PREFACE

PERHAPS a justification may be found for this addition to the many literary histories that abound, in the particular emphasis laid on a social background. Literature is viewed not as a mere academic product, but as one expression of the many-sided activities of national growth. An historical sketch of contemporary social and political events is given as prelude to every important period in the development of English letters, in order that the inter-relation between Art and Life may be the more clearly appreciated, while in the more purely critical portions the author has attempted always to disengage the human element in the literary work under discussion.

His cordial thanks are due to Miss Rose Abrams, L.L.A., to Miss Elizabeth H. Lee, and to his brother, Charles E. Compton-Rickett, for material and valuable assistance in various portions of the work. He is under obligation also to Mr. John Lawrence Lambe, who kindly read part of the later portion in proof, and made some valuable suggestions. He is grateful, especially, to Miss E. H. Lee, for having helped him so considerably in the biographical sections and in the arduous work of revision.

Permission to make certain quotations has been kindly accorded by the following :

Swinburne, and Theodore Watts-Dunton, for their courtesy in granting a ready permission to use freely their respective works; also to Mr. William Meredith for his interest in the biography of his father, the late Mr. George Meredith, and for kindly placing fresh biographical matter at his disposal.

INTRODUCTION

"History's true object of study," says Fustel de Coulanges, "is the human mind." Whatever objections may be urged against this definition, it certainly possesses the merit of emphasizing the psychological bond that connects history with literature. Any account of a nation's march in bygone times must reveal to some extent its mental characteristics; just as any record of its literature must disclose some pulsings of its social life. While therefore a history of English Literature is a history of the inner life, a record of dreams and ideals, it needs to be limned on a background of its social activities, in order to be clearly seen and nicely appraised.

Oliver Wendell Holmes once reminded us, that the human soul was an omnibus in which sit the shades of our ancestors. So the first thing to recognise in dealing with our imaginative life, is its complex inspiration.

Looking at the splendid fabric of English Literature, we realise in it a "coat of many colours", for it is shot with the varying tints of racial characteristics. To its making have gone the prismatic fancy of the Celt, the sombre passion of the Teuton, the golden gaiety of France, Scandinavian greys, Italian purples. Yet for all its composite character it is not a thing of patchwork quality, but an harmonious blend, in which one element predominates. That element is the Anglo-Saxon. We have only to analyse some passage of representative modern poetry to realise how despite our linguistic debts to France, to Italy, and to Greece, the Saxon tongue is the one outstanding feature in our speech.

The first indwellers of our Islands were a rude, primitive race, that we term Palæolithic. A devoted geologist, Mr. James Cross, has spent many years searching for evidence of Palæolithic culture in the tertiary deposits swept together by the Thames near Gravesend. The present river flows at least a hundred feet below the deposits of silt and gravel in which Mr. Cross' fine series of London palæoliths were found. They can be seen at the Royal Scottish Museum in Edinburgh. The tomahawk is the weapon most generally met with—a flint or stone with a "butt" or bruising end, a cutting edge, a well-marked strengthening rib, and a "tang" to which the wooden shaft is bound. This was bound to a split stick with a fibre fastening. With these, hand daggers were found heavy at the base and sharply pointed, with a carefully hollowed place for the thumb and finger-tips. Strangely enough, all these palæoliths were found within a strictly limited area. All the evidence goes to show that the site of the Palæolithic finds was a ford by which the primitive Londoners crossed the Thames. If men lay there in wait for the game which might come to the ford to drink, or the traveller who might be passing that way, it is easy to see why weapons would be found in the river's silt at that spot and nowhere else. But however this may be, there existed the ford over the Thames in Palæolithic times. The dark, curly-haired, narrow-headed, dwarfish men who succeeded them, those of the Neolithic age, overran the country and possessed it until the Celts ran their keels ashore upon the gravels and sands of Kent. Doubtless, they cut their terraced fields, their long grave barrows, and communal earth-works where London now stands.¹

Then came the first Celtic invasion; the Goidels, or the Gaels. These men drove the inhabitants to the West and North, but thoroughly intermingled with them, and the Gael persists to this very day.

A second inroad of Aryan people came in about 300 B.C., and has been distinguished from the first by the term Brythons. These invaders did not spread so far as the Gaels, settling largely in the south-west and west, and becoming known later as the Cymri, or, as the English called them, the Welsh. Their spirit glows in the magical verse of Mr W. B. Yeats, and the imaginative prose of Synge; it animates the fantasies of "Fiona Macleod," and by its spell George MacDonald achieved his highest flights of romantic beauty.

Thus Brythons, Gaels, and Neolithic were now closely intermingled. The Cymri had their own literature—a literature of war songs; serious legends with a stern and melancholy note, that mingled later with the gay and lively fancy of the Norman romancers, sobering its morcual gaiety, and in the process, taking on itself more varied and plastic moods.

The Roman occupation of Britain affected our literature only in one particular; that is, in the indirect religious influence it brought to bear upon the inhabitants, first through the Christianised Cymri, secondly through the missionary priests in the seventh century.

Formative Influences in English Literature

From the foregoing sketch of our Literature, certain formative influences will have emerged—the Saxon, the Celtic, the Danish, and the Norman. It may not be amiss at this point to develop and clarify these.

The Saxon genius of the race voiced itself more readily in social and political life than in literature. It was essentially practical and orderly. Passion and imagination were not alien but subordinate qualities here; for the characteristics most insistent in the Saxon were those precisely that made for sound and efficient national life. Patience and perseverance, the capacity for obedience, an instinct for law and method, the spirit of adventure, power of endurance, and fidelity to a cause that has once touched the emotions: qualities such as these more easily and more naturally find congenial expression in political institutions and social initiative. In themselves they prepare the soil for great literature rather than directly create it. They act as fertilisers, giving strength and vitality to the vegetation, restraining wild luxuriance, and eliminating the weeds. To speak of the unimaginative Saxon, as some Celtic enthusiasts do, is absurd. It is not the quantity but the quality of his imagination that differentiates him from the Celt and Norman. His imagination is clear and intense, with a certain fierce simplicity and bleak directness, whereas the Celtic imagination is iridescent and exuberant, subtle and pervasive rather than simple and strong, allusive and mystical rather than direct and practical.

As against these diverse types, there is the equally distinctive imagination of the Norman, livelier and nimbler than the other two, lacking the solid tenacity of the Saxon and the ironic melancholy of the Celt, but excelling in gaiety, animal spirits, and a logical inventiveness derived from Latin sources.

In the making of our poetry, the Saxon imagination is seen to best advantage in simple love-ballads, in verse infused with strong yet tender piety, in the epic where its capacity for lucidity and repression is happily marked.

In the making of our prose, its influence is more emphatic, for reasons not hard to understand. Too rigid in texture, too prone to economy of effects, its inspiration in verse is necessarily circumscribed. Simplicity, temperance of expression, clarity, and high seriousness of purpose find happier medium in prose; and history, science, and speculative thought, owe much to its integrating power.

Turning to the influence of the Celt, we realise that if the Saxon brought intensity, the Celt as certainly brought variety. To our poetry he gave subtle shades of meaning, delicate nuances of humour and pathos, a wealth of rich fancies, like the network of tracery that adorns a Gothic cathedral. To our prose the Celt brought the gift of satire and ironic introspection, from mordant and savage to a mood of elfish mockery; fine graces of style; and to both prose and verse that passionate love of Nature and mystical interpretation of her phenomena, that differs widely from the half fearful, if stoical attitude of the Saxon in face of the primal facts of life.

There is a fundamental affinity between the Danish and the Saxon influence. The Dane merely repeated in somewhat cruder fashion the spirit of the Anglo-Saxon invaders. Directly, it was a negative influence on Literature, and retarded the progress of our tongue for some time, but indirectly in the long run, it welded the people more closely together, and infused into verse much of that compelling attraction for the sea, that meets us in early English Literature.

Neither the Saxon nor the Celt by himself would have made our literature the great heritage it is, but in conjunction the one happily supplemented the other; and our greatest poetry and finest prose is that in which the Celtic and Teutonic elements are the most closely intermingled. Where the one offered strength, the other gave grace. Saxon simplicity and orderliness straightened out the ebullient extravagances of the Celtic mind; and the plastic charms of the latter softened the stiffer outlines of the English genius. Without the driving power of the Saxon, the dreams of the Celt would have been like exquisite star dust, drifting ineffectually through the literary firmament.

The Norman influence, though less insistent than the Celtic and Saxon, is more complex. There was a Celtic element, of course, in the Norman, and with this he mingled something of the Latin South and the Norse.

The Normans were Northmen softened and modified by Southern intercourse. It seemed at first, after the Conquest, as if the Norman influence would be the paramount one, for it started a fresh era of literary history with a suppression of the native tongue. The cultured life of the day was ruled by French and Latin models.

An age of Latin writers was inaugurated. Latin of course was no new thing to the English clergy, it had been spoken and written by them for centuries, but the close contact with Rome inaugurated at the Conquest, extended its dominion to an extraordinary extent. French became the language of the well-born, and the English vernacular was deliberately disregarded.

France at this time was the intellectual centre of Western Europe. Quick and adaptable in her temperament, she set the pace, and others followed as best they might. France was by no means profoundly original, her body of literature was inferior in quality to that of England before the Conquest; but she had the gift of purloining the ideas of others, and transforming them into an especially acceptable form.

A remarkable illustration of this is furnished by the Arthurian Cycle, which was originally Celtic in its inspiration, but owing to French redaction and elaborations, became one of the most popular of European Romances.

We have sketched the chief formative influences in our Literature. At a later date, Italy, Spain, and France exerted a potent influence upon English Letters. Italy in the early Renaissance, Spain in the late Renaissance, and France during the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries. There was also, in the late Middle Ages, a touch of far Eastern thought, and during the Renaissance, more than a touch of Greek idealism upon our literature. Notwithstanding these many influences, the two most considerable are the Celtic and the Saxon, that so closely commingled at the time of the Conquest as to be inseparable. The greatness of our Literature then is due to these two great formative influences.

I THE ANGLO-SAXON AT HOME

When first we catch a glimpse of the Anglo-Saxon tribes they are leading a pastoral life on the shores of the Baltic and the North Sea, in a country bleak and low-lying. But the atmosphere of repose which the word "pastoral" suggests to most people, is not to be found here. Our forefathers shared the intense restlessness that characterised the Germanic people as a whole.

Tillers of the soil, and hunters by compulsion, they became also by force of circumstance fierce sea-rovers. Inured by long privation to the terrors of the sea, they made little of its dangers, and a Roman writer has told us, how that they would plunder the western coasts, sailing down upon them in their high-prowed warships in the midst of a storm so that their victims might be the less prepared. Truly enough were they likened to sea-wolves.

In appearance they were big, large-limbed men, with blue-grey eyes and ruddy faces, relentless, savage, and daring, yet courageous and faithful to one another, and among their women folk gentle and loyal. Infanticide was not infrequent, for valour was prized above all things, and a weakly child might survive only to bring shame and disgrace upon his kinsmen.

Naturally enough, this ingrained passion for action expressed itself most readily in fighting; this was peculiarly attractive, for not only did it provide an outlet for their physical energy but it afforded also an excellent chance of their gaining the Teutonic Paradise of Walhalla. A courageous death on the field of battle opened the entrance to those Halls in which a banquet of boar's flesh and ale was for ever being celebrated.

Moreover, war held out the prospect of material advantages. Energy does not necessarily imply industry; and the Germans were always ready to substitute plunder for labour, whenever it was possible to do so. Piratical expeditions first brought the Anglo-Saxons into contact with this Island. But the days were not long enough to satisfy these adventurous spirits, therefore, when night fell, gambling took the place of fighting as a means of varying the monotony of existence. According to Tacitus, it was "a serious occupation with them even when they were sober." While to such a pitch were these games of chance carried that sometimes even personal liberty was staked—and lost. No catastrophe was more bitter than this, for the love of freedom was one of the most marked characteristics of the Teutonic races. It was this intolerance of constraint which explains why they so long preferred to live in small communities. "They dwell scattered and apart," writes the Roman historian, "just as a spring, meadow, or wood has attracted them." Moreover, even in the village itself, the houses were always detached from one another. The same spirit recurs in their political institutions. All questions of common interest were discussed in the presence of the Freemen of the tribe who signified their dissent by a murmur and their approbation by the clashing of spears, and it is quite characteristic that—in early times at any rate—business was delayed, perhaps for two or three days, by the casual manner in which the people assembled. With this pronounced individualism it is, therefore, not surprising to find that the warrior chieftains controlled their followers rather by the force of example than by military discipline. Positive, as well as negative reasons combined to make this the most effective method of control, for the Germans possessed a sense of personal loyalty in a marked degree. To support and protect a courageous leader on the battle-field was with them a point of honour, and to survive his death was to incur a lifelong disgrace. That this feeling of devotion was mutual, is well illustrated by the legend that has gathered round the name of the great Ostrogoth—Theodoric. It tells us how his enemy Ermenrich having captured several of his men, demanded the entire surrender of Theodoric's kingdom as the price of their lives, and how the Ostrogothic leader not only consented to, but actually fulfilled this condition of their safety; for he says "Even though all the empires of the world were mine, I would give them away rather than desert my dear faithful thanes."

Equally pleasing was their attitude towards strangers. Perhaps no race has ever been more renowned for its hospitality than the Teutons.

"Every German," to quote Tacitus once again, "receives his guest with a well-furnished table. When his supplies are exhausted he who was but now the host becomes the guide to further hospitality, and without invitation they go to the next house." Having washed his hands and feet the guest joined the family board, and using his fingers instead of a fork, helped to devour the vast quantities of meat which were always in requisition. The meal being brought to a lively, if somewhat hazardous conclusion by the practice of throwing the bones about the place, the more serious business of the evening began—namely the drinking. Around the blazing fire in the centre of the long Hall our ancestors sat far into the night consuming ale with which their women folk supplied them; and should this prove of inferior strength the feminine brewers suffered accordingly, for quality as well as quantity was deemed essential for those convivial gatherings. But though somewhat exacting in this respect the Teutons made ample amends by the high esteem in which they held their women.

In Anglo-Saxon times a woman possessed liberties which it has taken her centuries to recover. Not only were the rights of property and of taking judicial proceedings accorded to her, but she was also allowed to attend the meetings of the Township in which local politics were discussed, and, on occasions, even the national council of the Witanagemote.

Mental unfaithfulness was both rare and punishable, but though making good husbands, the Anglo-Saxon by no means favoured absolute equality of the sexes. Whilst a girl was still a "spinster" she was under paternal authority, and marriage merely effected a transfer of masters. Should she prove insubordinate, "three blows with a broomstick" were considered a wholesome corrective. Yet with all its limitations the Teutonic conception of womanhood was superior, not simply to Oriental ideas—that would not be saying very much—but even to the notions of such a highly civilised people as the ancient Greeks.

The Germanic people compared most favourably with the nations of the East in another particular, namely, in their capacity for progress.

The Teutons possessed to quite a remarkable extent the power of adapting themselves to strange surroundings and of assimilating a foreign civilisation. It is this aptitude which accounts for the absorption of Gothic customs and ideas that transformed Norsemen into Normans with such surprising rapidity, and explains the speed with which the antagonisms of 1066 were forgotten in this Island. Of all racial endowments there are perhaps none more valuable than this mental elasticity; and it would be difficult to over-estimate its influence upon the national history of the Anglo-Saxon people.

II. ENGLISH LITERATURE BEFORE THE SAXON CONQUEST

The earliest English literature is unwritten. It consists of songs and legends, heroic and stirring in character, sung to the harp by the minstrel and gleeman, and handed down from one generation to another. Parents taught these tales to their children, and the younger learned of the elder singer. Our Saxon forefathers used an alphabet, just as the Scandinavians did, but it was used for inscriptions and not for distinctively literary purposes. It served to adorn a sword hilt, not to perpetuate a legend. So it is impossible to say by whom these old stories and myths were originally composed, for they come to us out of the dim past, with the accretions of years upon them, and with the impress of many a singer, each of whom has unconsciously added something to the ancient tale.

It is not until much later that these old stories were written down; and the blend of Christian and Pagan sentiment is due to the fact that many were first set down, after the introduction of Christianity, when the monk who took them in hand wished to infuse religious sentiment into the rough heathen saga.

But if in olden times the poetry was unwritten, this was not because it was lightly esteemed. The minstrel was the preacher and moralist of heathen times. His song stirred men to deeds of courage and endurance, he glorified the heroes of the past, offered solace to the chieftain whose fortunes had been marred, and renewed in him fresh hope for the future. No day was complete without the minstrel's aid. After the fighting and hunting, when the chieftain and his followers were refreshing their bodies with meat and drink, then came the gleemen to minister to their minds; and the songs sung then were stored up in the warriors' memories, so that in the stress of battle they might shout out as did the Israelites of old, some snatch of song which would at once inspire themselves and confound their enemies.

The minstrel was not the only singer, albeit the chief. So far as we can tell, the most important minstrel was the scōp or shaper of verse. He composed verses as well as sang them. The secondary minstrel and the gleeman (or Harper), merely repeated them. His was a less dignified post, and the very name suggests that he was not merely a singer but a maker of fun, from gléo (A.-S.) = fun, amusement. In this personage, therefore, we may trace the early jester, who was to take such a prominent part in mediæval entertainments. Indeed, he lasted until Elizabethan times, and was inseparable from the earlier dramas of the age.

Our Saxon forefathers then, were, in common with other nations of the time, a singing folk. Not only did the chieftain have his own bard to cheer him, but he himself—witness Hrothgar in Béowulf—was a singer. He carried his song along with his sword into battle. His whole life was a chant. On his way to the fight, ploughing through the sea-storm, he sang; after the strivings were over, at the festive board, he sang again, and was sung to. In the moment of victory, he sang exultantly to his Gods, the sky and the earth, and their gracious son, the Summer. In the hour of death, he used his last breath to sing a farewell to his people.

The circling seasons, the alternate reign of day and night, fed his imagination and found expression in the many Nature myths that served as his early religion. Then, on to these myths became grafted stories of the great men who had done mighty deeds; and soon the doings of the heroes became one with the doings of the gods. An early example of this is found in the poem Béowulf, that arose as an oral saga, made up of pagan songs celebrating the hero's prowess, long before it was written down and Christianised by the monks.

III. OLD ENGLISH HEATHEN POETRY

Béowulf

At the close of the eighteenth century, this poem was found in a manuscript written about A.D. 1000. It is essentially a mosaic of pagan tales, blent with a certain basis of historical fact. Possibly, Béowulf himself is not an integral part of the old legend, which is found associated with other heroes. About the eighth century this mosaic is placed in a Christian setting, with which it harmonises but ill. Pagan monsters and biblical allusions go oddly together. Probably a monk is the writer who dealt last with these legends; such an explanation would account for the moralising strain that runs throughout the poem. Béowulf praises God for His gifts to men. There is much to support the contention that this ethical and religious note is of quite late introduction.

The poem contains over three thousand lines, and is supposed to be the oldest surviving epic of the Teuton people, anterior to the Scandinavian sagas, and considerably older than the great mediæval romances of southern Europe.

Its importance for us lies in its emphatic indication that our literature is essentially Teutonic in origin.

The Story—Béowulf has been not unfairly described as a knight errant before the days of chivalry. He is a mighty warrior of royal Swedish blood who has not only fought with man but has defied the fiercest storms that have swept over the seas, and grappled with the awful sea monsters that inhabit their depths.

To the help of the venerable King Hrothgar he comes, whose kingdom has been ravaged by a dreadful monster, Grendel by name. Béowulf meets this monster face to face, and after a terrible fight wounds him to the death. But the monster has a mother, even more fearsome than he. She inhabits the floods, and Béowulf has to descend into these chill and dark waters to find her. The conflict that ensued is more harrowing than the other, and is described with Homeric vigour. Just when he is about to succumb to the fury of her attack, he comes across a huge sword which does the work pretty effectually, and the subsequent proceedings interest this lady no more. Béowulf is not allowed to rest long without a further display of prowess. But he survives a reign of fifty years, well seasoned with valorous deeds, before he meets with a fiery dragon that has been having things all its own way. The dragon is killed, but not before its venomous poison has infected Béowulf. Knowing that his end has come, he speaks to his friend with fine stoical resignation.

"I have held the people fifty years; there was not any king of my neighbours, who dared to greet me with warriors, to oppress me with terror. . . . I held mine own well, I sought not treacherous malice, nor swore unjustly many oaths; on account of all this, I, sick with mortal wounds, may have joy. . . . Now do thou go immediately, to behold the hoard under the hoary stone, my dear Wylaf. . . . Now I have purchased with my death a hoard of treasures; it will not be yet of advantage at the need of the people. . . . I give thanks. . . . that I might before my dying day obtain such for my peoples. . . . longer may I not here be" (xxxvii., xxxviii.).

The Literary Style.—The literary method is massive and sweeping rather than subtle and varied. The poem is akin to the old sagas, and like them excels in broad effects, and in impressive directness of speech. The crude savagery of the original legends has been transmuted through the various minds brought to bear upon the poem, into a fine appraisement of Béowulf's goodness of heart and unselfish devotion to others. He is not merely a man of great physical strength; there is a moral splendour about his character. Nor is this side ever lost sight of.

Its Origin—How was the poem introduced into English literature?

It has been suggested that the poem is in its basis a Scandinavian saga. The poem, however, though Scandinavian in its setting, contains no Scandinavian words or phrases. Earle believes that the story of Béowulf was a piece of the prehistoric folk lore of which a fresh edition was made in Merovingian Gaul. From Gaul, the story, latinised by some Frankish scholar, passed over here and was worked up into the epic. The subject is still debated by scholars, by no means in agreement, but this, at any rate, affords one explanation to account for inconsistencies in the poem.

Its Historical Value—The picture of social life given us in Béowulf is essentially primitive. To fight valorously, to eat and drink well, to be soothed by music after the day's labour and then—to sleep.

The men described are men of few words; brave and loyal where their affections are concerned, but cruel and implacable otherwise. There is no gaiety about them. Life to them is a sombre business; the melancholy of the North is about them.

Great emphasis is laid upon the splendour of Court life, and for this reason its historical value as a picture of aristocratic society in Saxon times has been commented on by some of the critics.

The scenic background is well suited for such men. It is bleak and cold, and the rough and rugged land is swept by storms. We realise here "the winds that would be howling at all hours." Whether on sea or land, Nature is always in her blackest and fiercest moods. There is no sentiment, no tenderness, to relieve the gloom. Fierce animal spirits dominate.

But if sombre, there is an austere grandeur about the poem, and a fine stoical resignation.

The scenes and people are Scandinavian, but the one great, vital figure is that of Béowulf. He stands before us as the early English ideal of virile courage and nobility. What Achilles is to the Greek, Romulus to the Roman, Charlemagne to the French, Béowulf is to the Englishman. Beside him, King Arthur is but a shadowy figure.

Widsith and Deor

Widsith is the earliest of the poems made by our forefathers on the Continent. Widsith is the wide wanderer, or far traveller. He tells of his wanderings, speaks of the foudal halls in which he sang, and how men loved his song, and gave him gifts; so that wherever he went he found a ready welcome. He sings of war, and not unfittingly, for had not he himself fought with the Huns?

At the close of his poem he praises his art, inasmuch as it has brought him joy. Adversity he has known at times, but not so grievous that his art could find no solace for it.

Another early poem is The Complaint of Deor. Deor also is a minstrel, but he is no wanderer. He belongs to the household of his chief, and is happy in his position until he finds himself supplanted by a rival. But the singer bids himself take heart and endure his misfortune, and the note of stoical resignation is the insistent note. The poem is lyrical in form, with a definite refrain, and may be called our first English lyric.

Deor gives the reverse side of the picture of the gleeman painted by Widsith.

The manuscript poem dates from the eleventh century, and, like Béowulf, has been Christianised. But it is clearly an old heathen saga, in origin.

In addition to these wandering songs, there are traces of a saga about Finn, King of the North Frisians, in the Battle of Finnsburg, a fragment of an old pagan tale about Waldhere of Aquitaine; and some curious verses sung by the Teutonic peasant, while he followed his pastoral occupations, or sailed on some voyage of adventure. These were called The Charms, and though, like Béowulf, they became later infused with religious sentiment, they are primarily heathen songs, addressed to the Elements—to the Valkyries and to Woden. They are genuine nature myths, filled with that mingled fear and love of the ancient earth that we find among primitive peoples.

IV. ENGLISH LITERATURE AFTER THE SAXON CONQUEST

(i) The Poetry

Hitherto the poetry, though written in the English language is not strictly part of the literature of England. The first native maker of English verse is CÆDMON. He was a simple, unlettered man, an inmate of St. Hilda's Monastery, near Whitby, to whom fell the task of looking after the cattle. Leaving the feast and the singers, because he could not take part, he fell asleep among the cattle. And while he slept he dreamed that one came to him and commanded him to sing. "Of what am I to sing?" said Cædmun. "About the beginning of created things." He then fashioned a song about the Creation, and awakened from his dream. The song he remembered, and made many more like it. And after this he became a monk. The Bible was read to him because he could not read, and he would turn those passages that appealed especially to him, into verse.

These stories in verse—Cædmun's Paraphrase—were written about 870, and became very famous. Thus did the old paganism merge into the Christian sentiment of the time. Of these poems only a fragment has survived, quoted by Bede and carried from monastery to monastery. But the influence of Cædmun upon his successors was great. So we may say of Cædmun, that he founded a new school of religious poetry, and it is probable that his verse served as a model for many subsequent writers.

CYNEWULF is in the line of succession from Cædmun. It is not improbable that he was the author of the Christ, possibly also of the Judith, and the Dream of the Rood. He was a Northumbrian who lived at the close of the eighth century. We know little about his outward life, save that his youth was happy and irresponsible; and that he underwent suddenly a spiritual change, and regretted the careless pleasures of his earlier years. His view of life finds amplest expression in the Christ. The threefold coming of Christ is dealt with, and the last picture is that of the final Judgment. He gives a glowing picture of the Christian who has fought the good fight:

"A gladsome host of men; youth without age;
The glory of the heavenly chivalry; health without pain
For righteous workers, and for souls sublime
Rest without toil, there is day without dark gloom,
Ever gloriously bright; bliss without bale;
Friendship 'twixt friends forever without feud;
Peace without enmity for the blest in Heaven,
In the communion of Saints!"¹

CYNEWULF'S RIDDLES

Riddle I

My robes rest silent when I roam the earth,
Still, when I stay at home, or stir the waves;
Anon my pinions poise me up above
The high air o'er the homes of warriors
Far o'er the folk the cloud-force floateth me,
Mightily whirr my wings, make melody,
Sing wondrously, when I, a wanderer,
Touch neither world nor wave.

(A Swan.)

Riddle VII

Lo, the wind wafts aloft these little wights
Over the mountain brows, full black are they,
Swart, sable-clad, yet softly voiced in song
They wander forth in clouds, and clearly wail,
Float o'er the forest heights, or fly above
The city dwellings of the sons of men.
Behold, they name themselves!

(A Gnat.)²

There is the note of passion in his verse, but a note also of joy and confidence alien to the old pagan melancholy. Like a true Saxon he sings of "the clashing of the sea waves," and "the rolling of the waters," and of "foaming billows" that cover the earth.

During the following century the scattered poems of the past were gathered together into collections, and in the tenth century religious poetry is mingled with plentiful war songs, such as the Song of Brunanburgh (937), where the conflict between Saxon and Dane figures prominently.

Characteristics of Anglo-Saxon Poetry

1. It resembles Hebrew poetry, indulging in parallelism¹ and metaphorical phrases.

2. In metre it is marked by accent and persistent alliteration.

3. Rhyme is absent, and there are no definite number of syllables. The metre undergoes a good many variations, and responds to the nature of the subject.

4. The poetry was sung, for in early times poetry and music were one and indivisible, and the minstrel was free to modify the movement of the verse. Any modification introduced was, however, subject to certain rules. There were always four accented syllables and three alliterative syllables. Many changes were wrought later in the Middle English period through French influences, but the trick of alliteration has become an integral part of all English poetry, and though no longer a structural part of English prosody, is regarded to-day as an ornament, not an essential. It has been used with most remarkable effect by Swinburne.

5. There is a prevalence of compound words, by means of which the poet sought to condense the qualities of his subject. This characteristic also has survived.

For instance, when Rossetti speaks of "hoarse-tongued fire," or Keats of "lead-eyed despair," they are using a poetical method derived from our earliest verse.

6. The style of this poetry is, on the whole, diffuse, though when the writer is greatly moved it becomes more simple and direct. And while there is force and vigour, and often the austere splendour of the Icelandic Saga about the work, there are no graces or subtleties, and the lyric note is extremely rare.

The form of poetry chiefly favoured by these elder writers is the epic; it suited both their manner and matter, and lent itself to the treatment of heroic deeds. William Morris' translation of the Scandinavian Sagas will give the modern reader a fair idea of the trend and character of this early poetry.

(ii) The Prose

The prose, unlike the verse, was not used as an emotional stimulant; it was for the most part educational. What Christianity did to inspire the maker of verse has been seen, it was responsible also for the creation of the monk scholar, an individual who did much to shape the literature of this formative period. The first Englishman to become famous as a scholar and teacher was ALDHELM; he did for the South what at a later period Bede did for the North. After a while he was made Abbot of Malmesbury, then Bishop of Sherborne. He died in 709, after many achievements both in prose and verse. As was the custom of the time he did much of his work in Latin, but his English verse was esteemed highly by no less an authority than Alfred himself. He was interested more in music and architecture, and a church at Bradford-on-Avon remains as a memorial of his work, while of his skill as a musician and of his power to touch the hearts of the common people, tradition is eloquent. His is the one name of significance in the history of Wessex, until the time of Alfred, two hundred years later. On the whole, the North was far more noted for intellectual thought and vigour.

NORTHUMBRIA AS AN INTELLECTUAL CENTRE

The predominance of Northumbria in literary life was largely due to the activity of Irish missionaries, cultured and imaginative men, and to the greater influx of Roman civilisation into the North. The library at York was famous throughout Europe. The earlier phase of this intellectual vitality is seen in the religious verse of Caedmon and his successors, the later phase in the Latin prose of the monk scholar.

Of these, the first in importance is BEDE. In these words did the orphan scholar epitomise his life at the age of fifty-five: "I wholly applied myself to the study of the Scripture, and, amidst the observance of regular discipline, and the daily care of singing in the church, I always took delight in learning, teaching, and writing." He studied eagerly every department of human thought—the philosophies, arts, and sciences, and to his Ecclesiastical History we are indebted for our knowledge of the England of his time. He wrote in Latin for the most part, but was quick to recognise the possibilities of the Saxon tongue, and when dying is said to have repeated to himself some of these old poems.

He owed much to the Abbot of his monastery, Benedict, a keen and brilliant man. Bede was a fine classical scholar, and his writings abound in quotations from classical poets. Much of his work was of the text-book order, and his reputation as a teacher was as considerable as that of his scholarship. He had a school at Jarrow, of European fame.

WESSEX AS AN INTELLECTUAL CENTRE

With the coming of the Danes in the tenth century the seat of learning passed to Wessex. The Danish invasions were catastrophic to the progress of English literature. Attracted by the wealth of the great monasteries, they plundered and destroyed the finest. Worst of all, they burned the splendid libraries, until "there was not one house of learning left from the Forth to the Humber."

Happily a man arose at this time who rescued England from her sorry plight; and although too late to save the North, yet Middle and South England were preserved from ravage by the valorous master mind of Alfred, "Lord of the harp and liberating spear."

ALFRED, grandson of the doughty Egbert, was born at Wantage in Berkshire (849), and whilst a boy, was taken by his father, Ethelwulf, to Rome. There, Roman civilisation and ecclesiasticism impressed him in the most plastic years of his life.

On his return to England, he became deeply interested in the songs of his native land and the love of Saxon verse, and the prowess of his ancestors never left him.

From the dream of studious youth he was roughly awakened by the onslaughts of the Danes, and his early years as king were spent in fighting hard against them. Mercia, already, had been ravaged and lost; Wessex itself was in deadly peril. Then did he prove that he was a great warrior as well as a keen student; that he could fight like his heroes as well as sing about them. Thus did he win peace for his people, and having won peace he sought to nurture their mental life. So, after fifteen years of incessant warfare (c. 880), he had made peace with the foe and looked around to repair something of their wanton work of destruction. He founded a monastery at Athelney, saw to the education of his nobles, and while seeing to the careful training of the Churchmen, was mindful also of the common people. He is the pioneer of popular education, for it was his wish that "all the youth now in England of free men who have the wealth to be able to set themselves to it be put to learning while they are not of use for anything else."

To effect this he set to work to increase the abundance of English literature, and superintend the translation of many Latin books for the benefit of the people at large. He prepared a handbook for the clergy, saw to the translation of much of Bede's famous history, and adapted the philosophy of Boethius (a Roman patrician of the fifth and sixth centuries) for common use. "He took," said Mr. Frederick Harrison, "the Meditations of Boethius as a standard text-book of moral and religious thought, and he uses it as the basis of his own musings upon man, the world, and God."¹

Alfred may be remembered also as the first

Englishman of letters who was not a churchman, and the first to encourage the making of English prose. He wanted to make it loved and known by the people at large; and this could not be done while it was written in the Latin language favoured by the Church.

During his reign the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle came into existence; and if not his own work, it probably owed much to his inspiration. This is the most important landmark of Anglo-Saxon prose, and continued beyond the Conquest down to the death of Stephen.

No English king ever did more for his people than he. He had a genius for kingship, and never abused that endowment.

This brief record of Alfred's work may close with a passage from Boethius: "To be brief, I may say that it has ever been my desire to live honourably while I was alive, and after my death to leave to them that should come after me my memory in good works."

Of Alfred's greatness, there can be no question, but it was a greatness of personality rather than of Art. He was not a great poet, or a great proseman in the way that he was a great fighter and organiser. None the less by his zeal and industry he did well by English letters. He had the rare merit of clarity in his writing, and something of that naive charm which is often as delightful to the reader as literary skill.

ALFRED'S SUCCESSORS

Wessex continued to hold its own in intellectual matters until the coming of the Normans. The North never recovered from the ravish of the Danes. Among the most notable names are DUNSTAN, Abbot of Glastonbury (924-980), ÆTHELWOLD, EDGAR, and ELFRIC. Elfric especially concerned himself with the work of monastic reform. His writings were voluminous, the more important being his famous Homilies—excellent example of Saxon prose, and some metrical lives of the Saints.

But the tenth century saw a decline on the whole in literary impulse. The influence of Rome both in religion and scholarship, had done much to inspire the old Saxon writers. A fresh virile influence was now wanted. It came with the Norman Invasion.

MIDDLE ENGLISH PERIOD

(1066-1400)

Introduction—Mediaeval Scholarship and the Latin Writers · Chronicles and Histories.

INTRODUCTION

LATIN was the language in which the cultured man of Norman times wrote, and French was the language spoken in polite society. The Saxon tongue languished, and there is little doubt that the Norman Conquest did for a time militate against the development of our literature. Many Saxons wrote in French, and, with the exception of the Saxon Chronicle, which went on until 1154, the bulk of the prose was written in Latin. English prose after the Chronicle practically slumbered until its remarkable awakening in the sixteenth century.

Yet, after all, the Norman Conquest was not the conquest of England by an alien race. The Normans were originally Northmen like the Anglo-Saxons and Danes, even though southern influences had greatly modified their character and outlook. And this affinity was ultimately felt by both Saxon and Norman. Consequently there was a real fusion of the two races. On the Saxon side we accepted the traditions of France in matters poetical. On the Norman side we finally chose the Saxon tongue in place of the French in which to express ourselves.

MEDÆVAL SCHOLARSHIP AND THE LATIN WRITERS

CHRONICLES AND HISTORIES

Scholarship even before the Conquest had formed many links with the Continent. There was an exchange of students between the Universities of Oxford and Paris, Oxford being then in its infancy. French and Flemish ecclesiastics came to England, and Englishmen finished their training in French or Flemish monasteries. This intercourse received a powerful impetus with Lanfranc as Archbishop of Canterbury. A rich, learned ecclesiastical literature in Latin soon arose in England. There were many scholars who came to fill livings and stations of honour in the newly founded monasteries. They were far superior in many cases to the English clergy in their knowledge of the Latin writers, and in their style. The interests of the clergy were not confined to Biblical and theological subjects. The monasteries were great centres of hospitality and they entertained important statesmen and distinguished travellers. The abbots and monks, often scholarly, cultured men, took an interest in worldly affairs and in the statecraft of their age. Hence it is that the most important contribution to literature made by the Latin writers is the series of chronicles in which the chief aim of the writers was to give a faithful record of contemporary events. Many of these records breathe the charm of a personal narrative, and "though composed in a foreign tongue are written from a national point of view." Before dealing with the chroniclers we may just briefly glance at the theological work of Lanfranc and Anselm, and other churchmen, which preluded the establishment of a more national literature.

Lanfranc wrote about 1080, a book defending the doctrine of transubstantiation, called the Liber Sententiarum.

Anselm, who died in 1109, wrote a number of theological tracts and treatises: De incarnatione Verbi—Cur Deus Homo?—De Voluntate—and De concordia præscientiæ et prædeterminationis et gratiæ Dei cum libero arbitrio.

Osborne of Gloucester (1150) wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch and the Book of Judges. He also translated some Lives of the native Saints from Early English into Latin.

Robert Pullus who lectured at Oxford, compiled a manual of theology entitled Libri Sententiarum.

Other writers who laboured in this field were Hugo of Rouen, who died in 1164—Quæstiones theologice, Robert de Melun (d. 1167), whose speculations were embodied in his Summa Sententiarum. In addition to these purely technical theological works, there was also a mass of literature dealing with the lives of the Saints, especially Irish and Welsh saints—a number of English Saints were deposed by the more orthodox Normans.

The work of Ælred or Æthelred of Rievaulx, is distinguished for its spirit of mysticism. There is in it the same note of subjective religious intensity that is found later on in the works of Richard Rolle. Ælred wrote the Speculum charitatis, the dialogue De spirituali amicitia—A Rule for Nuns—Liber de institutione inclusarum—thirty-three homilies—A chronicle of the reign of Stephen, in which he describes the Battle of the Standard. He died in 1166 and twenty-five years later was canonised as a Saint.

Nor was the secular side of knowledge neglected by these Latin writers. Athelward of Bath studied at Tours and Laon and afterwards lectured at Laon, from whence he travelled Eastward, visiting Greece and Asia Minor, possibly even penetrating to Bagdad. On his return home, by his lectures and translations of mathematical and astronomical works he rendered the more advanced learning of the Arabs accessible to the West. Athelward had a passionate love of scientific knowledge and claimed the rights of reason as opposed to blind faith in authority. In his Quæstiones naturales he discusses with his nephew, who represents Western learning, having been trained at Laon, sixty-seven questions or problems in physical science. Athelward gives solutions according to the knowledge he has gained in the East, the nephew answering them according to the wisdom of the West. Athelward also wrote a treatise on the Abacus and the Astrolabe: he translated an Arabic work on astronomy, and introduced into England the first translation of Euclid, the latter remained a text book for generations. His treatise De eodem et diverso (the same and different) published before 1116, consists of a dialogue between Philosophy (Love of Wisdom) and Philocosmia (Love of the World). These under the guise of two women appeared to him when he was a student on the banks of the Loire. They dispute as to which of them shall have most claim on his affection. He finally chooses Philosophy. The treatise is an allegorical expression of his passion for learning.

In 1140 Robert de Retines, an Anglo-Norman, and his friend Dalmation Hermann went to Evora in Spain in order to study under Arab teachers. During this period Robert at the desire of Peter the Venerable, Abbot of Cluny, produced a translation of the Koran.

Alexander Neckham (1157–1217), who was born and educated at St Albans, afterwards taught at Paris, wrote a Treatise on Science, in Latin elegiac verse, in which he deals with Creation, the elements—fire, water, air—and the "seven arts," a number of other prose works and a commentary on Aristotle.

A number of Latin poems also belong to this period. Reginald of Canterbury (c. 1120), wrote a long poem on the legend of St. Malchus, a poem rendered somewhat tedious by its rhymed hexameters. He is, however, the author of a charming song of praise to his home in Southern France—Fagia.

Laurence of Durham, in the middle of the twelfth century in his Hypognosticon, tells the Bible history in Latin verse. His Consolationes pro morte amici, modelled on Boethius, combines prose and rhythm in an artistic manner. Henry of Huntingdon, better known as an historian, also distinguished himself in various forms of Latin verse.

The historical writers are, however, by far the most important both in bulk and consequence. Many causes contributed to the outburst of historic writing which occurs at this time. Under Henry I, England and Normandy were united and England assumed the dominant position. The Normans who settled in England adopted it as their country, hence the national character of works written by Anglo-Normans in an alien tongue. The Crusades moreover were exercising the same sort of stimulus as that afforded in later time by the Discovery of the New World. Men's minds were enlarged by new geographical knowledge, by the interchange of stories and romances. The "wonder" of the East gave to the more prosaic Western mind an element of magic to ponder over.

The Chroniclers, however, were for the most part sober-minded historians (Geoffrey of Monmouth forms a notable exception), who desired to set down the truth as they knew it. For the earlier part of their Chronicles they incorporated the work of previous writers, but in their contemporary records they write of things they have seen or heard related, and in many instances they have been in personal contact with the warriors and statesmen; they have handled the documents they describe, hence the value of their records. From Bede onwards, the monasteries had maintained a tradition of Chronicle-writing. Many of the monasteries had rooms set apart for the writing and copying of old books.

Two chief schools arose, one in the north—the Northumbrian, and one in the south, at St Albans. The former has been characterised as "the most ancient, the most fertile, longest-lived and most widely spread."

The first writer of this school to merit mention is Simeon, precentor of Durham. Simeon's work is based on Bede up till the ninth century, when he follows a Northumbrian Chronicle that has been lost and is now known to us only through Simeon's Chronicle. He then follows Florence of Worcester from 1121–9. The latter part of the work is the writer's own contribution. This may be cited as an example of the method adopted by the majority of the Chroniclers. This work of Simeon attained high repute and was continued down to the reign of King Stephen by two Priors of Hexham, the elder of whom, Richard, wrote an account of the acts of Stephen and the Battle of the Standard.

William of Newburgh (1136–1208?), who has been styled "the father of historical criticism" would almost certainly have been involved in a libel action had he lived in these days. His acuteness led him to describe Geoffrey of Monmouth's work as "a tissue of lies"! William limits himself to dealing with the events of his own times. He declares "that in our own times such great and memorable events have happened that the negligence of moderns would justly be reprehended should they fail to hand them to eternal memory in literary monuments."

Roger of Hoveden, who also belongs to the Northern school, wrote a history of several centuries compiled from various sources.

Southern School.—Florence of Worcester was a brother of the monastery of Worcester, and is notable for having produced the first attempt at Universal History in his Chronicon ex Chronicis. Beginning with the Creation of the World, he continues his account to 1082, with the help of the universal chronicle of Marianus Scotus, and for the latter part he uses the English Annals of Worcester. Florence is little more than a compiler, although occasionally the references to his own times are useful.

Eadmer, a Benedictine monk of Canterbury, a follower and intimate friend of Anselm, wrote in six books, a history of his own times down to 1122, entitled Historia Novorum in Anglia. Whilst concerning himself mainly with ecclesiastical matters, and aiming chiefly at giving an account of the Investiture Dispute of Anselm with William II and Henry, he includes matters which led up to the quarrel as well as those that followed and incidentally throws much light on social and political matters. His work is distinguished by its design and sense of proportion. Eadmer also wrote a life of Anselm which is the best authority on the subject.

Ordericus Vitalis was the son of a married priest who came over to England from Orleans with Roger de Montgomery, and settled at Atcham, near Shrewsbury. When Ordericus was ten years of age his mother died, and his father retired into a Benedictine monastery which had been founded by Roger. A year later Ordericus was sent to a monastery at Ouche, afterwards known as the Abbey St Evroult. There in his twelfth year he received the tonsure and his name was changed to Vitalis. He spent the rest of his life at the Abbey St Evroult, which possessed a magnificent library. His Historia Ecclesiastica, a work that occupied many years of his life, is more ambitious in scope than that of Eadmer. The history fills thirteen books; the first two books are compilations from Church History and deal with the period extending from the birth of Christ down to 855. They also contain a list of the popes till 1142. The next four books concern the foundation of the monasteries in Normandy and in particular the history of St. Evroult. The latter part consists of the History of the Norman Wars, and of the Church down to the Conquest. Eadmer is essentially a chronicler and not an historian, but his work is "a rich mine of material." He abounds in valuable suggestions; he inserted many genuine copies of letters and epitaphs, and he is on the whole an important authority.

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY (c. 1095–c. 1142).

Compared with Eadmer and Ordericus, William is a greater historian than either. Milton said of him, "Both for style and judgment, William is by far the best writer of all." William's great inspirer was Bode, and he desires to follow him and tell the history of England artistically, and critically, and especially to fill in the period occurring between the ancient and modern history. William's work is in two parts; a History of the Kings of England (449-1127), and the Historia Novella or Modern History (1142). The second part was written to please his patron Robert of Gloucester, and gives a description of the struggle between Stephen and the Empress Matilda. William's other works were a History of Glastonbury, and a Life of St Wulfstan. A man of sound judgment, William has also the artist's instinct for salient and significant features. A lover of books and a considerable traveller, his eager inquiring spirit carried him beyond the prejudices and narrow standards of the cloister. His fondness for anecdotes leads him to include in his writings many errors and fables, but he is able to invest his details with imaginative interest and his writings have therefore a value especially to the student of early English History.

As a historian, Henry of Huntingdon does not occupy such an important place as William of Malmesbury. Henry was a secular cleric, and lived under the patronage of Robert Bloet, Bishop of Lincoln, and afterwards under his successor Alexander of Blois. By command of Alexander he wrote his History of the English, which he extended to the year 1154. In the earlier portion he draws from Bode and the English Annals, but he also borrows from oral tradition and popular poetry. He gives from the Annals a metrical version of the Battle of Brunanburgh. Henry has been styled "a facile writer but a perfunctory historian."

"He was ambitious but not laborious, literary but not exact, intelligent but not penetrating, he formed large projects but was too indolent to exercise them satisfactorily."¹

De contemptu Mundi, his last work, addressed to the friend to whom he had dedicated his youthful verses—"A youth to a youth I dedicated juvenilities, an old man to an old man I destine now the thoughts of age."

The Life of Thomas à Becket, written by William Fitz-Stephen, himself a Londoner, and a witness of Becket's death, contains some interesting references to the social life of the times. He testifies also to the popularity of the Miracles.

Benedict of Peterborough. Benedict's name has been associated with the most authoritative Chronicle of the reign of Henry II (begun 1172), but all that can be stated with any certainty is that the MS was transcribed by his order. Benedict wrote the Passion and Miracles of Becket.

Ralph of Diceto occupied an important position being Archdeacon of Middlesex, and from 1180-1202 he was Dean of St Paul's. Ralph was consequently brought in contact with many of the public men of the day. His Imagines Historiarum is therefore of interest from this point of view. Ralph was a shrewd judge of character, and endeavours to analyse the motives and underlying causes of events.

Gervase of Canterbury may be mentioned as a writer who perpetuates the Brutus legend in his Gesta Regum.

The Chronicle of Jocelin of Brakelond, monk of St Edmundsbury, affords a picture of monastic and social life of the twelfth century.

Giraldus Cambrensis (Gerald de Barri) (1146?-1220?), was born in Wales of Norman parents, and was distinguished throughout his life for his passionate love for his country. A scholar trained in Paris and an eminent churchman, he was twice elected by the chapter to the Bishopric of St. David's, but was kept out by the opposition of the king. A quick observer of men, with a ready faculty for all kinds of curious knowledge, of which he has left a record in his Topographia Hibernica, an account of a tour in Ireland, which he undertook with Prince John, and in Itinerarium Cambriae. He also wrote an autobiography.

Walter Map (Mapes), was born on the borders of Wales in 1143. Map studied at the University of Paris. An amusing sketch of the University at this time is given in Wireker's Brunellus, or Speculum Stultorum (Mirror of Fools), a satirical poem consisting of 3800 lines of Latin elegiac verse.

Map came to England in attendance on King Henry II. He held many offices at various times, being a judge, chaplain to the king, he also represented Henry at the court of Louis VII. He became a canon of St. Paul's, Precentor of Lincoln and finally Archdeacon of Oxford. His De Nugis Curialium (Of Courtiers' Trifles), the title of which he borrowed from his learned contemporary John of Salisbury, Bishop of Chartres (1176), who produced a work entitled Polycraticus, or On the Trifles of Courtiers and Tracks of the Philosophers (1158-9). Map gave the title to his commonplace book, a medley of curious information and witty anecdotes. He gives an account of the various heretical sects of the twelfth century, together with reflections on the Norman kings and current opinions. His work might well be styled, Table Talk at the Court of Henry II.

Matthew Paris (c. 1155-1259), the greatest of all the mediæval historians, was a Benedictine monk of St Alban's Abbey (1217). There arose at this Abbey an influential school of historical writers. St. Alban's Abbey was the chief centre of monastic culture in the tenth century. It possessed many advantages, it stood on the main road (Watling Street), and was therefore in constant intercourse with important men of the day, since the monasteries entertained travellers of every degree. Moreover the writing of history had been carefully organised under Abbot Simpson (d. 1163), who established a regular office of "historiographer." Roger of Wendover was the first occupant of the office and Matthew Paris succeeded to the post on the death of Roger in 1286. He revised and continued the Flores Historiarum of Roger in his Historia Major, a work that gives a comprehensive and wonderfully skilful survey of English and Continental history down to 1250. In 1248 Matthew accepted the invitation of Hacon, King of Norway, to undertake a mission of reform to the monks of Holm. He was absent eighteen months. On his return he enjoyed the favour and intimacy of Henry III, who gave him information concerning matters of state which form a valuable element in his history. He also gave him a seat near the throne during the Feast of Edward the Confessor in 1247, in order that the event might be accurately recorded. Matthew was a man of wide sympathies, scholar, courtier, monk and man of the world, and in addition a born historian. He took much trouble to verify his facts and obtained information from many sources. He had numerous correspondents both at home and abroad. It has been said his work reads like a "stately journal of European events." He is at times an outspoken critic, not afraid to rebuke the king or denounce the rapacity of the nobles.

Matthew stands at the head of the historians of Henry's day, and after his death the art of the historian entered on a period of decline. The literary distinction which marked the writers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was not continued in their successors.

Henry of Bracton (d. 1268) wrote a treatise on the laws of England. In addition to his legal work he left a note-book containing two thousand cases taken from the Plea Rolls of his time with comments "which probably came from Bracton's hand and head." Bracton was not first in the field, for Ralph Glanville, who is said to have lent Richard I £15,000 for the Crusades, and to have been killed at the Siege of Acre in 1190, wrote a Treatise on the Laws and Customs of England. The difference between them is that whereas Glanville regarded his subject from the practical point of view, Bracton treated it from the standpoint of the theorist.

THE GOIDELS

THE connection between the Goidels (Irish Celts) and the Brythons, has been the subject of much discussion. One theory would suggest that the Goidels were the first immigrants from the Continent; they were followed by the Brythons, who gradually drove the Goidels into Ireland, those left behind being absorbed into the Brythonic race. These transmitted their legends to their adopted race, hence the similarity of Welsh and Irish legends; and although they were afterwards developed along independent lines, yet the substratum enables us to detect their essential identity.

Another theory maintains that the Goidels invaded Ireland and that the Welsh borrowed the stories from the conquerors.

A third theory, that perhaps presents fewer difficulties, would account for the community of ideas by supposing the stories to rest upon a mythological basis common to the Aryan family that have been developed along different lines by Goidel and Brython.

The Irish did not come under Roman influence until some two or three centuries after it had affected Wales, consequently, the early written literature of Ireland represents a more archaic representation of Celtic antiquity than even the Welsh. The fact that the Irish had no common foe to strive against resulted in the retention of the tribal divisions, and the glorification of the tribal hero and freebooter rather than the national hero.

THE BEGINNINGS OF CELTIC LITERATURE

Until very recent times the wealth and extent of Irish literature had been very vaguely realised. Its very existence was denied by many who, ignorant of the language and prejudiced by political feeling, would not allow any good thing to be enshrined in Gaelic. The great Celtic revival stimulated and inspired by the publication of Macpherson's pseudo-Ossian in 1762-3, led to the recovery and investigation of many ancient MSS. Although much had already perished, enough remains to show the universal love of literature among the Irish people and the wide distribution of traditional songs and sagas. The studies of European scholars—Stokes, Windisch, Zimmer, Zeuss, Jubanville, as well as those of Irish scholars O'Curry, Dr Hyde, and Miss Eleanor Hull in England—have served to establish the close affinity of Celtic literature with Greek and the parent Aryan.

The dawn of Irish literature is veiled in the mists of antiquity, it probably arose in a period anterior to the Bardic schools of the Druids. The Bardic schools collected and handed on the oral race traditions and were the means also of their diffusion throughout Ireland. Caesar speaks of the numbers who frequented these schools.

The training of a bard was an arduous one. It took from nine to twelve years to learn the 350 stories (250 greater and 100 lesser) with which the ollavh (ollav) had to be acquainted, and a man might spend twenty years ere he became proficient in his art and attained the highest dignity accorded to the bard. These stories might not be committed to writing, although it is not supposed that the bards actually memorised them in their entirety. They learned the sequence of the tale, and by long practice were able to give it poetic form, elaborating the incidents as the individual fancy of the reciter inclined him. In course of time this led to divergences, and different versions of the same story became current. The Ogam, a runic alphabet that has been found inscribed on wood and stone of which there are about three hundred known—two hundred being discovered in the south-west of Ireland—was possibly also used by the bards to assist them in memorising their tales. The Dialogue of the Two Sages tells that Diarmuid mac Fergus ordered the words of Caoilte and Ossian to be inscribed on "the headless staffs of poets."

These square staffs carried by the poets, upon which they scratched or cut Ogam characters, O'Curry supposed to have been in the nature of a fan that would close up. Upon these they could carry the history and genealogy of a race, and the framework of their narratives.

The purely native schools of the Brehons and the Bards continued to flourish side by side with the monastic schools.

The most ancient poem in Ireland is attributed to a Milesian, Amergin, brother of Eber; and is perhaps the oldest surviving poem in any vernacular of any country in Europe with the exception of Greece.

One of the oldest prose treatises in Irish is the Instructions to a Prince, ascribed to King Cormac, and written in the form of a dialogue between Cormac and his son Cairbré.

These Instructions are interesting as containing an account of pagan ethics. The language is so ancient as to have required considerable glossing in the Book of Ballymore.

THE INTRODUCTION OF CHRISTIANITY

With the conversion of Ireland to Christianity came the introduction of the Latin alphabet and Latin literature, and the establishment of monastic schools. These soon became famous. In A.D. 664, during a time of plague, numerous Anglo-Saxons who fled to Ireland were, according to Bede, given food, instruction and books to read, thus showing the extent to which books had already multiplied.

Great numbers of foreigners—Gauls, Teutons, Swiss, Italians—crowded to these schools in which a wonderful standard of scholarship was maintained. Greek, Hebrew, and Latin were taught in addition to grammar, philosophy, theology, &c. Moreover, this instruction was given to the foreign students through the native language. A number of the very oldest Irish texts are contained in the glosses to be found written in the margins or between the lines of a Latin Commentary on the Psalms, and a Latin Sermon written in the eighth century, now in the libraries of Milan and Cambray. The margin of the MS. of St. Priscan of St. Gall in the Milan Codex, contains these little Gaelic poems:

"A grove surrounds me,
The swift lay of the blackbird makes music to me,
I will not hide it
Over my much-lined little book
The song of the bird makes music to me."

"Wild blows the wind to-night,
The white harvest billows rage,
The bold warriors from Norway
Fear not the path of a clear sea."

The variety of subjects dealt with in the Monastic schools has already been mentioned, and a further instance of this is to be found in a treatise on Gaelic Grammar, the first four books of which are assigned to Ceinníaeladh, the poet (678), the others to prehistoric, mythical people, one of whom, Gennius Faisaid, composed the Gaelic tongue out of seventy-two languages, and whose son Nial is said to have visited Egypt to teach the language after the confusion of Babel!

The Continental glosses proved of the greatest value to Zeuss who by means of them was enabled to establish the connection of the Celtic language with the Aryan.

The real spirit of Celtic literature is to be found in the sagas. These contain the story of the growth of the race, the history of the tribe and family, the Celtic mythology—"the very essence of the national life of Erin" is embodied in them. There is little need to emphasize the considerable quantity of this literature that has survived in spite of the ravages of Dane, Norman, and English. O'Curry has estimated that sufficient remains to fill something like twelve thousand of the large pages of the Four Masters!

Three cycles occupy a prominent position, since a greater number of stories have gathered round them and a larger number preserved than is the case with the Tuatha and the Boru, or Conarré the Great (cycles which have only one or two stories belonging to them). These are the Mythological Cycle, concerning the Tuatha de Danann and the Milesians, the Heroic or Red Branch Cycle (Cuchulain), and the Cycle of Finn mac Cumhail, Ossian, and the High Kings of Ireland—this latter being generally known as the Fenian or Ossianic.

These cycles are contained in four ancient MSS.:

1. The Book of the Dun Cow (Leabhar na h'Uídhre), so called after the original text of which this is a copy, transcribed about 1100. St. Ciarán wrote down, from the dictation of Fergus, the tale of the Tain Bó Chualgné, in a book made from the hide of a favourite cow (called from its colour "dun").

2. The Book of Leinster, transcribed by Finn mac Gorman, Bishop of Kildare, from other books, about 1150. This contains the famous list of one hundred and eighty-seven romances required of the bard: Destructions of Fortified Places, Cow Spoils (cattle-raiding expeditions), Courtships or Wooings, Battles, Cave Stories, Navigations, Tragic Deaths, Feasts, Sieges, Adventures, Elopements, Slaughters, Water-eruptions, Expeditions, Progresses, and Visions. "He is no poet" says the Book of Leinster, "who does not synchronise and harmonise all the stories."

3. The Book of Ballymore, dating from the end of the fourteenth century.

4. The Book of Lismore, compiled in the early years of the sixteenth century, which is specially important for the Ossianic cycles.

THE MYTHOLOGICAL CYCLE

This cycle of mythological tales is concerned with the people who, in dimly remote times, were supposed to have first colonised Erin. An atmosphere of vagueness and unreality surrounds these stories, but they are of considerable value to the student for the light which they throw upon the early religious ideas of the people. Most of these stories are found only in brief digests which have been preserved in the Leabhar Gabhála, or The Book of the takings and holdings of Ireland, large portions of which exist in the Books of Leinster and Ballymote. Two latter were rewritten by Michael O'Clery in 1630, who collected all the material he could find from the most ancient sources accessible to him.

The chief sagas belonging to this cycle are The First Battle of Moytura, The Second Battle of Moytura, The Death of the Children of Tuireann, The Progress of Partholan to Erin, The Progress of Nemed to Erin, The Progress of the Fírbolgs, The Progress of the Tuatha de Danann, &c.

We are told in the early history of Ireland how Partholan made a settlement. In course of time he and his people died of plague. After this the Nemedians or people of Nemed peopled the island; these were followed by the Fírbolgs, Tuatha de Danann, and last of all by the Milesians—thus bringing the record down to the Christian era. The Milesians are the ancestors of the modern Gaels.

On the arrival of the Milesians from Spain to Tara, they were met by the three kings and queens of the Tuatha. They complained that they were not ready for the battle. Their coming being a surprise visit, they entreated the Milesians to re-embark upon their ships and retire for "nine waves" on the sea. This they did, but on turning about, Ireland was not to be seen! The Tuatha de Danann by their enchantments had made the island "as small as a pig's back," and at the same time raised a violent storm. Many of the Milesian ships were wrecked and were only saved by the prayers of their leader, a Druid, addressed to the Tuatha. The storm ceased and they were able to land in peace. After a number of battles the Tuatha retired to the country of the Síd, the fairy mound-dwellers.

There are many characteristics in these stories which point to a mythological origin. The Tuatha de Danann are the pagan gods of the Gaelic people, or personifications of the forces of nature; the Forinorians, the bad spirits.

The mythological character of this cycle may be gathered from the story of the Dagda, at one time supposed to be King of the de Dananns, who is certainly more mythological than dignified.

THE HEROIC OR RED BRANCH CYCLE

This cycle deals with the Milesians during a certain period, and the stories open to us a window into the past, for in spite of a certain wildness and riotous imagination, there is a considerable amount of general and local history to be gleaned from this Ultonian saga. Light is thrown on the manners and customs of the people, and the stories exhibit the peculiar literary qualities of the Celt that are so difficult to define—the keen perception, the wealth of pictorial detail, the wonderful powers of description, and the Celtic love of colour.

The heroic cycle is sometimes known as the Ultonian, since it deals mainly with the heroes of the northern province of Ulster—Cuchulain, Conor mac Nessa, Fergus mac Roy, Naoise and Déirdre, Méve and Conall Cearnach.

A number of stories concern the birth, youthful exploits, and heroic prowess of Cuchulain, "the mightiest hero of the Scots," by Lugad son of Three Hounds, King of Munster, and by Erc, King of Tara, son of Carbre Nia Fer, and by the three sons of Calatin of Connaught. Seven years was his age when he assumed arms, seventeen was his age when he followed the driving of the kine of Cualgne, but twenty-seven years was his age when he died.¹

It is impossible to deal at any length with the numerous stories surrounding this "Irish Achilles." One of the longest and greatest in the cycle is the famous Táin Bó Cuaisgne, or The Cattle Raid of Cooley, in which Cuchulain guards the Marches of Ulster, and holds at bay, single-handed, the whole forces of Ireland.

The Táin opens with a conversation between Méve, Queen of Connacht, and her husband Oilioll, in which the question arises as to which of them is the richer. The argument becomes so heated that it is at last decided to bring their goods together and actually compare them.

Accordingly they collect their worldly wealth and find them equal in value, except for a great bull, "the white-horned," that was calved by one of Méve's cows. This bull, considering it disgraceful to be under the rule of a woman, had gone over to Oilioll's herd. Méve has nothing to compare with this bull, "and because she had not a bull of his size, it was as though she owned no pennyworth of stock." She discovers there is a similar bull in the district of Cuaisgne, in Louth, known as the Dun Bull of Cuaisgne, belonging to a chieftain named Daré.

Méve sends an embassy to Daré offering to purchase the bull. This would have been successful had not one of the men drunk too freely, and boasted that had the bull not been given it would have been taken. Daré hearing of this boast indignantly refuses to send the bull. Méve now swears to have the bull, and collects a vast army, and determines to make the attack at a time when the Ulster warriors are overcome by a sickness that overtakes them at certain periods—a punishment for a wrong done by one of Conchobhar's ancestors upon a member of the Irish god-clan. Before starting she consults a druid who tells her that "Whosoever returneth or returneth not thou shalt return." On her homeward way she sees a maiden upon the pole of her chariot. Méve inquires, "How seest thou our hosts?"

"I see crimson over them, I see red," is the answer repeated again and again to the queries of the queen.

Finally she prophesies the coming of Cuchulain.

Méve's army proceeds under the guidance of Fergus, who however is secretly giving warning to the Ulster men.

Cuchulain and Sualtam, who are free from the sickness of the Ulster men, harass the invaders—Cuchulain slaying them a hundred at a time Méve at last is driven to accept the terms of Cuchulain whom she is disappointed to find a mere boy Every day Cuchulain is to meet a warrior in simple combat During the fight the invaders may proceed but must stop as soon as the fight is finished

Combats follow in which Cuchulain is always victorious, but in spite of his efforts the Brown Bull is driven into Queen Méve's camp. Then follows more fighting, the most interesting episode being Cuchulain's Fight at the Ford with Ferdia. Finally Méve takes the Brown Bull back to Connaught.

DEIRDRE, OR THE FATE OF THE CHILDREN OF USNACH

An extraordinary amount of interest has been displayed in this saga down to quite modern times¹ It has been described as "the finest and best conceived in the whole range of Irish literature" A MS copy is in the Belfast Museum

King Conor and his Ultonians had gone to drink and feast in the house of Felim, Conor's chief story teller, and during their stay there, Felim's wife has a daughter of whom Cathba, the Druid, prophesies that much suffering and woe shall come upon Ulster He names her Déirdre The Ultonians are smitten with horror and declare that she shall be put to death at once King Conor forbids this and commands that the child shall be brought to him and she shall be the woman he will marry Déirdre is brought up in Conor's house No one is allowed to see her except her nurse Lavarcam, her tutor, and a Danish magician whom they were afraid to keep out

She grows up to be the handsomest maiden in Ireland, and in spite of all the precautions taken to keep her in seclusion she gives her affection to Naoise, the son of Usnach, whom she has by an accident seen playing games with his two brothers on the green The time for marriage with King Conor draws near, and becoming desperate, Déirdre confides in her nurse and sends for Naoise Déirdre entreats him to take her away, and they escape in the night without the knowledge of the nurse or the tutor They go aboard a ship, and with three fifty champions sail for Western Alba "Fifty with each of the three brothers—Naoise, Aine, and Ardan" Here, the three brothers and Déirdre live for a long time quite happily.

It is at this point that the modern copies begin. King Conor is feasting with his warriors in his hall He asks those assembled if aught is lacking to his palace at Emania. They reply that it seems perfect. "Not so to me," answered the king—he regrets the absence of the three noble sons of Usnach. Conor proposes to send ambassadors to Alba to solicit their return. Fergus and his two sons undertake the mission. On their landing in Alba, Fergus gives the "cry of a mighty man of chace" Naoise and Déirdre are playing chess in their hunting tent Naoise says he hears the cry of a man of Erin Déirdre declares it to be the cry of a man of Alba The cry is twice repeated—Déirdre persists in denying it. Naoise recognises the cry of Fergus and sends his brother to meet him Déirdre confesses that she had known it to be Fergus, and tries to communicate to Naoise her presentiment of coming evil. Her efforts are of no avail Fergus persuades Naoise to return and the next morning they embark, and Déirdre laments bitterly the "Delightful land, yon eastern Alba."

The fugitives land once more in Erin, but dangers surround them Through the strategy of King Conor they are separated from Fergus and left with his two sons. Déirdre again tries to make her husband see the coming danger

She makes one last attempt as they come in sight of the city If they are lodged in King Conor's palace, all will be well, but if in the House of the Red Branch they may be certain of treachery. They are lodged in the House of the Red Branch, and begin to realise they are caught in a trap. Mad with drink and jealousy, King Conor sends a man to see if Déirdre is still as beautiful The spy looks through a window at the two who are playing chess Naoise throws a chessman at his head and breaks the eye that looks at them Returning to the King the messenger declares that "it was worth losing an eye to behold a woman so lovely" King Conor is now furious and leads his troops to attack the Red Branch House A desperate struggle ensues, lasting all night The Sons of Usnach and Déirdre are still untaken. Conor's Druid, Cathba, consents to work a spell against them on condition that when Déirdre is taken, the Sons of Usnach shall not be harmed. Conor pledges his word, the spell is set, the Sons of Usnach are captured, and Conor has them at once beheaded Whereupon the Druid cursed Emania—a curse that has been verified, for since the wars with Méve, "neither Conor nor any of his race possessed Emania from that time to this"

Déirdre is distracted, and wails for "the three sons of the breast of the Ultonians."

After her keening she throws herself into their grave and dies

THE FENIAN OR OSSIANIC CYCLE

Yet another cycle of stories centres round Conn of the Hundred Battles, his son Art, and his successors

This cycle is sometimes known as the Fenian, since it deals to some extent with the exploits of Finn mac Cumhail and his Fenian militia, or, Ossianic, since Ossian, Finn's son, is supposed to have composed many of the poems belonging to it

Finn mac Cumhail was the leader of a band of professional soldiers who are supposed to have lived in the third century. The Irish annalists record his death as taking place in A.D. 252 or 253, but there is possibly an historic basis for these stories in the gradual and increasing enmity that grew up between the High Kings of Erin and their Fenian bands, and in the battles that ensued.

The stories are set in a romantic atmosphere; gods and men, giants and monsters intermingle, transformations are frequent.

The men of the Fenian cycle lived some two hundred years later than the men of the Cuchulain period, but the stories of the two cycles have remained quite distinct. The Fenian tales and poems are very numerous in conception and general characterisation, and differ from those of the Red Branch. They have not the same breadth and vastness as the earlier cycle. The tone is more modern; the heroes fought on foot or on horseback, chariots have been superseded. Mention is made of helmets and mail coats.

The Fenian stories became in later times the most popular. They were interwoven with the life and thought and feelings of the Gaels of both Ireland and Scotland, and their subsequent development for nearly fifteen hundred years is a remarkable instance of literary evolution.

Subject to constant redactions these stories continued in circulation down to recent times, many of them never having been written down. Yet the names of Finn, Ossian, Oscar, Goll, and Conan have lived on, cherished in the traditions of the people, giving rise to fresh stories and new developments in the sagas. It was these floating traditions that Macpherson used in compiling the Ossian. Macpherson had no original Gaelic text as he maintained, the version that appeared years later being merely a translation into Gaelic of the original work. Macpherson's poems are of no value to the student of Celtic literature.

The literature of this cycle may be divided into three classes.

1 Poems in ancient MSS. ascribed to Finn mac Cumhail, to his sons Ossian and Fergus Finnbheoil, and his nephew Caolite.

2 Tracts made up of prose and verse attributed to one of the bards, but related by some one else, e.g. The Dialogue of the Ancients, preserved in the Book of Lismore.

Caolite, the poet, and Ossian, were almost the only men to survive the Battle of Gabhra, in which Cairbré, the High King, destroyed the power of the Fenians. Meeting in their old age, St. Patrick and the preachers of the new teaching, they recount to the Saint the legends and tales connected with the rivers and streams of Ireland. These are written down by Brogan, Patrick's scribe.

3 A number of miscellaneous poems attributed to Ossian.

Ossian was the son of Finn mac Cumhail, and was said to have lived in Tír na n'óg, "the country of the ever-young," for three hundred years, surviving to hold converse with St. Patrick.

St. Patrick meeting the half-starved blind Ossian forbids him to speak of Finn or the Fenians. Later on St. Patrick, fired with curiosity, changes his tone and bids Ossian tell him how many deer were slain at Slieve-na-man-finn.

Ossian is quite ready to comply with the request, and recites the many battles and victories taken part in by Finn and the Fenians of Innisfail, and their pastimes afterwards.

EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE

The introduction of Christianity into Ireland gave men new ideals not only in religion but also in literature.

The first figure that stands out in the dawn of Christian literature is that of St. Patrick. A number of Irish poems and works in Latin prose are assigned to him. Of the poems the Faadh Fiada, or the Cry of the Deer, is known to be genuine.

This consists of eighty lines of verse—"Patrick made this hymn"—the cause of making it was to protect himself and his monks against his deadly enemies. The King had sent for St. Patrick to explain the new religion to the nobles at Tara. On his return an ambush was laid, apparently by the King's orders, to kill St. Patrick and his companions; they assumed, however, the form of deer in the eyes of the would-be murderers, and thus escaped.

St. Patrick's name is also associated with a codification of the Breton Laws, called the Cáin Phádraig—(the Great Tradition Seanchus Mór). In this St. Patrick was assisted by a committee of three kings, three bishops, and three brehons, who drew up a revised code of laws, in harmony with Christian teaching. After St. Patrick had finished, Ros the bard "put a thread of poetry round it," and rendered it into verse in order that it might be better remembered.

Columnkille is another celebrated Christian poet, who wrote a number of Irish poems and a Latin hymn called the Altus. Columnkille is typically Irish in his love for his native country, his feeling for nature, his tenderness and impulsiveness.

In addition to poetry, a large number of lives of the Saints—e.g. Life of St. Patrick by St. Benignus; Adamnan's Life of Columkille; a Life of St. Brigit by St. Ultan; and the famous Voyage of St. Brendan—were all composed during this early period.

The great colleges and monasteries that flourished and carried on their missionary expeditions, led to a wide diffusion of Celtic influence, an influence that has perhaps always been exercised indirectly rather than directly.

"If I were asked," says Matthew Arnold, "where English poetry got these three things: its turn for style, its turn for melancholy, its turn for natural magic, for catching and rendering the charm of nature in a wonderfully near and vivid way, I should answer with some doubt, that it got much of its turn for style from a Celtic source, with less doubt that it got much of its melancholy from a Celtic source, and with no doubt at all, that from a Celtic source it got nearly all its natural magic."¹

¹ The Study of Celtic Literature, by Matthew Arnold.

Though the influence of Celtic literature has been mainly indirect, the fusion of the races has led to the qualities and characteristics of Celt and Teuton becoming intermingled. The earliest direct influence of the Celtic spirit may have been exercised on the Northumbrian school of poetry—Northumbria was Christianised in the seventh century by Irish missionaries. Men from the Irish monasteries came to Whitby, and there is in the poetry of the Cynewulfian school a love of colour, and a feeling for nature, and the strong personal note that bespeaks the Celt.

We may note the Celtic love of nature in the beautiful poem of the King and the Hermit,¹ a colloquy between Guaire, King of Connaught in the seventh century, and his brother Marvan, a hermit.

The King, displeased at his brother's mode of life, remonstrates with him; Marvan thereupon recounts to Guaire the beauties and delights of his simple dwelling:

"I have a shieling in the wood,
None knows it save my God
An ash-tree on the hither side, a hazel-bush beyond,
A huge old tree encompasses it

Two heath-clad doorposts for support,
And a lintel of honoursuckle
The forest around its narrowness sheds
Its mast upon fat swine

The size of my shieling is tiny, not too tiny,
Many are its familiar paths
From its gable a sweet strain sings
A she-bird in her cloak ofousel's hue

The stags of Oakridge leap
Into the river of clear banks;
Thence red Roiny can be seen
Glorious Muckraw and Moimroy.

A hiding mane of green-harked yew
Supports the sky
Beautiful spot! the large green of an oak
Fronting the storm

A tree of apples—great its hounty!
Like a hostel, vast!
A pretty bush, thick as a fist, of tiny hazel nuts,
A green mass of branches

A choice pure spring and princely water
To drink
There spring watercresses, yew-berries,
Ivy-hushes thick as a man

Around it tame swine lie down,
Goats, pigs,
Wild swine, grazing deer,
A badger's brood

A clutch of eggs, honey, delicious mast,
God has sent it,
Sweet apples, red whortle-berries,
And blackberries

Ale with herbs, a dish of strawberries
Of good taste and colour,
Haws, berries of the juniper,
Sloes, nuts

A cup with mead of hazel-nut, blue-bells,
Quick-growing rushes,
Dun oaklets, manes of brair,
Goodly sweet tangle

Swarms of bees and chafers, the little musicians of the world,

A gentle chorus:
Wild geese and ducks, shortly before summer's end,
The music of the dark torrent.

An active songster, a lively wren
From the hazel-bough,
Beautiful hooded birds, woodpeckers,
A vast multitude!

Without an hour of fighting, without the din of strife
In my house
Grateful to the Prince who giveth every good
To me in my shieling "

Guaire is impressed and sings:

"I would give my glorious kinship
With the share of my father's heritage—
To the hour of my death I would forfeit it
To be in thy company, my Marvan "

The passionate love of colour we see in the curious personal description of Cuchulain

"A handsome lad truly was he that stood there then: Cuchullin son of Sualtam. Three sets of hair he had: next to the skin of his head, brown, in the middle, crimson, that which covered him on the outside formed as it were a diadem of gold, seeing that comparable to yellow gold was each glittering long-curling splendid beauty-coloured thread of the same, as free and loose it fell down and hung betwixt his shoulders. About his neck were a hundred linklets of red gold that flashed again, with pendants hanging from them. His headgear was adorned with a hundred mixed carbuncle jewels, strung. On either cheek four moles he had: a yellow, a green, a blue, a red. In either eye seven pupils, as it were seven sparkling gems. . . He dons his gorgeous raiment that he wore in great conventions, a fair crimson tunic of five plies and fringed, with a long pin of white silver, gold-encased and patterned, shining as it had been a luminous torch which for its blazing property and brilliance men might not endure to see. Next to his skin, a body vest of silk. . . which came as far as the upper edge of his russet-coloured kilt. A trusty special shield, in hue dark crimson, and in its circumference armed with a pure white silver rim "

Finally, the purity and excellent moral tone of Celtic literature is especially marked, there is no licence, no coarseness, and the high ideals aimed at by the Celt compare very favourably with all other literature.

THE BRYTHONS

The Celtic languages form one group of the Indo-European family of languages, occupying a position midway between the Italic and Teutonic branches. The various Celtic dialects may be divided as follows:

I. Gaulish.

II Goidelic, which includes Irish and Scottish Gaelic and Manx. Old Irish being the parent of Scottish Gaelic and Manx.

III. Brythonic, which includes Welsh, Breton, and Cornish.

It is with the third that we shall now deal. The remains of Celtic dialects found on monuments show a marked difference between the two groups, i.e. the Goidelic and Brythonic dialects, the Brythonic having gone farther in the process of losing inflectional endings than has the Goidelic.

The oldest Welsh literature consists of glosses belonging to the ninth and tenth centuries. Whilst these are of the greatest value to the philological student, they have no intrinsic interest. With the exception of two short verses written in Irish characters and preserved in the Juventus MS, at Cambridge, all the Welsh prose and verse from the tenth to the fourteenth century is preserved in four important MSS.

1 The Black Book of Carmarthen.—This is a small quarto vellum MS. of fifty leaves, written in Gothic letters by various hands in the reign of Henry II. It belonged originally to the Priory of Black Canons at Carmarthen, from whom it passed to St David's.

2 The Book of Ancurin.—A small quarto MS. consisting of nineteen vellum leaves, written in 1250.

3 The Book of Taliesin.—A quarto MS., of thirty-eight leaves in Gothic, dating from the early part of the fourteenth century.

4 The Red Book of Hergest.—A folio of three hundred and sixty leaves, written by different hands, and is in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. In this MS. are found the stories of the Mabinogion—with the exception of Taliesin. It is from this book Lady Charlotte Guest obtained eleven of her stories.

The book takes its name from Hergest Court, the seat of the Vaughans, who at one time possessed the MS. It was probably begun in 1318, and finished in 1454. The book is a compilation of Welsh verse and prose of all periods from the sixth century to the middle of the fifteenth century. These are not the only compositions which date from a remote period. There are three other very notable works.

1 The History and Epistle of Gildas.—a Latin treatise on the early history of the country, written about A.D. 560.

2 The Ancient History of the Britons, by Nennius.

3 The Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales.

THE MABINOGION

The Mabinogion is a collection of Welsh stories translated into English and published by Lady Charlotte Guest in 1849. These tales were taken from the fourteenth-century MS., known as the Red Book of Hergest, with the exception of the romance entitled Taliesin, of which the MS. dates from the seventeenth century.

The Red Book, like so many mediæval MSS., comprises a small library in itself, containing historical, devotional, legendary, and romantic materials, as well as translations from the Latin and French. In many cases the tales are transcripts of stories far older than the Red Book.

"The very first thing that strikes one," says

Matthew Arnold, "in reading the Mabinogion, is how evidently the mediæval story-teller is pillaging an antiquity of which he does not fully possess the secret."

Four of these stories: Pwyll, Prince of Dyfed; Branwen, daughter of Llŷr; Manawyddan, son of Llŷr; and Math, son of Mathonwy, form a series. The story of Pwyll begins with the words "Llyma dechreu Mabinogi" ("Here is the beginning of the Mabinogi") The succeeding stories are called branches of the Mabinogi.

The plural form of Mabinogi is Mabinogion, which was the title given by Lady Guest to the whole collection, although it really belongs only to the four tales mentioned above. The other stories included, differ in marked fashion from the Mabinogion proper. Two of them, The Dream of Mazen Wledig and The Contentment (?) of Lludd and Llewelyn, are evidently connected with material used by Geoffrey of Monmouth in his history.

Kulhwch and Olwen, and The Dream of Rhonabwy, are Arthurian stories not to be found in any of the French or German romances that have come down to us, whereas The Lady of the Fountain, Geraint, and Peredur are closely connected with the Arthurian romances of Chrétien des Troyes—Yvain, Erec, and Le conte du Graal.

Taliesin has much in common with the Four Branches of the Mabinogi, although the hero of the story is connected with the Arthur cycle.

Professor Rhys has shown that the Mabinogi is in reality the term applied to the subject matter of the Mabinog's course—the Mabinog being a scholar or apprentice to the bardic art. These stories, like the Edda Snorra Sturlusonar (a collection of Icelandic tales), had to be memorised by the apprentice bard as part of his stock in trade. The Mabinogion may therefore be regarded as the remains of a literature belonging in great measure to the mythic and heroic period, since the narratives concern people who possess at times certain supernatural qualities. "The Four Branches of the Mabinogi are nothing more nor less than degraded and adulterated mythological tales."¹

The foundation of these stories rests upon the old Celtic tradition of the gods. The Welsh Children of Llŷr, and Children of Don, correspond to the Irish Tuatha de Danann, or Folk of the goddess Danu, among whom Lir (the Irish sea god) occupies an important position. The Carr Sidr, where neither age nor disease affects anyone, is the Síd of Irish mythology, the residence of the gods.

The Irish tales, however, are far more primitive than the Welsh. The latter have undergone many modifications and have been profoundly influenced by contact with the Viking invaders and the Gwynedd romance cycle, so that it is no longer possible to give them any strict mythological interpretation. A comparison with the Irish tales shows the Welsh princes, warriors, and magicians to be the gods of the earlier tales, who have been euhemerised.

The Welsh tales, moreover, betray in various indefinable ways their contact with the culture, manners, and customs of the Normans. Consequently, although they are not as useful as the lush tales to the student of Celtic mythology, they are of greater value as stories.

Full of mystery, magic, and fantasy, they represent in supreme fashion the genius of the Celtic race, "that has worn itself out in taking dreams for realities and in pursuing its splendid visions. The essential element in the Celts' poetic life, is the adventure, that is to say, the pursuit of the unknown; an endless quest after an object ever flying from desire."¹

The Story of Lludd and Llewelyn, and The Dream of Maxen Wledig, whilst they still concern people belonging to the group of tales in the Four Branches are more definitely connected with British History and the Roman Conquest.

The Dream of Maxen Wledig embodies the attraction and fascination of Imperial Rome for the cultured Briton, and is a most delightful example of a certain type of story-telling.

Maxen Wledig, the Roman Emperor, while out hunting near Rome, overcome by the heat, lies down to sleep, protected from the sun by the shelter of his attendants. And he saw a dream,

"And this is the dream that he saw. He was journeying along the valley of the river towards its source, and he came to the highest mountain in the world. And he thought that the mountain was as high as the sky, and when he came over the mountain it seemed to him that he went through the fairest and most level regions that man ever yet beheld on the other side of the mountain. And he saw large and mighty rivers descending from the mountains to the sea, and towards the mouths of the rivers he proceeded. And as he journeyed thus, he came to the mouth of the largest river ever seen. And he beheld a great city at the entrance of the river, and a vast castle in the city, and he saw many high towers of various colours in the castle. And he saw a fleet, at the mouth of the river, the largest ever seen. And he saw one ship among the fleet, larger by far, and fairer than all the others. Of such part of the ship as he could see above the water, one plank was gilded and the other silvered over. He saw a bridge of the bone of the whale from the ship to the land, and he thought that he went along the bridge, and came into the ship. And a sail was hoisted on the ship, and along the sea and the ocean was it borne. Then it seemed that he came to the fairest island in the whole world, and he traversed the island from sea to sea, even to the farthest shore of the island. Valleys he saw, and steepes, and rocks of wondrous height, and rugged precipices. Never yet saw he the like. And thence he beheld an island in the sea, facing the rugged land. And between him and this island was a country of which the plain was as large as the sea, the mountain as vast as the wood. And from the mountain he saw a river that flowed through the land and fell into the sea. And at the mouth of the river he beheld a castle, the fairest that man ever saw, and the gate of the castle was open, and he went into the castle. And in the castle he saw a fair hall, of which the roof seemed to be all of gold, the walls of the hall seemed to be entirely of glittering precious gems, the doors all seemed to be of gold. Golden seats he saw in the hall, and silver tables. And on a seat opposite to him, he beheld two auburn-haired youths playing at chess. He saw a silver board for the chess, and gold pieces thereon. The garments of the youths were of jet black satin, and chaplets of ruddy gold bound their hair, whereon were sparkling jewels of great price, rubies and gems, alternately with imperial stones. Buskins of new cordovan leather on their feet, fastened by slides of red gold.

"And beside a pillar in the hall he saw a hoary-headed man, in a chair of ivory, with the figures of two eagles of ruddy gold thereon. Bracelets of gold were upon his arms, and many rings were on his hands, and a golden torque about his neck, and his hair was bound with a golden diadem. He was of powerful aspect. A chess-board of gold was before him, and a rod of gold, and a steel file in his hand. And he was carving out chessmen.

"And he saw a maiden sitting before him in a chair of ruddy gold. Not more easy than to gaze upon the sun when brightest, was it to look upon her by reason of her beauty. A vest of white silk was upon the maiden, with clasps of red gold at the breast; and a surcoat of gold tissue upon her, and a frontlet of red gold upon her head, and rubies and gems were in the frontlet, alternating with pearls and imperial stones. And a girdle of ruddy gold was around her. She was the fairest sight that man ever beheld."¹

Henceforth the Emperor has no life nor spirit, nor existence in him. The sages of Rome counsel him to send forth messengers to seek for tidings of the maiden. Eventually they cross the sea to Britain. They traversed the island until they came to Snowdon. "Beheld," said they, "the rugged land that our master saw." They go on their way and come to the castle and find everything as the Emperor had told them. They return to Maxen, who immediately sets out for Britain, conquers the Island and makes the Dream Lady his bride. Her father being made at her request ruler of Britain and the three adjacent islands, and three chief castles to be made for her—"And they brought thither earth from Rome that it might be more healthful for the Emperor to sleep and sit and walk upon."

Maxen after seven years returns to Rome, and receives assistance from the Britons in regaining Rome from the man who in the absence of Maxen had styled himself Emperor of Rome.

"KILWCH AND OLWEN," AND "THE DREAM OF RHONABWY"

These are fairy tales. The King Arthur of these stories is not the historic Arthur nor is he "Arthur, the Hope of Britain" one day to return from the isle of Avalon, but the subduer of magical and monstrous creatures, the prince of Faery.

Kilwch and Rhonabwy betray the influence of Irish romance upon the Welsh. The children of Don and Llyr, Conchobar the son of Ness, are associated with the companions of Arthur.

Three other stories dealing with Arthur: The Lady of the Fountain, Geraint, and Peredur, show the influence of chivalric ideals, and these stories have much in common with French and German romances, particularly those of Chrétien de Troyes—but as story-tellers the Welsh writers stand far above Chrétien. "The charm of the Mabinogion," says Renan, "principally resides in the amiable serenity of the Celtic mind; neither sad nor gay, over in suspense between a smile and a tear. We have in them the simple recital of a child, unwitting any distinction between the noble and the common."¹

TALIESIN

Talesin is one of the most famous of early Welsh poets. The existence of this poet sometime in the sixth century is testified by a number of tales found in Welsh mediæval MSS., the most important being the so-called Book of Taliesin, which is ascribed to him. These poems belong to various periods, some of them dating from the ninth century and others belong to the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, the whole being a selection put together at the close of the fifteenth. In ascribing these poems to Talesin, the Welsh bards were perpetuating the tradition of the earlier bards.

The story of the rebirth of Talesin is connected with very early Celtic myths. The late form of the story renders it of less interest as literature:

"Primary chief bard am I to Elphin
And my original country is the region of the summer stars,
Idno and Heinn call me Merddin,
At length every king will call me Talesin.

I was with my Lord in the highest spheres,
On the fall of Lucifer into the depth of hell
I have borne a banner before Alexander;
I know the names of the stars from north to south;
I have been on the galaxy at the throne of the Distributor;
I was in Canaan when Absalom was slain;
I conveyed the Divine Spirit to the level of the vale of Hebron;
I was in the court of Don before the birth of Gwion
I was instructor to Eli and Enoch;
I have been winged by the genius of the splendid crozier.
I have been loquacious prior to being gifted with speech;
I was at the place of the crucifixion of the merciful
Son of God;
I have been three periods in the prison of Arionrod,
I have been the chief director of the work of the tower of Nimrod;
I am a wonder whose origin is not known.

I have been in Asia with Noah in the ark,
I have seen the destruction of Sodom and Gomorra;
I have been in India when Roma was built;
I am now come here to the remnant of Troia.

I have been with my Lord in the manger of the ass;
I strengthened Moses through the water of Jordan,
I have been in the firmament with Mary Magdalene,
I have obtained the muse from the cauldron of Ceridwen,
I have been bard of the harp to Lleon of Lochlin
I have been on the White Hill, in the court of Cynvelyn,
For a day and a year in stocks and fetter,
I have suffered hunger for the Son of the Virgin.
I have been fostered in the land of the Deity,
I have been teacher to all intelligences,
I am able to instruct the whole universe
I shall be until the day of doom on the face of the earth,
And it is not known whether my body is flesh or fish
Then I was for nine months
In the womb of the hag Ceridwen;
I was originally little Gwion,
And at length I am Talesin."¹

THE MENDICANT FRIARS

THE establishment of the various orders of friars in England that took place from 1221 onwards, was not without its effect on the literature of the times. Many of the friars were the sons of poor men. Their early years made them familiar with the hardships of the labouring classes, their education enabled them to voice the aspirations and needs of the articulate crowd. Hence the friars became not only exceedingly popular, but also the medium whereby social grievances found expression. In addition to the members of the powerful preaching orders there were the Wyclif preachers, and mystics like Richard Rolle. These itinerant clergy had understood the needs of the people, hence the simplicity and naiveté of much of the religious writings. The introduction of the story and fable into the pulpit, the illustration of dogma by means of the moral tale, the use of picturesque details into their discourse invested them with vivid dramatic power. The popularity of the friars led to their downfall, they increased in numbers to such an extent that it was impossible for Pope or King to exercise any adequate control over them.

The notorious laxity of the friars in following their profession became a byword, and their corruption receives continual illustration in the works of Langland and Chaucer.

THE RELIGIOUS WRITERS

INTRODUCTION

The religious element predominates in Anglo-Saxon poetry. Christianity received a warm welcome in England in the early days and inspired the great Northumbrian poets, Caedmon and Cynewulf. This religious bias is not checked by Anglo-Norman influence, for it found a ready expression in a body of Latin literature largely theological, already passed under consideration. A formidable rival, however, arose in the shape of Romance. The craze for story-telling spread through every class, and the clerics, wise in their generation, found it advantageous to make use of the tale-loving spirit, and supply the people with stories that should point a moral and adorn a dogma. So while among the religious writings of the day there are certain devotional documents that scorned this compromise with romance and appealed frankly to the limited few, such as the writings of Richard Rolle, and the Ancren Riwle, much was quite as frankly popular in its appeal.

The clergy realised the need more and more clearly of instructing the unlearned people in the duties and doctrines of religion—for the Bible was inaccessible to the masses, and it was imperative that they should be made acquainted with sacred history and legend. Human nature being what it is, they thought it expedient to sugar the pill of didacticism, and among these sugared pills may be reckoned such ungainly compilations as the Cursor Mundi.

As a rough classification of the religious writings of the time, the following may prove serviceable:

1 Popular Theological Writings. (a) Homilies—These flourish mostly in the North Twelfth and thirteenth century Homilies in English carry on the spirit of Alfred's earlier work, of which Orm's is the most considerable. (b) Legends and Lives of the Saints. These took the place of Homilies in the South of England.

2 Popular Didactic Writings—Discursive histories and manuals such as the Cursor Mundi, and the Handlyng Synne.

3 Non-popular Devotional Works—These were written rather with a view to a select circle of readers, and are of a more subtle and spiritual character, e.g. Richard Rolle, and the Ancren Riwle.

1 POPULAR THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS

(a) HOMILIES

"Poema Morale"—1 Moral Ode (before 1200)

A sermon in verse that is interesting not only in itself but also for the influence it exercised on the development of English metre.

The form of the poem is the iambic septenarius—a Latin metre adapted by the poet to suit the native verse. By his adaptation he introduces a new principle of accentuation that has ever since left its impress on the development of English metre. The lines of the poem consist of two long lines to a strophe with end rhymes.

"I am older now than I was, in winters and in lore,

I wield more power than I did, were but my wisdom more."

The poet is lamenting his ill-spent youth and wasted opportunities. "We shall reap as we sow, therefore let us sow good seed, no evil shall go unpunished. What shall we do at the judgment? How shall we stand? Our works shall testify against us. In hell hunger and thirst, no sun nor moon shine there, but much smoke and darkness. Let us remember the shortness of life and fortify ourselves with fasting, alms, and prayers. Let us go by the bright and narrow way to heaven where there is rest and eternal peace. No man may tell of the joys of heaven. Christ grant we may go thither when we die."¹

The Poema Morale is contained in the Jesus MS. (Oxford). The fact that seven MSS of this poem have survived, testify to its popularity.

Orm's "Ormulum"

A book of homilies, similar in nature to the Poema Morale, was written some time in the early part of the thirteenth century. Orm, an Augustinian monk who lived in Mercia, probably near Lincoln, wrote his Ormulum (so called "because Orm made it"). Urged by his brother monk Walter to translate and explain the Gospels for the ecclesiastical year, Orm threw all his energy and industry into the task. He paraphrased the Gospel and the Homily (which is frequently taken from Bede) into blank verse. In order to fill out his verse, he adds much that is not in the original. "A diffuse paraphrase of the Gospel is followed by a still more diffuse commentary."² Although only one-eighth of the work has come down to us, this fragment contains ten thousand lines! The language used by Orm seems to indicate that the monastery was within the territory of the Danish invasion and settlements, possibly Orm himself was of Danish descent.

French literature and culture had not as yet penetrated to this district, and in the Ormulum, Norman French words are very rare. Orm knows nothing of the newer school of ecclesiastics such as Anselm, Bernard, and Abelard. He is content to follow the traditional school of Ælfric, Bede, and Augustine. Orm seems to have been imbued with a good deal of the spirit of Ælfric in his desire to foster the mother tongue, and teach the masses. Indeed he was an enthusiast on the correct use of the English tongue. He was both a precisian and a purist, and the Ormulum is immensely valuable as an example of the East Midland dialect.

The form of the verse is the "iambic septenarius" or iambic verse of fifteen syllables with a metrical point after the eighth. It is lacking in alliteration and rhyme and was probably written in imitation of some mediæval Latin poem, or Orm may possibly have used the form of the Poema Morale, written in the reign of Henry II, of which many copies were circulated. Orm keeps very strictly to the metre, the line always measures fifteen syllables, and the upbeat never fails. He aims at clearness, completeness, and simplicity, and in his endeavour to attain these qualities he is not afraid to repeat or to labour a point. It has been unkindly though not unfairly said, that he "has reduced monotony to a fine art."

² Ten Brink.

The "Genesis" and the "Exodus"

These two poems are of importance in literary history, since they are the first attempt, after a long interval, to bring the Bible home to the people. They are, moreover, the oldest poems in which the style of the French clerics was used successfully

(b) LEGENDS AND LIVES OF THE SAINTS

Whereas the homily primarily dealt with goodness in the abstract, illustrated with concrete examples, the legendary poems deal primarily with the concrete, and illustrate with abstract moralisings

These sacred biographies varied in literary value in proportion as they expressed real tribute to an inspiring personality or were written to order with the view of improving the occasion in general, rather than particular fashion.

The legends of the Saints help us to understand in some measure a mental attitude differing widely from that of the present age. "They represent Christian mythology as it has been formed in the course of centuries." The earliest of these legends, the lives of St Juliana, St. Margaret, and St. Katherine, are written in rhythmical, alliterative prose. They manifest, in many respects, a return to Old English tradition, to which has been added richer colouring and more varied diction. These three Saints and many others had been commemorated in literature before the Conquest. Cynewulf has sung of St. Juliana.

The appearance of the lives of these three women Saints at this particular juncture, is not without significance. Ascetic ideals were being preached and practised; the exaltation of Divine Love in contrast to earthly love, the cult of the Virgin Mary, caused the ideal of virgin purity to be held in high esteem. This theme is discussed in somewhat coarse fashion in an alliterative homily on the text—"Audi filia et vide et inclina aurem tuam"—known as "Hail Maidenhead" (Holy Maidenhood), in which the writer dwells on the evils of the married state.

There is, however, a new note in the lyrical tone, and a new enthusiasm is found manifesting itself in these early legends. "Quite romantic in tone and colour are the very fine early poems of Katherine, Gregory, Margrete, Magdalen, all of which are unfortunately only preserved in later remodelled forms."

The Legend of the Assumption of the Virgin (not entirely unknown in early English, vide Blacking Homilies) belongs to this period. It is written in rhyming pairs and in the southern dialect. Other popular religious legends were the Childhood of Jesus, that goes back to very early times. On the flight into Egypt, dragons and lions pay homage to the child Jesus. The trees, beneath which the Holy Family rest, bend their branches to give fruit to Mary. Later on, when they return and are settled at Nazareth, Jesus performs wonderful miracles—making flies from the earth, &c.

A collection of legendary lore gathers round the Legend of the Holy Rood, a theme also dealt with by Cynewulf in his Vision of the Holy Rood. The Crusaders gave a new significance to the legend that the earlier poet had dealt with from a purely subjective point of view, and the story now begins in Paradise and is continued after the discovery of the Cross by St. Helena.

The Descent of Christ into Hell, The Vision Pauli, and The Purgatory of St. Patrick (the legend of Owan's) were widely known. The Story of Gregory stands out from the mass of legends by virtue of its poetic qualities. Gregory, immediately after his birth, is put into a boat and consigned to the sea. He lives to become the liberator of his country and, like Oedipus, to marry his mother, being ignorant of his parentage. When the terrible truth is discovered he does penance for seventeen years; he finally becomes the Pope and pronounces forgiveness on his mother for her sin.

This story was translated from the French into North Midland verse, about the middle of the thirteenth century.

The well-known Vernon MS. at Oxford contains eight or nine Legends of the Virgin, that came into the West Midland dialect from French sources. It had long been the custom in France to recite rhymed lives of the Saints either during Mass or at the evening service. In England, during the eleventh and twelfth centuries the alliterative homilies prevailed, but the custom grew of reading on the special holiday the legend and office of the particular Saint whose festival was being kept.

In the North there already existed a collection of Sunday Gospels—Festæ Christi (i.e. homilies), consisting of exposition and narration, to these were added the legends. But in the South, the legendary matter was formed into a complete Liber Festivalis, that eventually absorbed the homilies. During the last quarter of the fourteenth century, legendary poetry entered the service of the Church and was formed by the monks into great collections for the services; there was a considerable falling off in the quality and style.

"Never again has legendary poetry reached the same height of pathos, the same purity and beauty of form, as in these older legends. The period immediately following shows a decided falling off in poetic power and in talent for form. The tone loses in depth and warmth, the style in fulness and swing."¹

The legend cycle of the South was compiled by the monks of Gloucester during the last quarter of the thirteenth century. They gathered their materials from various sources. A great number of them were translated from the Latin, French poems were also occasionally used.

About the same time, a similar legend cycle in Latin prose was written by an Italian, Jacobus a Voragine, Bishop of Genoa, the famous Legenda Aurea (Golden Legend). There is no evidence for supposing any of the English legends to have been derived from this work since Jacobus frequently copied from older texts and may therefore have used the same sources as the English writers. The scope of these legend cycles is extremely wide. They have been gathered from the East, from Ireland, from English ecclesiastical legend. The collection of these stories took considerable time and labour, they grew slowly round a nucleus, and most likely took the joint labours of an abbey—probably the Abbey of Gloucester—although attempts to make collections were made in other places. Several very old poems were absorbed into the collection and adapted to the metre. In the South, the metre used consisted of Alexandrine lines of six, seven, and sometimes eight accents: e.g. The Assumption, old texts of Magdalen and Margaret and the collections underwent more than one phase before their completion. The style, moreover, exhibits a corresponding diversity. In some cases coarse and rude and adapted to the popular taste of the times, in others, vigorous and dramatic, occasionally displaying delicate poetic feeling. There is abundant wit and sarcasm which spares neither clergy, class, nor sex.

The Lives of the Saints cannot be justly appreciated if judged according to modern standards.

In course of time the power of famous legends atrophied—the naive faith of the Middle Ages disappeared before increased knowledge. Indeed in the legends themselves there are not wanting signs of an awakening criticism.

St. Margaret—In the life of Margaret, the devil comes to the Saint in the form of a dragon, enters her cell, and swallows her! St. Margaret makes the sign of the cross and immediately the body of the monster bursts and she steps forth unhurt. Whereupon the poet comments, "But I do not tell this for true, for I do not find it truly authenticated. If it is true or not who can know? It would be against nature that the devil should be brought to death, hence I cannot believe it."

St. Dunstan—As an illustration of the humorous element in the Lives may be cited the story of St. Dunstan. The devil comes to the holy abbot in the form of a beautiful woman, while he is at work in his smithy. St. Dunstan talks in a friendly manner to his visitor and in the meantime heats his tongs in the glowing flames of the fire. When red hot, he suddenly seizes the devil's nose between them, until the fiend dances and howls with pain. When released he rushes off, exclaiming, "Out, what has the bald-head done, what has the bald-head done?"

St. Michael—The legend of St. Michael gives a curious account of the origin and nature of bad spirits. This legend is connected with the shrines on Mont St. Michel, and was of Norman origin.

There was war in heaven, and the evil one is cast out of heaven into hell by the Archangel Michael. A discussion on the various orders of angels follows, and we are told how the bad spirits became the elves that live in the woods, and are seen at night on the hills dancing and playing. We are reminded of Chaucer's comment:

"But now kan no man se none elves mo,
For now by the grete charites and prayers
Of Limitours and othere holy freeres
That serchen overy lond and stream

This maketh that there be no fairyes
For there as went to walken was an elf,
Ther walketh now the lynnytour himself."¹

Before the birth of Christ the evil one was able to do what he liked, but Christ has bound him and his fury has grown like that of a dog tied up who growls and tries to bite everyone who comes near, so does the devil tempt man. His fingers are named just as ours are: the least, "little man"—by that he signifies the trivial nature of the sin he would have us do. "Loech"—the ring finger, so called because physicians tested medicine with it—this reminds man of God's mercy and forgiveness. Then he tries to draw us with "Longueman"—a sign of the long life that lies before us in which to repent. Next the "Teclere" points to the sins of others, especially the saints. Finally, he uses the thumb. "'Strongue'—thou art strong enough to repent much greater sins than these." The poet next discusses the situation of hell, earth, and heaven. The earth is, of course, "the centre of the Universe." It is much smaller than the sun and fixed stars—165 times smaller than the sun and nine times larger than the moon. The earth is suspended in the midst of the heavens which move in eight spheres round it. Though a man travelled forty miles a day for eight thousand years he would not reach the highest heaven. Yet the soul of man if it be pure goes to heaven as quickly as a man's thought—still more quickly does it go to hell, if he be an evil-doer.

This legend is indeed a wonderful compendium of knowledge on most diverse topics. A kind of encyclopædia of the Middle Ages. The influence of the planets on the weather, and on man, the moon and its phases, the origin of thunder, lightning, hail, snow, dew, frost, and rime. The various kinds of men—choleric, melancholic, phlegmatic, and sanguine—and his three souls, these are some of the subjects dealt with by the author of what might be termed a text-book of popular science.

St. Brandan—The legend of St. Brandan, with its account of the wonders of the ocean, stimulated the imagination of the people, and kept alive that mysterious presentiment of an unknown world, that in later times was fulfilled by the discovery of America.

St. Kenelm—Historical and geographical elements are not lacking in these legends. The life of St. Kenelm (Chaucer refers to this story in his Nun's Priest's Tale) affords opportunity for the introduction of a description of England at the time of the five kingdoms, and of the relation of the countries and bishoprics.

Kenulf died in A.D. 819, and his son Kenelm, although only seven years old, succeeded to the throne. By order of his sister Quendrida, Kenelm is taken to a wood and murdered. Quendrida then seizes the land and becomes queen of the March. One day as the pope was singing Mass, a dove, whiter than any snow, laid a writing on the altar with letters of gold in English, saying that Kenelm lay under a thorn at Conbach, bereft of his head. This writ was kept as a relic, and the pope sent to make inquiries of Woldred, Archbishop of Canterbury.

Search was made and the Saint's body was taken up, a spring of water flowed out of the place, which was henceforth named St. Kenelm's Well.

The men of Worcestershire and Gloucestershire strove for Kenelm's body, and the latter obtained it and carried it away. A well sprang up to give them drink, by this was built St. Kenelm's chapel. Quendrida came to a miserable end.

St. Thomas—The legend of St. Thomas, by virtue of the brief period that elapsed between the death of Becket and the writing of the life, the mass of material that existed for the purpose, and his political importance, stands apart from the other legends. With the story of Gilbert Becket's pilgrimage to Palestine, and the episode of the admiral's daughter, the legend opens in orthodox romantic fashion, but the legend takes on a different spirit when the story of the relations of Becket and the king are being told, the examination of the laws, the opposition of the king and bishops; the approval of the people, the disputes between Henry and King Louis of France, who befriended Becket, the appeal to the Pope. The return of Becket to England. The last sermon at Canterbury in which all who denied the Church's rights were declared "excommunicate." The last scene in the drama, the entry of the four knights with Randolph de Broke, the murder in the Cathedral; the seizure of the papers and charters to be taken to the king. The grief of the people and the burial of the great bishop privately by the canons of the Cathedral. The penance of the king and the knights. The enshrinement of the body of Thomas in the reign of Henry III, all this is told in the detailed manner of the biographer who is living near enough to the events he is describing to give them actuality.

Medieval touches are not wanting. The sanctity of Becket is insisted on. When struck on the head the blood formed a diadem. The life closes with the reminder that Tuesday is Becket's Day (29th December) and an injunction for it to be duly observed.

The Legend Cycle is written in Alexandrine couplets, and there is therefore a certain similarity in style due to the employment of the same metrical form in all the legends, although, as we have already noted, there is considerable diversity in the contents. In poetic quality they fall below the older alliterative lives of the saints. The legends move us more by their simple, loyal adherence to the truths of their religion, rather than by any great poetic gifts.

The formation of the Legend Cycles may well be compared with the School of English Chroniclers. Both are the result of the co-operation of a number of writers animated by the same spirit and working with the same end in view.

2. POPULAR DIDACTIC WRITINGS

Cursor Mundi (1320-30)

A comprehensive Scriptural record written for the laity—for those unlearned in the French tongue.

This book, though intended for instruction was deliberately made popular in character, that is to say, the idea of amusing its readers was never lost sight of. Then on the principle that it is a shame to let the devil have all the best tunes, the writer hunts that as much pleasure and excitement may be derived from his work as from those dealing with "love paramours." So blithely he starts forth with the creation of the world, and with many fantastic flourishes continues up to the day of doom, with a few pleasant speculations as to the hereafter.

This poem, consisting of some 30,000 lines, is written chiefly in rhyming octo-syllabic couplets. The author, whose name is unknown, was most probably a Northumbrian cleric, since no layman of the period would have possessed the necessary scholarship. Indeed he refers to himself in one place as "an unworthy pastor."

"Among those pastors I am one, Wretch so unworthy know I none."

Two impulses then animate the writer: a desire to write in English a book for Englishmen, and a desire to popularise religious instruction.

"Seldom," he says, "is the English tongue praised in France; he will give to each nation their own language and there is no outrage in doing so." He wished also to instruct the ignorant masses by making the Biblical stories and legends as entertaining and as accessible as the romances. To the popularity of the latter he testifies in the opening lines of the prologue. Men are eager to listen to "rimes and gestes" and to read stories of King Arthur and his knights; of the strokes of Greece and Troy, of Tristram and Isoude; of Charlemagne and his paladins. The wise man is drawn to wisdom, the fool to folly in these tales. He will teach idle triflers to be wise and amend their ways. Nowadays a man is not considered in the fashion unless he love "paramours." This earthly love is but a phantom which quickly passes away. The poet will undertake to write a work in honour of her whose love is sweeter than "honey from the hive" viz., Our Lady:

"Lady who is of ladies all Mild and meek without (any) gall"

She is ever true, loyal, and constant, and he advises skilful rhymers to construct verses in her honour. As for himself, he will teach men of her kindred and relate some "gests" done in the Old Law. Briefly, his intention is a fairly comprehensive one, for he aims at giving a history of the world from the Creation to the Day of Judgment:

"Cursor o world man aght it call
For almost it over-ronnes all"

The poet arranges his work in seven main divisions, and discourses in leisurely fashion of the fall of the Angels, the creation of man, and the loss of Paradise. He tells of the death of Adam and relates the history of the chief Old Testament characters. The prophecies concerning the birth of Jesus Christ lead him on to the New Testament, the parentage of the Virgin Mary, and the story of her life. Christ's birth, life, death, resurrection, and descent into hell is followed by an account of the ascension into heaven, the feast of Whitsuntide, the history of the Apostles, the description of the Virgin, and the discovery of the Cross by St.

Helena. Finally, the poet describes the coming of Antichrist, the terrible signs preceding the Day of Doom, the Day of Judgment, and the state of the world afterwards. He concludes by describing the agony of the Virgin Mary at the foot of the Cross and glorifies the miraculous conception.

The Cursor Mundi is the first attempt made in England to blend in one whole Biblical stories and mediæval legends. Incidents quite as marvellous as any to be found in the romances are related with an air of sober reality and with much circumstantial detail.

There is the story of the three pips—one of cedar, cypress, and pine—brought by Seth from Paradise, which are placed under Adam's tongue and from which grow three miraculous rods (wands). These wands stood an ell high and were always green. They lasted to the days of Noah, Abraham, and Moses.

David in a dream discovers the wands to be hidden in the grave of Moses. He journeys to this country and fetches back the wands. Their miraculous power is shown in many ways. They change black Saracens into shining white men; cure a sick hermit so that he became "as well as a trout"; and when placed in a cistern strike roots so deep that none can pull them out. Later the tree is enclosed within the temple and from its wood the Cross is made. From the thirty silver bands which enclose it come the thirty pieces of silver which are given to Judas. A lady once came to worship in the Temple and inadvertently sat upon the tree, when it immediately burst into flames. She prophesied that Jesus would hang upon it. The Jews were angry with her and beheaded her. An angel fetched her soul and called her a "Christian."

Much curious information is given by the author in the course of the poem. The distance between heaven and earth is stated graphically. A man may fall forty miles a day for seven thousand, seven hundred years, ere he reach it. Moses discovered the worshippers of the golden calf by making the people drink of the water in which the powdered remains had been thrown:

"All those men that had the guilt
They had their beards all over gilt"¹

Solomon is put to learn "clergy lore and knight-hood," and soon becomes proficient in the "seven arts."

Herod, on account of his wickedness, is afflicted with seven different diseases. He sends for his doctors and threatens to hang them if they do not cure him. The doctors order him a bath of pitch and tar in which he is drowned.

In writing of Isaac, there is a curiously vivid description of old age:

"When a man is old his blood grows dry and cold—his head shakes and his hand quakes, his bones crack, his hair falls off and his light is dim. His foot easily stumbles, he praises all things that are gone and is quickly angered. Nothing can make him glad, yet do the young yearn for age."

The poem ends (in the Gottingen MS.) with an exhortation to the readers "to pray for me John of Landebergh who got this book made (i.e. transcribed). If it be lost, I will pay him who restores it, but will curse him who withholds it."¹

The work, although not that of a great poet, was extremely popular. Many copies of it were made, of which four are still in existence. It must have exercised considerable influence on the Collective Mysteries that were being formed about this time, and in an indirect way led to the greater diffusion of Biblical knowledge, which assisted the development of the miracle plays among the people.

Robert of Brunne's "Handlyng Synne" (1303)

The Handlyng Synne by Robert Brunne is an adaptation of William Wadington's Manuel des Peches. The poet treats of the twelve articles of Faith, the Seven Deadly Sins, and the Seven Sacraments, finally, the Twelve Requisites of Shrift, and the Twelve Graces which flow from a Good Confession.

In the opening lines Robert laments the popularity of "tals and rhymings" amongst the unlearned men. For these he writes in the English tongue, that their time may be more profitably employed. Robert's work affords a striking contrast to that of Richard Rolle in its appeal to the ordinary folk. Robert is a pious ecclesiastic who does not disdain the innocent amusements of his day, and who possesses a ready sympathy with the poor. He had a fund of genial humour, and the theological discussions are enlivened and illustrated by stories gathered from various sources, the Lives of the Saints, Gregory, Vita Patrum, Bede, and also some orally communicated. Robert is no mystic living in the clouds of contemplation, but an acute observer of the world around him, and his work bears the impress of his observations. The Handlyng Synne has therefore a value for the delights thrown on the social life and customs of the times, a quality entirely absent from the work of Rolle. We can only give a few indications of these, e.g. swearing by the Virgin is worse than swearing by Christ, a sign of the extent to which the cult of the Virgin had advanced at this time. He speaks of the Saturday half-holy day, as a special English institution to be observed in preparation for Sunday, and tells the story of a man who was struck dead for working on Saturday afternoon. He exhorts his readers not to haunt taverns on holy days, or to gamble before noon on such days. Tournaments, jousts, and squire's games are bad, they involve the seven deadly sins. Dances, carols, summer games, and minstrels are denounced. There is the story of the minstrel who was killed for disturbing a bishop; as a set-off to this story there is given the tale of Robert Grosseteste of Lincoln and why he loved the harp. No miracle plays should be acted except the plays of Christ's birth and resurrection. The denunciations against the carols and games are chiefly because they took place in the churchyards—hence those who took part in them were guilty of sacrilege.

Two stories are given as a fearful warning, the

Story of the Sacrilegious Carollers, and the Story of the Cursed Dancers—the latter being compelled to dance for twelve months (the Latin writer saith "for evermore"), and at the end of that time went hopping about singly ever afterwards.

Another tale, calculated to impress women who chattered in church, tells of a deacon who laughed in a most solemn part of the service, and on being remonstrated with by the priest, explained that his mirth was due to having observed, during the service, a fiend standing behind two women who were chattering in church, writing down on parchment their conversation. The tale of the Suffolk man released from purgatory by two masses that his wife had sung for him, was not without point.

Lastly, the advantage of being well shriven is driven home by the story of how the devil came to be shriven, but it availed him nought since he came without repentance.

Little is known concerning Mannyng's life. He was born at Brunne (now Bourn) near Market Deeping in Lincolnshire. From 1288 to 1303 he belonged to the priory of Brimwake, in the Hundred of Kesteven, six miles from Sempringham; he was afterwards, in 1327, connected with the priory of Sixhill. He once visited Cambridge, and died somewhere between 1340-5. Besides the Handlyng Synne, he wrote a history of England, the main source of this being the rhyiming Chronicle of Piers Langtoft (Peter Langtoft, Canon of Bridlington). Robert had read very considerably; he was familiar with French and English romances, the lives of the Saints, Bede's Ecclesiastical History, besides Latin English and Anglo-Norman historians. His writings were the outcome of a desire to please and entertain people profitably rather than from any motives of personal ambition.

DIALOGUES AND DEBATES

The Owl and the Nightingale

This poem, a debate between the nightingale and the owl, employs a device frequently used in literature. The troubadours had debates between one poet and another. The northern French had their debats, estrifs, or disputations. They were sometimes dramatic in form, sometimes epic, and they are not without importance in the evolution of the drama.

From classical times, the dialogue or debate had proved a favourite means of instructing folk in some point of myth, ethics, philosophy, theology, and science. On one hand we have the dialogues of the Scandinavian Edda, such as the dispute between Odin and Thor; on the other, various points of doctrine discussed in this medium by the Latin Christians. Sometimes a conclusion is reached, as in those of a definitely dogmatic character; at other times, as in the poem under consideration, the issue is left open. Among the religious dialogues, the most popular is the remarkable Debate of the Body and the Soul, in which the two sides of human nature are well opposed.

The Owl and the Nightingale has no religious import, but is an interesting and arresting study in ethics. It is considered by most authorities to have been written not later than the reign of Henry III (1216-72), i.e. almost one hundred and fifty years before Chaucer, and from that point of view alone, is a remarkable piece of work, if we remember that English had scarcely yet regained its position as the medium of verse in polite society. The poem has been attributed to Nicholas de Guildford, the "Maistre Nichole" who is accepted by the two disputants to settle the quarrel. The name of John of Guildford, who wrote a few poems at this date, has also been mentioned.

This anonymous poem was evidently written by one well trained in Latin verse, skilled in argument, a scholar, possibly an ecclesiastic, who after much experience of the world, settled in Dorsetshire or a neighbouring county—the Maister Nicholas of the poem lived at Portesham in Dorset.

The poet has been an unseen witness to the dispute between the owl and the nightingale:

"'Twas in a certain vale
In a very secret recess
I heard a great talk
An owl and a nightingale
The dispute was stiff and stark and strong"

Each said of the other the worst that they knew. The nightingale began the quarrel. Sitting upon a flowering twig she is disturbed in her singing by the sight of the owl seated on an old ivy-grown tree trunk. She saw the owl and despised her and abused her in unmeasured terms. The owl waited until evening and then replied. They attack each other in bitter speeches. Each criticises the manner of life and the singing capacities of the other. The owl scornfully inquires the value of the nightingale's song. The nightingale replies, "Why askest thou of my gifts? Better is my one than all of thine." Man is born for the bliss of heaven. For this reason men sing in church and clerks make songs, so that men may remember heavenly bliss and strive to attain it. "Clerks, canons, monks, rise at midnight and sing of the light of heaven, and priests sing in the country when the light of day springs and I help them, what I may. I admonish men for their good, that they may be blithe in their mood, and bid them that they may seek the song that is eternal."

The owl then replies, "Thou sayest that thou singest to mankind and teachest them to tend to the song that lasts for ever. It is the greatest of all wonders that thou dardest be so openly." Man will not come into God's kingdom with singing only; he must remember his sins and repent of them with tears. "I sing him no follies. If right goes forth and wrong goes back better be my weeping than all thy singing."

It will readily be seen the dispute resolves itself into the eternal conflict between the æsthetic and moral ideals. The owl represents the side of duty and moral earnestness, of those whose one question is ever "Of what use?" The nightingale supports the Hedonistic view, claiming that it also advances religious and ethical aims. The nightingale finally gathers round her a number of song birds who declare her the victor.

Her triumph irritates the owl, and the two seem as if about to proceed to blows. The wren reminds them of the agreement to allow Master Nicholas to decide the dispute. All agree in praising his wisdom, justice and prudence, and his right to settle the quarrel.

The poem is epic in form, and is written in short couplets. The author is one of the best lyrical poets of the period. "His smooth, melodious versification, his copious and redundant language, his frequent musical repetition of phrase and theme, betokens a poet who well knew how to make a strophic song"¹

The scenes in the poem admirably depict the country life of the time; the poem contains much homely proverbial wisdom, and in the 1792 lines, the French element is exceedingly small. It is a notable return to native verse.

The psychological significance of the poem consists in it being essentially a contest between the religious type of poetry and the poetry of love, that abounded in the South, but found a less congenial soil in the sterner North.

The more purely literary interest is found in the simpler and more natural diction, as compared with many Saxon poems; while there is an historical interest in the picture it gives of rural life, especially on its more sequestered side.

The author of Gawan and many another romance of the age paints the wilder sides of nature with a loving fidelity; the author of this poem is drawn, like Cowper, to the gentler aspects.

3. NON-POPULAR DEVOTIONAL WORKS

Richard of Hampole.

Such works as the Cursor Mundi, the Cycle of Homilies, and other similar writings, together with the general condition of the times, pave the way for the most forceful mystical writer of mediæval England. Richard Rolle was born at Thornton, near the old town of Pickering in Yorkshire, about 1300. He was sent to Oxford under the patronage of Thomas Neville, Archdeacon of Durham. At the University, the Friars, with their ideals of poverty, still exercised a penetrating influence, that was doubtless felt by Rolle. Contests between the Nominalists and Realists formed the chief interest of the day. Scriptural studies were of the greatest importance. Rolle manifested an eager desire, not merely for religious knowledge, but also towards personal holiness. Fearing the dangers and temptations to sin, he suddenly left Oxford at the age of nineteen and returned to his father's house. He obtained from his sister two of her dresses, a white and a grey, and in the solitude of a neighbouring wood he proceeded to fashion from these a hermit's dress, using his father's rain cloak for a hood. Thus attired he attended a church near by and occupied the seat of Lady de Dalton, who would not allow him to be disturbed. Her sons, who had known him at Oxford, tell her who he is. On a second occasion he attends the church and is allowed to assist in the service and preach the sermon. Transported by the fire of the Spirit, he preaches a wonderful sermon, that greatly moves his audience. He is invited by Sir John Dalton to a banquet. Sir John is impressed with the silence and humility of Richard, and after a private interview, the knight, convinced of his sanity, gives him hermit's clothing and provides for his maintenance as a hermit on the estate.

Hermits, both men and women (anchoresses), were a common feature of mediæval life. They were under episcopal control and licence. Indulgences were granted to those who supported them. The hermits themselves frequently performed useful services in repaving roads, or keeping bridges. Rolle remained on Sir John's estate for at least four years, spending his time in meditation and prayer and in writing a number of his books.

Rolle next went to Anderby, near Northallerton (Richmond). Here lived Margaret Kirkby, an anchoress, who exercised considerable influence on Rolle's literary activity. He wrote for her a book entitled The boke maad of Rycharde Hampole to an ankeresse, a book similar in purpose to the Ancren Riwle. He also composed an English commentary on the Psalms at her request.

From Anderby, Richard moved to Doncaster, where he was kindly received by the Cistercian Nuns and where finally he died on September 29, 1349 (? or 1348) in the year of the Black Death. The place of his death attracted many pilgrims, drawn thither by his fame and the accounts of miracles which took place at his grave. So great was his popularity, that the Cistercian Nuns sought his canonisation, and an office was composed for his festival,—"Officium et Legenda de Vita Ricardi Rolle"—still in existence in the library of Lincoln Cathedral, and which has been printed by the Early English Text Society.¹ It is from this Office that many of the details concerning Rolle's life are obtained. The Nuns took much pains to preserve his works from mutilation, and copies of them were kept in iron chains.

The Lollards were suspected of having designs on Richard's works, and there was much in Richard's life and writings that leaned towards the simpler teaching of the Lollards and inclined to heterodoxy rather than orthodoxy. Richard was neither a monk, nor a priest, yet he was both a preacher and a spiritual adviser. He retired from the world, to obtain a knowledge of God by contemplation, and he set forth the various stages by means of which he arrived at the heavenly sweetness. Yet this prophet of the mystic, contemplative life, mingled and jested with the world although his true life was that "lud with Christ in God." Richard has a profound reverence for the teaching of authority. He does not speculate about dogmas, nor does he feel any need to reconcile dogmas and philosophy.

His chief work, upon which his position in English literature depends, is The Pricke of Conscience (Stimulus Conscientie). The book is full of quotations from the Fathers and ecclesiastical writers and shows the wide reading of Hampole, in spite of the early limitation of his studies. The language of the poem is clear and vivid. Hampole is animated by a desire to instruct and edify. He is careless of the claims of style and he does not always trouble himself as to the number of syllables in a line. In the seven divisions of The Pricke of Conscience, Hampole considers the wretchedness of human nature, the transitoriness of the world, of life, death, purgatory, the last judgment, hell and heaven. "He vividly depicts the weakness, ugliness and loathsomeness of human nature, the terrors of death and the last judgment, and the torments awaiting the sinner beyond the grave; while all the splendour, all the charm of the poet's art, are lavished upon the picture of heaven."

The treatise De incendio amoris; The Fire of Love, translated into English by Richard Misyn in 1435. He dwells on the necessity of contrition, and two stories well exemplify the emphasis which Hampole laid upon the religion of the heart, as opposed to mere conventional religion. He tells of a wicked canon of Paris who, before he died, confessed his misdeeds, and did penance, yet was damned because he had not in his heart truly repented. Of another sinner who was forgiven before he received absolution! A scholar of Paris was so grieved at his sins that he was rendered speechless. He was told to write them down, and at once was sensible of God's forgiveness. Hampole insists on the paramount importance of the active life in the case of persons with position and influence. Altogether by the strength of his character, the wealth of his subjective religious experiences, Rolle exercised a wide influence and deserves a high place among the poets of religious thought. A cycle of mystic and practical poems centred round Rolle, and his writings had a wide circulation, and doubtless many of his followers imitated his work, e.g. Wm. Massington, Wending of Life.

The Ancrens Rule

One of the most notable works in prose produced early in the thirteenth century, is the Ancrens Rule, or Nun's Rule—a treatise containing instruction and guidance to women leading the solitary life of "ancesses" or "recluses."

The author of this work is now generally accepted as being Bishop Poore, who held the See of Salisbury from 1217–29, when he was translated by Bishop Honorius to Durham. It is also extremely probable that the nuns for whom this rule was written dwelt at Tarrent in Dorsetshire. A religious house was established at Tarrent by Ralph de Kahanes in the reign of Richard I. About a hundred years after its foundation Bishop Poore, who was born at Tarrent, became known as its second founder, and in 1237, during his last illness, he came to Tarrent and died there.

Three sisters of noble birth renounced the world, and lived in solitude in a house close to the church, attended by two women (out-sisters) and some lay brothers. Bishop Poore would seem to have been their spiritual adviser, and at their urgent request—"and ye my dear sisters have oftentimes unpertuned me for a Rule"—he wrote this book which deals with the outward and inward rule to be observed by Ancesses. He divides the book into eight parts. The first part treats of religious service; the next, of the five senses, of fleshly and spiritual temptations, of confession, penitence; finally, he considers the external rule, in which he enters into details concerning the food, clothing, possessions, treatment of the maids, &c., in an eminently practical fashion. The work displays the author's learning and fervent piety, his generous and benevolent attitude towards human frailty.

He exhibits within certain limits a refreshing freedom and broadness of view. "If any ignorant person ask of what order you are . . . say that ye are of the order of St James, who has described order and religion—Pure religion and without stain is to visit and assist the widows and fatherless children and to keep himself pure and unstained from the world."

Thus the writer, while not unmindful of the usefulness of externals, insists on the primary importance of the religion of the heart—purity of heart and love of Christ are the central themes dwelt upon.

The life of the anchoress was to be one of poverty—"Ye shall eat no flesh nor lard except in great sicknesses." They should not take meals outside the convent with friends. An anchoress is not to gather alms in order to dispense them—"Housewifery is Martha's part, and Mary's part is quietness and rest from all the world's dun, that nothing may hinder her from hearing the voice of God." An anchoress should have nothing that draweth her heart outward—"Carry ye on no traffic. An anchoress that is a buyer and seller, selleth her soul to the chapman of hell. Do not take charge of other men's property in your house, nor of their cattle, nor their clothes, neither receive under your care the church vestments, nor the chalice, unless force compel you or great fear, for oftentimes much harm has come from such caretaking." For this reason they are not to possess any beast "except only a cat"—an anchoress that hath cattle must think of the herdsman's hire, of the cow's fodder—"defend herself when her cattle is shut up in the penfold, and moreover pay the damage. Christ knoweth it is an odious thing when people in the town complain of anchoresses' cattle."

Their clothing might be black or white, their garments are to be plain, warm, and well-made. They are to wear no iron, nor hair-cloth, nor hedgehog skins; their shoes are to be thick and warm. "Have neither ring, nor brooch, nor ornamented girdle, nor gloves, nor any such thing that is not proper for you to have." Their time is to be occupied with their devotions and in shaping, sewing, and mending church vestments, and poor people's clothes. An anchoress is enjoined never to be idle. "Iron that lieth still soon gathereth rust; and water that is not stirred soon stinketh."

She is not to send nor receive, nor write letters without leave, neither may she become a school-mistress, nor turn her house into a school for children. Her maiden may teach any little girl "concerning whom it might be doubtful whether she should learn amongst the boys."

The dwelling of the anchorite was as a rule situated next the church, or near the chapel connected with a religious house, with a window looking into the church from whence it was possible to behold the Blessed Sacrament in its place on the Altar, or the elevation of the Host as the priest each morning celebrated Mass. Hence the injunctions to the sisters not to talk out of the church window.

The parlour window, in which they might converse, was protected by a grille, inside being a black curtain and a shutter of wood

"Wherefore, my dear sisters, love your windows as little as possible; and see that they be small—the parlour's smallest and narrowest. . . . See that your parlour windows be always fast on every side, and likewise well shut; and mind your eyes there, least your heart escape and go out like David's, and your soul fall sick as soon as it is out."

Interesting instructions are also given concerning the "Out-sisters" whose duty it was to perform all the commerce with the outer world rendered necessary in the provision of food and supplies

One of these sisters was to remain at home, the other to go out when necessary; "and—he cautions shrewdly—let her be very plain, or of sufficient age, and, by the way, as she goeth let her go singing her prayers; and hold no conversation with man or with woman: nor sit, nor stand, except the least possible, until she come home. Let her go nowhere else but to the place whither she is sent. Without leave, let her neither eat nor drink abroad. Let the other be always within, and never go out of the gate without leave. Let both be obedient to their dame in all things, sin only excepted. Let them possess nothing unknown to their mistress, nor accept nor give anything without her permission. They must not let any man in; nor must the younger speak with any man without leave; nor go out of town without a trusty companion, nor sleep out. . . . Let neither of the women either carry to her mistress or bring from her any idle tales, or new tidings, nor sing to one another, nor speak any worldly speeches, nor laugh, nor play, so that any man who saw it might turn it to evil."

The writer of the Nun's Rule shows the fondness for parable and allegory characteristic of the age. The influence of the Scriptures and of the new school of preachers is apparent (e.g. chapter on penance follows teaching of St. Bernard): "His style is simple and dignified, and unites grace and graphic picturesqueness with the free movement of that period"¹

There is a pleasant mingling of piety, common sense, and knowledge of human nature in the work.

There is a quiet touch of humour, moreover, that runs through these monitions to the Sisters: "God knows it would be more agreeable to me to set out on a journey to Rome than to begin to do it again."²

The Ayenbite of Inuyt.—About the same time that Richard Rolle the Hermit was writing the Pricke of Conscience for the use of his countrymen in the north of England, Dan Michel of Northgate, Kent, furnished the southern folk with a Manual bearing the quaint but thoroughly English title of the Ayenbite of Inuyt (the Remorse of Conscience). The Ayenbite is a very literal translation of a French treatise entitled Le Somme des Vices et de Vertue, composed in 1279 for the use of Philip II of France, by Frère Lorens of the Order of Friar Preachers. Two copies of Dan Michel's work are preserved in the British Museum. The manuscript states that the "Ayenbite of Inuyt was completed in the year of Our Lord's birth 1340, in the eve of the Holy Apostles Simon and Judas, by Dan Michel of Northgate, a brother of Saint Austin, Canterbury"

Considerable uncertainty attaches to most early English texts with regard to their date, authorship and dialect, but about this there is no doubt, and it is of great importance as a philological document.

WILLIAM LANGLAND

WILLIAM LANGLAND

WILLIAM LANGLAND, or Langley (tradition is not unanimous on this point), was born about 1332 at Clebury Mortimer in Shropshire. He was educated probably at Malvern, and certainly was familiar with the Malvern Hills. While yet a young man he came to London, living in Cornhill, poor and unhappy, with his wife Catherine and daughter Nicolette. It is said that he was in minor orders, and earned a precarious living by singing "the placebo, dirige, and seven psalms for the good of men's souls." Be that as it may, he was assuredly poor, and although his mental alertness had attracted towards him a few patrons at the outset of his career, these died, and he was left to shift for himself. And even putting aside his married state, it is easy to see why he never rose in the Church. He had the stuff of the reformer in him; and the reformer rarely gets promotion.

PERSONALITY AND TEMPERAMENT

In person tall and lank—men dubbed him "Long Will"; in disposition proud and moody; Langland strode through the London streets, a sombre, melancholy figure, with his tansured head and priestly robe. Sensitive and great-hearted, he was, at the same time, slow of speech, with few of those charms of manner which made his great contemporary, Chaucer, so popular. Like our own Thomas Hardy, he was more keen to note the ironies of life, the suffering and misery that lay about him, than to note those brighter aspects of mediæval life which Chaucer loved to paint.

But one solace he had, his book. One feels that into it was poured his life-blood; all his hopes and despair, sorrows and aspirations, anger and compassion went into The Book of Piers the Plowman. In addition to this unfinished work he wrote a poem called Richard the Redeless, i.e. devoid of counsel, which related to the expected deposition of Richard II in 1399. The shadow of obscurity hangs over his later years, but he died probably about the same time as Chaucer, in 1400.

THE BOOK OF PIERS THE PLOWMAN

This is the most correct name for the whole poem. The Vision concerning Piers the Plowman is the title of a portion only, and is sometimes referred to as The Vision of Piers the Plowman, suggesting that Piers is the author of the poem rather than the subject.

The poem is extant in various forms, but the chief forms have been called by Professor Skeat the A-text, the B-text, and the C-text. Of these the first version was written probably about 1362, and contains the Vision about Piers the Plowman, with a prologue and eight cantos; and the Vision of Do-wel, Do-bet, and Do-best in a prologue and three cantos. The second version (B-text), written about 1377 and probably in London, is of much greater length, and includes the fable of the rats and the cat. The third version (C-text) is the longest of all and the latest in date.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE POEM

The poem describes a series of remarkable visions, that pass before the dreamer, and in their general drift we are reminded of the great allegory of Bunyan. To the sound of murmuring waters the poet falls asleep. Maybe he was at Malvern when he wrote, maybe the fresh, rustic summer morn which he pictured was seen by the inward eye alone, in his impoverished home near St. Paul's; we do not know. Anyway, like another famous writer of allegory, he fell asleep, and in a "field ful of folkes" he saw the men and women of his dream—knights, monks, preachers, peasants, cooks that cry out, "Hot pies, hot," and "mystrelles" that sell "gloc." And the object of their journey, like that of the more famous journey from the City of Destruction, was the search for Truth and Good.

The poem may be considered from a threefold aspect:

1. As a picture of contemporary life and manners in town and country
2. As a satire upon ecclesiastical abuses, and the follies and vices of the age
3. As an allegory of Life.

1. Considered under the first aspect, it throws interesting sidelights upon mediæval life. We gather, for instance, how the tradesmen's apprentices stood at the shop doors shouting out to possible customers and trying to tempt them in, much as the showman does in the country fair. At the tavern door could be heard, "White wine of Alsace!" "Red Gascony wine!" while the cook would insinuate, "Good dinners, come dine!"

Cornhill, Tyburn, East Chepe, Smithfield, and other familiar London haunts are referred to by the poet; he speaks of the Law Courts at Westminster, alludes to the recent suppression of the Templars, and deals with considerable detail upon the habits of the clergy and merchant classes. We hear about the "pryvee parlour" and the "chamber with a chymene" which was coming into fashion. Earlier, the hall was the hiding-place for the head of the house and the members of the family. "Chambres" were sleeping-places, and the "parlour" originally meant a place for private chat. It was often used for business purposes, but none thought of making it a living-room. In Langland's time, however, the hall was used less and less, and the parlour was no longer reserved for special parliances. All this meant less feasting and good-fellowship in the big hall; and so this innovation was looked upon as selfishness on the part of the rich man.

"Now hath ech riche a rule
To eten by hymselfe
In the pryvee parlour."

He reproaches

"Brewers and bakere, and butchers and cooke;
Such men, on this mould, can most harm work
To the poorer people, that pece-meal buy;
For they poison the people, both privly and oft."

Also he condemns the rich people for "regrating"—that was the custom of buying up provisions and retailing them to the poor at great profit.

His mention of "breed" (bread) from "Stratford" reminds us of the fame which Stratford-at-Bow enjoyed in mediæval times for supplying bread to the city. And the bakers were important men.

2. Regarding it as a satire, we find Langland bitterly upbraiding those who shirk honest work, the drunkard and the oppressor, the tradesman who cheats, and the preacher who counsels one thing but follows another. Many of the sins and frailties he decries are common to no one age. Moralists of all ages have dealt with them, from Langland and the Elizabethan Puritan, Stubbes, William Harrison, the Kingsley of Shakespeare's day, down to Carlyle and the still more modern castigators of society. Some of the abuses he speaks of, however, are necessarily connected with the breaking up of feudalism and the corruption of the Church. Two things are clear from the tenor of his strictures: he desires better social conditions for the people, and less corruption in the Church. Yet, though the spokesman for the labouring classes favoured the old class divisions and reviled the insurgents of 1381, in these matters he is reactionary. He wants reform, but within the Church. He is less drastic in his proposals for clerical reform than Wyclif. Though satirising pardoners and friar confessors, he expresses belief in penance and absolution, and sighs for the obedience of an age that has passed.

Wyclif disbelieved in the doctrine of penance and absolution—in this matter being in accord with the Reformers of the generation that succeeded. In fact, he scarcely realised that in the desperate picture which he drew of corruption in Church and

State, and in the oppression by the rich, he had stated a case for reform far more drastic and thorough than those measures which he advocated.

On some points, however, Langland was thorough-going, viz. in his dislike of Jewish bankers, and his conviction that the great wealth of the Church was harmful to her. The knaves who traffic in "pardons"; the friars who make a pretence of religion; knights to whom fighting was merely an excuse to express their lust for blood; the countless men and women, both in town and country, whose lives were dominated by no great principle or ideal—all these he lashed. The brilliant insincerity which, despite its superficial charm, makes the flaunting fourteenth century in England compare so unfavourably with the two centuries preceding; the rottenness which was breaking up all the real strength and greatness of the Middle Ages, Langland saw with marvellous clearness. Where can truth be found? This is his cry. And so the Messengers—Reason, Repentance, and Hope—help in the search for Truth, guided by Piers himself. Piers insists upon manual labour as the first essential, and extols this with the enthusiasm of a Thoreau.

The World is at hand to wheedle and bribe the honest worker; the World in the person of Lady Meed, attractive but heartless, whose name itself savours of bribery. But on Lady Meed and her doings, and the revelations of the Knight's Conscience, there is no need to dwell in this brief sketch. We are more concerned with the picture of the crowd hurrying through the streets of London, and the vivid picture of the revelers in the City tavern. Here we have quarrels or discussions, and heavy drinking, and the noisy ritual of mirth for which taverns in every age are renowned, the hermit, the cobbler, the clerk of the church, the hangman, and the harlot met together.

We may note how "Gyle" is made welcome by the merchants, and serves in their shops; how that the pardoners take pity on "Lyer," and send him to church to sell pardons.

The scene shifts constantly and unexpectedly from town to country, from London to Malvern, vigorous and pungent homilies break in upon the action of the story, and the upshot of all is that the poet bids us "lerne to love" as the one cure for the ills of life.

It will be seen, therefore, that though a reformer, he is a Conservative reformer, desiring neither with Wyclif a radical reorganisation of the Church, nor with John Ball a transformation of society upon the lines of equality. He did not realise that feudalism was a spent force, and that beneath all the crude violence of the Insurrection of 1381 lay a perfectly just demand. Langland's counsel was to do your duty in whatever state of life it pleased God to call you. Class divisions were to remain, but the rich were to give protection, the poor, service. Then all would be well. But though his moderation may not appeal to some minds, none would dispute the earnestness and passionate sincerity of the man. He wrote, as Bunyan did, under compulsion to deliver his soul and to redeem his countrymen.

3. In its form the poem is an allegory. The good and bad qualities of human nature strive for the mastery, and among them moves Piers himself; externally a labourer, working with his hands; essentially a symbol for the Christ. He was meant to typify righteous living—a life of action in the world. Such places as the Field, the Tower, the Dungeon are clearly as allegorical as the Slough of Despond, Doubting Castle, or the Valley of the Shadow. The personages are, for the most part, abstractions, with such names as Warren Wisdom, Witty, the fascinating Lady Meed (i.e. Bribery), the more gracious figure of Holy Church. Some of the names excel Bunyan's in length. There is Suffer-till-I-see-my-time, and another rejoicing in the amazing appellation of Tom-true-tongue-tell-me-no-foresnor-lying-stories-to-laugh-at-for-I-loved-them-never.

THE SUBSTANCE OF THE POEM

In his sleep the poet dreams of the world as a Field Full of Folk, each at his self-appointed task. A motley crew assuredly—merchants, pilgrims, friars, ploughmen, anchorites, and spendthrifts, a King and an Angel. The Field is situate between the Tower of Truth (God the Father) and the Dungeon (the Abode of Evil Spirits). Clerical characters predominate, and for none of them has Langland a good word save the ploughmen and the hermits. Suddenly there comes a host of rats and mice, bent upon "belling the cat"; from this they are dissuaded by a wise old mouse, who warns them.

"Though we killed the old cat, yet another would come
To catch all our kin . . ."

Then the scene shifts to another part of the Field, where may be heard cooks and taverners touting for custom. And so the Prologue ends.

The First Canto deals with the Vision of Holy Church. A lovely lady approaches the dreamer, and tells him that the Tower is the abode of the Creator, while the Dungeon belongs to the Father of Falsehood: her name she discloses as Holy Church, and in the course of a good vigorous homily she instructs him upon the value of Truth and Love to mortal men who wish to go to Heaven:

"Give of your goods, and to you shall be given (Luke vi 38);

'Tis the lockgate of love, that letteth out grace
To comfort the careworn encumbered with sin
Love, next our Lord, is the leech of man's life,
The right road that runneth directly to heaven
So I say of the texts, as I said before,
When all treasures are tried, then Truth is the best
I have told thee what Truth is, no treasure is better,
I may linger no longer; the Lord be thy guide."

The homily is, in the original text, interspersed with Latin sentences from the Bible, far more familiar to Langland's readers (even though understood by few) than the English version.

Canto II deals with the Lady Meed and Falsehood. Holy Church points out the gorgeously adorned Lady Meed, who is about to wed Falsehood. She then leaves the dreamer. Theology strongly objects to the Wedding, and so all the parties set off for London, so that the dispute may be heard at Westminster. There Meed is taken prisoner, while the others make their escape.

Cantos III and IV.—The tactful Lady Meed tries to make her peace with both worlds. She confesses to a friar and is duly shriven, and advises judges to take bribes. The King, before whom she has been brought, counsels a marriage with Conscience. But Conscience objects, and exposes her character. Meed leaves Westminster Hall in disgrace and passes out of the story. Throughout the scene the King had listened to the advice of Reason, who agrees at the close to stay with him always. At this point the first Vision comes to an end.

Canto V—When next he falls asleep, we have the Vision of the Seven Deadly Sins, and of Piers the Plowman. Once more we are in the Field, where Reason is exhorting the people, and using recent plagues and tempests to point the moral. The sermon impresses the hearers; Pride vows humility, Luxury pledges himself to drink water, Envy, Wrath, Avarice, Gluttony, and Sloth also repent. And Piers the Plowman offers to help them in the Quest for Truth. In the course of this canto the poet gives a vivid sketch of a London alehouse and its occupants, whither Gluttony has gone. It is one of the social vignettes which give the poem its historical interest.

Canto VI—Piers advocates hard manual work, for which many are disinclined. Hunger, however, makes them submit. Then follow some passages in which he deals with the food of the poor and of their general condition.

Canto VII—Truth gives Piers a Bull of Pardon for almost every kind of sinner. False beggars, however, are excepted, and the author emphasizes what a formidable class they are. A Priest wishes to see the Bull, and finds in it only these lines. "Those who do well, shall have well; those who do evil, shall have evil." Whereat he scoffs at Piers and the dreamer awakes. The poem concludes with a declaration as to the superiority of a good life above all the Bulls of the Pope at the Day of Judgment.

A supplementary poem to this is that of "Dowel, Do-bet, Do-best," but although Langland gave thirty years to the writing of this, it falls far below the earlier poem in grip and vitality. Here Love, the Good Samaritan, takes the place of Piers. There is much religious discussion, but little story; and although there are striking lines, the poem as a whole is too diffuse and discursive. Langland is no theologian, and he feels at times that he is wading in water too deep for him.

THE STYLE OF THE POEM

Sincerity, dignity, and passion mark Langland's work throughout. He is no artist, as Chaucer was, nor had he, save on rare occasions, Chaucer's power to visualise character. The bad characters are more vitally drawn than the good. Langland gives most attention to them, and paints them with detailed touches, such as he does not accord to his virtuous. A comparison of Lady Meed with Holy Church will convince the reader on this point.

Undoubtedly, he had remarkable powers of observation, but he had as little self-criticism as Wordsworth, and, like Wordsworth, will follow up lines of elemental beauty with verse of the dullest and most trivial kind. But he had an arresting personality, and the task he essayed was a task of great difficulty. Compared with Chaucer, we realise his manifold limitations, but compared with his predecessors, he is, among the religious poets of mediæval England, a veritable giant. His outlook is constricted, and his pictures have too little light and shade. But they have a Rembrandt-like power, and he did a noble work as a spiritual irritant in rousing his generation to a sense of its shortcomings and weaknesses.

THE ROMANTIC ELEMENT (COURTLY POETRY)

THE ROMANTIC ELEMENT

"Saddle the Hippogriffs, ye muses nine,
And straight we'll ride to the land of Old Romance"
WIELAND.

THE very word "romance" conjures up to the vagrant fancy, visions of battlemented castles, of fair ladies waving wistful adieux to the bravely accoutred knights, as they ride forth in search of gloriously impossible adventures.

Reading these old romances we enter a new world, where damsels are always beautiful, sometimes even learned, e.g. the Fair Felice in Guy of Warwick, where the men are prodigies alike of valour and muscular might and properly contemptuous of wounds that heal conveniently by miraculous interposition; where disappointed ladies find consolation in ministering to the poor and afflicted; where men repent and found monasteries or become hermits and pilgrims; where true lovers overcome insuperable obstacles, and are eventually united to live happily or die together.

Now, mediæval English romances, like the word romance itself, were French in origin. The legendary tales of the Celt were told often in prose, but both the Norman and Teuton elected verse, and we have to pass to the time of Malory before we find this verse form, whether of alliteration or rhyme, superseded by prose. It is easy to understand why this preference is given to verse, inasmuch as most of the story-telling was done by the minstrel: romance was cradled in song; it is literature's lullaby for children of all ages

Such was the origin of English romance. What of its nature?

Roughly speaking, our romances were all fashioned from four big cycles of romance that centre round Alexander, Troy, Charlemagne, Arthur; embroidered by successive poets and minstrels, with material gathered from every source of popular tradition

The romances therefore are by no means similar in colour and texture. Some, like Guy of Warwick, immensely popular for its patriotic and religious note, are rich in extravagance, others, like the Song of Roland, are severe and simple in their telling. Yet the tendency, as time went on and the demand for these things grew, was for all of them to become elaborate and high-flown; while most of the tales that are Teutonic in origin, such as Havelok and King Horn, sound an insistent ethical note. We are clearly shown the overthrow of craft and the triumph of virtue.

The Romantic element has always existed in English literature from the very earliest times. It is found in the Beowulf and in the poems of Cynewulf, but the term "roman" or romance is usually restricted to a class of literary composition which was first written in languages derived from the Latin, but especially the French. During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the largest and most popular part of the vernacular literature consisted of adventure stories in which love and religion came gradually to occupy a more and more important position. These stories were sometimes written in prose, more commonly in verse.

After the Norman Conquest, a Norman French literature began to spring up in England. The English language fell into the background, Norman French was the language of the court and of polite society. The English tongue underwent changes; it was a period of transition at the end of which the native language began to reassert its ascendancy. Gradually the Norman French lost its dominant position; the two nations began to intermingle. The growing needs of business and family life, court life and chivalry, new discoveries in the industrial and fine arts, the clergy, the itinerant monks and the cosmopolitan orders did much to increase this growing intercourse and exchange of ideas. Of the influence of the mendicant friars we have already spoken. They came in close contact with the poor of the cities. But a still more important part was taken by the "discours geours," or as they were called in English, the "seggers or glee-men."

It was the professional "gleeman" who made the French literature translated either by himself or others (clerks) accessible to the ordinary people. Year by year the audience of the gleemen grew larger. The aristocrat still preferred French to English poetry, but the rich burgesses, the knights and squires, the yeomen, and throngs of meaner folk welcomed the professional story-teller, and the romances were easily first in popular estimation.

Now, in the French poetry, which came over here and so profoundly influenced our literature, there were three important story-cycles: the matter of Rome, the matter of France, and the matter of Britain.

The first includes the story of Troy, and the adventures of Alexander of Macedon. The Trojan story inspired Virgil, and was popular in France during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. More than one nation fancied descent from Pius Æneas, in an age when to have descended from some fabulous person was looked upon as a guarantee of national respectability. The Greeks themselves claimed Trojan origin, and Geoffrey of Monmouth, in his History of the Britons, described with gusto and particularity their descent from Brutus, great-grandson of Æneas.

Curiously enough this tale, which greatly took the popular fancy, was translated into French, and re-translated later on by the priest Layamon under the title of Le Brut (1205). A striking feature about Layamon's work is the introduction of rhyme into English verse in parts of his work, and the use of similes.

The adventures of Alexander had found an earlier ingress, but there are very few English poems dealing with it, though Chaucer says that everyone had heard of Alexander's fortunes.

The matter of France is more important as a literary influence. It dealt with Charlemagne, and started in France with the Story of Roland. The groundwork of this cycle is historical, and the struggles depicted between the feudal nobles and their over-lord are based on fact, though such an hero as Huon de Bordeaux is a figment of the imagination.

This cycle was wonderfully popular in mediæval times, and greatly influenced European literature—for example, the stories of Ariosto. In our own time William Morris drew upon its romantic treasures.

This cycle reached its height of development in the eleventh century. It appealed to the Southern nations more than to us, because it was concerned so particularly with the struggles of Christendom and Mohammedanism.

The matter of Britain is, for Englishmen at any rate, by far the most important of these cycles.

Why was this?

It was a cycle of stories of French origin, written partly in prose, partly in verse, dealing with the old Celtic legend of King Arthur. We are so accustomed to regard Arthur as a national hero, that we do not realise readily how largely the literature around him is in a foreign tongue. For the height of its popularity in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries was the height also of French influence. And it was in the form of a French Romance that the stories became known in England.

It is somewhat curious that we should have adopted as our national hero the chief of the defeated Britons rather than a Saxon leader. But such is the fact; other epic heroes we passed aside, and took to our hearts the Celtic conqueror of the "Demon Cat."

We do not know what was precisely the character of the original Welsh legend, but we do know that it was mainly concerned with fighting, and that the Launcelot story and the legend of the Grail, together with other tales of King Arthur's knights, were afterthoughts—French graftings on to the original stem.

Sir Thomas Malory finally blended the Arthurian literature—prose and verse—into one prose version.

DIFFERENCES IN THE NATURE OF THE CYCLES

The matter of Britain and of Rome differed from the matter of France in one fundamental point. These were essentially aristocratic in origin, the Charlemagne cycle democratic. The Arthurian cycle, for instance, came into being as a deliberate artistic shaping of old stories, to amuse and interest; the Carolingian epic started as a piece of patriotic propaganda, to encourage national sentiment. This difference in nature and interest is reflected in the character of the respective cycles, as will be seen from a detailed consideration of them.

While these romantic stories came in a French guise, they cannot be regarded as essentially the productions of the French genius. The tendency of the French spirit in literature is over towards a symmetrical and harmonious unity of form. This is well illustrated by the Song of Roland, which formed the basis of later Charlemagne romances. The national epic is inspired by two motives: the love of France, and the struggle for the propagation of Christianity. Roland, the true vassal of his great uncle Charlemagne, the champion of the Christian cause and of France, falls a victim to foul treachery, and his own high sense of honour, but his death is speedily avenged and the enemies of the faith overthrown. The life-long struggle of the hero is vindicated and the cause triumphant. The spirit of the poem, which exhibits the union of the Teutonic heroic ideal with that of a Christian knight, may be shown by the following passage—

"And when the count Roland saw his dear friend and comrade stretched upon the earth, with his face towards the east, he could not stir for grief, but softly to himself he began to sorrow for him: 'Noble comrade to thy hurt wast thou so valiant. Years and days have we been together and never hast thou lifted hand against me, nor have I done thee harm. And now thou art dead, what right have I to live?' And from too great grief has he swooned upon his saddle, and the golden stirrups hold him on his courser's back, so that he cannot fall whichever way he goes." An appeal for help from his friend Gualter, who is sorely wounded, arouses Roland and "amongst the heathen once more he plies his sword. Twenty of the foe has he laid in the dust, and Gualter has slain seven, and the Archbishop (Turpin) five. And the heathen spake one to another: 'Terrible men are these. Beware barons lest they escape alive, for such men deserve not to be taken. Cursed be the vassal who shrinks from fighting with them, and a vile coward is he who lets them go unhurt.' Now has the hue and cry begun again, and from all parts of the field the heathen pressed around them . . .

"Nobly still fights Roland, though he is bathed in sweat and his blood is all on fire. Great was the pain he felt in his head, and his temples were red with blood from the sounding of the horn. But he would know for sure if Charles would come and aid him, and once more he sounded his horn but feeble was the noise thereof. Now as the Emperor halted to listen to the sound, and thus he spake in anguish: 'Ah God, what evil has befallen us, for surely shall my nephew Roland fail us to-day. By the sound of this horn can I tell that he is nigh to perish, and quickly must he ride who would help him ere he fall. Now let each man blow his trumpet, that the sound thereof may be heard afar off.' And thereupon might one hear the sound of sixty thousand trumpets, so that the hills resounded, and all the valleys echoed. And the heathens, too, have heard it, and small is their desire for laughter."

Death of Roland—"High was the hill and very lofty were the trees, and four steps of shining marble were there amidst the grass, in the place where Roland fell . . . And there as he lay upon the summit of a hill, looking o'er the land of Spain, he beat his hand upon his breast, and thus he spake: 'Ah, God! grant me thy pardon for the sake of Thy great mercy! Absolve my sins both small and great which I have ever committed from the hour that I was born till this day on which I perish.' And he extended his right glove toward the God of heaven. And lo, the angels from heaven descended to where he lay."

Compare the Song of Roland with the Charlemagne romance which sprang up before the close of the eleventh century, and which was falsely attributed to Archbishop Turpin. In this poem the Charlemagne story is associated with popular traditions, oriental extravagances and legendary matter of many kinds. Charlemagne visits the Holy Sepulchre and returns from the east bringing the Holy Grail—the chalice which Christ used at the Last Supper. At once we perceive that new influences were at work, destined to entirely change the character of the earlier romances.

The Charlemagne cycle, owing to the alienation and subsequent rivalry of the Normans and French after the Conquest, did not receive much attention in England until a later period. The Celtic note dominates the history of the romance literature after the Conquest, and before dealing with this it is necessary to sketch quite briefly its growth and development.

THE MATTER OF BRITAIN

THE ARTHURIAN CYCLE AND ITS CELTIC ORIGIN

A close, if not always peaceful, connection had existed between the Bretons (the Bretons and Welsh both belonged to the Brythonic division of the Celtic race) and the Normans from the tenth century onwards. Many of the Breton lais were sung or recited by the French "jongleurs." In addition to this there is evidence of the transmission of the Arthurian legend through the medium of Welsh texts into Brittany. These two tributary streams of Celtic tradition, the Welsh and the

Breton, had found their way into Norman literature previous to the Conquest. Afterwards they are again united to the main stream in Britain where the traditions had flowed deeper and purer, and many causes contributed to its rapid rise in volume and power. The Norman Conquest was followed by a Celtic revival which found expression in literary activities of various kinds. It is probable that the Mabinogion, which contains the only Welsh Arthurian romance antedating French influences (Kulhwch and Olwen and The Dream of Rhonabwy), was redacted during the last quarter of the eleventh century.

Moreover, King Arthur was adopted by the Anglified Normans in place of Charlemagne, the French national hero. This aristocratic adoption of Arthurian legend led to its assuming new importance. It received an infusion of courtly and chivalric ideals in the hands of the Norman poets. The rapid diffusion of the legend on the Continent was possibly due to the fact that the Celtic legend was capable of receiving the new courtly and religious elements that were drawn into the cycle, whereas the Charlemagne cycle, as we have said, was specially concerned with the struggles of Christianity and Mohammedanism. This phase had passed away, and in the Crusades new aspects came into being, new ideals of knighthood. The patronage of literature came to be very often in the hands of women, and to this may be attributed the increasing regard paid to the love interest of the story.

EVOLUTION OF THE ARTHURIAN CYCLE

The romantic personality of Arthur is like a composite photograph, made up of three distinct figures. (1) There is the Historical figure. In the Historia Britonum by Nennius—written about A.D. 800, a skilful redaction of material from various sources—we learn that Arthur was a military leader of the Britons, who fought successfully against the Saxons and became a name with which to conjure. This led naturally to (2) the Mythological figure. Arthur here has attracted towards his person many myths and legends, and become a kind of god, with heroic attributes and a band of followers almost as wonderful as himself. But mediæval chivalry demanded some figure that should symbolize its graces, its knightly achievements; and the legendary, mysterious figure of Arthur seemed created for the purpose. They knew too much about Charlemagne, with his strenuous activities and devout temper. Arthur came from a distant clime, only dimly perceived through the mists of legend. Him therefore they took, so we have (3) the Romantic Arthur, the incarnate spirit of chivalry; and it was from Geoffrey of Monmouth's book that they took this figure. He virtually created the Arthur of Romance. He resumes in his person the successful leader, and the Saga hero, adding to these, fresh qualifications as an adventurous knight.

Among the writers who contributed to the literary evolution of the Arthurian cycle the first place must be assigned to Geoffrey of Monmouth. Slight references to Arthur's heroic deeds as "a leader and conqueror of the Saxons in twelve battles" occur in a Latin history by Nennius, but Geoffrey in his Historia Regum Britanniae brings together materials drawn from ancient poets and prose writers, possibly also oral traditions, and with the aid of imagination he welds the scattered legends into an harmonious whole. For the first time astonished historians were presented with a genealogy of British kings deriving their descent, not from Woden and Seth, but from the famous Trojan leader, Brutus. The legends of Lochrine, of Gorboduc, King Lear (Lear) and his daughters were incorporated with much accurate chronological and historical matter. The whole fabric was professedly based on a British (Cymric) book which Geoffrey was supposed to have received from Walter, Archdeacon of Oxford—"a man learned not only in the art of eloquence, but in the histories of foreign lands," and it is this book which he flaunts in the faces of historians like William of Malmesbury and Henry of Huntingdon, when he bids them "be silent as to the Kings of the Britons, since they have not that book in the British speech which Walter, Archdeacon of Oxford brought over from Brittany."

Arthur is here depicted as the great king and hero guarded by supernatural powers, surrounded by brave warriors, a man of marvellous life and tragic death.

The popularity of Geoffrey's work is due to its being a piece of realistic fiction. Geoffrey is essentially a story-teller and not an historian. He achieves the apotheosis of the historic Arthur in the region of romance; his work fostered the chivalric and kingly ideals, it ministered to the desires for the mysterious and marvellous. Moreover, it appeared just at the right time. The Anglified Normans were prepared to accept a British hero in preference to the French Charlemagne. In addition, romance was in demand and Geoffrey made the most of it. He is the story-teller par excellence, but it must be remembered that the air of historic reality with which Geoffrey contrived to invest these inventions was sufficient to deceive his own none too critical age. Two notable exceptions must be made: William of Newburgh, writing in 1190, says:

"It is manifest that everything which this person wrote about Arthur and his successors, and his predecessors after Vortigern, was made up, partly by himself, and partly by others, whether from an inordinate love of lying, or for the sake of pleasing the Britons."

Giraldus Cambrensis tells of a Welshman at Caerleon, named Melerius, who had dealings with evil spirits and was enabled by their assistance to foretell future events. "He knew when anyone spoke falsely in his presence for he saw the devil, as it were leaping and exulting on the tongue of the liar. . . . If the evil spirit oppressed him too much, the Gospel of St. John was placed on his bosom, when like birds they immediately vanished; but when that book was removed and the History of the Britons by Geoffrey was substituted in its place, they instantly reappeared in greater numbers, and remained a longer time than usual on his body and on the book." Since Giraldus himself was a writer of fiction, this little story may be merely the outcome of a piece of professional jealousy!

In spite of these criticisms, Geoffrey's Chronicle was accepted as a veracious history, by his own and succeeding generations. Its importance as an inspiration in English literature can scarcely be estimated. The series of Bruts, or Chronicles, which followed Geoffrey, will be dealt with in some detail. The influence of Arthurian romance suffered somewhat in the time of Chaucer. Malory's Morte d'Arthur gave new life to the Arthurian stories, and in spite of the protests of grave moralists like Ascham, the Elizabethans seized with avidity on these legends of early Britain. One consequence of which was, that Geoffrey's Chronicle was one of the many printed during the perfervid period of patriotism that arose in this reign. Spenser in his Faerie Queen, Drayton in his Polyolbion, William Warner in Albion's England, drew inspiration from these sources. In 1588, a play called The Misfortunes of Arthur, by Thomas Hughes, was acted before the Queen, but apart from this solitary instance, and Dryden's opera King Arthur or the British Worthy, Arthurian stories have made a greater and more enduring appeal to the poet than to the dramatist.

Milton meditated writing his great epic on the national hero, but finally chose a more "universal theme." Lastly, Tennyson in modern times has once more surrounded the coming and passing of Arthur with the mystery and magic of romance when "From the great deep to the great deep he goes."

Of Geoffrey himself all that can be definitely said is that he was ordained a priest and almost immediately afterwards appointed Bishop of St. Asaph in 1152. He died at Llandaff in 1155. The History was certainly begun in 1139, and had attained its complete form in 1148. There is no evidence that Geoffrey was a Welshman, although he lived at Monmouth, and claimed the patronage of a Norman prince, Robert, Earl of Gloucester, who was overlord of a tract of Welsh country. To this Robert, William of Malmesbury, the distinguished historian, dedicated his History of the Kings of England. Geoffrey commends him as "one nurtured in the liberal arts of philosophy and called unto the command of our armies by his own inborn prowess of knighthood, one whom in these days Britain haileth with heartfelt affection, as though she had been vouchsafed another Henry."

The popularity of Geoffrey's work is testified by the large number of manuscript copies that were made—there are, for instance, thirty-five copies in the British Museum, and sixteen in the Bodleian—and by the number of translations, adaptations, and continuations. Some of the most important will now be dealt with.

In 1150, five years before the death of Geoffrey, an Anglo-Norman poet named Gaimar wrote the first French metrical chronicle. It consisted of two parts: the Estorie des Bretons, and the Estorie des Angles. The former has not come down to us, but is known to have been a rhymed translation of Geoffrey's work. Gaimar was succeeded by Wace, a Norman poet who produced the Roman de Brut (Brut, i.e. Chronicle). Wace occupies an important position not only on account of his poetic gifts and his contribution to the Arthurian story, but also because the metrical chronicle forms a link between the prose chronicle and the metrical romance. The latter had received a powerful stimulus from Chrestien de Troies, the most distinguished of the trouvères. The French poet wrote for courtly circles and the metrical romances were a convenient method of setting forth the code of chivalrous conduct and recounting adventures of love.

Wace lived about 1100-75. He gives the following information concerning himself in the Roman de Rou:

"If anybody asks who said this, who put this history into the Romance language, I say and I will say to him, that I am Wace of the isle of Jersey, which lies in the sea, toward the west, and is a part of the fief of Normandy. In the isle of Jersey was I born, and to Caen I was taken as a little lad, there I was put at the study of letters; afterwards I studied long in France. When I came back from France I dwelt long at Caen. I busied myself with making books in Romance, many of them I wrote, and many of them I made."

Before 1135 Wace was a "reading clerk," and his writings won for him the favour of Henry II, who advanced him to the canonry of Bayeux. He composed a number of Lives of the Saints, but his two most important works are the Roman de Brut, and the Roman de Rou (i.e. Rollo)—the latter a chronicle history of the Dukes of Normandy that Wace had begun in obedience to Henry's command, but which for some reason or other he was not allowed to finish, Henry transferring his patronage to "Master Benoit" (Benoit de Sainte More).

"Since the king has asked him to do this work I must leave it, and I must say no more. Of old, the king did me many a favour, much he gave me, more he promised me and if he had given all that he had promised me, it had been better for me. Here ends the book of Master Wace, let him continue it who will."

Wace had completed the Roman de Brut, or Geste des Bretons, in 1155. The Brut can in no sense be termed a translation of Geoffrey's work, for Wace has impressed upon it the stamp of his own individuality. To begin with, the French octosyllabic couplet with its swift movement forms a striking contrast to Geoffrey's stately Latin prose. Wace tells us he had heard tales of Arthur, but he is not willing to give credence to many of these fables. He will only set down that which he believes to be true.

Wace's narrative betrays distinct evidence of the influence of the courtly school. He gives place to descriptions of love, and embodies two elements of Celtic origin when he gives us the first literary record of the Round Table, and of Arthur as the "Hope of Britain."

"He is yet in Avalon, awaited of the Britons, for as they say and deem he will return from whence he went and live again."

"Wace is not to be regarded as one of the great contributors to our knowledge of the Arthurian legend, but without a familiarity with his work, later French romance can scarcely be appreciated, so important is his place as a delicate transformer of the story, the harsher elements of which he veiled with the courtliness familiar to him, while he diffused throughout it the indefinable spirit of French romance; and this he did with the naive simplicity and grace that were his by birth and temperament"¹

THE SOCIAL VALUE OF ARTHURIAN ROMANCE

It served to inspire the Welsh with an imaginative ideal in their bitter struggle for Independence. The Scot, at a later date, found in it similar elements of inspiration; for some of the legendary characters (e.g. Mordred) symbolised Scottish rights, while the Saxon used Arthur as a weapon to confound the French and the alien generally.

Finally, in Caxton's day, the Arthurian Cycle resigns its political effulgence, and becomes merely a luminous literary beacon to cheer all kinds who love to read of "gracious knightly deeds"

ARTHURIAN ROMANCE AND ENGLISH LITERATURE

Layamon—Layamon, a priest of Arley Regis, in Worcestershire, is the first poet to sing of King Arthur in English verse, and his poem has therefore a special significance. He tells us in the introduction to the Brut, which was written in the first half of the thirteenth century, the following particulars concerning himself.

"There was a priest in the land who was named Layamon, he was son of Leovenath—may the Lord be gracious to him—He dwelt at Ernely, at a noble church upon Severn's bank—good it there seemed to him—near Redestone, where he books read (he read the services in church). It came to him in mind, and in his chief thought, that he would tell the noble deeds of the English, what they were named, and whence they came, who first possessed the English land after the flood that came from the Lord. Layamon began to journey wide over this land, and procured the noble books which he took for pattern. He took the English book that Saint Bede made; another he took in Latin that Saint Albin made, and the fair Austin, who brought baptism in hither, the third book he took and laid there in the midst, that a French clerk made, who was named Wace, who well could write; and he gave it to the noble Eleanor who was the high King Henry's queen. Layamon laid before him these books, and turned over the leaves, lovingly he beheld them—may the Lord be merciful to him!—then he took with fingers and wrote on book skin, and the true words set together, and the three books compressed into one. Now prayeth Layamon—for love of the Almighty God, each good man that shall read this book and learn this counsel, that he say together these sooth fast words, for his father's soul, who brought him forth, and for his mother's soul, who bore him to be man, and for his own soul that it be the better. Amen."

Layamon lived in a district which still retained a strong hold on the life and customs of the past. The Danes established no permanent settlement, nor were there any great cities to open up a commercial intercourse with other countries. It is true Normans had settled here, and Ordericus Vitalis was born not far from Arley, but there were probably few men in Worcestershire who possessed even Layamon's small knowledge of French culture. But the closest association existed between the English of this district and the neighbouring Welsh. In this way many of the Celtic stories found their way into English tradition. Layamon was probably familiar with a mass of sagas and folk songs. The past exercised a strong fascination for him and in mind and spirit he belongs to an earlier age. Although Layamon mentions three books which he obtained after some trouble, he does not appear to have made much use of either Aelfred's Beda, or of St Albin's book which is apparently the Latin original of Aelfred's Beda. Wace's poem therefore forms the main basis of Layamon's work. Wace had translated Geoffrey's stately Latin prose into the French short couplet; Layamon turns to the old national verse as he knew it from the folk songs of Worcestershire. The Brut is written partly in alliterative lines and partly in rhymed couplets of unequal length. The stirring scenes in the life of a Saxon warrior, grim battles, the life of the woods and fields, have a greater attraction for Layamon than the chivalry and romance of the Norman court. Layamon invests the story of Arthur with an entirely different atmosphere. The narrative gains simplicity and force, and is clothed with the dignity and splendour of the old English epic.

Layamon writes with intense interest in his subject, he lives and moves and has his being among the events with which he is dealing, investing his narrative with dramatic force, while he is at his best in the portrayal of battle and strife, and of the combat with the sea. Indeed hardly any metrical chronicle approaches him in poetic worth.

His account of the death of Arthur is finely poetical.

"All the brave ones were slain, Arthur's warriors high and low, and all the Britons from Arthur's Table, and all his wards, from many kingdoms. And Arthur himself was wounded by a broad battle spear; he had received fifteen bloody wounds; into the smallest one might thrust two gloves. Then there survived in the battle of two hundred thousand men who lay there slaughtered none, save Arthur alone and two of his knights . . .

"I will go to Avalon, to the most beauteous of all maidens, to the queen Argante, the splendid elf. And she will heal all my wounds and make me quite well with a healing drink. And afterwards I will come again to my kingdom and dwell among the Britons in great bliss."

"While he was saying this a little boat came from the sea borne by the waves, with women therein of marvellous figure. And they at once took Arthur and brought him to the boat, laid him in it and sailed away."

"Then was fulfilled what Merlin said of yore, that there should be mighty grief at Arthur's demise. The Britons still believe that he is alive and dwells in Avalon with the most beautiful of all elves, and the Britons still watch for his return. Never was the man born or chosen by woman who could with truth say more of Arthur. But of yore there was a prophet named Merlin. He announced with words—his sayings are true—that an Arthur should yet come to the help of the Britons."¹

THE RELIGIOUS ELEMENT IN THE ARTHURIAN CYCLE

The diffusion of the Arthurian story led to many other elements being drawn towards it. Legends, traditions, love interests and religious mysticism, these all group themselves round the story with which they seem to be mysteriously connected, although the connection is not always apparent, and oftentimes difficult to establish. In this way the Graal saga, that seems to have been first associated with the legend of Joseph of Arimathea, eventually became part of the Arthurian cycle. For testifying to the resurrection, Joseph is imprisoned by the Jews, but he is released by Christ who provides the prisoner with food and light, by bringing to him the communion chalice used at the Last Supper—(i.e. The Graal—dish).

Robert de Borron, a knight who probably lived in the Vosges district, wrote somewhere about 1160, a poem on the Graal called "Le petit saint Graal," which was later put into prose. This legend flourished in England in the reign of Henry II, undergoing various modifications and additions, embodied in a prose version called Le grand S. Graal. St. Joseph and his son come to England, Joseph is consecrated a bishop by Christ himself, and they convert the land to Christianity, both die and are buried there. St. Joseph possesses a marvellous shield. The dynasties founded by the missionaries who wedded daughters of the native kings are carried down to Arthur. The mystery of Transubstantiation and the Graal play an important part in this story—the latter is kept in a Northumbrian forest, and a "pure youth," Galahad, the son of Lancelot, is at last to find it. A martial and chivalric element has been added to the religious, and the Graal saga has thus linked itself to Arthurian legend.

Still another prose romance, La Queste del Saint Graal, concerns the search for the Holy Graal by King Arthur's knights. Galahad alone succeeds and takes the Graal to the Orient, which on the death of Galahad is taken up to heaven.

Walter Map, who lived in the reign of Henry II, is credited, although on uncertain evidence, with having translated these romances from the Latin.

Chrestien des Troyes, the French courtly poet, wrote his Conte del Graal towards the end of the twelfth century, which he, however, never finished. In this, Parzifal and not Galahad, is the hero of the story.

So much for the religious element in the Arthurian cycle. It is now necessary to consider the intensely interesting but tragic love story of Tristan and Isold, a Celtic story, that for a long time remained independent of the Arthurian cycle. This is probably one of the court romances which was composed from ancient Breton lays.

THE LOVE ELEMENT IN THE ARTHURIAN CYCLE

Tristan is conducting Isold from Ireland to Cornwall to be the bride of King Mark. Her mother, to preserve her daughter from a loveless marriage, has distilled a magic potion which ensures that the two people who drink of it shall have an enduring passion for each other. She entrusts the golden cup containing the magic potion to Brangwaine, Isold's maid, who places it in a cupboard on board the ship. During the voyage, Tristan, who has been entertaining Isold with all the songs and stories he knew, declares he is thirsty. Isold takes from the cupboard the magic cup and unwitting its power, places it first to her own lips and then hands it to Tristan who drank it greedily. At once there sprang up in their hearts a passionate love destined to last as long as they lived. After the first few hours of rapture, they realise their guilt and resolve to perform their compact at whatever cost.

They arrive at Tintagel, and Isold is at once married to King Mark. Isold is unhappy, and the lovers, impelled by the irresistible force of fate, drift together. King Mark is warned by his knights that Isold is false to him, and eventually Tristan goes to Brittany. Here in a moment of weakness he weds Isold of the White Hand, only to repent in a short time, since he cannot conquer his unhappy passion for Isold of Cornwall. Tristan is wounded in one of his combats so that even Isold of the White Hand cannot cure him. He sends his faithful steward to beg Isold to come to him and save him by her skill. Her presence in the ship is to be signalled by a white sail—her absence by a black sail. A vessel bearing a white sail appears, Isold of the White Hand is filled with jealousy at the approach of her rival. Tristan inquires eagerly of her, "For the sake of God, what sail does it carry?" "The sails are black." Despair at the supposed faithlessness of his beloved seizes Tristan, and he dies with her name on his lips. Isold lands, she is told of his death. Her agony is too great for expression. "Silently she steps through the crowd gazing at her beauty, to the hall where lies the corpse. There she flings herself on the bier and dies in a last embrace."

The story has been retold by Matthew Arnold and Swinburne and made the subject of an opera by Wagner. Swinburne has made the wind and the waves sing an accompaniment to the tragedy that harmonises so well with the rocky, storm-driven coasts of Brittany and Cornwall in which the principal scenes are enacted.

Sir Tristrem is a translation from a French version of the Tristan story, and is considered by certain authorities to be the first real English romance in the Matter of Britain: Arthur and Merlin being later. It has been attributed to Thomas of Erceildoune or Thomas the Rymer, a

Scottish poet who lived about 1280, but there is no evidence to connect the romance with this poet. Sir Tristrem was edited by Sir Walter Scott.

The poet of Sir Tristrem condenses his story owing to gaps in the French version; the verse moreover is experimental in character, and the poem forms a good illustration of the manner in which a ballad might arise from the metrical romance.

"Tristrem tok his stede,
And lepe ther on to ride,
The quen bad him her lede,
To schip him bi side;
Tristrem did as hys bede;
In wode he gan hir hude;
To th' erl he seyde in that nede:
Thou hast ynten thi pride,
Thou dote

With thine harp, thou wonne hir that tide,
Thou tint¹ hir with mi rote "² 3

THE MATTER OF ROME

(a) THE STORY OF TROY

The Troy saga, although extremely popular, is of least importance from the literary point of view. Homer's work was almost unknown even to the most classically educated writers of the twelfth century, but there existed two Latin prose versions of the Troy saga, one the work of the Cretan Dictys, who fought on the Greek side in the Trojan war; the other and shorter version was written by the Phrygian Dares, who fought on the Trojan side. The Ephemeris belli Troiani, of Dictys, dates from the beginning of the third century and is much closer to the ancient tradition than the De excidio Troiae historia of Dares, which has been characterised as a "wretched piece of work in bad Latin." Dares, however, was much preferred by the writers of the Middle Ages, probably because the shorter work could be more readily adapted and expanded and also on account of his association with the Trojans, especially when popular legends sought to establish the descent of the British people from Brutus the famous Trojan leader. Dares' work is notable for the prominence assigned to Troilus. The Story of Troilus and Cressida was used by numerous mediæval poets, and finally by Chaucer and Shakespeare. Two poetical Troy books based on Dares appeared during the second half of the twelfth century. One was written in Latin verse by Joseph of Exeter in 1188, and is remarkable for its highly cultivated and brilliant form. The other was composed by the French poet Benoît de Sainte More (in 1160), who had completed Wace's Chronicle of the Dukes of Normandy. Benoît has the usual mediæval fault of too great discursiveness. He likes to begin at the very beginning of all things; he adds to his narrative long descriptions, and learned geographical and mythological information. In Benoît the Troilus episode, whilst retaining the outlines as we find them in Dares, receives the courtly colouring and imaginative invention of the French poet. Benoît's work was of great importance in the development of the Troy saga. It was translated into Latin prose in 1287 by Guido de Colonna. Boccaccio then uses the story in his Filostrato. Cressid becomes, in the hands of the poet-novelist, a more vital and interesting figure. Chaucer adopts the story from Boccaccio, softening the character of the heroine somewhat and adding the figure of Pandarus. The Scottish poet Henryson wrote The Testament of Cressid in the fifteenth century. Shakespeare in the sixteenth century dramatised it. Dryden in the seventeenth century rewrote Shakespeare's play. Truly a remarkable sequence in the literary development of a story.

(b) THE ALEXANDER ROMANCE

This saga was the first to find access to Western literature. It seems to have assumed a definite form about the third century in the Greek narrative of Callisthenes. The work of the pseudo-Callisthenes was in time circulated in the West in several Latin versions which were generally based on recensions of the original text. Two of these texts are important; that of Julius Valerius for its age, and that of the Neapolitan arch-priest Leo. The latter received poetic form at the hands of Alberic of Besançon in the second half of the eleventh century. Other French Alexander poems followed, the most notable in the second half of the twelfth century by a monk of Chateaudun, Lambert the Crooked. To this poem the twelve-syllabled line owes the name of Alexandrine. It was translated and revised by Alexander de Paris of Bernay, and it is difficult to distinguish the work of Alexander from that of Lambert.

Alexander is presented to us as a mediæval rather than an ancient hero. The career of the mighty conqueror is sketched from his marvellous birth to his final end by poisoning. The description of Alexander's expeditions in the East affords opportunity for introducing all sorts of extravagant stories.

The oldest English Alexander romance, and also one of the best, dates from the reign of Edward I. It probably originated in the North of Mercia. The unknown writer followed a French version, supplemented by a Latin text; but he is no mere translator, he handles his material with great skill and renders it into "pithy verse and forcible, animated, and picturesque language."

"The spirit of chivalric poetry breaks forth most strongly when the writer leads us to the battle field, when he presents to us the picturesque advance of the troops, the glittering weapons, the neighing of the war-horses; the roaring onset, the tumult and the slaughter, the war cry of the fighters, and the lamentations of the wounded; or when he describes brilliant festivals, gorgeous garments, and beautiful women."¹

The value of the work is enhanced by the many details which are drawn from English common life and by the lyrical passages that introduce the separate divisions of the poem. These have no connection with the narrative and may have been inserted to arouse the attention of the audience.

THE MATTER OF FRANCE

THE CHARLEMAGNE ROMANCE

Jean Bodel, a French poet, writing in the twelfth century, says there are three themes which are worthy of the poet's attention: "The matter of France—of Britain, and of Rome the Mighty"

"Ne sont que trois matières à nul home entendant
De France, et de Bretagne, et de Rome le grant"

Of The Matter of Britain (Arthurian legends), and The Matter of Rome (Troy and Alexander romances), we have already spoken. Something has also been said of the early history of the Charlemagne romance. It merely remains for us to deal with two later products of this cycle.

The poem of Otinel, which was very popular in the reign of Edward II, was twice translated during this period. The story has no connection with the older Charlemagne saga, and has very little value. Other romances which group themselves around this cycle are the Rauf Coilyear, an alliterative romance; Huon of Bordeaux (in prose); Sir Ferunbras, The Sowdane of Babylon, The Surge of Milan, and Roland and Otinel. Lastly, the beautiful and pathetic story of Amis and Amiloun, made so familiar to us through the medium of Walter Pater and Andrew Lang. This is the story of two men so closely resembling each other that they cannot be told apart. So great is their friendship that one assumes the place of the other in a trial by combat, and thus incurs the guilt of perjury. For this, Amis is punished by leprosy. He is carried to the house of Amiloun who heals him with the blood of his own children. After Amis is healed the children awake as from a dream. "And he took them in his arms and carried them to his wife and said, 'Rejoice greatly, for thy children whom I had slain by the commandment of the angel, are alive and by their blood is Amis healed'."

The mediæval ideal of friendship, which does not shun the greatest sacrifices of life and conscience for a friend, is here embodied, and the story attained a wide circulation.

"The early English romance did not, as a whole, reach the level of its French model. Not only must the honour of invention be ascribed to the French (invention in composition, not in material), but also that of a more delicate execution and more harmonious presentation. The frequently abridged English versions are, as a rule, poorer, ruder, and of a less complete logical structure, and their excellent qualities, a more popular tone, a more vigorous painting within narrower compass, do not make good these defects. But we are charmed by the joy they manifest, in the green forests, and in hunting, and we contemplate not without satisfaction, this rude primeval force that does not exclude deep feeling, even if it often indulges in coarseness. Thus the English muse, if less delicate and dainty than her French sister, was less artificial; if more passionate, was less lascivious, and in her enthusiasm for what is grandly colossal, her joy in the actual, she showed, even when repeating foreign romances, many of the features that were to characterise her in the time of her full splendour."¹

LEGENDARY ACCRETIONS AROUND THE ARTHURIAN ROMANCE

Not the least curious feature of the Arthurian cycle, is the way in which it became inextricably entangled with legends and myths quite alien in inspiration. For instance, one of the earliest and most intimate of these myths is the Celtic tale of Merlin, a wizard bard, first associated with Arthur by Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Passing through the fertile and inventive imagination of France, Merlin emerges into a romantic English romance, early in the fourteenth century. This is the story of Arthur and Merlin translated from the French into Saxon verse, a more important and better known version in prose appeared about a hundred years later. Another figure associated with Arthur is the Knight Gawain. Originally pictured as one of his doughty companions, he becomes the centre of a cycle of stories as imposing as that of Arthur himself; more than any other of Arthur's companions does he dominate romantic legend, and the finest of English metrical romances is that of Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight.²

The tale of Lancelot is, as we have said, non-Celtic in origin, and is an illustration of the influence of chivalric ideals upon these early romances; just as the Quest of the Grail exemplifies the incursion of ascetic monasticism.

The hero of the "Quest" is the Knight Perceval. The Grail saga, in its origin, is probably pagan and Celtic, the Quest being one for a magic talisman as in certain old fairy stories; but during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, this pagan search becomes transformed by religious writers into the quest for the Cup of the Last Supper.

One other important legend remains to be noted, that of Tristan and Isolt. This is certainly Celtic in origin; it is supposed to be the oldest of the supplemental Arthurian tales. Remarkable for its note of sombre and tragic passion, it is one of the great love-tales of the world, in whose magic many of the greatest poets have sought inspiration.

ORIENTAL ROMANCES

There are certain romances that fall properly speaking outside the scope of the four great bodies of romances, recently passed in review. Some of these are legends, obviously inspired by the struggle between Paladin and Saracen, and the spirit of the Crusader interwoven with curious tales of magic. In one, William of Palerne, there is the were-wolf motif; in another, one of the most agreeable, Robert of Sicily, an angel for a while takes the place of the king, in order to chasten his pride;—Longfellow made delightful use of this story; another deals with Richard Cœur de Lion.

RICHARD CŒUR DE LION

The exploits of so renowned a warrior as Richard were not likely to be overlooked by the poets, who saw in the national hero the counterpart of the famous hero of antiquity, Alexander. This romance was translated from the French, near the time of Edward I, and is thus introduced by the author

"In French books is this rhyme written. Unlearned men know it not, unlearned men know no French; among a hundred there is not one. And yet many of them would hear with glad cheer, of the noble jousts, of the doughty knights of England. In sooth now I tell of a king, doughty in deed, King Richard, the best warrior that one may find in any tale."

The future greatness of Richard is indicated by his mysterious birth, he is the son of an enchantress named Cassodoric, who becomes the wife of Henry II but afterwards disappears in a magical manner. Richard, according to the legend, embodied in this romance, is named "Lion-heart" because he robbed the lion of his heart—a tradition referred to by Shakespeare in his King John (i 1 and ii 1). Richard's warlike expeditions to the East give plenty of scope to the imagination of the poet, and he recounts numerous adventures which the history books have omitted. The characteristics assigned to Richard may be readily gathered from the following episode in his career, which is related by the poet with evident gusto.

Saladin's ambassadors have arrived, bearing ransom for the prisoners. Richard entertains them to a banquet at which the heads of their nearest kinsmen are served up on a dish. Enjoying their terror and dismay, Richard helps himself heartily. "This is the Devil's brother," the Saracens whisper among themselves, "that slays our men and eats them." Richard with a threatening glance at his guests says to them, "For my love be all glad, and look ye be well at ease! Why carve ye nought from your food and eat fast as I do? Tell me, why glare ye so?" Speechless and trembling, the ambassadors sit expecting certain death. Richard has other dishes served accompanied with good wine, and calls upon his guests to be merry; but appetite is wanting, mirth does not respond. Then the king says: "Friends, be not squeamish. This is the manner of my house, that Saracens' heads be first served right hot. But I know not your customs. As I am a king, Christian, and true man, ye shall certainly return in safe conduct. For I would not for no thing that word of me should go forth into the world that I would misdo messengers."¹

The Richard romance consists of about seven thousand lines and is notable for its expression of English patriotism in spirited verse. Besides the Alexander romance of which we have already spoken, there are two others which belong to this period (i.e. beginning of the fourteenth century), viz. Arthur and Merlin, and The Seven Sages.

Other romances come from further East. There is the old Greek story of Apollonius of Troy, dealing with incest and strange enchantments. The most interesting feature about this story is that Gower took it for one of his stories in the Confessio Amantis, for which he was taken to task by Chaucer, and at a later date it was used again by the author of Pierres. More interesting as a romance, is the tale of Floris and Blanchefleur.

FLORIS AND BLANCHEFLUR

The story of Floris and Blanchefleur concerns the all-absorbing passion of two lovers who overcome difficulties and desperate perils, and in the end are united. It was one of the most popular stories of the Middle Ages. Originating in the East, it attained a wide circulation in Western Christendom, probably through the agency of the Crusades, and the history of the story is almost as interesting as the story itself. It seems to have been introduced into France about 1180, and was connected by the jongleurs with the French cycle (Charlemagne). There were two versions, an "aristocratic" or courtly version, and a "popular." In the popular version the hero is transformed from a love sick youth into a man of knightly courage. The English translation made by a poet in the reign of Henry III some hundred years later reproduces from the earlier French version the Oriental air of softness and luxury, but condenses the sentimental element. The poem is written in short, well-constructed rhymed couplets.

Blanchefleur is the foster sister of Floris, and the two children have been brought up together. The time has come when Floris, who is the king's son, must be educated but he refuses to learn without Blanchefleur. They are put to school together and both make good progress. After a time the king again desires to separate them, and he proposes to put the maiden to death. The queen however suggests that Floris should be sent away to stay with his aunt at Montargis, and that Blanchefleur shall follow in fourteen days' time. Floris spends the interval in grieving over the loss of his companion, and his grief is reported to the king. The king is very angry and again desires to put Blanchefleur to death. The queen dissuades him, and the maiden is sold instead. She is taken to Babylon and sold to the Admiral.

The king and queen cause a tomb to be erected for Blanchefleur, and when Floris on his return persists in his inquiries for her, he is conducted by the mother to the tomb. Floris reads the inscription and swoons seven times! He weeps and sighs and laments, and finally attempts to take his own life. His parents then tell him the truth; the grave is opened and found to be empty.

Floris then declares his resolve to find Blanche-flour. The king gives him a retinue, and the magnificent cup which had been given in exchange for Blanchefleur. Floris then sets forth on his journey. He obtains news of Blanchefleur at an inn, and taking ship he arrives in the country of his beloved. Again an innkeeper is able to help Floris, and he learns that Blanchefleur has been sold to the Admiral. The innkeeper moreover is able to give him a ring to introduce him to the bridge porter of Babylon. Arriving at the gate, Floris is hospitably entertained, but sits with mournful countenance. Daris inquires the reason, and Floris hints at his trouble. Daris then enlarges on the size of the city, the strength of the Admiral, and tells of the forty-four maidens who are kept on a high tower. He describes the beautiful orchard which contains a wonderful tree and a spring with magic powers. Floris implores the aid of Daris, who eventually tells him to go disguised as a mason to the Tower and induce the porter to play draughts. "During the game, show him the cup, and tell him your desire, and ask his aid." The porter at first reproaches Floris, but at length promises to help him. He conceals him in a basket of flowers and he is borne up to the Tower. Floris mistaking another maiden for Blanchefleur, leaps forth too soon, but discovering his mistake, again hides himself. The maiden goes to fetch Blanchefleur to see "a well fair flower." Floris springs forth and they embrace one another. Both beg Claris not to betray them. She promises not to do so and they rejoice. Each morning two of the maidens have to go to the Admiral. Twice does Blanchefleur fail to appear, and although Claris makes excuses for her, the Admiral goes to seek her himself, and discovers Floris and Blanchefleur together. The Admiral summons his counsellors to decide their fate. One suggests that they should be burnt. Floris begs Blanchefleur to take the ring which should preserve her from death. She thrusts it upon him; the ring falls to the ground and is picked up by another counsellor. The fairness of the children excites compassion, and the Earl who had picked up the ring steps forward to plead on their behalf. Floris implores the Admiral to spare Blanchefleur. She begs for mercy to be extended to Floris. At length the Admiral, touched with pity, promises to pardon them if Floris will tell how he gained admission to the Tower. Floris tells the story after the king has exonerated the porter. The Admiral, at the conclusion of his story, dubs Floris a knight, and gives permission for the faithful lovers to be married in church with a ring. Messengers arrive, bringing the news that Floris' father is dead. He therefore returns to the kingdom to reign with Blanchefleur as his queen. The Admiral is married to Claris. Thus ends in a truly satisfactory manner this "court romance"—a story in which there is much to remind us of the charming twelfth-century French romance, Aucassin and Nicolette, and Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet.

These Oriental romances differed from the Saxon romances in their more fantastic and sentimental treatment. In their inception at any rate, they are fanciful, allusive, whimsical, tender rather than stern, and passionate. Some of them became Westernised, to suit the fiercer taste of the Saxon, and the more vigorous inclination of the Norman. Few of them were ever so popular as the Arthurian Romances, yet they played a part in modifying our literature, and tingeing with softer outline our own romance.

ROMANCES OF SAXON ORIGIN

HAELOK THE DANE

BOTH Havelok, and King Horn, although they have been preserved through French versions, appear to be based on stories which had their origin in England. Both have a distinctly Teutonic spirit.

The Lay of Havelok was probably composed in the reign of Edward I about 1280. It exists in a unique manuscript known as the Laud MS., and was discovered in a very curious fashion after having been given up as lost.

Tyrwhitt, in an Essay on the Language and Versification of Chaucer, laments the loss of the "Rime concerning Gryme the Fisher," the founder of Grymesby. It was found by accident bound up with a manuscript in the Bodleian which was described as the Vita Sanctorum, a large portion of it being occupied with legends of the Saints. It was edited in 1828, by Sir Frederick Madden, for the Roxburgh Club.

From the fact that it is called a Lai, and also since the poet tells us "ge on lai en frent li Breton" ("whereof the Bretons made a lay"), we are justified in concluding that the story belongs to British or Welsh tradition. An abridgment of the story was made by Geffrei Gaimar in 1141 or 1151, and in one place Gaimar quotes Gildas as his authority. He mentions a feast given by Havelok after his defeat of Hodulf "si am mec dit la vera estoire" ("as the true history tells us"). An account of this feast does not appear in the fuller French version, but is included in the English version, whence we may argue that some additional source of information was open to the poet. The poem opens in spirited fashion—

"Hearken to me good men,
Wives, maidens, and alle men,
Of a tale that I you will telle,
The tale of Havelok imaked
First fill me a cup of good ale"— and we may be sure the listeners hastened to supply his demand. his thirst quenched, the segger begins his tale.

There was once a king who made good laws—he hated traitors and robbers. In his days men could carry gold in safety and boldly buy and sell. Then was England at peace, for the king made his foes hide themselves. He befriended the fatherless and punished those who wrought shame. His name was Æthelwold—he had but one young daughter to succeed him on the throne. The king feels that death is drawing near and is troubled concerning his daughter who is not yet of age. He summons to his bedside his lords from Roxburgh to Dover. All come to Winchester, in great sorrow at the ill news. The king prays them to tell him who can best guard his daughter. They answer, Earl Godrich of Cornwall. The king sends for the chalice and paten and the Earl swears a solemn oath to the dying king to protect the interests of his daughter and to marry her to the best and fairest man that can be found. Shortly afterward the king dies and the Earl takes possession of the kingdom. He appoints justices and sheriffs, and soon becomes so rich and powerful that he is feared by all.

Goldborough, the king's daughter, grows up to be very beautiful, and Goldrich is vexed: "Shall I give England to a fool—a girl! My son shall have the country." He sends Goldborough to Dover and shuts her up in a castle.

"May Christ release Goldborough from prison!" interjects the segger.

The story now moves to Denmark, whose king, Burkabeyne, is also dying. He commends his three children to the care of Earl Godard, who swears to take care of them and surrender the kingdom to the boy. No sooner is the king dead than the wicked Earl shuts up the three children—Havelok, Swanborough, and Helfed—in a castle. "He cares not for oaths, he is a traitor, may he be accursed! Cursed be he by the north and south." Godard goes to the Tower in which the children are imprisoned. Havelok complains that he is hungry. Godard cares nought; he cuts the throats of the two little girls and Havelok, seeking to avoid the fate which has befallen his sisters, begs Godard to spare him and he will flee from Denmark. Godard relents for a short space, but reflecting that if Havelok is dead his children will be the heirs, he sends for Grim, a fisherman, and orders him to throw Havelok into the sea. The frightened lad is gagged, put into a sack and carried to the house of Grim. His wife sees a bright light shining round Havelok and tells her husband, who finds the mark of kingship on his shoulder. He begs Havelok to forgive him and promises that Godard shall know nothing about him.

The starving boy is given bread and cheese and butter by Dame Leve, Grim's wife, which he eats up greedily. He then goes to bed.

In the meanwhile, Grim goes to Godard, says he has killed Havelok, and asks for his reward. The Earl sends him away telling him he has done wickedly and shall be hung. Grim, in fear for his own safety and that of Havelok, makes preparations for leaving the country. He sells his stocks, fits up his ship carefully, and taking his wife, his three sons, two daughters, and Havelok, he sets sail. A north wind arises and they are driven to England, they land at Lundeasay, up the Humber. There Grim built a house—"that place was called Grimsby after Grim."

Grim was a good fisherman, he caught sturgeon, turbot, &c. He and his sons carried the fish in baskets round the streets. He also sold lampreys at Lincoln and brought home smelts, meal, meat, and hemp to supply their needs. Thus they lived for twelve years.

Havelok having now grown to manhood, thinks it is time for him to work, and earn what he eats. He too will carry a pannier and sell fish. Later, a dearth arises, and they cannot get enough to eat. Grim advises Havelok to go to Lincoln to seek work, and made him a coat out of an old sail. Havelok tramps barefooted to Lincoln where he eventually obtains service with the Earl's cook. Havelok draws water and cuts wood. He is always laughing and blithe. He becomes a general favourite and the playmate of the children. The cook buys him a new suit of clothes. Havelok is the tallest and strongest man in Lincoln.

Earl Godrich has summoned a Parliament to meet at Lincoln. There are games and sporting contests. Some begin "to put the stone," but few are strong enough to lift it. Havelok stands looking at the others. His master tells him to try, and he succeeds in putting the stone twelve feet beyond the rest. His achievement is everywhere discussed and at last comes to the ears of Earl Godrich. The Earl remembers that Æthelwold had told him to marry his daughter to the strongest man alive. Havelok shall be the man. He thinks that Havelok is only a thrall. The Earl sends for Goldborough to come to Lincoln to marry Havelok. Goldborough declares she will marry none but a king. Havelok also refuses, but consents when Godrich threatens to hang him. Goldborough also gives way and the two are married by the Archbishop. They both go to Grim where they receive much kindness. At night Goldborough retires to rest very sorrowful. She sees a great light come out of Havelok's mouth and notices a red cross on his shoulder. She hears an angel's voice saying, "Goldborough, be not sad, Havelok shall be king and thou queen." She rejoices and kisses Havelok, who awakes from a dream in which he is urged to cross the seas and win back Denmark once more.

Havelok takes Grim and his sons and they sail across the seas to Denmark. On landing he asks Ubbe to give him permission to buy and sell, and presents Ubbe with a gold ring. Ubbe admires Havelok for his size and strength, and thinks he ought to be a knight and not a pedlar. He invites them to his house, where they have a great feast. They are then sent to the house of Bernard Brown.

At supper, sixty-one thieves attack the house. Havelok performs prodigies of valour, kills twenty men and receives the same number of wounds. The sixty-one thieves are slain, and in the morning Ubbe comes to see what is the matter. They are then taken to Ubbe's castle. During the night Ubbe wakes and sees a great light, "Light enough to choose a penny by"—like toy candles. The light comes from Havelok's mouth. They see also a bright cross on his back—the kingly sign. They know he is Birkabeyne's son and heir.

So great is their joy that Havelok is awakened, and they do him homage. Ubbe sends for the lords of the kingdom, tells them the story and bids them swear fealty to the rightful king. Godard is seized, bound to an old mare and taken to Havelok—"Old sin makes new shame." He is judged by the Earls and condemned to be flayed, drawn, and hung. Havelok then returns to Grimsby, and after much fierce fighting, Godrich is taken prisoner and awarded a similar punishment by the English, who accept Goldborough as their queen. Havelok rewards all who have befriended him in the days of his adversity. The Danes return home but Havelok remained in England sixty years. Ho and Goldborough were never apart :

"Such is the teste of Havelok and Goldborough
Each of you say a pater noster for the author.
Amen."

GUY OF WARWICK

Guy of Warwick is one of the oldest, the most popular and at the same time one of the most tedious of the romances. The story has three main divisions and is probably a combination of two or three romances. The first part tells the love-story of Guy and Felice.

"Since the time that Jesus Christ was born, many adventures as yet unknown are worth knowing." This story concerns a rich and powerful Earl of Warwick and his daughter Felice. Felice was not only very beautiful

"A fair visage lovely in sight
Her skin was white of bright colors,
To kiss it often was grette blys
With grey eyen and nekko white " :

but she was also learned in the seven arts. She had famous teachers from Toulouse who had instructed her in "Astronomy, Ars-metrik, geometry, sophistry, rhetoric, music, and clergy" !

Dukes and earls wooed her in vain.

Guy was the son of the Earl's faithful steward. He is handsome, courteous, and well taught, and strong and proficient in woodcraft, the arts of the chase, and chess. The Earl has a great feast and Guy is sent to wait on Felice. He bears himself so well that thirty maidens fall in love with him :

"And thereof he rekked nought
For upon another was his thought "

Guy is consumed with a passion for Felice and at last, after much secret torment, resolves to confess his love.

Felice speaks to him quite plainly :

"Should I take you a more garsoun forsaking earls and dukes and lords, that were dishonour
If I should tell my father you would be hewn in pieces for your folly. Go hence and come no more "

Guy returns home, cursing his fate and longing for death.

He goes a second time to plead with Felice and swoons at her feet. Felice begins to pity him and promises that if Guy becomes a knight he shall have her love.

The Earl dubbs Guy a knight, but Felice refuses to have anything to do with him until he has proved his valour. This forms the prelude to the series of adventures which Guy goes through, winning renown in many lands, but on his return Felice is still not satisfied, he must prove himself the best knight under heaven. Guy almost despairs, but again departs, visits Normandy, Spain, Germany, Lombardy, everywhere winning much love and praise. The hatred of a rival, Duke Otoun, almost finishes Guy's career. He is severely wounded and his faithful companions slain. One of them, Herhaud, is however miraculously restored, and after further vicissitudes, Guy and Herhaud meet, to their mutual joy.

It would be far too wearisome to follow the history of the battles, sieges, and tournaments in which Guy is involved, assisting Greek and Turks against the Saracens. In one fierce battle the dead bodies of the Saracens covered fifteen furlongs ! The Soudan is so angry at the defeat that he ordered his gods to be brought to him. He reproached them with ingratitude, clouted them, broke their legs and arms, and ordered them to be cast out !

Moreover Guy, sent as a messenger to the Soudan, strikes off his head and runs away with it. Another time he kills a dragon to help a lion with whom the dragon is fighting. Guy's marriage with the Emperor's daughter is arranged, Guy and his friends go to the church—the princess is also there. The Archbishop is ready to marry them. He then suddenly remembers Felice; he would rather have her than any other maiden with all good things !

Guy solves the difficulty by conveniently fainting away. Recovering, he asks the Emperor to put off the marriage. Eventually Guy bids them all farewell and starts on his homeward journey. Many adventures happen on the way, but he finally reaches England, staying a short while with King Athelstan. Ere proceeding to Warwick, news reaches the king of a terrible dragon which has come over from Ireland and is devouring men and cattle. Guy offers to go to Northumberland and kill the dragon. His sword has no effect upon the dragon, which is thirty feet long, but Guy manages to kill it and the head is taken to the king.

"May God reward those who listen to my tale !"
ejaculates the minstrel.

Guy at last reaches Warwick, and his marriage with Felice is accomplished with much feasting and rejoicing, which goes on for a fortnight.

One night Guy, having returned from hunting, is standing on a turret looking at the stars. He is suddenly filled with remorse on account of his past life. God has given him so much, he has done nothing in return; he thinks he is lost body and soul. He thereupon determines to devote the rest of his life to penance. He will go on a pilgrimage. Felice takes a more practical view of the matter and suggests that he can quite as well atone for his sins at home, by shrift, by founding churches and abbeys. Guy will not be turned from his purpose. He gives Felice a ring, his sword and various instructions concerning the education of his son to Ilherhaud, and departs.

The usual adventures follow. Guy takes part in several fights in spite of his palmer's weeds. In the meantime Raynbron, Guy's son, is stolen away, and Felice consoles herself for her double loss by acts of piety, feeding the poor, &c. Finally Guy returns and, habited as a pilgrim, receives alms from his wife. Unwilling to distract her in these pious pursuits, he lives the rest of his life as a solitary hermit.

When dying, he sends the ring by a page to Felice, and urges her to come and give directions for his burial. She arrives, and having received his last words, survives him only fifteen days and was buried in the same grave.

Another long addition to the romance describes the search for Raynbron, &c.

"Now is the story brought to an end
Of Guy, the bold baron of krice
And of the fair maid Felice.

And ye that have heard this story,
God give you all his blessing,
And of his grace to your ending
And joy and blisse, that ever shall be!
Amen, Amen, for charites!"

KING HORN

The beginning of the thirteenth century witnessed a revival of the English element. The epic stories seem to have been lost or preserved only in oral tradition. These earlier epic tales had been replaced by a new set of stories imported from France. The popular stories of Guy of Warwick and Sir Bevis, that were supposed to contain a kernel of genuine tradition, are, as we have seen, elaborately embroidered with the materials of mediæval romances. Havelok and King Horn stand apart from these.

The story of King Horn is known in several versions, and the oldest and most archaic was evidently intended to be sung by the gleemen. Its origin may be traced back to the turbulent times of the Danish invasion. The Song of King Horn is a metrical romance, in which an old story has received a fresh impress.

Horn is the son of King Murry or Alrof of South Daneland and Queen Godhild. He is exceedingly beautiful and has twelve noble youths as companions—among them two whom he loved more than the rest, Athulf and Ekenhild, who proves a traitor. One day as King Murry is riding along the strand he sees fifteen ships have arrived filled with Saracens. After a brave defence the king and his companions are slain, and the enemy begin to lay waste the country. The churches are destroyed and the people massacred. Queen Godhild retires to a cave, where she continues to practise the Christian religion. Horn's beauty arouses the pity of the pagan king and he and his companions are cast adrift in a boat. "The sea began to flow and Horn-child to row, the sea drove the ship so fast that the children were afraid. They saw a sure fate before them all day and all night, till the daylight sprang, till Horn upon the strand saw men walking on the land. 'Comrades,' he spoke, 'youths, I will tell you tidings, I hear birds sing and see the grass spring. Let us be blithe in life, our ship is on the shore.' They meet King Aylmer on the land, who asks Horn his name, and on hearing it speaks thus: 'Enjoy thou well thy name, Horn, sound loud over hill and dale, resound over valley and down.' The king entrusts Horn to Athelbrus, his steward, to be educated. He is to be instructed in hunting, fishing, playing the harp, and serving the cup. Horn learns readily and becomes a general favourite, but most of all he is loved by Rymenhild, the king's daughter. Rymenhild bids Athelbrus to bring Horn to her bower, but he, fearing some evil consequence, takes Athulf instead. Rymenhild in the darkness of the storm mistakes Athulf for Horn, embraces him and declares her love. Athulf declares his identity and Rymenhild is angry with Athelbrus, who then promises to bring Horn. He finds the latter in the hall serving the king. He bids Horn go to the bower of Rymenhild, bidding him be discreet. Horn goes to Rymenhild's bower. She tells him of her love and bids him plight his troth to her. Horn refuses on account of his low estate. Rymenhild faints away when she hears his reply. Horn takes her in his arms and caresses her, and promises to marry her if she will help him to become a knight.

The next day Athelbrus asks the king who readily accedes to the request, and Horn and his companions are knighted.

Rymenhild again sends for Horn. He comes with Athulf to bid her farewell. Before he makes her his wife, he must win honour and deserve her by knightly deeds.

Rymenhild gives Horn a ring which he is to wear for her love, which will protect him if he looks at it and thinks of her. Horn then takes his leave and rides forth on his black steed in search of adventures. He finds at the seashore hosts of Saracens. He slays the Saracen leader, and then looking on his ring, a hundred more. He returns to King Aylmer bearing the Saracen leader's head on the point of his sword. On going to Rymenhild he finds her weeping. She has had a dream which fills her heart with fear. These fears are soon realised, for Ekenhild tells the king that Horn is plotting to kill him. King Aylmer angrily banishes Horn from the kingdom. Horn bids Rymenhild a tender farewell, telling her not to wait for him longer than seven years. "Farewell, Rymenhild, longer dare I not stay. I go to a strange country. If I come not again at the end of seven years, or send thee no message, take a husband and wait no longer for me. Fold me into thine arms and kiss long."

The seven years are filled with adventures and combats with the Saracens. During this time he does not communicate with Rymenhild. Athulf sends a letter to Horn telling him that a king is suing for the hand of Rymenhild. While Horn is out hunting he receives a letter telling him that Rymenhild is to be married to King Mody of Reynes, on Sunday. Horn replies that he will return on Sunday before Prime. The messenger is drowned, and Rymenhild looks in vain for the answer to her letter. Horn tells King Thurston who he is and asks his aid in carrying out his plans. The king consents, and Horn levies men and sets sail for Westernesse accompanied by Irish knights. Landing, he leaves his followers behind, and meeting a pilgrim he learns that the wedding has already taken place. Horn changes clothes with the pilgrim and goes to the castle where Rymenhild dwells, not yet having become the wife of Mody. Athulf from the Tower awaits his coming, dreading he will be too late. Rymenhild bears wine to the guests. Horn asks Rymenhild to serve the beggars. She fills a gallon bowl with brown beer and offers it to Horn. He refuses it, saying he will have nothing but "a coppe of white"; that he is no beggar, but a fisher. He further alludes to her dream of the fish net, and bids her drink to "Horn of hornes."

Rymenhild looks at him and trembles, not understanding. She fills the horn with wine and bids him drink his fill and tell her if he knows aught of Horn. He drinks and then throws the ring into the horn. Rymenhild finds the ring after she has returned to her bower and sends for the pilgrim to inquire how he got the ring. He tells her that in his wanderings he met Horn on the strand and goes on to say that Horn fell ill on the ship and as he was dying, charged him to deliver it. Rymenhild raves with grief and attempts to stab herself with a knife. Horn prevents her, and stripping off his disguise, tells her who he is. Rymenhild is overcome with joy. Horn tells her he has armed men at the "wodes ende," who will prevent the wedding. Later, Horn with his men break into the hall, kill many of the guests, and Rymenhild and he are married. Horn addresses the king and exposes the treachery of Fikenhild.

The story does not end here, for Horn is determined to avenge his father's death and win back his kingdom ere he takes Rymenhild for his wife. With the help of his Irish followers and the faithful Athulf he succeeds in regaining his kingdom, and to his great joy finds his mother still alive. He causes churches and chapels to be built, bells to be rung, and masses celebrated for his father's soul. During his absence the traitor Fikenhild gains a great following, seizes Rymenhild whom he wishes to compel to be his wife, and shuts her up in a strong castle which he has built in the sea. Warned by a dream, Horn returns at the critical moment. He is informed by Arnoldin, Athulf's nephew, of all that has happened, and hastens to the castle which he and his companions enter, disguised as harpers, with their swords under their garments.

"They stepped over the gravel to the castle. They began merrily to sing and play. Rymenhild heard it, and asked who they were. They answered that they were harpers, and some of them were fiddlers. They let Horn in at the portal of the hall. He seated himself upon the bench and began to play the harp. He sang before Rymenhild and she answered with wailings. Rymenhild fell into a swoon, none laughed there. Bitter pain smote Horn's heart. He looked upon his ring, and thought of Rymenhild, he stepped to the board, and with the edge of his good sword he struck off Fikenhild's head and he overthrew all warriors, one after another. When they were killed he caused Fikenhild to be torn to pieces."¹

He rewards his faithful followers. Horn now takes Rymenhild to be his queen, and they live in true love and cherish God's law.

Many traits in this story suggest its primitive origin. The relationship existing between Horn and his followers, the manner of wooing—in the duel scene—in the formal challenge on the part of an invading host to a duel upon the result of which shall depend the marriage of a princess or the fate of a kingdom.

BEVIS OF HAMPTON

Bevis of Hampton and Guy of Warwick are both romances which professedly deal with the time of Athelstan and Eadgar. It is possible that in Guy of Warwick the poet used English local traditions. There are many elements in both that suggest folk-lore material: the story of the dragon reminds us of the slaying of Grendel and Grendel's mother.

Guy, Earl of Southampton, marries late in life the beautiful daughter of the King of Scotland. The Emperor Almano or Devoun had desired to marry her, but her father refuses her hand to Devoun and gives her to Sir Guy. They have one son named Bevis. After his birth the lady regrets her marriage, and resolves to encompass the death of Guy and marry her former lover. She sends a messenger to the Emperor requesting him to come to England on the 1st of May and go into a forest near the seaside and kill her husband whom she will send there.

The messenger finds the Emperor and delivers the message. He receives a rich present, and the Emperor promises to perform her request. On the 1st of May, Lady Guy pretends to be ill and sends her husband into the forest to get the flesh of a wild boar which she hopes will cure her.

Thither her husband rides, and is met by the Emperor who has a large retinue with him. Guy is slain and his head despatched to his lady, who promises to become the Emperor's wife the next day.

Bevis grieves at the death of his father and reproaches his mother with murder. She commands his foster-father, Saber, to murder the boy. Saber pretends that he has done it and sends the garments of Bevis sprinkled with pig's blood to his mother. He dresses the boy as a poor herdsman and sends him to mind the sheep, intending to send him later on to an Earl to be educated. Out in the fields Bevis hears the sound of rejoicing. He cannot refrain from going to the hall and demanding admission. He strikes the Emperor three strokes with his staff and then escapes, thinking he has killed the Emperor. His mother sells him for a large sum to heathen merchants who sail with Bevis to Armenia. There he becomes the king's chamberlain, and in the usual way the princess having witnessed some of his brave deeds, falls in love with him. Bevis becomes a brave leader in the king's army.

Josian presents him with a magic sword Morgelai, and a horse Arondel, but in consequence of jealousy of courtiers he is forced to depart. In the meantime Sabor sends his son Terri to search for Bevis. When Terri makes inquiries he is told that Bevis has been hanged by the Saracens.

Bevis now proceeds to Damascus, where he meets with many adventures and is imprisoned for seven years. Bevis has progressed in Christian virtue, has received a visit from an angel who cures him of an adder's bite. He renews his prayers to heaven for deliverance, and finally escapes by means of a miracle and rides off into the forest.

Bevis finds his way to Jerusalem and confesses to the patriarch; he then sets out for King Ermin's court. On the journey he meets a knight who informs him of Josian's marriage.

Disguised as a palmer, he is received by Josian and placed at the head of the board and requested to say whether he has seen or heard aught of Sir Bevis in his travels. He professes to be an intimate friend of Bevis who has sent him in search of the steed Arondel. The queen leads him to the stable, and at the sound of the stranger's voice Arondel burst the seven chains that bound him and ran to the stable door:

"Bevis himself in the saddle threw
And thereby Josian anon him knew"

Boniface, Josian's confidential chamberlain, suggests a plan whereby the two can escape, unknown to the king. The plan is successful, in spite of pursuits, attacks by lions, and an encounter with a formidable giant Ascapard who, after being vanquished in fight, becomes the page of Sir Bevis. The three proceed to Cologno in Gormany—the bishop of Cologne quite providentially is the brother of Sir Guy and Sir Saler, and uncle to Bevis. He hears their story and at the desire of Sir Bevis consents to baptize Josian and the page Ascapard.

"The bishop christened Josian
That was white as any swan
For Ascapard was made a tun,
And when he should therein be done
He leapt out upon the brench (brink)
And said, 'Churl, wilt thou me drench? (drown)
The devil of hell met fetch thee!
I am too much (too big) christened to be!"¹

This little scene sorely grieved the bishop, the author tells us, although it afforded much amusement to the spectators.

Bevis now asks the bishop for assistance to avenge his father's death, and is readily given a hundred knights.

Leaving Josian in the care of Ascapard, he sets sail for England, landing at Southampton. In the meantime a powerful Earl named Sir Mile determines to make Josian his wife. By means of a forged letter, he gets rid of Ascapard. The lady, in great alarm, sends a message to Bevis, but herself invents a way out of her difficulty by hanging Sir Mile to the roof-beam with her girdle.

The Barons and workpeople wonder at the long sleep of the Earl, and they break open the door. Josian informs them

"His head wol ake never more.
'Yesterday he wedded mee with wrong
And at night I did him hong"

Josian is condemned to be burnt to death. Sir Bevis and Ascapard return in time to rescue her from the stake. Bevis afterwards returns to Southampton and after a fierce struggle avenges his father's death.

Here, one might imagine the story would end,

but no; Bevis is involved in a further series of adventures.

King Eadgar's son tries to steal Arondel, receives a sudden kick and is killed. Eadgar swears to be revenged on Sir Bevis and he is expelled from the country. His return with Josian and his two sons is not accomplished without great slaughter:

"The blood fell on that pavement,
Right down to the Temple Bar it went,
As it is said in French romance,
Both in Yngelonde and in Fraunce.
So many men at once were never seen dead,
For the water of Thames for blood was red;
From S. Mary Bowe to London Stone,
That ilke tyme was housing none."

Sixty thousand men were slain in this battle ere Sir Bevis and his sons returned to their camp at Putney.

King Eadgar made overtures for peace and offers his only daughter to Mile, the son of Bevis, in marriage. Bevis with Josian and his other son go to Ermony. Soon after Josian is seized with illness and dies in the arms of her husband. At the same moment he receives news that the faithful Arondel had died in his stable—a few minutes later he himself breathed his last. Their remains were buried under the high altar of a church dedicated to St. Lawrence:

"God on their souls have pity,
And on Arondel his good steed.
Giff men for horse shoulde sing or read!
Thus endeth Sir Bevis of Hampton
That was so noble a Baroun."

Whereat the modern reader who attempts to wade through the romance will heave a sigh of relief.

ENGLISH ALLITERATIVE ROMANCES

A revival of the Old English alliterative verse occurred about the middle of the fourteenth century. The victories of Edward III in France resulted in a re-awakening of the national self-consciousness which found vent in a new enthusiasm for the English tongue. English displaced French in the schools and law courts, and in 1362 Parliament was opened in the English language.

During the preceding period, the various dialects had been undergoing a process of simplification. Inflections had been disappearing, the language was tending towards forms which could become universal. It is not strange, therefore, that this revival should be accompanied by a reaction on the part of the poets to earlier and more truly national forms of verse. Under French influence rhymed verse had gained the ascendancy in English poetry, although alliteration still remained in numerous phrases and conventional formulas. Alliterative poetry never entirely disappeared, and in Laurence Minot, lyric or courtly verse joined forces with the more popular forms.

This accounts in some measure for a series of romances that arose in the district of the Welsh Marches, and which borrowed the Old English epic verse and invested the romances with a certain dignity and stately splendour.

"The archaic cast of the form, combined with the thoroughly modern subject-matter (that is, modern in the fourteenth century) at first has an odd and startling effect. But this impression is soon overcome; one grows accustomed to the novel style and yields voluntarily to its mysterious spell, a spell that is, nevertheless, broken in protracted works, or in mediocre poets by monotony."

Two poems of which fragments only remain are the oldest specimens of this alliterative verse, one being part of a romance on the Holy Graal, or Joseph of Arimathea, and two parts of an Alexander romance. The first is a condensed version of a long work in French prose. The serious style of the writers is admirably in keeping with the mystical character of the narrative. The Alexander fragments contain graphic and forcible descriptions and several brilliant passages. The work of this poet is important, since it influenced "William" the translator of a French romance, William of Palerne.

The romance of William and the Werwolf has been printed from a unique manuscript in the library of King's College, Cambridge. Jacob Bryant and the Rev. Jeremiah Miles, Dean of Exeter, in an attempt to defend the Rowley poems by Chatterton as being genuine Old English poems, cite portions of this romance in support of his claims. The quotations made from this manuscript attracted the attention of George Stevens, who desired permission to inspect it. Dr. Glynno, Senior Fellow of the College, a strong supporter of the Rowleyan theory—(Dr. Glynno bequeathed to the British Museum the original parchments fabricated by Chatterton)—thinking that an examination of the book might not assist the claims of Chatterton, had the book locked up where it remained until 1821, when they were once more brought to light.

The story of this roman d'aventures concerns a Spanish prince who is transformed into a werewolf through the sorcery of his wicked step-mother. The werewolf carries off to Rome a Sicilian prince, whose uncle seeks to kill him. There the youth is discovered by the Emperor who makes him a page to the Princess Melior, his daughter. Melior and William become lovers, and the two escape from Rome in bear-skins and deer-skins, pursued by knights. Eventually, all the actors in the extravaganza meet at Palermo—disenchantments and reconciliations take place—and the roman concludes with the various weddings.

William excels in his portrayal of the tender and pathetic thomes. He excuses himself for adopting the alliterative metre—(the original was written in short couplets)—and in this form the poet feels he does not possess sufficient skill.

"In thise wise hath William all his werke ended,
As fully as the Frensche fully wold aske,
And as his witte him wold serve though it were febul."

Another alliterative poem, remarkable for its freshness and force, that dates from the reign of Edward III, is A treatise and good short Refreyte (Dispute) betwixt Winner and Waster. It is a satire on the social conditions prevalent in England at this time (c. 1350). The poet in his vision sees two rival hosts ready for angry conflict. They agree to submit the case to the king for settlement. Winner and Waster, the two leaders, then address the king in turn. The king stops their wrangling and tells each to live where he is loved most. Winner is to go to Rome and dwell with the Pope and Cardinals, Waster to the busy streets of London until he shall accompany the king on his Continental wars.

The poem is incomplete, only five hundred lines remaining, but it affords a striking commentary on the miseries of the country at the time; the scarcity of labour, the result of the Black Death. The economic conditions are discussed, and it is possible the poet was influenced by the revival of chivalry in the institution of the Order of the Garter (1343)—vide description of rival knights. Moreover the concluding page of the manuscript has the motto of the Order written in Old English:

"Scorn have the man that any harm thinketh."

SIR GAWAYNE AND THE GREEN KNIGHT

"Pearl," "Cleanness," and "Patience"

Each poem in the MSS. is preceded by four illustrations, those to Sir Gawayne are as follows:

- (1) Illumination of a headless knight on horseback, carrying his head by its hair in his right hand and looking benignly at an odd-eyed bill-man before him, while from a raised structure above, a king armed with a knife, his queen, an attendant with a sabre, and another bill-man looks scowling on.

Here and elsewhere the only colours used are red, yellow, and blue and green. At the conclusion in a later hand is written "Hony fait q mal renc," which may perhaps allude to the stolen interview between

- (2) Sir Gawayne and the Wife of the Green Knight. Above the lady's head is written

"Mi mind is mukel on one that wil me noght amende, Sum time was trow as ston and fro schame couthe her defende."

- (3) Gawayne is seen approaching the Green Chapel, whilst his enemy appears above wielding his huge axe.

- (4) Sir Gawayne fully equipped in armour is represented in the presence of King Arthur and Queen Guenevere after his return to court.

Characteristics—The metrical romances were in most cases meant to supply amusement and entertainment to the listeners. They performed the part of picture palaces in the Middle Ages. With the return of alliterative verse a more serious view was given to the romance.

Among the many heroes of British romance, Gawayne holds the place of honour, for attractiveness of personality. To those who know of him only from Tennyson's unpleasing picture of a false, irreverent knight, it comes as a surprise to find that the Gawayne of mediæval romance is "gay, gracious, and good." He was the best beloved of Arthur's comrades, and we are told "ever he was wont to do more than he agreed, and to give more than he promised." In the work of Malory, for the first time these characteristics are presented in a less favourable light.

True that he does not dominate any romance in the way that Tristram and Lancelot do, but there is scarcely a story in which he does not appear, and does not fail to grace, and one of the most remarkable and most arresting of the romances is that of Gawayne and the Green Knight (c. 1374); a romance that has no superior save in the pages of Chaucer.

About its author, unhappily, practically nothing is known, save that he lived probably in Cheshire. In his romance he uses both alliteration and rhyme.

In Sir Gawayne, the poet holds up a "mirror of knighthood." The ideal is the ideal knight "truest of speeche and fairest of forni," in "cleanness and courtesy was he never found wanting", a prototype of Chaucer's "verray parfaict, gentil knight." The story is borrowed from the Perceval (Roman de Perceval, by Chrestien de Troyes), with interpolated passages that are original and throw light on the customs and manners of our ancestors.

The Story—King Arthur holds Christmas festival that lasts fifteen days, at Camelot, surrounded by his knights and ladies. They celebrate the New Year by a religious service in chapel and the distribution of gifts. The king and his lords and ladies take their seats at the Round Table, but Arthur jumps up and down like a child, declaring he will not eat until he has beheld some marvel—heard some strange tale, or witnessed an encounter of arms.

The first course is served with the noise of trumpets and drums. Then another sound is heard and there rushes in at the hall door a knight of gigantic stature, the greatest on earth. He is clothed entirely in green and rides upon a green foal. Fair wavy hair fell about his shoulders and a beard like a bush hung upon his breast. The knight carried no helmet, shield, or spear, but in one hand he held a holly bough and in the other an axe, the handle of which was encased in iron curiously graven in green with gracious works. Thus arrayed, he enters the hall without saluting anyone. He casts his eye round, looking for the most renowned of the knights who sat marvelling, not daring to speak.

"Not all from fear, but some from courtesy."

Then Arthur salutes the Green Knight, and entreats him to stay awhile at his court. The knight replies that he has come to satisfy himself respecting the fame of Arthur's court. He comes in peace and has but one request to make.

He then challenges any among the assembled knights to give him one stroke with the axe, provided that he come to him in a year and a day's time to receive the return stroke. The knights are still more astounded at this speech, and sit silent. The knight righting himself in his saddle, rolls his eyes fiercely about, bends his bristly green brows and strokes his beard awaiting a reply, but finding none accept his challenge he exclaims, "What! is this King Arthur's house, the fame of which has spread through so many realms? Forsooth, the renown of the Round Table is overturned by one man's speech, for all tremble for dread without a blow being struck." He laughed so loud that Arthur blushed for very shame and waxed as wroth as the wind. Arthur himself will accept the challenge and seizes the axe. Sir Gawayne, the king's nephew, at this steps forward and beseeches the king to allow him to undertake the encounter.

Sir Gawayne takes the axe, the Green Knight bends himself to the ground and bares his neck for the blow. Gawayne raises the axe on high and quickly it falls upon the neck of the Green Knight. The head is severed from the body and rolls near the feet of the knights who turn it aside with their feet. The knight does not falter, but seizing the head, he mounts his horse, and holding the head by the long fair hair, he turns the bleeding trunk in the saddle and the head lifted up its eyelids and the mouth spoke to Sir Gawayne, charging him to seek him out at the Green Chapel in a twelve-month's time and receive the return stroke.

With a fierce start he turns the reins, rushes out of the hall door, his head in his hand—so that the sparks flew out of the hoofs of his foal. King Arthur then declares himself ready to have his meat, for he has that day seen a wondrous adventure. The axe is hung upon the wall, and conversation flies quickly.

The year soon passes away.

After Christmas comes the "crabbed Lenten" time; the spring with its soft showers, the earth is covered with green and the flowers begin to blossom forth, then cometh summer "with soft blowing winds":

"When zephyr sighs sweetly on seeds and herbs,
Most winsome is the wort that then groweth wild,
When the dapp drops drip from the dewy leaves,
A blissful blush to bide of the bright beaming sun."¹

Harvest soon approaches, and drives the dust about. The leaves drop off the trees, the grass becomes grey, and all ripens and rots. Winter comes round again, and it is time for Sir Gawayne to start on his journey.

On All Hallows Day, Arthur makes a feast for his nephew, and there is much sorrow at his departure. "Much was the warm water poured from eyes on that day," says the poet.

Sir Gawayne passes from Camelot, through Gloucestershire into Montgomeryshire, thence through North Wales to Holy Head adjoining the Isle of Anglesea, from whence he passes into the narrow peninsula of Wirral in Cheshire, where dwelt few that loved God or man.

The knight pursues his journey by strange paths, climbs many cliffs, crosses many fords, finding many foes, and encountering many adventures with serpents, wolves, wild men, and boars, but the sharp winter troubled him more than anything. Thus he travels until Christmas is near at hand. He prays to the Virgin Mary that she will guide him to some abode. On the morrow he finds himself in a deep forest where there were many hundreds of oaks "Many sad birds upon bare twigs piped piteously for the cold."

Through many a mire he goes that he may celebrate the birth of Christ. He beseeches the Virgin—He says "Cross of Christ speed me"—and scarcely has he crossed himself thrice when he saw a dwelling set on a hill. Gawayne rides to the gate, but the drawbridge is raised and the gates shut. At the call of the knight the porter opens the gate. Gawayne rides into the castle, he is received with great honour. His horse is led into the stable and knights and squires hasten to relieve him of his weapons. The lord of the castle then appears and bids Gawayne a cordial welcome.

He is led into a chamber in which a fire is burning, and gorgeous robes are placed ready for him to wear. A feast is made ready in the hall, fish cooked in a variety of ways—baked and broiled and seasoned with spices. Beer and spiced wine is also served. Trumpeters announce the entry of the courses, and during the repast, music and carols are furnished by minstrels.

After dinner they go to the chapel for service, at the conclusion of which the lady leaves her seat and approaches the knight, accompanied by an old and withered crony. The lady herself is young and beautiful. By permission of his host, Gawayne goes to meet them—he bows to the old lady and kisses the younger. The evening quickly passes in cheerful conversation, all rejoice that Gawayne "the father of nurture" is there. Now they may expect to see "courtesy." The feasting and revelry go on for three days.

On the evening of St John's Day many of the guests depart and Gawayne also desires to go, but his host on being informed of the object of his journey promises that Gawayne shall reach the chapel in time, since it is only two miles distant from the castle. He begs him to stay longer.

Relieved by the assurances of his host, Gawayne is nothing loth. The host proposes that Gawayne shall keep his hostess company on the morrow while he goes out hunting, and that they shall present to each other what the day brings them. The compact is renewed twice. Each day the lord of the castle goes to hunt; on the first day deer, the second boar, the third the fox. The hunting is described in the minutest detail, even to the manner in which the deer and boar are cut up and carried home to the castle. Lest these technical matters should prove too tedious, Sir Gawayne's experiences are related in between. Each morning the lady visits Sir Gawayne's room. Her advances are rejected by Sir Gawayne respectfully and courteously, her kisses he returns to the lord of the castle in exchange for the hunt. The third morning, having declined a gold ring which the lady wishes to bestow upon him, he relents so far as to accept a silken girdle that will preserve the owner from death and wounds. Gawayne, mindful of his coming encounter with the Green Knight, keeps the gift a secret. Thus withstanding sensual temptation he is a victim to fear of death.

At last New Year's Day dawns, the weather is stormy, snow falls, the dales are full of drift. Gawayne, lying sleepless, hears each cock that crows. He rises ere daylight, dresses himself, buckles on his armour, placing beneath it the silken girdle. Gringolet is led forth, and with words of gratitude he bids them all farewell.

Gawayne rides forth accompanied by a servant to show him the way. They "climb the cliffs, where each hill had a hat and a mist cloak." Here they halt and the servant tries to dissuade Gawayne from proceeding further, since the Green Knight kills everyone who passes the chapel. "Therefore, noble Gawayne, let this man alone, and go, for God's sake, some other way. I shall bid me home and I shall swear by God and all his saints to keep the secret. Never will I say thou didst flee before any man!"

Gawayne answers with sternness, that if he were to fly for fear he should be a coward knight. He pursues his journey and reaches the valley, but looks in vain for the chapel, being surrounded by high rocks on all sides.

At last he sees a smooth hill on the bank of a stream. He dismounts, ties his steed to a bough and proceeds to examine the hill. He finds that it has three entrances—the inside is hollow.

"Can this be the Green Chapel?" says the knight; "the devil might say mass here at midnight." While climbing the hill he hears the noise of someone grinding an axe. He thinks the sound may proceed from the enemy, and calls, "Who dwells in this place to hold discourse with me? Now goes here the good Gawayne, if any man will hurry hither to have his wish now or never."

"Abide," is the reply, "and thou shalt speedily have what I once promised thee."

With these words the Green Knight springs forth, bearing a new Danish axe in his hand. He tells Gawayne to get ready for the blow he has covenanted to receive. Gawayne bends his head and bares his neck. The Green Knight seizes the weapon and raises it for the blow. As the axe falls, Gawayne shrinks slightly. The Green Knight reproaches him with cowardice. "I flinched once," says Sir Gawayne, "but will no more; if my head falls on the stones I cannot restore it."

The Green Knight raises the axe again. "Now that thou hast thy heart whole, I must hit thee; look to thy neck, if so be it recover from my stroke!"

Gawayne replies angrily. "Thrash on, proud man, thou dost threaten too long. I believe thine own heart fails thee."

"Forsooth! thou answerest so bold I hinder thy fate no longer." Wrinkling his lips and brows, he lets the axe fall on Gawayne's neck, but only slightly wounds him. The blood flows over the hero's shoulders to the earth. Gawayne at once springs up, arms himself with helmet and shield, and drawing his sword and speaks, "Hold now with thy blow, offer me no more, one stroke I have taken in this place without strife. If thou give me any more I will readily requite it. For according to our covenant but one falls to me."

The Green Knight, resting on his axe, surveys the hero with a pleased look. "Bold knight, be not so angry, no one has done thee unmannerly wrong here. We acted only according to our agreement. I promised thee one stroke, thou hast it, I release thee from the rest. If I had been more wrathful, I could have dealt thee worse harm. At first I menaced thee with one stroke, without striking thee, on account of the agreement we made the first night; thou didst keep it faithfully, and gavest me all thy gain. The second feint was for the second day, thou didst kiss my wife and gavest me the kisses again. But the third time thou failedst, and therefore hadst thou that tap. For mine it is, that woven girdle which thou wearest, my own wife wove it, I know it well. I know well thy kisses and thy virtues and the wooing of my wife; I wrought it myself, I sent her to tempt thee, methinks, the most faultless hero, in sooth, that ever trod the earth. As pearls are of more price than white peas, so is Gawayne of more price than other gay knights. But here thou hast sinned a little, a little thou brokest faith. But that was not for amorous wooing, it was because thou lovedst thy life, hence I blame thee the less."

At these words Gawayne stands silent, and the hot blood rushes to his face. "Cursed be cowardice and covetousness both, cowardice taught me to accord with covetousness, and to forsake my nature; the generosity and loyalty that belong to a knight." He throws the girdle to the Green Knight, bitterly lamenting his failure. The knight presents Gawayne with the girdle, saying he has atoned for it by the wound he has received. He invites him to return to the castle and be reconciled to his wife. Gawayne, however, declines the offer:

"... deceived by a woman!"

Did not the same thing happen to Adam, Solomon, Samson, and David? How could a man love women and not believe them?

Gawayne then takes the girdle. He will wear it as a sign of his guilt. In answer to his request to know his name, the Green Knight tells Gawayne he is Bernlak de Hautdesort. Arthur's half-sister, Morgan the Fay, the pupil of Merlin, has planned the whole affair, in order to frighten Queen Guinevere. She was the old dame whom Gawayne had seen with the lady. The two knights bid each other farewell, and Gawayne returns to Arthur's court. Gawayne relates his adventures with shame and shows the girdle. The king and knights comfort Gawayne, every knight of the Round Table resolving to wear a green girdle in his honour.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE ROMANCE

1. Written with the alliterative measure of the epic, and combined with a lyrical element (cf. Pearl).

2. This romance shows close acquaintance with the courtly life of the age, and the writer was evidently a lover of the chase; it has therefore an historical value.

3. It is remarkable also for the deep and tender love of nature displayed throughout the poem, and some of its most delightful passages describe the charms of wild scenery.

4. It displays an intimate knowledge of mediæval craftsmanship and art.

5. It shows literary power in its treatment of the story, avoiding monotony and repetition with great skill.

6. It is, in essence, didactic, being a study of chastity. Gawayne, beset by St. Anthony's temptations, triumphs over them.

In the romance of Gawayne and the Green Knight, the poet for the first time breaks away from tradition, and while using a romantic tale he tells it with force and individuality, so that the attention of the reader is held throughout. He avoids the besetting sins of the romancers, their diffuseness and the repetition of stock phrases and episodes. The incidents in the story are subordinated to the main purpose the writer has in view—viz. to produce a work of art dominated by a high ethical ideal; and as a piece of literary craftsmanship the romance occupies a place in the front rank. This same earnest moral purpose expresses itself in Pearl, and in the two less considerable poems, Cleanness, and Patience.

Pearl (1380-1400)—In its external loveliness, and even more in its deeper spiritual beauty and truth lies sufficient reason for most patient and devoted study of Pearl, "The Vita Nuova of our language."¹

That this beautiful Middle English poem is not more widely known is due to the difficulty of the language in which it is written, a dialect of the extreme North-West Midland, with a large mixture of Northern, Scandinavian, and romance words.

The writer of Pearl also wrote Cleanness, Patience, and the romance of Sir Gawayne and the Grene Knight. His identity is a matter of conjecture; attempts have been made to associate the authorship of these poems with Huchown of Awle Ryule—

"He made þe gret gest of Arthuro,
And þe Awyntyne of Gawayne"—² and with Ralph Strode, who is described in an old Merton College catalogue as "Radulphus Strode, nobilis poeta fuit et versificavit librum elegiacum vocatum Phantasma Radulphi." The theory advanced in the latter case being that Phantasma is identical with Pearl.

From the internal evidence of the poems, the author would seem, from his wide reading and clerical lore, to have been educated at Oxford or Paris. He has a knowledge of French and Latin, and intimate acquaintance with the Bible.³ He is also familiar with the Roman de la Rose, Boccaccio, and Dante.

That he was an ecclesiastic seems doubtful, although he has strong sympathy with the religious life. He is cultured, experienced in the ways of the court, and in knightly breeding. The details of life in a feudal castle, the tapestries, the knights' armour, the episodes in the three days' hunting described in such realistic fashion in Sir Gawayne, seem to indicate the author's close association with such matters. The four poems, Cleanness, Patience, Pearl, and Sir Gawayne exhibit the same passion for purity, the same moral earnestness, enthusiasm for beauty and goodness in man and nature, although it is perhaps in the last poem that the writer attains the highest expression in art and technique.

The writer adopts the allegorical convention of his day, laments the loss of his little child (Margaret), under the image of the Pearl

"Pearl, pleasant to prince's pay,
So daintily dight in gold so clear!"

He describes the loss of his precious Pearl in an arbour, his entry into the arbour in the "high season of August," probably the Feast of the Assumption (August 15th).

"To that sweet spot of sad renown
I entered, to that arbour green,
In August, at the summer's crown,
When corn is cut with sickles keen
The earth where once my Pearl rolled down
Was shadowed with herbs full clear and sheen,
Gillyflower, ginger, and gromeholm,
And peonies powdered all between"¹

He slid into a sleeping dream; his spirit wandered forth and he found himself where steep cliffs gleam

"High crown'd is all that steep hillside
With crystal cliffs so steep of kind!"

No tongue could describe the beauty of the "sweet sight that God me sent"

"This glorious sight of down and dale,
Of water, wood, and noble plain,
Stirred in me bliss, allayed my bale,
Soothed my distress, destroyed my pain;
Beside those waves that softly steal,
I went in bliss, with teenyng brain,
The farther I followed that watery vale,
The mightier joy did my heart constrain,
As fortune fares when she is fain,
Send she solace or sadness sore,
The wight on whom her gifts may rain
Must chance to receive aye more and more"²

Beyond the brook he sees the glories of Paradise, but "the water was deep I dared not wade" As he walks along the bank, hoping to find a ford, he sees at the foot of the cliff, a child:

"A gracious maid, full debonaire
Her dazzling robe was undefiled;
I knew her well, I had seen her ere
As glistening gold, pure and sincere,
So shone she on that shining shore.
Long gazed I eagerly on her there;
The longer, I knew her more and more.

The more I gazed on her fair face,
And saw her make so sweet a show
The more I felt such gladdening grace
As seldom had been mine ere now
I yearned to call her, but, alas!
Amazement dealt my heart a blow
To see her in so strange a place,
And made my reason bend and bow
When lo! she raised her ivory brow,
That such a look of sweetness wore,
As stung my heart with numbing woe,
And ever the longer the more and more"³

His attempts to reach her are vain. The maiden talks with her father from the opposite banks, telling him of her great joy and honour in the heavenly kingdom. She solves his doubts and difficulties. Finally, he beholds her in the throng surrounding the Lamb in the New Jerusalem. His grief is transformed into joy and wonder; his "rebel mood" is changed into submission to the divine will.

"The Prince's yoke is ever light
To those who love His peace divine,
For I have found Him, both day and night,
A God, a Lord, a Friend full fine
Thus mused I, stretched on earth outright,
Planning my Pearl with bitter brine,
Committing to God that Jewel bright,
In Christes dear blessing and mine,
That in the form of bread and wine
The priest us sheweth every day
Lord make us servants true of Thine
And precious pearls unto Thy pay!"¹

Pearl consists of one hundred and one twelve-lined stanzas (ababab-bcbc), with four stresses to a line. This form is not found outside English poetry, but occurs in some of the religious poems of the fourteenth century.

The poet of the Pearl is a connecting link between the East Midland School represented by Chaucer and the West Midland School that later found expression in Langland. The author of Pearl has greater poetic power than Langland, he possesses moral earnestness combined with greater artistic skill. He is the real literary predecessor of Spenser in his use of allegory and alliteration; and moral seriousness united to the beauty of romance.

It has been suggested that the lines written above the picture of Sir Gawayne in the MSS (see description, p 48) point to some domestic trouble, and that the author after the loss of his child may have retired to a monastery. There is no reference to the mother throughout the poem.

Cleanness—A collection of Bible stories in which the writer endeavours to enforce purity of life, by showing how greatly God is displeased at every kind of impurity and how sudden and severe is the punishment meted out for offences against the Divine Laws.

Patience.—This poem is in reality a poetical paraphrase of the Book of Jonah, exalting the virtue of patience.

"Patience is a noble point though it displease oft"—The writer exhorts his readers to practise this virtue in the introductory lines:

"For he that is too rash to rend his clothes
Must afterward sit with worse ones
To sew them together"

The poem contains some fine descriptive passages—e.g. the storm at sea:

"Anon out of the north-east the noise begins
When both breezes did blow upon blue waters;
Rough clouds there arose with lightning thereunder,
The sea sobbed full sore, great marvel to hear
The winds on the wan water so wrestle together
That the waves full wild rolled so high—
And again bent to the abyss that bred fishes."²

THE ROMANTIC ELEMENT (POPULAR POETRY)

Lyrics—Ballads—Folk Songs, &c

POPULAR POETRY

THE outburst of lyric song which began about 1300, and lasted for nearly two hundred years, may be regarded in many ways as the expression of popular feeling. Both the ballad and the lyric arise in response to the same need, both are associated in their origin with the communal dance, but while the ballad has remained a wayside flower, the lyric gradually became an exotic product of conscious art. Elements of genuine folk songs survive in the refrains, repetitions, and interjections contained in some of these old songs.

KING CANUTE'S BOAT SONG

"Meirio sunge the muncekes binnen Ely
Tha Knut king rew therhy :
Roweth, knihtes, ner the land
And her we thes muncekes sang ,"

and The Hymns of St Godric, the hermit of Finchale, are generally cited as the earliest examples of rhymed English song. Godric's Hymn to Our Lady and to St Nicholas were set to music, and those instances together with other references are useful, since they testify to the early diffusion of song and music amongst the people. Giraldus Cambrensis in his Gemma Ecclesiastica, tells the story of a priest who, having been kept awake through the night by the dancing and singing in the churchyard, could not forget the refrain which the dancers had repeated, and instead of saying "Dominus Vobiscum" said "Sweet kerrnan thin aró" ("Sweet heart, have mercy!") The Bishop henceforth forbade the song to be sung anywhere in his diocese. This dancing in the churchyards—a heathen survival—was a source of much trouble to the clergy, who frequently denounced it.

The new lyric poetry developed mainly in the South and Midlands. Two manuscripts—the Harleian, which is as important in the study of songs as the Auchinleck manuscript is in the study of the romances, and the Bodleian manuscript are both in the Southern dialect, although all the songs do not belong to that district. The movement was associated at the commencement with the expression of religious feeling. A Good Orison to Our Lady, or prayer to the Virgin—a religious love song—appeared soon after the beginning of the thirteenth century.

"Christ's mild mother, St Mary light of my life, my dear lady, to thee I vow and bend my knee,
and all my heart's blood offer thee"

Mary has redeemed him from the power of the devil, she is the source of life. She dwells on her throne high above the cherubim, the angels make joyful music in her presence, and are never weary of looking upon her beauty. He implores her to have pity upon him, to shield him from sorrow and heal his wounds, for in her "is all his trust after her dear Son."

The metre of the poem is very simple. The poet charms by his enthusiasm rather than by any great poetic gifts.

Several other religious songs betray the influence of the Pocina Morale. One in which the monk laments with bitterness his former worldly life, and confesses that he has "often drunken wine and rarely from the spring."

But a new influence was beginning to act on the religious verse; this was the influence of the wandering scholars—(colares vagantes) "the main intermediaries between the learned and vernacular letters of the day."

These were men educated at the Universities, who knew Oxford and Paris life as well as the Schools. Some of them were men who had taken minor orders, they were familiar with missal and breviary. They came in contact with all classes, and this intercourse with the people kept their minds alert. Equally at home in cloister, hall, market-place, or tavern, frequently careless and dissolute, they would sing with equal spirit a hymn to the Virgin, or a religious parody. They knew by heart the drinking songs and love songs in French or English and Latin.

The national lyric betrays the influence of the Latin strollers, of French love poetry and English religion, and beneath them all ever and again peep out remnants of the folk song.

In consequence of this, the rude folk songs were made to conform to the metre of the Latin Hymns, popular refrains were introduced into lyrics of all kinds. There was no hard and fast distinction between forms.

THE LUVE ROUN

This poem shows how lyric form might be used for serious experiments in verse. It was written by Brother Thomas de Hales, a Franciscan monk, at the request of a maiden. The request for a love song affords opportunity for instruction:

"A maid of Christ entreated me
A love song for her to indite,
That thus she may instructed be
To choose a lover true aright.
The best to guard a woman free
Of all men born, most loyal knight,
Nor shall her wish refused be,
To teach her this be my delight."¹

The poet enlarges on the transitoriness of earthly affection—worldly affection is false and fickle—famous knights have passed away like the wind's blast—they have fallen like the meadow grass. He who loves this fleeting world is blind. Man fades as a leaf on a bough—his love is inconstant and untrue.

"Where is Paris? Where Heleynne?
That were so bright of air of blee,
Tristram, Amadas, Ydeyne?"²

Ibid

It is as if they had never lived, all their heat is turned to cold. There is a lover who offers himself, who is kind and true and loyal. He is the richest, fairest, and best lover in the world. He is greater than Henry on his throne. He will bestow all upon her and asks no dowry in return.

"Maiden, oh hear his sweet command,
For to thee now his love he troweth."¹

He has given her a precious jewel to guard, which shall shine brightly in heaven's bower. The writer begs her to learn this song by rote and teach it to other maidens.

This contemplative lyric, with its note of warm, religious feeling blended with lyric fancy, exemplifies the gradual and imperceptible union of various forms. No hard and fast line was drawn between the various forms. The monk would borrow from the courtier, the minstrel from the wandering scholar. Sermons even might adopt poetic "form and in one the spirit of Piers, seems already present:

"All these deceiving chapmen, the devil yet will get them,
The bakere and the brewere, to cheat all men do set them
They hold low down the gallon and then with foam they spill,
And very poor they make their bread and eke their ale,
For if they take the silver in they never tell a tale (Good people for God's love, believe such things are sin,
And at the last will lose you the heaven you would win
All the wives of priests shall then, I wot, be most forlorn,
And of the priests themselves, all sins shall not be borne,
Nor of these proud young men that love their Malokyn,
Nor yet those maidens bold that dote on Janekin,
At church and at the market, when they together rove
They quickly gather whispering and speak of secret love
When to the church they come on any holy day,
Each one but goes to see his love there if he may,
Then she beholdeth Watkin, as glad as she can be,
But home she leaves her rosary, locked up full care-fully
For masses and for matins she certainly cares nought;
To Watkin and to Watkin she gives her every thought."²

Another poem, which gives an account of the Passion begins thus:

"Here is a little story I will tell to you, as we find it written in the Gospel. It is not of Charlemagne and the twelve peers, but of Christ's passion which he suffered here. Now beginneth our tale—it's no leasing."

The influence of the secular love poetry is seen in the beautiful Easter Song

"Summer is come and winter gone,
The days began to grow long,
And the birds everyone
Make joy with song
Still strong care bindeth me
Despite the joys that's found in land
All for a child
That is so mild of hand."³

³ Ibid.

The religious lyric loses nothing of its depth and seriousness, but it gained directness in expression. The feeling for nature and joy in the singing of birds are derived from the folk song.

CAROLS

The carols were brought from France, and there are Norman carols extant which were sung in the later part of the twelfth century. Most of the carols are written in simple Latin metres and hence they probably date from the thirteenth century, when the greatest dependence was placed on the Latin metrical system. Many of the refrains are familiar lines taken from the hymns and canticles:

"Now sing we right as it is Quod puer natus est nobis"

"When Christ was born of Mary free
In Bethlehem that fair city,
Angels sang loud with mirth and glee
In excelsus gloria"

Another quaintly introduces the shepherd's pipes:

"Tyrly, Tyrliow, tyrly, tyrliow,
So merrily the shepherds began to blow."

Still another reminds us of the Mystery—

"Whan Wat to Bedlem cum was
He swet, he had gone faster than a pace;
Lull well Jhesu in thy lape
And farewell Joseph with thy rownd cape."¹

In addition to the carols treating of the Christmas, and the Lullabies of Mary, there were secular carols that dealt with various customs connected with the feasting and sports of Yuletide.

The bringing in the boar's head was accompanied by the singing of a well-known carol:

"The boar's head in hand bring I, Caput apri differo"

Others concern the contest between the Holly and the Ivy, a survival probably of heathen festival games. The lads took the part of the Holly, the lassies that of the Ivy.

"Here comys holly, that is so gent,
To please all men is his intent."

Religious lyrics, as we have already seen, frequently took the form of a Dialogue. The Complaint of Mary, based on the Latin Hymn, Stabat Mater, and The Debate of the Body and the Soul were favourite themes in English poetry in the thirteenth century.

It is impossible to enumerate the many and varied forms of lyric songs during this period. Some of the most rollicking drinking songs survived as the convivial songs that Elizabethans sang with joy in their taverns.

PROVERBIAL POEMS

Instead of the proverbs of Alfred, a middle English collection of proverbs appeared bearing the name of Hendyng.

"Men that wish to hear wisdom, they may learn of the wise Hendyng, that was Marcolf's son, good thoughts and many manners for the instruction of many vicious ones, for that was ever his custom."

"The wise man holds back his words; for he does not begin to play ere he has tempered his pipe. A fool is a fool and that is seen; for he will speak green words before they are ripe. A fool's bolt is soon shot quoth Hendyng"

The Cuckoo Song, which dates from the middle of the thirteenth century, is frequently considered an example of genuine folk song. The music to which this song was sung has been transmitted, having been preserved in a codex (Harl. 978). It was written in 1226 by John of Fornote, a monk of Reading, who was the founder of the first English School of Music. But the music—a canon or round in six parts—and the form of the poem are relatively advanced, yet it is probable that elements in this and other songs are traditional, since there is little doubt that whole forms and verses passed from the folk song to the songs of the clerics. We quote a verse, although the song is familiar:

"Summer is y-oomen in—loude sing cuckow!
Groweth seed and bloweth mead, springeth the wodde now.

Ewe bleateth after lamb, loweth after calfe cow.
Bullock starteth, buck verteth, merrye sing ouckow!
Cuckow! Cuckow!

Well singest thou cuckow, he swich¹ thou never now"

Another love song has the following refrain, evidently inserted by the poet, and which he did not invent:

"Blow northern wynde,
Send thou ino my suetyng²
Blow northern wynd, blou, blou, blou"

The poet tells to "Love how this Beauty had seized a heart that was mine, how her knights sighing, Sorrowing, and Thought had sought me. . . Sorrowing sore threatened that he for this Beauty would lead me in baleful bands until the end of my life in spite of every right"

An East Mercian poet, who fashioned his love plants on the model of the religious lyrics in single rhymed strophes of four long lines, has all the simple directness and warmth of feeling that is usually associated with later lyric poets:

"My death I love, my life I hate, all for a lady fair,
She is as bright as the daylight, none can with her compare

I fade, I droop, as doth green leaf in summer's sunny air,
If all my thought me helpeth nought, what can I but despair"

Sorrow and sighs and dreary mood hold me enthralled me fast,
That now meseems I shall go mad, if it much longer last;

My pain, my care, all with a word, she might forth from me cast,
What helps it thee, sweetheart, to see my life thus long harassed?

Away thou clerk, thou art a fool, with thee I will not chide,
The day I give my love to thee, thou never shalt abide;

If in my bower thou art caught, then shame may thee betide,
'Tis better far on foot to go, than wicked horse to ride!

O sweet, relent, thou grieveest me, thy pity I implore;
For now I am as sad a man as blithe I was before.

In window's shelter we could kiss full fifty times and more;

A fair behest oft makes a man forget his troubles store.

Alack-aday why wakest thou old pain thus ruthlessly?
I loved a clerk once faithfully, and true he was to me,
He was not glad on any day, until he could me see;
I loved him better than my life; what boots a lie to thee?

When I a clerk was in the school much did I know of lore;

From the deep wound dealt by thy love, sharp ache I've felt and sore,

Far from men's haunt, in pilgrim's garb I've roamed the wide world o'er,

Have pity on me, lady sweet, alas, I can no more!

Thou seemest well to be a clerk, for so thou spakest still

No longer voicing dole shalt feel from my love-wounds nor ill,

Not father, mother, all my kin, shall hold me from my will,

For thou art mine, and I am thine, thy bidding to fulfil."

A contrast in tone and spirit to the above is found in the exquisite Song of Alysoun,

"Between soft March and April showers
When sprays of bloom from branches spring,
And when the little bird 'mid flowers
Doth song of sweetness loudly sing
To her with longing love I cling,
Of all the world the fairest thing,
Whose thrall I am, who bliss can bring
And give to me life's crown

A gracious fate to me is sent,
Methinks it is by Heaven lent;
From women all, my heart is bent
To light on Alysoun

Her sheeny locks are fair to see,
Her lashes brown, her eyes of black,
With lovely mouth she smiles on me;
Her waist is slim, of lissom make Unless my mate she will me take,
To be her own, my heart will brook;
Longer to live I will forsake,

And dead I will fall down
A gracious fate to me is sent,
&c. &c.

All for thy sake I restless turn,
And wakeful hours sigh through at night;
For thee, sweet lady, do I yearn,
My cheeks wax wan in woeful plight,
No man so wise that can bright
Her goodness tell, her beauties bright.
Her throat is than the swan's more white,
The fairest maid in town.

A gracious fate to me is sent,
&c. &c.

Weary as water in the wear
With wooing I am spent and worn;
Lest any reave me, much I fear,
And leave me mateless and forlorn.
A sharp, short pain is better borne
Than now and evermore to mourn.
My love, O fair one, do not scorn,
No longer on me frown!

A gracious fate to me is sent,
Methinks it is by Heaven lent,
From women all, my heart is bent,
To light on Alysoun"

THE BALLAD

Meaning of the Term—The term ballad¹ is used now to cover a wide variety of verse, but the word originally signified a dance song, and many ballads eloquent of love, youth, and the springtide were sung by the villagers at their feasting times to a rhythmic measure.

What we have are the product of Saxon intensity of feeling, softened and lightened by Norman sentiment and grace; though the ballad measure is of ancient origin, and probably dates from early mediæval times.

Its History—Thus the ballad is a narrative poem, associated in its origin with the communal dance, possessing no marks of authorship, and the outcome of tradition among people free from literary influence. As in the case of the lyric, one more gifted member of the tribe would compose the verses of the song, while the rest would chant the refrain. The bard would recite the exploits of the hero in battle or the leader himself might even do this, and the surrounding warriors join in the primitive chorus. Such is the history of the ballad not only in England, but as recent investigations have shown, it can be paralleled in the unwritten literature of every savage race.²

The term ballad has, however, been loosely applied to all poems written in what is known as "ballad metre", that is, four-lined stanzas technically described as iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter—hence the term often includes poems that are really "artificial ballads," inasmuch as they imitate the artless, simple, narrative form of their original literary prototypes, but which, since they are not the outcome of the conditions which produced them, are not to be classed with them. "Conditions favourable to the making of such poetry ceased to be general after the fifteenth century."

The charm of the ballad lies in its naive simplicity and primitive feeling. To call it artless, as some do, is a mistake, for it has its own rules of diction, its tricks of phrasing, and conventional refrains. But it has the ease and sincerity of genuine poetry, and is deep-rooted in its love of Earth and primal human qualities.

"And the hirk and the broom blooms bonnie"—

There is poignancy in the cry of Margaret to her dead lover in Clerk Saunders,

"Is there any room at your head, Saunders?
Is there any room at your feet?
Is there any room at your side, Saunders?
Where fain, fain I wad sleep."

Homely pathos, old-time magic, a fierce love of independence, and a brooding sense of tragedy—these are the things that pervade such pieces as Chevy Chase, The Bonny Earl of Murray: while the love of outdoor life and the changing seasons meet us in the Robin Hood Ballads, and the well-known "Sumer is i-cumen in, Lhude sing cuccu."

The ballad differs from the lyric in being descriptive rather than impressionistic, the telling of a tale not the expression of a mood; while technically it is simpler, more primitive, less wrought upon as an art form.

Ballads were current in great numbers in Early England, but only two were written down earlier than the fifteenth century. Judas exists in manuscript in the handwriting of the thirteenth century. St. Stephen and Herod, which is considered to be quite as old, dates from 1450. Langland, in his poem of The Vision concerning Piers the Ploughman, mentions the ballads of Robin Hood, and of Randulph, which shows these at any rate were current before 1377.

"Paternoster I know not, as priests intone it,
But rhymes of Robin Hood, or Randolph of Chester;"¹

The Battle of Otterburn was fought August 19, 1388, and the ballad was probably sung soon after.

It is easy to understand how popular among the people, outlaws like Robin Hood and Hereward the Saxon would become in the early days of the Norman rule, the hatred of the Normans being accentuated by the harsh forest laws.

A Latin life of Hereward was compiled from ancient stories, and there exists a number of ballads dealing with the life and adventures of Robin in the Green Wood, his encounter with the Sheriff of Nottingham, of Robin Hood and the Monk, finally of his death through the treachery of a woman, and his burial by Little John. All these in their present form are of late date, but the Gene of Robin Hood may have been put together in 1400, and printed by Wynkyn de Worde possibly as early as 1492.

It is a popular epic divided in eight fyttes. It tells how Robin lent the knight Sir Richard Lee money to pay his debts, and how Sir Richard in return ran risks for Robin.

The opening verses transport us at once to the green forest:

"In summer when the shawes be shoon
And leaves be large and long,
It is full merry in fair forest
To hear the fowles sing

To see the deer draw to the vale
And leave the lilles high
And shadow 'em on the leaves green
Under the greenwood tree"²

THE BALLAD OF THE NUT-BROWN MAID

(About 1500)

Be it right or wrong, these men among, on women do complane,
Affirming this, how that it is a labour spent in vaine
To loue them wele; for neuer a dele they loue a man

For lete a man do what he can, ther fauour to attayne, Yet yt a newe to them pursue, ther furst trew loue than Labourerth for nought, and from her thought he is a bannished man.

I say not nay, but that all day it is bothe writ and sayde
That womans fayth, is as who saythe, all vtterly de

But neuertheles, right good witnes in this case might

Loo' myn heite swote, this ylle dyet shuld make you pale & wan,
Wherfore I to the wood wyl goo, alone, a banysshid
man"

"Amonge the wyld dere suche an archer as men say that yo hee
Ne may not fayle of good vitayle, where is so grete plente,
And watir cleere of the rymme, shulbe ful swote to me,
Wyth whiche in hile I shal right wole endure, as yo shal see,
And er wo goo, a bed or twoo I can promide a-noon,
For in my mynde, of all mankynde, I loue hut you alone"

"Loo yet, before, ye must doo more, yf yo wyl goo with me,
As entte your here up by your ere, your kirtel by the knee,
Wyth bowe in hande, for to withstonde your enomys, yf nede be
And this mane nught before day-lyght, to wood-ward
wyl I flee,
And if yo wyl all this fulfyll, doo it shortely as yo can,
Ellis wil I to the grene wode goo, alone, a banysshid
man"

"I shal as now do more for you than lougeth to woman-hode,
To short my here, a bowe to here, to shote in tyme of nede
O my swote model, before all othor for you haue I most dred,
But now a-diew, I must ensue whor fortune doth me
leade
All this make ye, now lete vs flee, the day cumeth fast vpon,
For in my mynde, of all mankynde, I loue but you
alone"

"Nay, nay, not soo yo shal not goo, & I shal telle you
why,
Your appertyte is to be lyght of loue, I wele aspie,
For right as ye haue said to me, in lyke wyse hardely Ye wolde answere, who-so-euer it were, in way of company
It is sayd of olde, 'sone hote, sone colde,' and so is a woman,
Wherfore I too the wode wyl goo, alone, a banysshid
man"

"Yef ye take hede, yet is noo nede such wordis to say bee me,
For ofte ye preyd, and longo assayed, or I you loud,
perdoe,
And though that I of auerosty, a barons doughter bee,
Yet haue you proued how I you loud, a squyer of low degree
And euer shul, what so detalle, to dey therfore a noon,
For in my mynde, of al mankynde, I loue but you
alone"

"A barons childe to be begyled, it were a cur-sed dede,
To be felow with an out-lawe, almyghty god for-bede!
Yet bettyr were the pore squyer alone to forest yede,
Than ye shal saye, another day, that he my wyked dede
Ye were betrayed, wherfore, good maide, the best rede that I can,
Is, that I too the grene wode goo, alone, a banysshid
man"

"Whatso-euer-be-falle, I nouer shal of this thing you
vphraid,
But yf yo goo and leue me soo, than haue ye me be-traied,

Roinembre you wele how that yo dele, for yf ye, as ye sayde,
Be so vynkynde, to leue behynde your loue, the not-browne maide,
Trust me truly that I shal doye, sone after ye be gone,
For in my mynde, of all man-kynde, I loue but you
alone."

"Of that ye went, ye shulde repent, for in the forest
now
I haue purueid me of a maide, whom I loue more than you
Another fayrer than euer ye were, I dare it wel anowe,
And of you both, eche shuld be wrothe with other, as I trowe
It were myn case to lyue in pease, so wyl I, yf I oan;
Wherfore I to the wode wyl goo, alone, a banysshid
man"

"Though in the wood I vnderstoode yo had a paramour,
All this may nought reneuo my thought, but that I wil be your
And she shal fynde me softe and kynde, and curteis euery our,
Glad to fulfyll all that sho wylle commaunde me, to my power,
For had ye, loo' an hundred moo, yet wolde I be that one,
For in my mynde, of all mankynde, I loue but you
alone"

"Myn own dere loue, I see the proue that ye be kynde and trewe,
Of mayde and wyf, in al my lyf the best that euer I knew
Be mery and glad, be no more sad, the case is chaunged
newe,
For it were ruther, that for your trowth you shuld haue cause to rewe
Be not dismayed, what-so-euer I sayd to you, whan I began,
I wyl not too the grene wode goo, I am noo banysshid
man"

"Theis tidings be more glad to me, than to be made a quene,
Yf I were sure they shuld endure, hut it is often seene,
When mon wyl breke promyse, they speke the wordis on the spene
Ye shape some wyte, me to begyle, and stole fro me, I wene,
Then wore the case wurs that it was, & I more woo
begone,
For in my mynde, of al mankynde, I loue but you alone"

"Ye shal not nede further to drede, I wyl not disparage
You, god defende, sith ye descende of so grette a lynage
Now vnderstonde, to Westmorelonde, whiche is my herytage,
I wyl you bringe, and wyth a rynge, be wey of marvago
I wyl you take, and lady make, as shortly as I can,
Thus haue ye wome an erles son, and not a banysshid
man!"

Here may ye see that wymen be in loue moke, kinde, & stable,
Late neuer man repicue thom than, or calle them
variable,
But rather prey god that we may to them be comfortable, Whiche sountyme prouyth suche as ho loueth yf they be charitable
For sith men wolde that wymen sholde be meke to thom echoon,
Muche more ought they to god obey, and serue but hym alone

THE NUT-BROWN BRIDE

Lord Thomas and fair Annet
Sate a' day on a hill,
When night was come and sun was set
They had not talked their fill.

Lord Thomas said a word in jest,
Fair Annet took it ill.

"Ah, I will never wed a wife Against my ain friends' will"

"Gif ye will never wed a wife,
A wife will ne'er wed ye;"
Sae he is hame to tell his mither,
And knelt upon his knees.

"O rede, O rede, mither," he says,
"A gude rede gie to me;
Oh shall I tak the nut-brown bride,
And let fair Annet be?"

"The nut-brown bride has gowd and gear,
Fair Annet she has gat nane,
And the little beauty fair Annet has,
Oh it will sune be gane"

And he has till his brother gane:

"Now, brother, rede ye me,
Ah shall I marry the nut-brown bride,
And let fair Annet be?"

"The nut-brown bride has oxen, brother,
The nut-brown bride has kye,
I wad hae ye marry the nut-brown bride,
And cast fair Annet by"

"Her oxen may die i' the house, billie,
And her kye into the byre,
And I shall hae nothing to mysel'
But a fat fadge by the fire"

And he has till his sister gane:

"Now, sister, rede ye me,
Oh, shall I marry the nut-brown bride,
And let fair Annet free?"

"I'se rede ye tak fair Annet, Thomas,
And let the brown bride alane,
Lest ye should sigh and say, alas!
What is this we brought hame?"

"No, I will take my mither's counsel,
And marry me out o' land;
And I will take the nut-brown bride
Fair Annet may leave the land"

Up then rose fair Annet's father
Two hours or it wore day,
And he is gane into the bower
Wherein fair Annet lay.

"Rise up, rise up, fair Annet," he says,
"Put on your silken shoen,
Let us gae to St. Marie's kirk
And see that rich wedding"

"My maids, gae to my dressing-room,
And dress to me my hair,
Where'er ye laid a plait before,
See ye lay ten times mair.

"My maids, gae to my dressing-room,
And dress to me my smock;
The one half is o' the holland fine,
The other o' needle-work"

The horse fair Annet rode upon,
He ambled like the wind,
Wi' siller he was shod before,
Wi' burning gowd behind.

Four and twenty siller bells
Were a' tied till his mane,
And ae tift o' the norland wind
They tinkled ane by ane.

Four and twenty gay gude knights
Rode by fair Annet's side,
And four and twenty fair ladies,
As gin she had been a bride

And when she cam to Marie's kirk,
She sat on Marie's stane,
The cleaving that fair Annet had on,
It skinkled in their een.

And when she cam into the kirk,
She slumnered like the sun;
The belt that was about her waist,
Was a' wi' pearls bedone

She sat her by the nut-brown bride,
And her een they were sae clear,
Lord Thomas he clean forgot the bride
When fair Annet drew near.

He had a rose into his hand,
He ga'e it kisses throe,
And reaching by the nut-brown bride,
Laid it on fair Annet's knee

Up then spak the nut-brown bride,
She spak wi' meikle spite,
"And where gat ye that rose-water
That does mak ye sae white?"

"Oh, I did get the rose-water
Where ye will ne'er get nane,
For I did get that very rose-water
Into my mither's wanie"

The bride she drew a long bodkin
Frae out her gay head-gear,
And straik fair Annet unto the heart
That word sho never spak mair
Lord Thomas he saw fair Annet wax pale,
And marvelt what might be,
But when he saw her dear heart's bluid,
A' wud-wroth waxed he.

He drew his dagger that was sae sharp,
That was sae sharp and meet,
And drave it into the nut-brown bride
That fell dead at his feet.

"Now stay for me, dear Annet," he said,
"Now stay, my dear," he cried;
Then straik the dagger intil his heart,
And fell dead by her side.

Lord Thomas was buried without kirk-wa',
Fair Annet within the quire,
And o' the tane there grew a birk,
The other a bonnie brier

And aye they grew, and aye they threw,
As they would fain be near,
And by this ye may ken right weel
They were twa lovers dear.

CLERK SAUNDERS

Clerk Saunders and may Margaret
Walked ower yon garden green,
And sad and heavy was the love
That foll thur twa between

"A bed, a bed," Clerk Saunders said,
"A bed for you and me!"
"Fye na, fye na," said may Margaret,
"Till anes we married be"

"For in may come my seven bauld brothers,
Wi' torches burning bright
They'll say, 'We hae but ae sister,
And behold sho's wi' a knight!'"

"Then I'll take the sword frae my sabbard,
And slowly lift the pin,
And may you swear, and save your aith,
Ye never let Clerk Saunders in

"And take a naphin in your hand,
And tie up haith your bonny een
And you may swear, and save your aith,
Ye saw me na since late yestreen"

It was about the midnight hour,
When they asleep were laid,
When in and came her seven brothers,
Wi' torches burning red.

When in and came her seven brothers,
 Wi' torches sluning bright,
 They said, " We hae but ae suster,
 And behold her lying with a knight ! "

Then out and spake the first o' them,
 " I bear the sword shall gar him die ! "
 And out and spake the second o' them,
 " His father has nae mair than he ! "

And out and spake the third o' them,
 " I wot that they are lovers dear ! "
 And out and spake the fourth o' them,
 " They hae been in love thus mony a year ! "

Then out and spake the fifth o' them,
 " It were great sin true love to twain "
 And out and spake the sixth o' them,
 " It were shame to slay a sleeping man "

Then up and gat the seventh o' them,
 And never a word spake he ;
 But he has striped his bright brown brand
 Out through Clerk Saunders' fair bodye

Clerk Saunders he started, and Margaret she turned Into his arms as asleep she lay,
 And sad and silent was the night
 That was atween thir twae.

And they lay still and sleeped sound,
 Until the day began to daw' ;
 And kindly to him she did say,
 " It is time, true love, you were awa' . "

But he lay still, and sleeped sound,
 Albeit the sun began to sheen,
 She looked atween her and the wa',
 And dull and drowie were his een

Then in and came her father dear,
 Said, " Let a' your mourning be
 I'll carry the dead corpse to the clay,
 And I'll come back and comfort thee "

" Comfort weel your seven sons ;
 For comforted will I never be
 I ween 'twas neither knave nor loon
 Was in the bower last night wi' me "

The clinking bell gaed through the town,
 To carry the dead corpse to the clay,
 And Clerk Saunders stood at my Margaret's window,
 I wot, an hour before the day

" Are ye sleeping, Margaret ? " he says,
 Or are ye waking presentlie ?
 Give me my faith and troth again,
 I wot, true love, I gied to thee "

" Your faith and troth ye sall never get,
 Nor our true love sall never twin,
 Until ye come withun my bower,
 And kiss me cheek and chin . "

" My mouth it is full cold Margaret,
 It has the snill, now, of the ground ;
 But if I kiss thy comely mouth,
 Thy days of life will not be lang

" O, cocks are crowing a merry midnight,
 I wot the wild fowls are boding day ;
 Give me my faith and troth again,
 And let me fare me on my way "

" Thy faith and troth thou sall na get,
 And our true love shall never twin,
 Until ye tell what comes of women,
 I wot, who die in strong travelling " "

" Their beds are made in the heavens lugh,
 Down at the foot of our good Lord's knee,
 Weel set about wi' gilly flowers
 I wot sweet company for to see

" O, cocks are crowing a merry midnight,
 I wot the wild fowls are boding day,
 The psalms of heaven will soon be sung,
 And I, ere now, will be missed away "

Then she has ta'en a crystal wand,
 And she has stroken her troth thereon ;
 She has given it him out at the shot-window,
 Wi' mony a sad sigh, and heavy groan.

" I thank ye, Marg'ret ; I thank ye, Marg'ret.
 And aye I thank ye heartlie ;
 Gin ever the dead comes for the quick,
 Be sure, Marg'ret, I'll come for thee "

It's hosen and shoon, and gown alone,
 She climbed the wall, and followed him,
 Until she came to the green forest,
 And there sho lost the sight o' him

" Is there ony room at your head, Saunders ?
 Is there ony room at your feet ?
 Or ony room at your side, Saunders,
 Where faul, faul, I wad sleep ?

" There's nae room at my head, Marg'ret,
 There's nae room at my feet ;
 My bed it is full lowly now,
 Among the hungry worris I sleep.

" Cauld mould it is my covering now,
 But an my winding-sheet,
 The dew it falls nae sooner down,
 Than my resting-place is weat.

" But plant a wand o' bonnie birk,
 And lay it on my breast,
 And shod a tear upon my grave,
 And wish my saul gude rest

" And fair Marg'ret, and raro Marg'ret,
 And Marg'ret o' veritie,
 Gin e'er ye love another man,
 Ne'er love him as ye did me "

Then up and crew the milk-white cock,
 And up and crew the gray ;
 Her lover vansh'd in the air,
 And she gaed weeping away.

FAIR ANNIE

" It's narrow, narrow, make your bed,
 And learn to lie your lane,
 For I'm gaun o'er the sea, fair Annie,
 A braw bride to bring hame
 Wi' her I will get gowd and gear ;
 Wi' you I ne'er got nane

" But wha will bake my bridal bread,
 Or brow my bridal ale ?
 And wha will welcome my brack bride
 That I bring o'er the dale ? "

" It's I will bake your bridal bread,
 And brew your bridal ale,
 And I will welcome your brack bride,
 That you bring o'er the dale "

" But she that welcomes my brack bride
 Maun gang like maiden fair,
 She maun lace on her robe see jump,
 And braid her yellow hair "

" But how can I gang maiden-like
 When maiden I am nane ?
 Have I not borne seven sons to thee,
 And am with child again ? "

She's ta'en her young son in her arms,
 Another in her hand,
 And she's up to the highest tower,
 To see him come to land

" Come up, come up, my eldest son,
 And look o'er yon sea-straid,
 And see your father's new-come bride
 Before she come to land "

She's ta'en her seven sons in her hand
 I wot she didna fail !
 She met Lord Thomas and his bride,
 As they came o'er the dale.

"You're welcome to your house, Lord Thomas;
You're welcome to your land;
You're welcome, with your fair lady,
That you lead by the hand.

"You're welcome to your ha's, lady,
You're welcome to your bowers;
You're welcome to your hame, lady,
For a' that's hore is yours."

"I thank thee, Annie; I thank thee, Annie;
Sae dearly as I thank thee!
You're the likest to my sister Annie,
That over I did see.

"There came a knight out o'er the sea,
And steal'd my sister away,
The shame scoup in his company,
And land where'er he gae!"

She hang ae a napkin at the door,
Another in the ha',
And a' to wipe the trickling tears,
Sae fast as they did fa'

And aye she served the lang tables
With white bread and with wine
And aye she drank the wan water,
To had her colour fine

And aye she served the lang tables
With white bread and with brown;
And aye she turned her round about,
Sae fast the tears fell down

And he's ta'en down the oik napkin,
Hung on a silver pin,
And aye he wipes the tear trickling
Adown her cheek and chum

And aye he turned him round about,
And smiled amang his men,
Says, "Like ye best the old lady,
Or her that's new come hame?"

When bells were rung, and mass was sung,
And a' men bound to bed,
Lord Thomas and his new-come bride
To their chamber they were gae

Annie made her bed a little forthye,
To hear what they might say,
"And ever alas!" fair Annie cried,
"That I should see this day

"Gin my seven sons were seven young rats,
Running on the castle wa',
And I were a grey cat myself,
I soon would worry them a'

"Gin my seven sons were seven young hares,
Running o'er yon lily loe,
And I were a grew-hound myself,
Soon worried they a' should be"

And wae and sad fair Annie sat,
And dreary was her sang,
And ever as she sobbed, and grat,
"Wae to the man that did thee wrang!"

"My gown is on," said the new-come bride,
"My shoes are on my feet,
And I will to fair Annie's chamber,
And see what gars her greet

"What ails ye, what ails ye, fair Annie,
That ye make sic a moan?
Has your wine barrels cast the girds,
Or is your white bread gone?"

"Oh, wha' was't was your father, Annie,
Or wha' was't was your mother?
And had you ony sister, Annie,
Or had you ony brother?"

"The Earl of Wemyss was my father,
The Countess of Wemyss my mother;
And a' the folk about the house,
To me were sister and brother."

"If the Earl of Wemyss was your father,
I wot sae was he mine;
And it shall not be for lack o' gowd,
That ye your love sall tyne.

"For I have seven ships o' mine ain,
A' loaded to the brim,
And I will gie them a' to thee,
Wi' four to thine eldest son,
But thanks to a' the powers in heaven,
That I gae maiden hame!"

BINNORIE

There was twa sisters in a bower,
Binnorie, O Binnorie
There came a knight to be their wooer.
By the bonnie mill-dams o' Binnorie.

He courted the eldest wi' glove an' ring;
But he loved the youngest abune a' thing.
He courted the eldest wi' brooch and knife;
But loved the youngest as his life

The eldest she was vexed sair,
And much envied her sister fair.

Into her bower she couldna rest;
Wi' grief and spite she almost brast.

Upon a morning fair and clear,
She cried upon her sister dear

"O sister, come to yon sea-strand,
And see our father's ships come to land."

She's ta'en her by the milk-white hand,
And led her down to yon sea-strand.

The youngest stood upon a stane,
The eldest came and threw her in.

She took her by the middle sma',
And dash'd her bonniback to the jaw.

"O sister, sister, tak my hand,
And I'll mak you heir to a' my land.

"O sister, sister, tak my middle,
And ye'll get my gowd and my gowden girdle.

"O sister, sister, save my life,
And I swear I'll never be nae man's wife."

"Foul fa' the hand that I should tak,
It's twined me and my world's mak

"Your cherry cheeks an' yellow hair,
Gars me gae maiden for evermair"

Sometimes she sank, sometimes she swam,
Till she came down yon bonnie mill-dam.

Oh, out it came the miller's son,
And saw the fair maid swimmin' in.

"O father, father, draw your dam;
Here's either a mermaid or a swan"

The miller quickly drew the dam,
And there he found a drowned woman.

You couldna see her yellow hair,
For gold and pearl that were so rare.

You couldna see her middle sma',
For gowden girdle that was sae braw.

You couldna see her fingers white,
For gowden rings that was sae gryte.

An' by there came a harper fine,
That harped to the king at dune

When he looked that lady upon,
He sighed and made a heavy moan

He's ta'en three locks o' her yellow hair,
And wi' them strung his harp sae fair

The first tune he did play and sing.
Was "Farewell to my father the king!"

The nextin tune that he played syne
Was "Farewell to my mother the queen!"

The lasten tune that he played then
Binnorie, O Binnorie,
 Was "Wae to my sister, fair Ellen!"
By the bonnie mill-dams o' Binnorie.

WALY, WALY

O waly, waly, up the bank,
 O waly, waly, down the brae,
 And waly, waly, yon burn-side,
 Where I and my love were wont to gae!
 I lea'd my back unto an aik,
 I thocht it was a trustie tree,
 But first it bow'd and syne it brak',
 Sae my true love did lichtlie me.

O waly, waly, but love be bonnie
 A little time while it is new!
 But when it's auld it waxeth cauld,
 And fadeth awa' like the morning dew.
 O wherefore should I hush my heid,
 Or wherefore should I kame my hair?
 For my true love has me forsook,
 And says he'll never lo'e me mair.

Noo Arthur's Seat sail be my bed,
 The sheets sail ne'er be press'd by me;
 Saint Anton's well sail be my drink,
 Since my true love's forsaken me.
 Martinus wind, when wilt thou blaw,
 And shako the green leaves off the tree?
 O gentle death, when wilt thou come?
 For of my life I am wearie

'Tis not the frost that freezes fell,
 Nor blawing snaw's mchincence,
 'Tis not sic cauld that makes me cry;
 But my love's heart grown cauld to me.
 When we cam' in by Glasgow town,
 We were a comely sight to see,
 My love was clad in the black velvet,
 An' I my self in crinane

But had I wist before I lea'd
 That love had been so ill to win,
 I'd lock'd my heart in a case o' goud,
 And pin'd it wi' a siler pin
 Oh, oh! if my young babe were born,
 And set upon the nurse's knee,
 And I mysel' were dead and gane,
 And the green grass growing over me!

POLITICAL BALLADS OR LYRICS

The political lyric was fostered in the middle of the fourteenth century, by the gleemen who took sides with the people, and by the clergy who levelled their satire against abuses in the church and government.

A Song on the Battle of Lewes, 1264, pours scorn on the court party and especially on King Henry's brother, Richard of Cornwall, who was hated by the people as being a foreign king, and also for his corrupt life.

The poem describes how Richard and his men, after the battle, escaped to a mill which they defended as if it had been a castle.

The refrain exults on the downfall of the traitor:

"Richard than thou be ever traitor Treichon shalt thou never more"

("Richard, though thou be ever a traitor, thou shalt treason never more")

Another gleeman, in the reign of Edward I, celebrates the great victory of the Flemish burghers over the French knights at Courtrai (1302).

"Listen, Lordings, both young and old, of the Frenchmen that were so proud and bold, how the Flemish men bought and sold them upon a Wednesday. Better it had been for them at home in their land, than to seek Flemings on the sea-strand, wherefore many a French woman wringeth her hands and singeth, wel-away."¹

Peter de Langtoft in his Chronicle has handed down many songs that were sung by the soldiers and peasants, and which were inspired by the wars with Scotland.

A long ballad tells of the capture and execution of Sir Simon Fraser (1306), whose head was set up on London Bridge near that of Wallace:

"Prot! Scot for thy strife
 Hang up thy hatchet and thy knife,
 While him lasteth the life
 With the long shanks"

The social evils of the time, the corruptions in the church, served as materials for satire:

"Hwon holy ohreche is onder fote"²

This poem bitterly laments the rule of Mammon in the Church:

"Then Simon was here and now is simony, that hath marred a greet part of the clergy. . . Now holy church is in evil hands. All war against her that live in the land; bishops and clerks, knights and knaves, kings and earls have malice towards her. And the Pope himself, who should defend her—if he have his gifts of silver and gold, marks and pounds, with right and wrong, he lets them all do their will, who are so very strong."³

A Song of the Husbandmen voices the grievances of the husbandman, who in spite of bad harvests and dearth must pay heavy taxes and enable the king, Edward I, to carry on his wars. He lives in constant anxiety from the extortions of foresters, rangers, and bailiffs, who hunt him as the hound does the hare. He is forced to sell his grain while it is as green as grass. He is compelled to lose all he has saved during the year.

An illustration of the proverbial, aphoristic style is afforded by A Poem on the King's breaking his confirmation of Magna Charta (1311).

In this poem occurs the statements of the four sagos:

- (1) "For might is right, the land is lawless, for night is light, the land is loreless, for fight is flight the land is nameless"
- (2) "For one is two, the land is strengthless, for weal is woe, the land is ruthless, for friend is foe, the land is loveless."
- (3) "For lust hath leave, the land is thewless, for thief is reavo, the land is penniless, for pride hath sleovo, the land is shenceless"
- (4) "For will is rede (counsel), the land is wreakful, for wit is quel (wicked), the land is wrongful, for good is dead, the land is sinful"

Still another satire, dealing in a more detailed fashion with the sufferings of the people, appeared about this time (1316-17).

War, murder, famine and pestilence—they are the punishments inflicted by God for the wickedness of the nation. Truth and righteousness have fled from the land. Deceit and treachery are rife. Truth fears to enter the palace of the pope, for the clerks have plotted his destruction. Nothing can be accomplished without gold, with it the most evil man can attain his ends. "Covetousness and Simony rule the whole world." From Archbishop to curate the clergy are open to bribery, and many of them lead evil lives¹

"The monks suffer heavily for the love of God, they wear socks in their shoes and felt boots over them; they are well nourished with flesh and fish, and when the roast is good they leave little in the dish, so kill they their bodies to keep Christ's commandment" The mendicant friars, the Knights Templars, counts, barons, doctors, sheriffs, judges, bakers, brewers, merchants, all come beneath the lash of this satirist, whose heart was hot within him as he mused on the evils of his day and generation

Political ballad poetry reaches its highest point during the early part of the reign of Edward III, in the patriotic songs of Laurence Minot

Minot was a Northumbrian gleeman, who aspired to the rank of minstrel, that is, he desired the patronage of a great nobleman. He wrote in all ten poems, between 1333 and 1352, commemorating

King Edward's wars. He afterwards collected and arranged them in chronological order

Minot's songs are full of ardent patriotism for England and of hatred of her enemies. Like his predecessors among the gleemen, he pours contempt upon the French and the Scots. He prays for the welfare of his king and country and exults in their victories. The victory of Halidon Hill, the sea fight on Sluys, the siege of Tournay, the Battle of Crécy, Neville's Cross, the capture of the Castle of Guines, 1352, are celebrated in songs which combined in an original fashion the art of the gleeman with that of the clerical lyric

Minot uses end rhyme and alliteration, although he does not conform quite strictly to the Old English rules in his use of alliteration

"Bot son the time that God was born,
Ne a hundredth yere biorn,
War never men better in fight
Than Inglish men while that had myght.

And God assayl thaim of thaire sin,

THE AGE OF CHAUCER

THE Age of Chaucer was essentially an age of unrest and transition. We usually regard the discoveries of Columbus as marking the beginning of the modern era in history. It must be remembered, however, that these geographical achievements are only the culmination of a movement which had started more than a hundred years earlier. Broadly speaking, the process of transition dates back to the second half of the fourteenth century; then for the first time it is evident that men are becoming dissatisfied with mediæval ideas and practices. But before entering into any details, it may be well to take a brief glance at the England of The Canterbury Tales.

In the religious world there was a serious outburst of unorthodoxy. Wyclif and his followers were making an organised attack upon the Church. In town and country alike, doctrines were being preached which a future age was to familiarise under the name of Protestantism. Nor was the Church the only mediæval institution attacked. The working classes were stirring and had begun to display a spirit of independence hitherto unknown. A period of economic discontent is followed by an open revolt—a revolt which marks the downfall of the manorial system. But there were constructive as well as destructive forces at work. Political and military events were contributing to the growth of a National consciousness, the former in a negative manner by minimising the extent of Papal influence in this country, the latter, more positively, by stimulating the pride of the English people. Yet one must not exaggerate the change taking place in the life and thought of the Age, noticeable though it is. In some respects Chaucer's England is still characteristically mediæval, and nowhere is the conservative feeling more strongly marked than in the persistence of chivalry. This strange amalgam of love, war, and religion so far from exhibiting any signs of decay, reached perhaps its fullest development at this time. More than two centuries were to elapse before it was finally killed by the satirical pen of Cervantes.

Nevertheless, even when all reservations are made, the most insistent feature of the period is an impatient, progressive spirit, alien to the mediæval mind. Let us now retrace our steps to fill in the picture thus rapidly sketched.

Among the great contemporaries of Chaucer, few deserve more attention than John Wyclif, for he was one of the first Englishmen to challenge the authority of the Catholic Church, and in so doing he anticipated Martin Luther by nearly one hundred and fifty years. Like his famous successor, he came to the conclusion that clerical pretensions had raised a barrier between man and God, and both by pen and in pulpit he endeavoured to break it down. Free access to the Bible was what the spiritual life required.

This view of religion admirably illustrates the critical attitude which was slowly coming into existence. The Lollard movement was the first opposition of importance to Catholicism in England. Ever since the memorable council of Whitby, seven centuries distant, Roman Christianity had received the obedience which its tenets demanded.

Heresy there may have been, but it was confined for the most part to individuals. Not that the Middle Ages marked a time of intellectual stagnation, far from it. The schoolmen possessed great subtlety of mind; they delighted in debating problems such as: "How many Angels can stand on the point of a needle?" or "What happens when a mouse eats the consecrated Host?" These questions may not appeal very strongly to us, but the fact that they were seriously discussed argues a remarkable appetite for mental gymnastics. But this alertness of intellect was always at the service of the Church; it was engaged in explaining and justifying the orthodox faith. Scholasticism, for example, never thought of disputing the doctrine of Transubstantiation, it was quite content to produce philosophical reasons for believing in its truth. With William Occam, however, the long succession of famous schoolmen came to an end. "The Invincible Doctor" died whilst Chaucer was still a child. The next great theologian, as we have seen, repudiated the whole system which his predecessors had so ingeniously sought to make secure.

The prestige of the Church was, in truth, beginning to decline. Politically, intellectually, and spiritually its influence had diminished. Until the reign of John it was the clergy more than any other class who ensured good government. For they had held the balance between the despotic inclinations of the King on the one hand and the anarchical tendencies of the nobility on the other. But for reasons which we need not here discuss, this patriotic policy had been hindered during the thirteenth century. Then came the birth of Parliament, and the people began to fight their own political battles.

Culture was spreading beyond the Church. Hitherto she had practically monopolised the intellectual life of the nation. Philosophy was in the hands of the schoolmen, and they were drawn mainly from the Dominican and Franciscan Orders. For scientific knowledge the Middle Ages were never conspicuous, but what little existed was possessed by the Church. The one great English scientist of the period—the famous Roger Bacon—was a friar; though it is true that many of his contemporaries held him "to be in league with the Devil." The monks, too, had been the nation's chroniclers from the time of Bede onwards. But their accounts were always marred by a lack of proper perspective. It is, therefore, not surprising to find that this literary activity was at any rate now being shared by the layman. Froissart was writing his memorable work. And, of course, Chaucer himself has left us a document which is historical in all except the technical sense of the word.

But these points are, after all, only of subsidiary importance. The Church was first and foremost a spiritual body, and it was not so much the decrease in her political and intellectual utility which angered Wyclif, as the failure in extending her own peculiar functions. To this degeneration many causes contributed, and any discussion of them would lead us too far afield. But one factor must at least be mentioned. The clergy had been too successful. Material prosperity long continued had made them both arrogant and lax. For we must remember that in mediæval times they experienced no difficulty in amassing wealth. Gifts to the Church obtained Masses for the souls of the dead, procured the remission of penances, soothed the uneasy conscience and secured her good-will. Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, stands as a type very prevalent in Wyclif's day. He was one of those ecclesiastical politicians who owed their position less to spiritual than worldly qualifications. He recommended himself to Edward III by his diplomatic ability, and his reward was a series of promotions which culminated in the office by which he is remembered. Nevertheless, though the Age of her Glory had passed, the Catholic Church was still a power in the land, and Wyclif had been in his grave a century and a half before her pre-eminence came to an end.

The fourteenth century opened brightly for Industrial England. There had been no repetition of the anarchy of Stephen's reign when so barren was the land that—to use the words of a contemporary writer—"you might as well have tilled the sea." The material prosperity of the working classes had steadily increased. Both with regard to food and clothing the English labourer was better off than his fellows on the Continent. He had, moreover, another and important reason for self-congratulation which requires a word or so of explanation. For one cannot follow the trend of economic events during this period without referring, however briefly, to the curious mediæval system of land tenure.

Under this system the rent which a man paid for his land was decidedly complex in character. This is especially true of the payments which the peasantry made. On occasions it must have necessitated the tenant possessing a painful sense of mathematical accuracy when "a hen and a half" was taken as a partial settlement of his obligations. Most of the rent, however, was discharged, not in kind, but in personal services. In return for a holding the villein was obliged to work for a certain number of days in the year on the land which his lord had not chosen to sublet. The duties were multifarious and need not be detailed. The main point here is the fact that for a long time past they had been gradually converted into money payments. This change made for greater liberty, for the old methods had compelled a man to remain on the manor to which he belonged. But now he was frequently allowed to take his labour where he could find a market for it. Such was the encouraging state of affairs in 1348. Then in the August of that year came the Black Death.

This terrible pestilence, with which the medical science of the time was powerless to cope, carried off no less than one third of the population, even when full allowance is made for the mediæval powers of exaggeration. A vivid account has been left us by Henry Knighton, a canon of Leicester. "In Bristol," he says, "almost the whole strength of the town died." Sometimes death ensued in the course of a few hours.

One result of this prodigious mortality was a sudden scarcity of labour and a corresponding demand for higher wages. Nor were the men alone in taking advantage of the changed conditions. Women, who had hitherto been contented with a penny for the daily work, now regarded double the amount as their rightful due. Some of the new requirements, such as the desire to have "fresh flesh or fish fried or baked," may not sound hopelessly audacious to modern ears, but Edward III. and his Parliament, took a very different view. A series of Statutes were enacted, increasing in severity, until at last imprisonment was the penalty for those who refused to conform to the old standards of payment. Many of the labourers thought to indulge in "passive resistance" by simply deserting their masters, but when captured they suffered for their temerity with a heavy fine.

Not only were the emancipated villeins prohibited from asking for a rise in wages, but their newly gained freedom was also threatened. The landowners endeavoured to compel them to resume the personal services from which they had been exempted. Consequently, those who still remained unfree saw little chance of ever gaining their liberty, if it was to depend on the will of their lords. To a people smarting under the sense of injustice came the Kentish priest, John Ball, preaching the doctrine of social equality. Referring to the nobility, he asked, "Whereby can they say or show that they be greater Lords than we?" The spirit, if not the letter of the answer, is contained in the witty remark of Beaumarchais' Figaro, they have "taken the trouble to be born, nothing more."

How the peasantry were stirred by this gospel to march on London with the purpose of redressing their grievances, how Richard promised reform, and how he broke his promise, are events related in every history book.

To a superficial observer, the Peasants' Rising may seem to have failed in its object, but we know, of course, that this was not the case. The revolt had, for the first time, given significant suggestion of the strength which the working people in this country possessed when they took concerted action. It is a dim foreshadowing of those industrial troubles that lay in the distant future. So far as villonage was concerned no further appeal to force was necessary, for the governing classes profited by the hint which had been given them; and whilst loudly proclaiming a policy of "no surrender," in point of fact surrendered. During the succeeding century, the system by which the labourer was tied to the soil rapidly ceased to be of importance in the economic life of England.

A final illustration of the progressive spirit animating society at this time may be found in the growth of national sentiment. What were the conditions which favoured this development? It will perhaps be remembered that in dealing with the psychology of the Teutonic people, a prominent trait was found to be their power of adaptation. Since this pliability enabled them to readily absorb the characteristics of races wholly alien to themselves, it is not surprising that this fusion was still more rapid when different branches of the parent stock encountered one another as they did at Senlao. As we have seen, the men who invaded our shores in 1066 were foreigners not by blood but through environment. Barely a hundred and fifty years had elapsed since their ancestors left a Scandinavian home. Long, therefore, before Chaucer was born, the men of England could say with some truth, "Saxon, Norman, and Dane are we." One must not, however, be misled by a phrase. Unity there was both of customs and temperament, and of language also in some degree. But a national life requires more than this, it requires consciousness of unity. To produce this state no forces are more potent than a native literature and a foreign war, for each of them in differing ways intensifies a nation's individuality. Of these two factors the former, in the fourteenth century, was only just coming into existence, but the latter had already begun to exert its stimulating influence.

The Accession of Edward III marked the beginning of that struggle with France always known as "The Hundred Years' War"—a title which explains itself. To narrate the causes which occasioned this mighty conflict would be unnecessary, for we are only concerned with historical events in so far as they have some direct bearing on the literature of the period. What does call for notice is the brilliant start which England made.

In the very year in which Chaucer was born occurred the great sea fight off Sluys. This battle has a twofold interest. It is the first of an almost unbroken series of victories which lasted nearly twenty years and included the familiar names of Crécy and Poitiers, further, it is one of the earliest of those naval successes which in the years to come Blake and Nelson were to make so typically English. But in the importance of its results, Sluys cannot, of course, compare with Crécy—the battle which Froissart has described in such vivid and picturesque language.

From the standpoint of national development, the fight is memorable not merely for stimulating the pride of Englishmen—thus effect it shared in common with all the great victories of the war such as Poitiers and Agincourt—but because of the manner in which it was won. The Archers were chiefly responsible for our gaining the day: "They let fly their arrows," says the French Chronicler, "so wholly together and so thick that it seemed snow." Hitherto our successes on the battle-field had been achieved by the aristocracy, by the lance of the knight; now the humble bowmen played the most prominent part, and in so doing broke down the barrier of military inequality between the upper and middle classes.

But these events on the Continent were not alone in making for the growth of national consciousness. At home, legislation was working towards the same end. In a manner at once successful and unmistakable, it was displaying a long-felt resentment at the Papal interference in the temporal affairs of this country. To thoroughly appreciate the significance of this policy one must remember that throughout the Middle Ages the Pope was for ever aspiring to be not only "World Priest" but "World King." The earthly jurisdiction of princes, he argued, comes from the supreme spiritual authority just as the Moon derives its light from the Sun. Naturally enough this pretension was a great hindrance to the national life of England. A strong king invariably refused to play the inferior rôle so thoughtfully assigned him, with the result that the clergy in particular were placed in an anomalous position; they could not be patriotic without being in some measure disloyal to the Head of their Church. And when the weakness of John induced him to hold his kingdom as a fief from the Pope and pay an annual tribute of one thousand marks, the element of disunion was still greater. For this act of submission gave Rome a right of political interference more plausible than any she had hitherto possessed. But time was on the side of England.

In the fourteenth century the Papacy met with a series of misfortunes, of which the English kings were not slow to avail themselves. The temporal overlordship of the Pope was definitely repudiated. Nor was this all. He lost also the important advantage of being able to fill the bishoprics with his own nominees. By these and other measures the Parliaments of Edward III and his successors began that process of separation from Rome which the work of Henry VIII completed.

Such then, briefly, are the main political and social tendencies of the time in which Chaucer and Langland lived and wrote—a transitional age, with the old feudalism slowly losing its pristine vigour and utility, with a great Church rich in its traditions of intellectual and moral guidance, exhibiting signs of decadence and onfebloment; yet with no clear ideals as yet, or only dimly limned ideals, as to what form of social reconstruction was to take their place. But the weaknesses are clearly enough perceived, and no one has assayed them more bitterly than the conservative minded Langland. The moral aspects of the time touch Chaucer more lightly. It is sufficient for him to see what rich material for his moralising power lay in the newly awakened democracy. Both the Knight and the Yeoman are numbered among his Canterbury Pilgrims. So he paints for us, with the joyful impartiality of the literary artist, every class in the community; less concerned than Langland in reprimanding us, but as quick as he to detect the frailties and imperfections of human nature irrespective of class.

Chaucer's world is mediæval; but beneath the mediævalism the leaven of the Renaissance is already at work.

CHAUCEER

Chaucer symbolises, as no other writer does, the Middle Ages. He stands in much the same relation to the life of his time as Pope does to the earlier phases of the eighteenth century, and Tennyson to the Victorian era; and his place in English literature is even more important than theirs, for he is the first great English writer—the first man to use "naked words" in English; the first to make our composite language a thing compact and vital.

Frank, virile, and tolerant, he is amused rather than angry with the little kinks in human nature; and in his intellectual vision he has a wider sweep than most of our writers. The poet most akin to him in his general outlook is Robert Browning. Certainly he would have endorsed that poet's line:

"And the need of a world of men for me."

Neither Browning nor Chaucer were insular poets; nor despite certain qualities which we look upon as distinctively English—bluffness, geniality, and restless vitality—was he wholly English in mould. His religious temper had nothing of the Saxon's narrow intensity, and his imaginative sympathies were clearly cosmopolitan. The name itself, it has been shown,¹ stands for chaufe aie (i.e. a "chafe wax"), and suggests a foreign lineage. It is probable that his grandfather was one Robert le Chaucer, collector of wine dues in the Port of London. On his death the widow remarried Richard le Chaucer. His stepson John was a vintner like his stepfather, acting also as King's Butler to Edward III, whenever that monarch crossed the water. John Chaucer married Agnes, niece of Hugo de Compton; and it is probable that Geoffrey Chaucer was their son. The exact date of his birth is uncertain, but most scholars fix it for 1340. Geoffrey's early life was spent in London during his most plastic years, and the impressions of the city and its teeming life were likely to make an ineffaceable impress upon his imagination. In 1357 Chaucer was appointed to the household of Elizabeth, Countess of Ulster, and wife of Lionel, third son of Edward III, and from items of her expenditure that have survived, we gather that she provided the youth with red and black breeches, and shoes. Two years later he was captured by the French, while on a military expedition to France, and the King paid a ransom equivalent to £240 of our present money for his release. He became subsequently a personal attendant of the King's—a "boleved valet," as he was called, or as we should say to-day, a gentleman in waiting. From this position he ascended to that of esquire, where he was concerned with helping to entertain the Court and any strangers that might come along. In this way his social qualities were sharpened, a characteristic that left ample impression on his later poetry.

From 1370 to 1378 he went on diplomatic missions abroad—during the later part of the time to Italy. These journeys, especially the Italian ones, affected in marked fashion his literary work. During this period he obtained from the Corporation of London a life lease of the Gatehouse at Aldgate, where he lived for a number of years. Later he became Comptroller of Customs in the Port of London.

We pass now to the last period of Chaucer's life. His fortunes at this time declined. He lost Court favour in 1386 and became relatively poor. For the next few years he was however more free to turn to literary work. A slight improvement in his position occurred in 1389 when he was made Clerk of the Works; looking after the repairs and alterations at the Palace of Westminster, the Tower, and St. George's Chapel, Windsor. In 1391, however, he was superseded in these activities, and lived on pensions for the remaining years of his life. A literary hunt sent to Henry IV, entitled Compliment to his Purse, had facilitated matters in this direction. His great work The Canterbury Tales was written almost entirely during the later years of this period, when he made splendid use of his knowledge of men and affairs. He died in 1400 and was buried in St. Benet's Chapel in Westminster Abbey. During the last few months of his life he had taken a house in the garden of St. Mary's, Westminster. In 1868, a stained glass window, symbolising his life and work, was erected by Dean Stanley, over against his grave.

THE WORK OF CHAUCER

The writings of Chaucer may be divided for purposes of convenience into three periods: the French, the Italian, and the English; though it should always be remembered that he was nurtured on French literature, and remained to a large extent French in his literary methods to the very end. Unlike Langland, he showed no liking for English alliterative verse; and despite his admiration for Italian poetry, he refrained (with one trifling exception) from following their metrical patterns. None the less, there were these three distinct influences in his literary life, which left well-defined marks upon his work;

(1) The French Period

While an esquire to Edward III, he first began to write, and a prayer to the Virgin, A. B. C., is declared by many to be his first extant poem. He read the famous Roman de la Rose, and was profoundly impressed by it. Of this voluminous poem he made a translation, probably at a later date.

Before 1369 he had struck out a line of graceful and tender sentiment in the Compleynt to Pite: which was followed by the Book of the Duchesse in 1369—the Duchesse being the wife of Chaucer's patron, John of Gaunt.

(2) The Italian Period (c. 1372-1384)

This covered the time of his mission abroad. Two of these missions were to Italy, to Genoa, Pisa, Florence, and Lombardy. It was the Italy of the Early Renaissance—the Italy of Petrarch, of Boccaccio, of Giotto. And just as French chivalry had inspired his earlier work, so did the glory of Italian literature colour his writings of this period. He read Petrarch, possibly met and talked with him also, and studied the stories of Boccaccio. On returning to England, he wrote Troilus and Cressyde, 1380-3, founded on the Filosofo of Boccaccio. It was Boccaccio, chastened by English reticence and religious feeling. He wrote also The Story of Griselda (The Clerk's Tale). The story of the patient Griselda had fascinated Petrarch, and became immeasurably popular. Indeed it had been seized upon by the ballad writers, in the same way as Guy of Warwick; and the unhappy fortunes of this peasant girl excited the widest interest. Like King Cophetua, Walter, Marquis de Lelune weds a peasant girl whom he had met while on a hunting expedition. The marriage turns out unhappy, the Marquis treats her with brutality; and ultimately, shorn of her rich clothes, she is sent back to her father. The Marquis proceeds to enter into another alliance, and with calculated cruelty, requires Griselda to help him in making the wedding preparations. Griselda, with native goodness and freedom from jealousy, had praised the bride, but pleads she should be well treated. Walter then admits it is a trick to try her; that this girl is no other than Griselda's own daughter, who had been brought up by an uncle. Griselda is overjoyed, she is taken back as Walter's wife, and they live happily ever after—according to the tale, despite the psychological improbability of such a termination.

Griselda is somewhat of an abstraction—womanly patience personified; and if she does not prove a shade "too good for human nature's daily food," it is because of the beautiful little touches of tenderness and sweetness with which Chaucer embellishes her portrait. This story of Griselda is The Clerk's Tale. He wrote also at this time, The Story of Constance, The Man of Law's Tale (from an Anglo-Norman Chronicle of 1334); The Compleynt of Mars (founded on classical legends); The Compleynt to his Lady, the exuberant Parliament of Fowls; To Rosamond; Lines to Adam Scrivener; The House of Fame (inspired by Dante), and The Legend of Good Women, influenced also by Dante, or derived from Boccaccio.

The Legend of Good Women deals with the poet as wishing to make reparation for past errors. He regrets having translated the Romance of the Rose: he upbraids himself for the stigma he has cast on women in his picture of Cressida. So here he vows he will treat of true and good women.

His choice of good women is not free from critical exception, as he elects to lead off with Cleopatra, who despite her charms and brilliance can scarcely pose as "a model of all the virtues!" Yet perhaps he realises this. Anyhow, he adds this whimsical comment:

"Now, ere I find a man so true and stable,
And will for love his Death so freely take,
I pray God let our heades never ache."

(3) The English Period (1384-1390)

Largely as his work has been affected by Italian subjects, he had never, save with one trifling exception, attempted to copy Italian verse. Boccaccio's octave stanzas did not attract him; he had a stanza ready to hand, which he deemed fully as good.

Some of The Canterbury Tales had been written during the earlier period, but those most characteristically English were written at this time—those of the Miller, the Reeve, the Cook, the Wife of Bath, the Merchant, the Friar, the Nun Priest, and the Pardoner. The Prologue is supposed to have been written in 1388.

Chaucer's Position in English Literature

The first thing to strike the reader is the number of translations and adaptations made by Chaucer, and from these we may infer that he had little gift of original creative imagination. On this point, Emerson's words may serve as the best comment :

"A great poet, who appears in illiterate times, absorbs into his sphere all the light which is anywhere radiating. Every intellectual jewel, every flower of sentiment, it is his fine office to bring to his people, and he comes to value his memory equally with his invention. He is therefore little solicitous whence his thoughts have been derived, whether through translation, whether through tradition, whether by travel in distant countries, whether by inspiration, from whatever sources, they are equally welcome to his uncritical audience . . . But Chaucer is a huge borrower . . . He steals by this apology—that what he takes has no worth where he finds it, and the greatest where he leaves it. It has come to be practically a sort of rule in literature, that a man, having once shown himself capable of original writing, is entitled therefore to steal from the writings of others at discretion. Thought is the property of him who can entertain it, and of him who can adequately place it. A certain awkwardness marks the use of borrowed thoughts; but, as soon as we have learned what to do with them, they become our own."

This is sound criticism. The supreme question after all is, not where does the tap-root of genius draw its nourishment, but what is the culminating expression of that nourishment? what blossom is forthcoming? Genius has an alchemy of its own that can transmute the baser metals, it may steal on occasion, into pure gold. Such was the way of that other splendid borrower, Shakespeare; and Chaucer is less unblushing in his literary thefts than he.

The Canterbury Tales place us in the heart of London.

It is not many years ago since the old Tabard Inn at Southwark could still be visited, and the visitor taste of that London Ale of which Chaucer speaks, and see in imagination the little band of pilgrims.

Beer was found in other places than inns in the fourteenth century. At the cross-roads of frequented highways houses were erected where beer was to be had. And the Pilgrim in the Tale dismounts at a house of this kind, where the Pardoner before starting on his story deemed it desirable

" . . . at this Ale-stake
Both drynke and byten cake "

It is to be hoped that the Pilgrims did not light upon a house such as a fourteenth-century writer describes: "The servant of a traveller, sent forward to engage the rooms, utters the warm wish that there are no fleas, nor bugs, nor other vermin. 'No, sir, please God,' replies the host, 'for I make bold that you shall be comfortably lodged here, save that there is a good peck of rats and mice!'"

The French of "Stratforde-atte-Bowe" spoken by the Prioress implied possibly no reflection on the worthy lady:

"And French she spake ful fair and fetisly
After the scole of Stratforde-atte-Bowe,
For French of Parys was to her unknowe."

The Prioress spoke "the usual Anglo-Saxon French of the English Law Courts, and of English ecclesiastics of the higher rank." Chaucer had been to France and knew the difference between the two dialects, but he had no special reason for thinking more highly of the Parisian than of the Anglo-Saxon French. This Anglo-Saxon French was taught by the nuns at the Nunnery of St. Leonard, Bow—an ancient Benedictine foundation.¹ It seems however, that Anglo-Saxon French was giving way even at the Court to the fashionable Parisian French.

We can guess from the food consumed at the Tabard hostelry how the middle classes fared; was not the cook accomplished in these matters?

"To boile the cheiken and the marrow bones,
And poudre marchant tart and galingale;
He could roast and sethe and boile and fry,
Maken mortrewes and well bake a pie."

"Poudre marchant tart" seems to have been a kind of mediæval curry powder; "galingale," the root of the sweet cypress, was aromatic and pungent; "mortrewes" were soups which contained a variety of ingredients—fresh pork, chicken, eggs, saffron, or sometimes fish, bread, pepper, and ale. These ingredients were bruised first in a mortar—hence their name. The Londoner approved evidently of strong seasoning.

While on the subject of dinners, it is interesting to note that the "goliardey" referred to by Chaucer in describing the Miller was a professional dinner-out who, in return for his dinner, was supposed to amuse the company by his jests and anecdotes.

There is a disquisition on table manners in the Prologue. Each guest brought his own knife, but for common use there were no forks. At the beginning and end of dinner every one washed his hands—an obviously desirable proceeding. On to the rush-strewn floor the guests flung the bones and scraps of meat. The difficulties presented by gravy were met by the meat—which was served by a carver at a side table—being laid upon thick slices of bread which absorbed the gravy. Every guest had a napkin, and the proper use of the napkin was an elaborate ritual in itself.

This picture of the average merchant has a familiar ring about it:

"A Marchant was ther with a forked bord,
In motteleye, and hye on horse he sat;
Upon his heed a Flaundrysch bevere hat;
His bootes clasped fair and fetisly,²
His resons he spak ful solompnely,
Sownynge³ alway thenecres⁴ of his wyunnyng.

This worthy man ful wel his wit bisette⁵
Ther wiste no wight that he was in dette."

The beaver hat still survives in the "topper," and the business instincts of the gentleman express themselves with no radical difference to-day.

Chaucer accepts the current class divisions between "gentles" and "churls." Neither he nor Langland ignore distinctions of rank; and although rich and poor, cultured and rude jostle one another in the procession, yet he is well aware that some of the Tales might displease the "gentles" among his readers as they offended the "gentles" in the poem. Yet he adds with the tolerance of the artist :

" . . . I must rehearse
Their tales all, be they better or worse,
Or elles falsen some of my matter."

In Chaucer's Doctor of Physic, we have an excellent picture of the mediæval medicine man, with his herbal remedies and his knowledge of astronomy—or what we should call astrology. In common with the physicians of the day, he was a priest, but Chaucer indicates that his medical studies had drawn him away from his profession: "His studie was but litel on the Bibel." Chaucer gives a sly dig at him for his fee-loving propensities :

"For gold in physick is a cordial,
Therefore he lov'ede gold in special."

The supposed medicinal value of the metal, so common not only in the Middle Ages but a century or so later, is here touched upon.

Such was the London in which Chaucer was brought up

The Form of the Canterbury Tales

Of this work about 17,000 lines are in verse ; with two stories—the tale of Melibeus and the Parson's Tale—in prose. The verse consists of rhymed couplets. It forms a compromise between the old and new prosody. He does not care for alliteration or doggerel rhyme, and chooses the form of "heroic" verse, with rhymed couplets and five accented syllables.

The tales themselves are of astonishing variety. Some are drawn from the romances of chivalry—e.g. The Knight's Tale. Others deal with moralising scriptural stories—e.g. The Monk's Tale. Some are fine adaptations of romantic stories of ancient France. There are, between the stories, prologues, where Chaucer's gift of sharp and vivid characterisation is best seen—e.g. The Discourse of the Wife of Bath.

The wealth and variety of the Tales, give us as in a camera obscura, not merely a faithful picture of differing sides of mediæval life in England, but a vitalised epitome of all that is interesting in mediæval literature.

In the Knight's Tale, we have much more than a typical romance ; we have a presentment with rare artistic skill of all the finer elements in mediæval romance, avoiding, as the author of Gawayne does, many of the vain repetitions and dull meanderings found in so many of them, and the whole clarified and sharpened by that sure sense of character, of which Chaucer alone of his Age possessed the secret.

We have in Sir Thopas the baser and more foolish kind of romances, burlesqued ; the coarse, the pungent humour of the Fabliau ; and the wrangle with the Summoner jostles with tales of pathos, such as the Clerk's.

The Characterisation.—When the prevailing tendency of the age to deal in allegory and abstractions is taken into consideration, it is astounding how alive these Chaucerian types are.

For he had in the course of his life come into contact with them all. The Knight, the Squire, the Merchant, the Sailor, Scholar, Doctor, Monk, Labourers, Saints, and Knaves—he knew them intimately and drew them from personal observation. He knew the Court folk, he knew the People, and he draws them for us with all their little tricks and mannerisms and external peculiarities. We recognise one by the raucous tone of the voice, another by his rubicund face, another for her sensitiveness—she was so "pitous" she wept to see a mouse caught. We see the parchment face of the Knave, the jolly countenance of mine host, he became acquainted, in a word, with the mediæval Englishman as he moved and lived, depicted with a breadth of vision and a rich tolerant humour unsurpassed in our literature. The poignant note that we find in Langland is absent, for Chaucer takes rather the comedy view of life, but this must not be held to imply any lack of sympathy with the poor and suffering. There is a large-hearted charity in his treatment of the labouring class, as his picture of the Ploughman will testify.

There is an open-air atmosphere about it all. His people are always on the move. Never do they become shadowy or lifeless. They shout and swear, and laugh and weep, interrupt the story-teller, pass compliments, and in general behave themselves as we might expect them to in the dramatic circumstances of the narrative. It is never possible to confuse the story-teller ; each is distinct and inimitable, whether it be the sermonising Pardoner, the hot-tempered Miller, or the exuberantly vivacious Wife of Bath, who has had five husbands, but experience teaching her that husbands are transient blessings, she has fixed her mind on a sixth !

There are tragedies as well as comedies in the Tales ; some are grave and subdued, others ablaze with colour and merriment ; but the thread of honest and kindly laughter runs through them all, serious and gay alike.

There is nothing of the dreamer about Chaucer—nothing of the stern moralist and social reformer. Like Shakespeare, he makes it his business, in The Canterbury Tales, to paint life as he sees it, and leaves others to draw the moral.

Langland's mordant pictures of contemporary life gave an actuality to poetical literature which removed it far from the old heroic stories with which the name of poet hitherto had been connected. Chaucer realised what those who followed him for many years to come were too blind to see : that the genius of the English people did not lie in high-flown tales of sentiment, but in homely stories of everyday life, illumined by shrewd observation, tolerant humour, and occasional moralising. Indeed, for all his considerable powers of pathos, his happy fancy, his lucid imagination, it is as a great humorist that he lingers longest in our memories, with a humour, rich, profound and sane, devoid of spite and cynicism, irradiated by a genial kindness, and a consummate knowledge of human life.

THE KNIGHT'S TALE

(Palamon and Arcite first see Emelye from the Prison Window)

This passeth yeer by yeer, and day by day,
Til it fel coones, in a morwe of May,
That Emelle, that fairer was to seene
Than is the lile on lur stalkē grene,
And frescher than the May with floures newe—
For with the rosē colour strof hire hewe,
I not which was the fayrere of them two—
Er it wore day, as was hire wone to do,
Sche was arisen, and al redy dight;
For May wol han no sloggardyē aught,
The sesoun priketh every gentil herte,
And maketh him out of his sleep to starte,
And seith, "Arys, and do thyn observaunce."
This makede Emolve han remembrance
To don honour to May, and for to ryse,
I-clothed was sche fresho for to devyse.
Hir yelwe here was browded in a tresse,
Byhynde lur bak, a yerde long, I gesse
And in the gardyn at the sonne upriste
Scho walketh up and down, and as hir liste
Sche gadereh floures, party whyte and roede,
To make a sotil gerland for hire heede,
And as an aungel heavenlyche scho song,
The grete tour, that was so thikke and strong,
Which of the castel was the cheef dongoon,
(Ther as the knightes were in prisoun,
Of which I tolde yow, and tellen schal)
Was even jovnant to the gardyn-wal,
Ther as this Emolve hadde hire ployngye,
Bright was the sonne, and cleer that morwenyng,
And Palamon, this woful prisoner,
As was his wone, by leve of his gayler,
Was risen, and romode in a chambere on heigh,
In which he al the noble cité seigh,
And eek the gardyn, ful of braunches grene,
Ther as this freshe Emelye the echeene
Was in lur walk, and rounde up and down.
This sorweful prisoner, this Palamon,
Gooth in the chamber, romyng to and fro,
And to himself compleynyng of his woo;
That he was born, ful ofte he seyde, alas!
And so bytel, by aventure, or cas,¹
That thurgh a wyndow thikke, of many a barre
Of iron greet, and squar as eny sparro,²
He caste his even upon Emelye.
And thowthil he bleynte³ and cryede, a!
As though he stongon were unto this herte
And with that crye Arcite anon up-sterde,
And seyde, "Cosyn myn, what eyelth the,
That art so pale, and doedly on to see?
Why crydestow? Who hath the doon offence?
For Goddes love, tak al in patience
Our prisoun, for it may non other be,
Fortune hath yeven us this adversite
Som wikke aspect or disposition
Of Saturne, by som constellacioun,
Hath yeven us this, although we hadde it sworn;
So stode the heven when that we were born,
We note endure it this is the schort and pleyne.
This Palamon answerde, and seyde ageyn,
"Cosyn, for sooth of this opynyoun
Thou hast a veyn ymaginacioun,
This prisoun caused me not for to crye
But I was hurt right now thorought myn eye
Into myn herte, that wol my bane be
The fairnesse of that lady that I see
Yond in the gardyn romé to and fro,
Is cause of al my crying and my wo
I not whether sche ho womman or goddesse;
But Venus is it, sothly as I gesse"
And thowthil on kneec adoun he fil,
And seyde, "Venus, if it be thy wil
Yow in this gardyn thus to transfigure,
Biform me serweful wrecche creature,

Out of this prisoun help that we may;
And if so be my destiné be schape
By sterne word to deyen in prisoun,
Of our lynage have sum compassioun,
That is so lowe y-brought by tyrannye."
And with that word Arcite gan espye
Wher as this lady romede to and fro,
And with that sighte hir beaute hurte him so,
That if that Palamon was wounded sore,
Arcite is hurt as moche as he, or more.
And with a sigh he seyde pitouly;
"The freshe beaute sleeth me sodeynly
Of hir that rometh in the yonder place;
And but I have hir mercy and hir grace,
That I may seen hir attē lastē weye,
I nam but deed; ther nys no mo. . . to seye."

THE NUN'S PRIEST'S TALE

. . . A cook, named Chanticleer;
Of crowing had he in the land no peer.
His voice was merrier than the organ's tone
In church on solemn mass-days loudly blown.
His crowing more exactly told the hour
Than did the great clock in the Abbey-tower.
By nature each ascending point he view'd
Of th' equinoctial in that latitude;
For when degrees full fifteen had ascended,
Then crew he, that it could not be amended.
His crested comb was coral-red and tall,
Embattled as it were a castle-wall;
His bill was black, like shining jet to view,
His legs and eke his toes were azure-blue.
His talons whiter than the lily showed,
And like new-burnished gold his colour glowed.
This gentle cook had in his government
Hens seven, which were kept for his content,
That were his sisters and his lovers too,
And wondrous like to him in splendid hue.
Of which the brightest-coloured in the throat
Was rightly named "fair damsel Part-e-lole."
Courteous she was, discreet, and debonaire,
Companionable, and bare herself so fair
E'en since the day that she was seven nights old,
That certainly she hld the heart in hold
Of Chanticleer, fast-locked in every limb;
He loved her so, that well therewith was him.
But such a joy it was to hear him sing,
When that the rising sun began to spring,
In sweet accord—"My loved one's far away!"
For at that time, as I have heard men say,
Both beasts and birds could plainly sing and speak.

And so befell, that once, ere morn did break,
As Chanticleer amongst his spouses all
Sat on his perch, that stretched across the hall,
And next him sat this fair dame Part-e-lole,
This Chanticleer gan groan within his throat,
As one that in his dream is troubled sore
And when that Part-e-lole thus heard him roar,
She was aghast, and said—"O husband dear,
What aileth you, to groan as if in fear?
Ye be a very sleeper! Flo' for shame!"
He answered straight, and thus he cried—"My dame,
I pray you, moderate your grief and dread!
Alas! I dreamt I was so ill bested
Right now, that yet my heart is sore with fright
May God"—quoth he—"my dream expound aright,
And keep my body out of prison base!
I dreamt, that up and down I walked space
Within our yard, where that I saw a beast,
Was like a hound, who would have made arrest
Upon my body, and would have had me dead.
His colour was betwixt a yellow and red,
And tipped his tail was, as were both his ears,
With black, unlike the remnant of his hairs
His snout was small, with eyes that glowed severe,
Still, for his look, I almost die for fear;
This caused me all my groaning, questionless"
"Away!" quoth she, "fie on you! spiritless!"

Alas ! " quoth she, " for, by yon heav'n above,
Now have ye lost my heart and all my love ;
I cannot love a coward, by my faith.
For truly, what so any woman saith,
We all desire, if e'er it so may be,
To have our husbands handy, wise, and free.

A day or two repasts digestive make
Of worms, before your laxative ye take
Of laurel, fumatory, centaury,
Or else of hellebore, that groweth nigh,
Or spurge, perchance, or of the cornel-berry,
Or ground-pine growing in our yard so merry !
Go, peck them as they grow, and eat them in ;
Be merry, husband, for your father's kin,
And dread no dreams ! I cannot tell you more " "
" Madam, " quoth he, " gramercy for your lore " "
We know how men in old books oft have read . . .
And have discovered by experiance,
That dreams have their significacions
As well of joy as tribulations.

And therefore, lady Part-e-lote so dear,
By such examples old thou seest full clear
That no man should too heedlessly dismiss
His dreams of warning, for I tell thee thus,
That many a dream is such as one should dread."

A fox, renowned for sly iniquity,
That in the grove had dwelt for years full three,
Impelled by hold imagination's flight,
Had broken through the hedge that very night
Into the yard, where Chanticleer the fair
Was, with his seven wives, wont to repair ;
And in a bed of pot-herbs still he lay,
Till it was passed the earlier hours of day,
Waiting his time on Chanticleer to fall . . .
From his contrivry, if he may it see,
Though ne'er before he saw him with his eye.

This Chanticleer, when he the fox did spy,
He would have fled but that the wily foe
Said, " Gentle sir, alas ! where would ye go ?
Be ye afraid of me, that am your friend ?
Now surely, worse were I than any fiend
If e'er I wished you harm or villany ! . . .
Forsooth, ye have a voice as merry and soft
As any anger hath, that dwells aloft, . . .
But, when men speak of singing, let me say,
As ever I hope my eyes will welcome day,
Savo you, I never heard a man so sing
As did your father on a May-morning
Now sing, my friend, for sweet saint Charity !
Let's see, can ye your father counterfeit ? "

This Chanticleer began his wings to beat,
As one that could his treason not espy,
So was he ravished with his flattery !

Alas ! my lords, what flat't'ers oft ye keep Within your courts, and many a traitor deep
That pleases far more surely, by my faith,
Than he who veriest truth unto you saith.
Go, read Ecclesiast on flattery ;
Beware, my lords, of all this treachery !

This Chanticleer stood high upon his tees,
Stretching his neck, and held his eyes all close,
And gan to crow out loudly, for the noice,
The fox—Sir Russell—started up at once,
And by the throat he caught Sir Chanticleer,
And on his back towards the wood him bare,
For no pursuit or outcry yet was made.
O destiny, that no man may evade !
Alas ! that Chanticleer flew from the beams !
Alas ! his wife had no belief in dreams !
And on a Friday fell this sad event !
O Venus, that art goddess of content,
Since Chanticleer had vowed to thee his faith,
Why wouldst thou suffer on thy day his death ?

Lo ! how that fortune changeth suddenly
The hope and boasting of the enemy !
This cock that lay upon the fox's back,
In all his dread, unto the fox he spake,
And said—" Good sir, if that I were as ye,
I yet would say—and so may heaven help me—
" Turn back again, ye churls and peasants all !
A very pestilence upon you fall !
Now I am come unto this forest-side,
Despite you all, the cock shall here abide !
I'll eat him up, in faith, and that anon ! " "
The fox replied, " In faith, it shall be done ! "
And as he spake that word, right suddenly
The cock brake from his mouth full cleverly,
And high upon a tree he flew anon
And when the fox perceived that he was gone,
" Alas ! " quoth he, " alas ! good Chanticleer,
I have to you done great offence, I fear,
In so far as I made you so afeard,
When I you caught, and carried from the yard.
But sir, I did it to no ill intent ;
Come down, and let me tell you what I meant ;
I'll tell you all the truth, God help me so ! "
" Nay then, " quoth he, " a curse upon us two,
And first I curse myself, both blood and bones,
If you bogule me oftener than once !
Thou nevermore shalt, by thy flattery,
Cause me to sing, while winking with mine eye
For be that winketh, when he ought to see,
All wilfully, thrive nevermore may he ! "
" Nay, " quoth the fox, " God grant he thrive amiss
Who knows so little self-command as this,
To talk aloud when he should hold his peace ! "

Lo ! such it is to be so cautionless,
So negligent, so fain of flattery !
But ye that think this tale a mere folly,
As of a fox, or of a cock and hen,
Take the morality thereof, good men !
For saint Paul saith, that all that written is
For our instruction written is, y-wis,
Then take the corn, and let the chaff be still.
Now, gracious God, if that it be Thy will,
As saith our bishop, make us all good men,
And bring us to His heavenly bliss "—Amen.

Here is ended the Nun's Priest's Tale.

JOHN GOWER

His Life.—John Gower was a man of Kent, born of good stock during the earlier years of the fourteenth century. He seems to have been a person of shrewd business instincts with a large amount of landed property in East Anglia. Some authorities have inclined to picture him as a lawyer, but Mr G. C. Macaulay, his latest and most exhaustive biographer, suggests that he made his money as a merchant, judging by the way in which he speaks of our " City, " and the number of merchants with whom he was in personal communication. However that may be, it is clear that about middle life he is concerned entirely with the management of his estates and the writing of books. His sympathies were aristocratic and conservative, and the Peasants' Revolt horrified him exceedingly, not merely as an upholder of law and order, but as a landlord with vested interests. It may be that the youthful Richard's diplomatic harangue to the mob at Smithfield disgusted him, but it is certain that he transferred his allegiance from Richard II to his rival, Henry of Lancaster. Late in life there is a record of his marriage, whether his first or second marriage, is not quite free from doubt. In 1400 he became blind, but lingered on for a few more years and was buried in St. Mary Overies (now St. Saviour's), Southwark.

His Writings—His chief works were Speculum Hominis, written in French; the Vox Clamantis, written in Latin, and the Confessio Amantis, written in English. The first is a poem of some 30,000 lines, somewhat in the nature of a Morality. The Vices and Virtues are classified, and a picture of society is drawn. For its improvement Gower looks to the intervention of the Blessed Virgin. Historically, the work is of small value, but, as in Langland and Chaucer, there are interesting sidelights on city life.

The Vox Clamantis was occasioned by the Rising of 1381. It consists of seven books, the first book describing the wilderness in which this mediæval Baptist cries. In later books he pictures the common people as having lost their reason and being transformed into wild beasts. Poor Tyler is suggested as an elephantine boar, later on as a jay who has just learnt to speak (Wat=a jay in A S).

Throughout the poem, politics and theology are intermingled, the later books dealing with man's responsibility towards man. The author divides people into three classes: clerk, soldier, and ploughman; he criticises the clergy as freely as Langland does—a significant testimony to the corruption of the Mediæval Church. And the satirical touch that wealth and wisdom for them are not synonymous, is worthy of Carlyle. On the other hand, he has little to say for the serf. And here again his attitude reminds one of the peasant prophet of Eccleſiſchan. Gower distrusts the people; yet claims to speak for them: the voice of the people is the voice of God! He believes in an aristocratic government and disapproves strongly of the vacillation of Richard II.

The Confessio Amantis was completed about 1390, and was written in the days when he believed in Richard. Later on, he substitutes the name of Henry IV for Richard II.

"This book upon amendement
I send unto mine owne lord
Whuch of Lancaster is Henry named?"

It is clear, from the drift of the poem, that the writer is opposed to social reform. He uses a number of stories with the definite intention of telling the people what are the rudiments of good morality. In telling the stories he is clear and straightforward, more so than Chaucer, whose delight in humanity causes him to dally with certain sides of his subject. Gower points the moral "to adorn a tale"; and if the result is less satisfying, less rich in dramatic material, than with the author of The Canterbury Tales, yet the poem has a merit all its own—like the merit of Pope's didactic verse.

His last writing, his Triste, deals with love and marriage, and consists of a number of ballads exhibiting many of the qualities shown in his earlier work, with greater power of technique though perhaps less imagination in treatment. It was written about 1397, possibly on the occasion of his second marriage, and is addressed to married people.

PART II

THE ENGLISH RENASCENCE

(c. 1400-c. 1660)

Introduction Dawn of Renaissance · Early English Verse Writers—Scottish Literature—Caxton, his Work and Successors—Malory and the Morte d'Arthur—More and the Utopia, &c. &c.

INTRODUCTION

CHAUCER died in the dawn of the fifteenth century, leaving behind him the realisation that a great force in English letters had passed away. "The master dere and fadir reverent," as his devoted friend Occleve called him. His successors in England did little but copy him, and we enter on an era of mediocrity in Saxon verse that continues up to the time of the Renaissance.

Among English verse-makers of the time, there is THOMAS OCCLEVE (c. 1368-c. 1450), a personal friend of Chaucer and a clerk in the Exchequer. Of a hopeful turn of mind, and a moderate amount of brains, he was always on the look-out for some generous dispensation by Fate, that should provide him with less to do and more to get. Meanwhile he applied himself to his work of copying documents, with as much relish as possible, and by way of recreation went to the tavern where by his own account he indulged in mild amorous adventures. In order to attract attention in high quarters he wrote a long and tedious poem on the Government of Princes. There is no duller dog in literature than Occleve, but he has claims on our consideration other than his work. He loved and respected Chaucer, and has perpetuated a portrait of Chaucer, which we have every reason to believe to be a good and faithful one.

LINES ON CHAUCER

Simple is my gosse, and sears my letterure,
Unto youre excellence for to write
Myns inward love, and yit in aventure
Wol I me put, thogh I can but lyte;
My dere Maister—God his soule quyte—
And fadir, Chaucer, fay no wold have me taught,
But I was dulle, and lerned lyte or naught.
Allas! my worthy maister honorable,
Thus londes verray tresour and richesse,
Dethe by thy dothe hath harme irreparable
Unto us done: hir vengeable durcesse
Dispoired hath this londe of the swetnesse
Of rethoryk, for unto Tullius
Was never man so like amonges us.

She might han taryed hir vengeance a while,
Tyl sum man hadde egal to the be;
Nay, lot be that; she wel knew that this yle
May never man forth bringe like to the,
And hur office nodys do must she;
God had hir soo, I truste as for the beste,
O maystir, maystir, God thy soule reste!

More important than Occleve is JOHN LYDGATE (c. 1370-1451), a scholar, and monk at the Benedictine Monastery of Bury St Edmunds, in Suffolk. His learning overweighed his muse, and the naïve admission of Occleve, "But I was dulle," might well have been uttered by Lydgate also. He imitated with more labour than skill, Chaucer's favourite metres, and his treatment of romantic themes, but he floundered about disastrously in his cadences, admitting ruefully, "I took none heed neither of short nor long." Perhaps his most interesting piece of work is his London Lackpenny, an agreeable and lively set of verses describing the woes of a poor man in Westminster Hall and about the London Streets, where he sees much to attract him, but can avail himself of no allurements or purchases for lack of funds.

LONDON LACKPENNY

(About 1450)

To London once, my stepps I bent,
Where trouth in no wyse should be faynt;
To Westmynster ward I forthwith went,
To a man of law to make complaynt.
I sayd, "For Mary's love, that holy saynt!
Pity the poore that would procede";
But for lack of mony I cold not spede.

And as I thrust the prease amonge,
By froward chaunce my hood was gone;
Yet for all that I stayd not longe,
Tyll to the Kyngs bench I was come,
Before the judge I kneled anon,
And prayd hym for God's sake to take heede
But for lack of mony I myght not spede.

Beneath thom sat clarkes a great rout,
Which fast dyd wryte by one assent;
There stode up one and cryed about,
Rychard, Robert, and John of Kent;
I wyst not wele what this man ment;
He cryed so thyeke there indede;
But ho that lackt mony myght not spede.

Unto the common place I yode thoo,
Where sat one with a sylken hooode;
I dyd hym reverence, for I ought to do so,
And told my case as well as I cold,
How my goods were defrauded me by falsehood.
I gat not a mum of his mouth for my meed,
And for lack of mony I myght not spede.

Unto the Rolls I gat me from thence,
Before the clarkes of the chauncerye,
Where many I found earnyng of pence,
But none at all once regarded mee,
I gave them my plavnt upon my knee;

They lyked it well when they had it reade,
But lackyng mony I cold not be sped.

In Westmynster hall I found out one,
Which went in a long gown of raye;
I crouched and kneled before hym anon;
For Maryes love, of help I hym praye.
"I wat not what thou meanest," gan he say;
To get me thence he dyd me bede,
For lack of mony I cold not sped.

Within this hall, neithere ryche nor yett poor,
Wold do for me ought, although I shold dye;
Whioh soeing, I gat me out of the doore,
Where Flemynges began on me for to cry,
"Master, what will you copen or by,
Fyne felt hatts, or spectacles to reede?
Lay down your sylver, and here you may spede."

Then to Westmynster gate I presently went,
When the sonn was at hyghe pryme;
Cokes to me, they tooke good entente,
And profered me bread with ale and wyne,
Rybbes of befe both fat and ful fyne;
A fayre cloth they gan for to sprede,
But wantyng mony I myght not then spede.

Then unto London I did me hie,
Of all the land it beareth the pryse;
Hot pascoods one began to crye,
Straberry rype, and chorryes in the ryse;
One had me come nere, and by some spyce,
Peper and sayforne, they gan me bede;
But for lacke of mony I myght not spode

Then to the Chepe I began me drawne,
Where nutch people I sawe for to stando;
One offred me velvet, sylke, and lawne,
And other he taketh me by the hande,
"Here is Parys thred, the fynest in the lande,"
I never was used to such thyngs indede,
And wantyng mony I myght not spede.

Then went I forth by London stone,
Throughout all Canwyke streete,
Drapers much cloth me offered anone.
Thon comes me one, cryde hot shepes feete,
One cryde makerell, ryshes greno, another gan greete,
One bad me by a hood to cover my head;
Bot for want of mony I myght not be sped.

Then I lyed me into Estchepe;
One cryes rybs of befe, and many a pye;
Powter pots they clattered on a heape;
There was harpe, pype, and mynstrelsyne;
"Yea by cock!" "nay by cock!" some began crye,
Some songe of Jenken and Julian for there mede;
But for lack of mony I myght not spede.

Then into Cornhyll anon I yode,
Whero was much stolen gere amonge;
I saw where hongo myne owne hooode,
That I had lost amonge the thronge;
To by my own hood I thought it wronge,
I knew it well as I dyd my orede;
But for lack of mony I cold not spede.

The Tavernor took me by the sleve;
"Sir," sayth he, "wyl you our own wyne assay?"
I answered, that can not mutch me greve,
A peny can do no more than it may;
I dranke a pynt, and for it dyd pay;
Yot sore a hungord from thence I yedo,
And wantyng my mony I cold not spede

Then hyed I me to Belynggate;
And one cryed "hoo, go we hence!"
I prayd a barge man for God's sake,
That he wold spare me my expence
"Thou scapst not here," quod he, "under 1j pence,
I lyst not yet bestow my almes dede":
Thus lacking mony I cold not spede

Then I conveyd me into Kent,
For of the law wold I moddle no more,
Because no man to me tooke entent,

I dyght me do as I dyd before.
Now Jesus that in Bethlem was bore,
Save London, and send trow laywers there mede,
For who so wants mony with them shall not spede.¹

Possibly, no unfair description of Lydgate would be to call him an accomplished scholar with a fair knack of verse-making, and a fluency that considerably outruns the knack.

STEPHEN HAWES (d. 1523?), was a man of culture with a taste for travel, and a remarkable memory. He wrote loyal verse to congratulate Henry VII on his accession. He had a gift for phrases which lighten up his prolix muse from time to time, for instance these lines:

"Be the day weary, or be the day long,
At length it draweth to Evensong"

And an aptitude for allegory, less happy in pleasure-conferring qualities. The French aspects of Chaucer's genius attracted him chiefly, and he follows the author of the Romaunt of the Rose rather than that of the Canterbury Tales.

Occleve, Lydgate, Hawes, affect one all in the same way. Their work has literary merit of a fitful kind, but it is sadly lacking in spontaneity, original impulse, and sincerity.

A decided improvement is seen in the work of that vigorous personality, JOHN SKELTON (c. 1460-1529), a Norfolk cleric, and a remarkable scholar, at one time tutor to Henry VIII. There is no advance in beauty of workmanship. In fact, Skelton neglects beauty quite openly, striving for some fresh metrical form of expression to suit his subject matter.

But at any rate we are outgrowing the imitative period, for Skelton is an original force, albeit a rough and undisciplined one. Beginning as most young poets do in the conventional and imitative vein, he soon broke away, and his later work, despite all its uncouthness, has an individual flavour, refreshing to meet with after the tameness of his predecessors. He is a moralist, with a message for his generation, that he determined to make as effective as possible:

"For tho' my rime be ragged,
Tattered and jagged,
Rudely rain-beaten,
Rusty and moth-eaten:

It hath in it some pith."

Characteristics.—He attacked abuses of the day, both in the Church and Court, with an uncompromising rigour worthy of John Knox. When Wolsey was at the height of his power, Skelton did not hesitate to criticise him severely, as in his satire Why Come ye not to Court?

His most popular work was the quaint Boke of Philip Sparrow, celebrating the death of the pet bird of Mistress Joan Scrope; his most outspoken was the Hogarthian sketch The Tunning (browning) of Elynor Rummyng—recounting the brewing and subsequent ritual of a certain broach of ale by a rural alewife and her friends. He had a liking for brief, jerky metres • e.g.

Significance and Influence of his work.—Skelton was a pioneer inasmuch as he broke up old conventions of verse, suggesting new forms, and infusing life and vigour in English poetry at a time when it was needed. All great poetry is marked by beauty and vitality, and no genuine poetry can dispense with one or other of these elements. Beauty and grace, Skelton assuredly had not. But he had something of Butler's gift of grotesquerie, something also of his genius for doggrel, and his work therefore is not without a beneficent influence on the poetry of his age.

SCOTTISH LITERATURE IN THE 14TH
AND 15TH CENTURIES

Despite its quasi-barbarism and internal troubles in the fourteenth century, Scotland had at any rate accomplished one great thing. She had won, hardly and desperately, her independence, and this fact had served as trumpet call to the imaginative minds of the age. JOHN BARBOUR leads the way with his patriotic poem—Bruce (c. 1376), a poem recalling, in its noble apostrophe to Freedom, the famous lines of Shelley in the Masque of Anarchy. The rough material of poetry is there, all that is needed is something of the fine culture that had already made its way into England, to fashion and grace it.

About this time JAMES I (1394–1437) returned from his years of captivity in England, a cultured and accomplished prince, and the influence he exercised on national verse was just what was needed. His own poem, The King's Quair, is one of no small beauty and power. Imitative, it is true, of Chaucer and of French Romance, but animated by genuine imagination and feeling, it is a work of the heart and not of the head. He writes with power because he loved Lady Jane Beaufort, not because he fancied himself a versifier of Chaucer's school.

ROBERT HENRYSON (1430?–1506?), the "school-master in Dunfermline," though like his royal predecessor a faithful admirer of Chaucer, shows real first-hand observation of nature and an insight born of no mere literary accomplishment into the simple and ordinary aspects of lowly life. There is a quaint charm about his description of why he added to Chaucer's story of Troilus and Cressida. One winter's night, he tells us, he sat by the fire reading Troises, and comforting himself with some hot drink. But neither fire nor drink could reconcile him to the leniency of Chaucer, and so he adds his mite to the poem with a diurnal account of Cressida's death—thus appeasing his sense of justice

He is at his best, however, when dealing with rustic scenes, whether it be to recount the eternal (poetic) squabbles of shepherd and shepherdess, or to deal in popular allegorical vein with the town mouse and the country mouse. Perhaps there is more human nature than mouse nature about Henryson's rodents, but in their way they can hold their own with the "wee, sleekit . . . tum'rous beastie" of the poet's great successor.

ROBENE AND MAKYNE

Robene sat on gude green hill,
Keepand a flock of fe;
Merry Makyne said him till,
"Robene, thou rue on me,
I haif thee luvit loud and still,
Thir years two or three;

Robene answerit, "Be the rude,

Be patient and privie "

Robene answerit her again,
"I wait nocht what is lufe;

The woddur is fair, and I am fain,
My sheep gais hale abuse;
An we wald play us in this plain,

"Robene, tak tent unto my tale,

And thou sall haif my heart all hail,

"Makyno, adieu, the sun gais west,

"Robene, in dule I am so drest,

"Ga, lufe, Makyno, wherever thou list,

"Robene, I stand in sic a styll;

"Makyno, I haif been this while;

"My honey, Robene, talk ane while,

"Makyno, some other man beguile,

Robene on his ways went,
As licht as leaf of tree;
Makyno murnit in her intent,
And trow'd him never to see
Robene braid attour tho bent;
Than Makyno cryit on hie,
"Now may thou sing, for I am shent!
What ails lufe at me?"

Makyno went hame withoutin fail,
Full weary ofir couth weep;
Than Robene in a full fair dale
Assenblit all his sheep

He fallowit her fast there till assail,
And till her tuk gude keep

"Abide, abide, thou fair Makyno,
A word for ony thing,
For all my lufe it sall be thine,
Withoutin departing.
All hail thy heart till haif mine
Is all my coverting;
My sheep to-morne whill hours mine

"Robene, thou has heard sung and say,
In gostis and stores auld,
The man that will nocht when he may

Mot eke thoir cares cauld,

Be firth, forast, or fauld "

"Makyno, the nicht is selt and dry,

And the green wud richt near us hy
To walk attour all whero,
There may na janglour us espy,
That is to lufe contrair,
Therain, Makyno, bath ye and I
Unseen we may repair "

"Robene, that world is all away
And quite brocht till ane end,
And never again thereto, parlay,
Sall it be as thou wond,
For of my pain thou made it play,
And all in van I spend,
As thou has done, as sall I say,
Murne on, I think to mond "

"Makyno, the hope of all my heal,
My hart on thee is set,
And evermar to thee be leal,
While I may lif but let;
Never to fail, as othreis feill,
What grace that ever I get "
"Robene, with thee I will nocht deal;
Adieu, for thus we met "

Makyno went hame blyth aneuch,
Attour the holtis hair;
Robene murnit, and Makyno leuch;
Scho sang, he sicht sair,
And so left him, bath wo and wreuch,
In dolour and in care,
Keepand his herd under a heuch,
Amangus the holtis hair.

After Henryson, comes WILLIAM DUNBAR (1465 ?-1530), a poet of striking if undisciplined power, and one of the great names in Scottish Literature. He is the Burns of the fifteenth century, with something of that poet's passion for beauty, native humour, and force of expression. He was not unlike Burns, moreover, in character, sensual and headstrong, with a lively and bitter appreciation of the paltriness of life of the senses

He started as a Franciscan friar, but this did not harmonise with his pleasure-loving nature, and being with all his family a man sincere and straightforward, he left the Order, and became one of the Scottish Court.

LONDON

London, thou art of townes A-perse,
Sovereign of cities, seemliest in sight,
Of high renoun, riches and royaltie,
Of lordis, barons, and many goodly knight;
Of most delectable lusty ladies bright,
Of famous prelates, in habitis clerical,
Of merchantis full of substance and might.
London, thou art the flour of Cities all.

Gladdeth anon thou lusty Troynovant,
Cite that some time cloped was New Troy,
In all the earth, imperial as thou stant,
Princess of townes, of pleasure and of joy
A richer resteth under no Christian roy,
For manly power, with craftis natural,
Fourmeth none fairer sith the flood of Noy:
London, thou art the flour of Cities all

Gem of all joy, jasper of jocunditie,
Most mighty carbuncle of vertue and valour;
Strong Troy in vigour and in strenuities,
Of royal cities rose and gerafour;
Empress of townes, exalt in honour,
In beaute bearing the crown imperial,
Sweet paradise precelling in pleasure.
London, thou art the flour of Cities all

Above all rivers thy River hath renoun,
Whose beiriall streamis, pleasant and preclare,
Under thy lusty wallis runneth down,
Where many a swan doth swim with wings fair,
Where many a barge doth sail, and row with aer,
Where many a ship doth rest with top-royal
O! town of townes, patron and not compare.
London, thou art the flour of Cities all,

Upon thy lusty Brig of pillars white
Been merchantis full royal to behold;
Upon thy streetis goeth many a seemly knight
All clad in velvet gowncs and chains of gold
By Julius Cæsar thy Tour founded of old
May be the house of Mars victorial,
Whose artillery with tongue may not be told.
London, thou art the flour of Cities all.

Strong be thy wallis that about thee standis;
Wise be the people that within thee dwellis;
Fresh is thy river with his lusty standis,
Blith be thy churches, well-sounding be thy bellis;
Rich be thy merchantis in substance that excellis;
Fair be their wives, right lovesome, white, and small;
Clear be thy virgins, lusty under kyllis.
London, thou art the flour of Cities all.

Thy famous Mayor, by princely governance,
With sword of justice, thee ruleth prudently.
No lord of Paris, Venice, or Florence
In dignitie or honour goeth to him nigh,
He is exemplar, lode-star, and guye;
Principal patron and rose original,
Above all Mayors as master most worthy:
London, thou art the flour of Cities all

Dunbar's work is varied and voluminous, and exhibits him as an amoralist, a moralist, and a satirist. Mention has been made of Burns, but it is not as a love poet or as a moralist that he suggests the analogy. It is rather in his rough and vigorous humour that we find the kinship. Dunbar's love poetry is undistinguished; he writes here as a courtier, and relies contentedly on most of the literary conventions of the time; nor are his moral or religious efforts anything but experiments in the orthodox Chaucerean School. When we examine his satirical verse, we realise a breadth, a vigour, and a vitality that clearly show the real bent of his genius. In his spirited attack on the law courts—Tidings from the Sessions, in his anathemas on the dirty condition of the city in the Satire on Edinburgh; in his boisterous ridicule of the thirsty alewife in the Ballad of Kynd Kittok, we realise a genuine force, a Rabelaisian relish for the grotesque, that is something new in our literature. This gift it was that made him seek out fresh prosodic forms, and do for Scottish much what Skelton did for English verse. He has indeed been called "the Scottish Skelton," and of the two he is perhaps the greater power. He is a typical transitional writer, mediæval in many ways, yet helping to break up the old mediæval methods, and to pour fresh life into English poetry. There is no breadth of the Renaissance in his work, only by his restlessness and experimentalising does he show that a new era is about to dawn.

Of his contemporary, GAVIN DOUGLAS, it is less easy to speak. By some he has been claimed as a child of the New Age, while others regard him as essentially belonging to the Chaucerean school, and mediæval in his outlook. Douglas was well born, and rose to preform in the Church. Letters for him was but an episode in a busy life. First and foremost he was a political churchman, his literary work being done while he was a young man. Of this, the Palace of Honour and the translation of the Æneid of Virgil take the chief place.

In the Palace of Honour we are in the familiar realm of mediæval allegory. We start with the usual dream in May time, and find ourselves in a mixed company of Old Testament worthies and Pagan deities. There is more moralising than art, and it is directly inspired by Chaucer's work. His interest in the Latin writers, Virgil and Ovid, suggest for the moment the inspiration of the new learning; but there is no trace of humanism in the poem. The Roman poets serve only as moral tags.

The translation is a far more interesting piece of work, it is not epoch-making, it has little merit as a rendering of a classic into English dress, none the less it is the first translation of a great writer into English, and the philological import of the writing is of no slight interest, with its strange minglings of Chaucerean Saxon, ancient alliterative verse, and snippets from alien tongues both North and South. There is a pictorial quality about some of the writing, that faintly adumbrates the rich imagination of Spenser. But it is as the last of the Mediævals, not as the child of the New Age, that we must regard Douglas.

THE DAWN OF THE RENAISSANCE

The fifteenth century dawned upon an England that had outlived the energising idealism of the twelfth century. The vigorous vitality of that era had been paralysed by the wasteful futilities of the Hundred Years' War with France, and divided counsels at home. Feudalism that had been a power in Norman times in evolving order and solidarity out of anarchy and confusion, survived now only as a spent force. No longer did it suit the needs of the nation. The plaint of Langland, the anathema of Wycliff, bear witness to the general unrest and disorganisation. The sterility of English literature after Chaucer testifies to the lowered vitality of the time. Yet once again is the old saying justified that it is darkest before the dawn. There has been a stirring of fresh life, a kindling of new desires in Italy and Germany. In each country the horizon is aglow with promise—a promise that speaks according to the personality of each nation. In Italy the Renaissance thrills through the senses; in Germany it speaks through the intellect. Thus is it that from the first the awakening assumed in Germany a religious character; it merged at once into the Reformation. In Italy it was different; the old ecclesiasticism became paganised. "The Gods descend from Olympus and live once more amongst men." Pagan influences were needed; though the sudden transition from a starved asceticism to a rich, pulsing life could not be accomplished without moral disasters. Perhaps no more significant illustration of difference in outlook can be given than in the attitude towards nudity. The mediæval artist at the portal of the Cathedral at Basle had depicted the dead rising from graves and donning hurriedly their garments, so as to appear decently clad at the Last Judgment. After the Renaissance, as Jusserand has reminded us, a naked woman was wrought in bronze upon the tomb of a Pope. All that was beautiful was, through the eyes of the Renaissance, also divine. The human body, so long despised and ill-treated, came into its kingdom and was glorified:

"Beauty is Truth, Truth Beauty"

But while Italy was on fire with the new sunrise, it was still for England merely a streak of light upon the horizon.

The Mediæval Church, in place of welcoming the cleansing changes of a Wycliff, opposed all remedies for curing her of her sick condition. Nor were our Kings any more farseeing. Henry IV helped to stiffen the autocratic power of the Church by passing the Act that heretics should be burned to death. Henry V persecuted the Lollards with relentless vigour. But in vain did they try to prop up the tottering edifice of mediæval thought. They could hold back for a while the oncoming tide; to give fresh life to what was moribund was beyond their power; so England stood:

"Between two worlds, one dead,
The other powerless to be born"

Our intellectual centres dwindled into insignificance, and the continuous social disturbances helped but to emphasize the mental and moral degradation of the country. But if the Wars of the Roses reacted unfavourably on our literary life, they contributed to bring matters swiftly to a crisis, by destroying the power of the great Feudal nobles, and bringing about the inevitable reaction.

Meanwhile, Learning suffered badly. The tragedy of JOHN TIPTOT, Earl of Worcester, is a case in point. He was a scholar and a traveller, one imbued with the new culture of Italy. Oxford was indebted to him for the gift of valuable manuscripts brought from the Continent. As a translator of the classics he had done a splendid work. But the opportunist politics of the age had engulfed him, and he was executed in 1470. Fuller's tribute to him as "noble and virtuous" was probably ill-deserved; but there was force in the hyperbole, that "the axe did at one blow cut off more learning than was in the heads of all the surviving nobility."

Meanwhile an agency was at work, more potent even than the zeal of reformers, to turn the scale in favour of the New Learning.

A Kentish man, WILLIAM CAXTON (c. 1422–91) after serving his apprenticeship to a City mercer, crossed to Flanders, and in the intervals between business duties, dimmed his eyesight by much writing. Later, he became copyist in the service of Margaret of Burgundy, the sister of Edward IV, and while groaning over the mechanical labour, he came across a new art introduced into Bruges by Colard Mansion a clever caligrapher (about 1473).¹

Possibly, Caxton had learned the new art at Cologne a year or so previously, but whether this was the case or not, he gave Mansion financial assistance. When he returned to his native country he carried with him his precious Printing Press (1476), and established himself in the Almonry at Westminster, where he advertised his work thus: "If it please any man, spiritual or temporal, to buy any pyes of two or three commemorations of Salisbury all empyrinted after the form of the present lotter, let him come to Westminster, and he shall have them chepe." Caxton was a man of business as well as a man of letters. Probably the things which brought him most money at first were the service books and sermons which he sold to the preachers. There we see the shrewd man of affairs. In his publication of Lydgate and Gower, of Malory, and of that "worslypful man, Geoffrey Chaucer," we recognise the man of letters. He had a pretty taste for literature, and as early as 1468–69 translated into English a favourite mediæval romance, Le Recueil des Histoires des Troye. Long before becoming a printer he had been a translator, and translation occupies him still. According to his own account, he translated twenty-one books, and printed in fourteen years nearly eighty separate volumes, some of which passed through several editions.

Edward IV and Richard III both favoured him: to Richard, Caxton dedicated his Order of Chivalry.

The Earl of Arundel allowed him "a yearly fee of a buck in summer and a doe in winter," for translating The Golden Legend.

The Golden Legend, printed about 1493, is Caxton's most important translation.

The Renaissance had come with Caxton, and the great nobles of the day no less than the monarchs were stung with the desire of knowledge.

Thus the Renaissance movement in London

begins with the publication of English masterpieces, awakening in the minds of the people a sense of their national life. Then, with the arrival of the Tudors, the dawn broadened into the sunshine.

The invention of the Printing Press, coupled with the discovery some time before, of a way of transforming linen rags into paper, made the multiplication and circulation of books a very different matter from what it had been in the Middle Ages.

Thus the Renaissance, in place of becoming a scholar's monopoly, was rendered a far-reaching popular movement.

(i) ART AND LETTERS

Caxton deemed the Middle Ages more interesting than Classical antiquity. Indeed, all that was vital and inspiring in mediævalism he found summed up in Sir Thomas Malory's Morte d'Arthur. This is his greatest undertaking. It is a book of noble proportion, written in fine flowing English, with that simple austerity characteristic of the Saxon genius.

Who is this unknown writer suddenly made famous by Caxton?

Of Sir THOMAS MALORY very little is definitely known. He may have belonged to a Worcestershire family of that name who fought with both Lancaster and York in the Wars of the Roses, one member of which was named Thomas, and a member of parliament in 1444-5, several families in Yorkshire and also in the Midlands aspire to have him for an ancestor, but no trace of a Thomas can be found who lived about that time. Professor Kitteridge in Who was Sir Thomas Malory? traces him to a certain Sir Thomas Malory of Newbold Revell in Warwickshire, who succeeded to the family estates about 1434. John Bale (1495-1563) the historian, in his Account of the Lives of Eminent Writers of Great Britain, says he was a Welshman. The one thing certain is, that he wrote the Morte d'Arthur, which comprises twenty-one books compiled from a variety of sources. According to Bale, the first four books are founded on Robert de Borron's Romance of Merlin, Book V from Morte d'Arthur manuscript in Lincoln Cathedral Library; Book VI from the French Romance of Lancelot; Book VII is not identified; Books VIII-X from the Romance of Tristan by Luc de Gasc; Books XI-XXI are mainly from Lancelot, with interpolations.

Of the first folio edition printed by Caxton in 1485 only one perfect copy is in existence; of two subsequent editions, 1495 and 1520, printed by Wynkyn de Worde, one copy of the latter is in the British Museum.

Malory sings the praise of love, not with the gay abandon of the French troubadour, but with that seriousness of passion typical of the North.

While she loved, he says of Guenevere, she was a true lover, and therefore she had a good end. It is a pity if love be spent upon one who happens to be inaccessible. Still, love, whether of maid or wife, is good, inasmuch as all love is good. All

Malory pleads for is that Love first be given to God, and then that the lover keep faithful to his love.

THE DEATH OF LAUNCELOT

"Oh ye mighty and pompous lords, winning in the glory transitory of this unstable life, as in reigning over great realms and mighty great countries, fortified with strong castles and towers, edified with many a rich city: Ye also, ye fierce and mighty knights, so valiant in adventurous deeds of arms, behold, behold, see how this mighty conqueror King Arthur, whom in his human life all the world doubted, yea also the noble Queen Guenevere, which sometime sat in her chair adorned with gold, pearls, and precious stones, now lie full low in obscure foss or pit covered with clods of earth and clay. Behold also this mighty champion, Sir Lancelot, peerless of all knighthood, see now how he lieth grovelling upon the cold mould, now being so feeble and faint, that sometime was so terrible, how and in what manner ought ye to be so desirous of worldly honour so dangerous. Therefore me thinketh this present book is right necessary often to be read, for in all ye find the most gracious, knightly, and virtuous war of the most noble knights of the world, whereby they got praising continually. Also me seemeth by the oft reading thereof, ye shall greatly desire to accustom yourself in the following of those gracious knightly deeds, that is to say, to dread God and to love righteousness, faithfully and courageously to serve your sovereign Prince. And the more that God hath given you the triumphal honour, the meeker ye ought to be, ever fearing the unstableness of this deceitful world, and so I pass over and turn again unto my matter.

So within six weeks after Sir Lancelot fell sick, and lay in his bed; and then he sent for the bishop that there was hermit, and all his true fellows. Then Sir Lancelot said with dreary steven. "Sir Bishop, I pray you that ye will give me all my rights that belongeth unto a Christian man." "It shall not need you," said the hermit and all his fellows, "it is but a heaviness of the blood, ye shall be well amended by the grace of God to-morrow."

"My fair lords," said Sir Lancelot, "wit ye well, my careful body will into the earth, I have warning more than I will now say, therefore I pray you give me my rights." So when he was houseled and encased and had all that a Christian man ought to have, he prayed the bishop that his fellows might bear his body unto Joyous Gard. Some men say Anwick and some men's say is Bamberow.

"Howbeit," said Sir Lancelot, "me repenteth sore but I made mine avow sometime, that in Joyous Gard I would be buried, and because of breaking of my vow I pray you all lead me thither." Then there was weeping and wringing of hands among all his fellows. So at the season of the night, they went all to their beds, for they all lay in one chamber; so after midnight against day, the bishop that was hermit, as he lay in his bed asleep he fell on a great laughter, and therewith the fellowship awoke, and came unto the bishop and asked him what he ailed. "Ah Jesus, merry," said the bishop, "why did ye awake me, I was never in all my life so merry and so well at ease." "Why, wherefore?" said Sir Bors.

"Truly," said the bishop, "here was Sir Lancelot with me, with more angels than ever I saw men upon one day; and I saw the angels heave Sir Lancelot towards heaven, and the gates of heaven opened against him." "It is but dretching of swevens," said Sir Bors, "for I doubt not Sir Lancelot aileth nothing but good." "It may well be," said the bishop, "go ye to his bed, and then shall ye prove the sooth."

So when Sir Bors and his fellows came to his bed they found him stark dead, and he lay as he had smiled, and the sweetest savour about him that ever they smelled. Then was there weeping and wringing of hands, and the greatest dole they made that ever made men. And on the morrow the bishop sung his mass of Requiem; and after the bishop and all those nine knights put Sir Launcelot in the same horse bier that Queen Guenever was laid in before that she was buried. And so the bishop and they altogether went with the corpse of Sir Launcelot daily, till they came unto Joyous Gard, and ever they had an hundred torches burning about him.

And so within fifteen days they came to Joyous Gard. And there they laid his corpse in the body of the chour, and sung and read many psalters and prayers over him and about him, and ever his visage was laid open and naked, that all folk might behold him; for such was the custom in those days that all men of worship should so lie with open visage till that they were buried."

Caxton's personality is an interesting one: it may be seen in his various prefaces. These reflect a kindly and simple nature, with a pleasant admixture of keen humour to take off the flatness.

His style is uncertain, for he is not clear how far to draw upon foreign tongues. But he has a ready instinct for good Saxon prose, and his prose is far more readable and attractive than some of the prose written about this time. One of his pleasantest qualities is the confidential note which he strikes—a note, that was later on to be the distinctive note of the English Essay. At present English prose is still in the experimental state; like, to a lesser extent, the verse. But poetry was to have a glorious career, before English prose made itself a force with which to be reckoned.

THE SUCCESSORS OF CAXTON

For nearly fifty years after the death of Caxton, the book trade in England was directed for the most part by two men, Jan Wynkyn de Worde (d. 1534), and Richard Pynson (d. 1530); but the admirable start made by Caxton was scarcely maintained by his successors. Classical learning took a very low place, and until 1543 no Greek book was printed in England. Religious literature of a mediocre kind could be had in abundance, there was a steady market for these, and contemporary poets like Skelton and Hawes had the gratification of finding some of their work printed. For any advance in the development of English literature we must look, however, not to the printer but to a wealthy nobleman, Lord Berners, who did admirable work as a translator.

John Bouchier, 2nd Lord BERNERS (1467–1533) was educated at Oxford, and married Catherine, daughter of the Duke of Norfolk. As a youth he was intimately acquainted with Henry VIII, with whom he travelled to Calais. After filling many important positions in the State, he was made Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1516, and Deputy to Calais in 1520 with a yearly salary of £100 and £104 "spyall money." In straitened circumstances through numerous lawsuits in connection with his estates, he was continually borrowing money of the King who, during Berner's last illness, ordered his goods to be sequestered in the interest of his creditors.

His literary work consisted of important translations from the French and Spanish. In 1523, at Henry's request, he translated Froissart's Chronicles, a second volume in 1525 being printed by Richard Pynson; Huon of Bordeaux from the French (1532), printed by Wynkyn de Worde, The Castell of Love from the Spanish; the History of the moost noble and valyaunt Knight, Arthur of Lytell Brytaine; and in 1534 The Golden Book of Marcus Aurelius, translated from Guevara's El Relox de Principes o Marco Aurelio, which also inspired Lyly in his Euphues.

Among lesser literary forces may be mentioned ROBERT FABYAN (d. 1513), who did useful work as a chronicler of London history, despite his tendency to accept all the fabulous tales of our national origin first made by Geoffrey of Monmouth. EDWARD HALL (d. 1547), is a man of more scholarly attainment. He chronicles the story of the Houses of Lancaster and York, and carries the story down to 1532. He had an eye for characterisation; and some of his work attracted Shakespeare, who makes fairly generous use of it in his plays dealing with Plantagenet England.

HENRY VII had done much to encourage the New Learning. Mention of him usually recalls the memory of a shrewd, sagacious, and thrifty statesman, a man with a genius for practicability and cautious common sense. For the rest he does not impress himself upon us as a figure of the Renaissance. But there were two Henrys; and one of them especially marked in earlier years was a kindly, art-loving student, somewhat reserved perhaps, but with flashes of humour, and an ardent, romantic temperament. We may recall the delight which Malory's Legends afforded him; the pleasure it gave him to surround himself with the best scholars of the day; the careful education he bestowed upon his children. He lacked the open, genial bearing of his successor; yet his tastes were as fully with the New Learning as were those of his son.

The hopes of cultured England were bright and confident when young HENRY succeeded his father in 1509. Handsome, alert, artistic, with marked scholarly tastes, yet no bookworm, he seemed an ideal prince. He had the Englishman's love of outdoor exercise; a winning manner and an all-round versatility likely to endear himself to all sorts and conditions of men.

By his distinguished marriage with Catherine of Aragon he had made a powerful ally in Spain. In fact, there was no cloud on the horizon when he came to the throne. Men were willing to put up with the ebullience of vanity that showed itself even thus early, especially as there was some reason for it. What did it matter if, like Sir Willoughby Patterne, he knew that he had "a leg," and was pleased to share that knowledge with others? had he not single-handed met "that serpent" Luthor, and confounded him in a learned book that had met with the approbation of the Pope himself?

Assuredly a man of the Renaissance: he writes lyrics and composes music, is an expert on various instruments himself, and ranges over most subjects in science and philosophy, with an eager interest characteristic of the time. There is nothing of his father's parsimony about him. Erasmus is made heartily welcome and Holbein invited to stay, the clever foreigner is welcome at Court. England at length is coming into line with the Southern nations.

We are now in a position to examine more closely the spirit of the Renaissance working in England and helping to stir its dull stagnation into fresh life. It was during the last few years of the fifteenth century that the connection of English thought with Italian scholarship began.

William Grocyn, for some time Greek Professor at Oxford, spent two years at Florence, where the famous politician was lecturing, and about the same time Linacre, a man of great sensibility and refinement, was selected to help in the teaching of Lorenzo di Medici's children. These two men became saturated with the classicism of Florence, and on their return home communicated their eager enthusiasm to others in England, notably Colet, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's, and to Sir Thomas More. "To be in company of such men as Colet," said Erasmus, who entered Oxford in 1498, "he would not refuse to live even in Scythia," and he likened his talk to the talk of Plato. Grocyn's varied knowledge and Linacre's fine judgment, received also the warm commendation of the young scholar, while his tribute to More has become one of the commonplaces of literary history: "When did Nature ever mould a character more gentle, endearing, and happy than Thomas More's?"

The fire once lit spread apace. Schools and colleges sprang up, dedicated to the cause of the latest culture. Richard Fox, Bishop of Durham, founded grammar schools at Grantham and Taunton, and brought into being Corpus Christi College at Oxford; while Cambridge, not to be behind, responded with the creation of Christ's and St. John's Colleges through the influence of Bishop Fisher. In London, St. Paul's School sprang up at the instigation of Colet, where the young students were to be taught "the old Latin speech, the very Roman tongue used in the time of Tully and Sallust and Vergil and Terence, the Latin adulterate, which blind fools brought into the world, being absolutely banished." William Lilly, the godson of Grocyn, was to be the first headmaster. He was a friend of More, and well approved of by Erasmus as one versed in the art of educating youth.

Among the most remarkable personalities of the time is Sir THOMAS MORE; he was the son of Sir John More, a justice of the King's Bench, who had his residence in the heart of the City, and it was here, in Milk Street, that Thomas was born in the year 1478. As a child he attended St. Anthony's School in Threadneedle Street, at that time considered to be a school of high repute. From here he followed the usual custom in those days of becoming attached to some great household.

Thomas More was particularly fortunate in his patron, Cardinal Morton, the Archbishop of Canterbury, who quickly discovered his young retainer's promise, remarking: "Whoever liveth to try it, shall see this child here waiting at table prove a marvellous man." The keen political insight showed by More was greatly due to the stimulating counsel of the Cardinal. This interest was continued after he left his patron, for we find it was through his influence that More was sent to Oxford and so came into contact with the New Learning then being advanced by Grocyn, Linacre, and Colet. It was here, also, he met and became the closest friend of Erasmus, and the three were soon looked upon as the most eager disciples of the forward movement of the day.

More's stay at Oxford did not last long. On his return to London he began to study law at New Inn and Lincoln's Inn, and we find him steadily working his way up to the Bar. At this time he was much in the society of Colet and Lilly.

At the age of twenty-one More is a Member of Parliament, and when a proposal is made four years later, by King Henry VII, for a subsidy for the marriage portion of his daughter Margaret, who was to be married to James IV of Scotland, More openly opposes the demand of the King. As his opposition influenced Parliament to the extent of their refusing the subsidy, he had at once to bear the wrath of the displeased monarch: "A beardless boy has disappointed the King's purpose!"

The result of this fearlessness brought More's father into the trouble, for the incensed king caused him to be fined upon a legal pretext, and Thomas More found it necessary to leave public life. This check to his career was terribly disappointing, and so unsettled More, that he at this time contemplated becoming a monk. His disposition had always been religious. While he was a law student he imposed upon himself various forms of self-mortification—fasting, praying, and next to his skin he wore a hair shirt.

The influence of his wise teacher, Colet, now Dean of St. Paul's, and of his friend Erasmus prevailed, and before he was twenty-five he had determined upon a secular career.

Erasmus has said of More, "When did Nature ever mould a character more gentle, endearing, and happy than Thomas More's?" and it is to this gentleness and kindly thought for others that we must ascribe his curious selection of a wife. He married in 1505, Jane, the eldest daughter of John Colt of New Hall, Essex, although he preferred her younger sister—but he did not wish to subject the elder sister to the discredit of being passed over, and so "of a certain pity he framed his fancy" towards the elder daughter.

This first wife died, and in 1511 More married Alice Middleton, a widow. This marriage was one of great affection, and Erasmus, his friend, was impressed many years later by his devotion to her. "He loveth her as if she were a girl of fifteen."

More's prospects at the beginning of Henry VIII's reign (1509) were exceptional. Wolsey made him known to the King and honours came thick and fast. First appointed Under Sheriff of London, 1510; then became Master of Requests, 1514; Treasurer of the Exchequer, 1521; and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, 1525. His duties necessitated his making various visits abroad, and it was whilst staying in Antwerp that he wrote the first draft of his great work on Social Reform—Utopia.

We arrive at the year of Wolsey's fall, 1529. Not many days after the Cardinal was dispossessed of his office of Lord Chancellor, More, against his wish, but yielding to the importunities of the King, stepped into Wolsey's vacant place.

The King was unwilling to accept harsh measures with the statesman, and before the final steps were taken, opportunities were given to More to reconsider his position. But he was firm. In April 1534 he was sent to the Tower for declining the oath of adherence which he feared would impugn the Supremacy of the Pope, and so make it an easy matter for King Henry to divorce his queen. He was beheaded on Tower Hill, 7th July 1535. A brave man of most happy disposition, he met his fate with courage, and even on the scaffold his sense of humour did not desert him.

His Writings—In 1510, Life of Pico of Mirandola, from the incomplete History of Richard III (written in Latin c. 1513), has been called the first book in classical English prose, it is sometimes said to have been based on a Latin work by Archbishop Morton, not extant.

Utopia, first printed in 1516 at Louvain; a second edition appeared in 1517. It was then revised by More and printed in 1518. Also reprinted in Paris and Vienna. It did not appear in English, till translated by Ralph Robinson, after More's death, 1531.

More's other Latin works include epigrams, a translation of some of Lucian's dialogues, and pamphlets against the Lutharans.

Amongst his English controversial works the most important is the Dyaloge against Luthuranism and Tyndale, in five books.

Whilst in the Tower he wrote Dyaloge of Comfort against Tribulation.

He also wrote much English as well as Latin verse.

Utopia or, to give the full title, The Discourses of Raphael Hythloday, of the Best State of a Commonwealth.

This satire on the social and political evils of the age was written in Latin in two parts, the second about 1515, the first a year later. Though printed at Louvain, Basle, Paris, and Vienna, no English edition appeared till Robinson's translation in 1551. Gilbert Burnet made a better translation in 1684, and Burnet's is the one now used.

Beginning with fact, Sir Thomas More relates how he and Cuthbert Tunstall, Master of the Rolls, were sent by Henry VIII—"the unconquered King of England and a prince adorned with all the virtues!"—on a diplomatic mission to Prince Charles of Castile, with whom he had "some difference of no small consequence." A satisfactory termination to the mission not being imminent, More takes the opportunity of visiting Antwerp, and is entertained by Peter Giles, a man "whose conversation was so pleasant and so innocently cheerful, that his company in a great measure lessened any longings to go back to my country, and to my wife and children, which an absence of four months had quickened very much."

Through the kindness of Giles, More is supposed to make the acquaintance of Raphael Hythloday, a Portuguese who had travelled with the famous explorer Amerigo Vespucci. On their fourth journey Hythloday, impressed with the newly discovered country, requests to be left behind in order to make inquiries into its social and political government.

Finding that More and his friend are anxious to hear all he can tell them, Hythloday proceeds to relate how he and his companions ingratiated themselves into the affections of the people, and how "they came to towns and cities, and commonwealths that were both happily and well peopled . . . and reckoned up not a few things, from which patterns might be taken for correcting the errors of these nations among whom we live."

He tells them that while on a visit to England he had heard that the dreadful punishment enacted against thieves was hanging. "Would it not be better," he says, "that every man might be put in a method how to live, and so be preserved from the fatal necessity of stealing and of dying for it? . . . if you suffer your people to be ill-educated, and their manners to be corrupted from their infancy, and then punish them for those crimes to which their first education disposed them, what else is to be concluded from this but that you first make thieves and then punish them?"

The Utopians "do not wear themselves out with perpetual toil from morning to night" as is common in most countries. "Dividing the day and night into twenty-four hours, they appoint six of these for work, three of which are before dinner and three after . . . sleep eight hours; the rest of the time . . . left to every man's discretion; yet they are not to abuse that interval in luxury and idleness, but must employ it in some proper exercise."

All are engaged in some useful work, agriculture so "universally understood among them that no person, either man or woman, is ignorant of it; they are instructed in it from their childhood." No unnecessary labour is permitted, and the people are allowed "as much time as is necessary for the improvement of their minds, in which they think the happiness of life consists."

Their towns all possess a pure water supply and good sanitation, the streets are broad and "gardens behind all their houses," which they cultivate with great care; "there is nothing belonging to the whole that is both more useful and more pleasant."

In choosing their Prince from among their head magistrates, the people take an oath "before they proceed to an election, that they will choose him whom they think most fit for the office" and "give their voices secretly."

They "much more detest the folly of those who, when they see a rich man, though they neither owe him anything, nor are in any sort dependent on his bounty, yet, merely because he is rich, give him little less than divine honours."

Virtue is defined as "living according to Nature . . . they think we are made by God for that end; and believe that a man then follows the dictates of Nature when he pursues or avoids things according to the direction of reason." The first dictate is "a love and reverence for the Divine Majesty" . . .

the second "directs us to keep our minds as free from passion and as cheerful as we can . . . and use our utmost endeavours to help forward the happiness of all other persons . . ."

A life of pleasure is either a real evil or a good thing. "What sort of pleasure is it that men can find in throwing dice?" And what pleasure can one find in "seeing dogs run after a hare, more than of seeing one dog run after another? . . . But if the pleasure lies in seeing the hare killed and torn by the dogs, this ought rather to stir pity, that a weak, harmless, and fearful hare should be devoured by strong, fierce, and cruel dogs."

Of true pleasures some are mental, some physical. "The pleasures of the mind lie in knowledge, and in that delight which the contemplation of truth carries with it; . . . the joyful reflection on a well-spent life, and the assured hopes of a future happiness. . . ." Physical pleasures are of two kinds, "that which gives our senses some real delight . . . by recruiting Nature" and that which affects the senses such as "the pleasure that arises from music."

Perfect health is "the greatest of all bodily pleasures. . . . And if any should say that sickness is not really pain, but that it only carries pain along with it, they look upon that as a fetch of subtlety that does not much alter the matter."

"It is thought a sign of a sluggish and sordid mind not to preserve carefully one's natural beauty; but it is likewise infamous among them to use paint . . . no beauty recommends a wife so much to her husband as the probity of her life and her obedience, for as some few are caught and held only by beauty, so all are attracted by the other excellences which charm all the world."

The Utopians have few laws, "it is an unreasonable thing to oblige men to obey a body of laws that are both of such bulk, and so dark as not to be read and understood by everyone of the subjects." Neither have they any lawyers, for "they consider them as a sort of people whose profession it is to disguise matters and to wrest the laws; and, therefore, they think it is much better that every man should plead his own cause, and trust it to the judge . . . by this means they both cut off many delays and find out truth more certainly . . . without those artifices which lawyers are apt to suggest."

"Leagues are useless things, and believe that if the common ties of humanity do not knit men together, the faith of promises will have no great effect."

War is a brutal thing, and there is "nothing more inglorious than the glory gained by war; and therefore, though they accustom themselves daily to military exercises and the discipline of war, in which not only their men, but their women likewise, are trained up, that, in cases of necessity, they may not be quite useless, yet they may not rashly engage in war, unless it be either to defend themselves or their friends from any unjust aggressors or, out of good nature or in compassion, assist an oppressed nation in shaking off the yoke of tyranny."

It is accounted a "just cause of war for a nation to hinder others from possessing a part of that soil of which they make no use . . . since every man has, by the law of nature, a right to such a waste portion of the earth as is necessary for his subsistence."

If war is forced upon them they "make use of the worst sort of men," which they hire "with the offer of vast rewards to expose themselves to all sorts of hazards, out of which the greater part never returns to claim their promises, yet they make them good most religiously to such as escape. This animates them to adventure again . . . for the Utopians . . . reckon it a service done to mankind if they could be a means to deliver the world from such a lewd and vicious sort of people, that seem to have run together, as to the drain of human nature . . . When they draw out troops of their own people, they take such . . . as freely offer themselves, for none are forced to go against their wills, since, if any man is pressed that wants courage, he will not only act faintly, but by his cowardice dishearten others."

They protect life and property in the enemy's country, neither do they harm any man "unless he is a spy."

"When a war is ended they do not oblige their friends to re-imburse their expenses; but they obtain them of the conquered." It is not said, however, how they meet their expenses if they suffer reverse.

"However, there are many things in the commonwealth of Utopia that I rather wish, than hope to see fulfilled in our government."

The Significance of the Utopia.—This work has been not unaptly called "the first monument of modern Socialism." In its general conception and trend it is in direct succession from Plato's Republic, though whereas Plato's is an aristocratic communism, More's is on a democratic basis. It is a People's State, with an elective government even though State controls. This insistence on State control; its advocacy of a six hours' day; its concern with over-population and what we term "the land question"; its denunciation of luxury and idleness; these things it is which give the Utopia a special interest to the Social reformer.

As a purely literary work it is of value as showing how the spirit of the New Learning expressed itself in the practical idealism of an English scholar, yet in the very language selected, it showed how far the author was from realising the possibilities of our native tongue. It was written to convert the student rather than to impress the populace. It was in part a scholar's dream of what might be; in part a reformer's dream of what should be.

More's friend Erasmus is a man of equal ability, but quite other in temperament and character. More's humour is genial, Erasmus is bitterly satirical. Erasmus' brilliance is clear-cut and cold, More's is softened with a kindness of heart. His severities as Chancellor, whatever we may think of them, were certainly not the expression of his real nature. The best part of More is seen in his family life at Chelsea, and in the Utopia. His tenderness of heart extends to animals—a trait rare indeed in those times. "God," says he, "has given them life that they may live. . . . How can we find more pleasure in seeing a dog run after a hare than in seeing a dog run after another dog?"

It is interesting to note that both More's Utopia and Erasmus' Christian Primer were written about the same time, and embody the ideals of the New Learning as applied to social and political life; ideals defined by a modern historian as "the art of living together in civil society and of securing the common weal of the people." Erasmus had little of More's fine humanity and delicacy of feeling, but intellectually he is at one with him. He urges the importance of the Golden Rule, and suggests that kings should refrain from entering into any avoidable war. It were best for them to seek the good of their people, not a mere section, but the good of the whole community. A king's claim to the throne should rest upon the goodwill of the nation, he should tax them as little as possible, and what taxation there is should fall upon the wealthy, not the poorer classes.

(ii) Religion

The first complete version of the Bible in English was made by Wyclif in 1382, though Wyclif himself was responsible probably only for the Gospels. The introduction of printing signalled the rapid multiplication of summaries of various portions of the Bible, and in 1525 Tyndale's translation of the New Testament was first issued. To Miles Coverdale, however, belongs the privilege of rendering the first complete English Bible in 1535, a Bible based on the Swiss-German version. Tyndale's translation, however, being freely used so far as it went.

WILLIAM TYNDALE (born c. 1484), a small, thin, earnest man of extreme pertinacity, was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, and later acted as tutor in a Gloucestershire family. He was an ardent supporter of Luther, and although he did not lack friends in London, found it necessary to go abroad to work at his translation of the New Testament from Greek into English. This he completed at Hainburg, and the translation was finally printed at Worms, three years after Luther's translation of the New Testament into German. He was helped in his work by one William Roy, a Minorite friar educated at Cambridge. Tyndale had no special affection for his collaborator, about whom he remarked dryly: "As long as he had gotten no money, somewhat I could rule him, but as soon as he had gotten his money he became like himself again. Nevertheless, I suffered all things till that was ended which I could not do alone. . . when that was ended I took my leave and bade him farewell for our two lives, and as men say, a day longer." The translation, coming as it did from one associated so closely with "the arch heretic" Luther, was denounced by Cuthbert Tunstall at St Paul's Cross, and publicly burnt.

More was selected to do battle against Tyndale. He criticised his text, for its avoidance of certain Catholic terms, such as grace, confession, and penance. Tyndale defended his exclusion of these words, on the ground that a false meaning had become attached to them. More frankly admitted, however, that the English ought to have the Bible in their own tongue, and disposed of the argument that some might come to harm that way by saying that "to keep the whole commodity from any people because of harm that by their own folly and fault may come to some part, were as though an unlicensed surgeon should . . . cut off a man's head by the shoulders to keep him from toothache."

More's disposition was naturally gentle and humane, and his sensibility and insight made him quite alive to the defects of his Church. His own policy would have been quietly and gradually to have reformed from within, and the crude, violent methods of Luther and the uncompromising vigour of his friends, jarred not merely on his refined and tranquil habit of mind but thoroughly alarmed him. It was fear for the safety of his Church that forced him into association with the sorry exponents of persecution. It is only fair to him to remember that literature was quite alien to the spirit of the time. Neither the Reformers nor their opponents looked upon it as a desirable quality. Each side was in fierce earnest; each thought the other heading for damnation. To More therefore it probably seemed like the adoption for a brief while of a policy he hated in order to save England from destruction.

Whatever may be thought of Tyndale's substitution of such words as congregation, elder, knowledge, penance, for church, priest, confession, penance, the rhythmic grace and verbal charm of his version has not been questioned. To it the translation of the Authorised Version owed a great debt, scarcely realised by many people.

MILES COVERDALE (b. 1488), a Yorkshireman educated at Cambridge, had become a priest in 1514, and had assisted Tyndale in the translation of the Pentateuch. Less brilliant as a scholar than Tyndale, he had no small measure of his literary power, and about the time of Tyndale's martyrdom, his friend and colleague completed his translation of the entire Bible.

Finally, in 1540, a translation more carefully revised, containing a prologue by Cranmer, was appointed to the use of the churches. Of the five men more or less associated with the translation in England—Tyndale, Coverdale, Rogers, Cromwell, and Cranmer—Coverdale alone survived a violent death, dying quietly as an old man in 1568, after a life of extraordinary mental activity.

Good translations from the Classics now make their appearance, with the smiling approval of such men as the erudite and whimsical tutor Roger Ascham and Wolsey himself. According to an interesting document, "The Daybook of John Dow," bookseller at Oxford, we learn in what great demand are the authors of antiquity. Aristotle is greatly sought after; Horace, Ovid, and Virgil are all names to conjure with commercially. Virgil especially took the fancy of the early sixteenth century.

The custom for the scholar to write prose in Latin still persists, but there are vigorous efforts on the part of some—Ascham is one of the first—to give vitality to our own tongue. "To pretend," said More, "that our language is barbarous is not a fantasy . . . and if they would call it barren of words there is no doubt that it is plenteous enough to express our myndes in anye thing whereof one man hath use to speke with another" Yot, good

Sir Thomas, for all that, wrote his famous Utopia in Latin.

Ascham, on the other hand, insisted in his Treatise on Shooting, "I have written this English matter in the English tongue for English men."

EARLIER RENASCENCE AND POETRY

(1406-c. 1490)

Wyatt and Surrey to Sidney

THE EARLIER RENASCENCE AND POETRY

THE Poetry of the Renaissance has all the freshness and vigour of a youthful race :

"Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive,
But to be young was very Heaven."

At first the poets—scholars and courtiers—could do little but stammer with fitful grace. The instrument is there, but they cannot as yet pipe on it. They are embarrassed and self-conscious. Yet this awkwardness melts away. When we reach Spenser and Sidney, the tentative flutings are over. The music is sweet, spontaneous, full-throated.

During the earlier years of the Renaissance in England we are still in the experimental period. The bleakness of the post-Chaucerian period is over, but from the time of Wyatt and Surrey until we reach Sir Philip Sidney, English poetry is interesting more for its promise than for its performance.

The poetry of the age opens with the publication of a volume known as Tottel's Miscellany (1557).¹ This book contained the verse of those ill-fated courtiers Sir Thomas Wyatt and the Earl of Surrey, and marks the first English poetry of the Renaissance.

THOMAS WYATT was born in 1503, entered St John's College, Cambridge, at the age of twelve, and took his degree at fifteen.

He was at one time, like Chaucer, esquire to the King. He travelled to Italy on several occasions, and was the first to introduce the sonnet into England. His friend Surrey praised his handsome appearance where "force and beauty met." He was an accomplished swordsman, and could bandy words as well as the rapier, a fine linguist, an agreeable musician, a brilliant talker, it is small wonder that he became a favourite with Henry VIII. His letters to his son have the weighty wisdom of Chesterfield's utterances. They were modelled on Seneca's epistles :

"Have your friends in a reverence ; and think unkindness to be the greatest offence, and least punished, among men, but so much the more to be dreaded, for God is justicer upon that alone. . . . If you will seem honest, be honest ; or else seem as you are."

Wyatt died of a fever in 1542, in his thirty-ninth year.

¹ Richard Tottel, a printer who, along with Grimald, a University scholar and chaplain to Ridley, made a collection of verse written by courtiers of Henry VII.

THE LOVER'S APPEAL

And wilt thou leave me thus ?
Say nay ! say nay ! for shame,
To save thee from the blame
Of all my grief and grame
And wilt thou leave me thus ?
Say nay ! say nay !

And wilt thou leave me thus,
That hath loved thee so long
In wealth and woe among :
And is thy heart so strong
As for to leave me thus ?
Say nay ! say nay !

And wilt thou leave me thus,
That hath given thee my heart
Never for to depart
Neither for pain nor smart :
And wilt thou leave me thus ?
Say nay ! say nay !

And wilt thou leave me thus,
And have no more pity
Of him that loveth thee ?
Alas ! thy cruelty !
And wilt thou leave me thus ?
Say nay ! say nay !

His friend and disciple, HENRY HOWARD, Earl of Surrey, was born about 1517. More hot blooded than his friend, he was continually getting into trouble as a young man, and made several visits to the Fleet Prison. His whole career was a chequered one ; in fighting, sonnetteering, and roystering he spent his days, and fell at last a victim to Henry's arbitrary power, being beheaded, on a pretext of treason, in 1547. He was more dashing and indiscreet than his friend, but equally with him, had an open, ingenuous disposition, charm of manner, and a cultured mind.

Of these two names Wyatt's is the most important. Modelling his work upon Italian models, he attempted a great variety of metrical experiments—songs, madrigals, sonnets, elegies, occasionally imitative, but with touches of grace and fantasy.

Surrey is seen rather as the disciple of Wyatt than an independent force ; yet his sonnets are more effective than those of Wyatt. Wyatt adhered strictly to the Petrarchan model, used with such fine effect at a later date by Milton, and still more recently by Rossetti. Surrey modified the form, and it was this modification that Shakespeare seized upon in his splendid Sonnet sequence. The Petrarchan form is perhaps the more impressive ; the modified English form the more expressive.

Surrey also translated the second Æneid into blank verse. This is the first example of blank verse in English. Rhymed verse hitherto had held undisputed sway, but one effect of the study of the classics was to lessen the prestige of rhyme. Surrey's blank verse was very unlike the sonorous measure it became in the hands of Marlowe. But it was a step at any rate in the direction of a form of literature in which the greatest Elizabethans won their highest triumphs. Surrey and Wyatt stand in relation to the glory of English poetry under Spenser and Shakespeare as Thomson and Collins do to Wordsworth and Shelley.

Surrey excels his friend as a metrist, and shows little of that awkwardness that mars much of Wyatt's verse. But it must be remembered that if the disciple excelled his master in ease and assurance, the master had the advantage of having opened up the way. In the work of these men, we mark for the first time a more personal note in English poetry, for the great characteristic of mediæval verse is its impersonal character. Conventional it still is, and often stiff in expression; but a more individual tone is now imparted to it.

DESCRIPTION OF SPRING

The soote season, that bud and bloom forth brings,
With green hath clad the hill, and eke the vale,
The nightingale with feathers new she sings;
The turtle to her mate hath told her tale
Summer is come, for every spray now brings,
The hart hath hung his old head on the pale;
The buck in brake his winter coat he slings;
The fishes fete with now repaired scale,
The adder all her slough away she slings;
The swift swallow pursueth the flies snail;
The busy bee her honey now she rings,¹
Winter is worn that was the flowers' bale
And thus I see among these pleasant things
Each care decays, and yet my sorrow springs!

GEORGE GASCOIGNE (c. 1525-1577) is an interesting figure of the time and has been held responsible for the first English prose comedy, The Supposes (from Ariosto), the first regular verse satire, The Steel Glass; the first prose tale (from Boccaccio), the first translation from Greek tragedy, Jocasta; and the first critical essay, Notes of Instruction. Whether this be correct or not, he was undoubtedly a man of considerable culture, was a well-known figure at Court and in political circles, and was, as befitted a man of breeding and education, a fairly extensive traveller. He is a tolerable metrist and has a nice turn for fantasy, as may be seen by his collection of verse, Flowers, Herbs, and Woods. His Lullaby of a Lover is a pleasant specimen of his original power.

LULLABY OF A LOVER

Sing lullaby, as women do
Wherewith they bring their babes to rest,
And lullaby can I sing too,
As womanly as can the best
With lullaby they still the child;
And if I be not much beguiled,
Full many wanton babes have I
Which must be stilled with lullaby.

First lullaby, my youthful years,
It is now time to go to bed,
For crooked age and hoary hairs
Have won the hav'n within my head;

¹ Mingles.

With lullaby then, youth, be still,
With lullaby content thy will,
Since courage quails and comes behind,
Go sleep and so beguile thy mind.

Next lullaby, my gazing eyes,
Which wanton were to glance apace,
For every glass may now suffice
To show the furrows in my face.
With lullaby then wink awhile,
With lullaby your looks beguile;
Let no fair face, nor beauty bright,
Entice you oft with vain delight.

And lullaby, my wanton will,
Let reason's rule now rein thy thought,
Since all too late I find by skill
How dear I have thy fancies bought:
With lullaby now take thine ease,
With lullaby thy doubts appease,
For trust to this, if thou be still
My body shall obey thy will.

With Gascoigne may be mentioned TURBERVILLE, GOOGE, and TUSSEN. These men were all agreeable verse-writers rather than genuine poets; happy occasionally in their phrasings and fancies, but uninspired and mediocre on the whole. It is best to regard them as indirectly helping the development of English poetry by their translation work. This indirectly served to strengthen and enrich the language, and therefore gave the original men of the age better material on which to exercise their craft.

"The green that you did wish me wear
Aye for your love,
And on my helm a branch to bear
Not to remove,
Was ever you to have in mind
Whom Cupid hath my fere assigned

As winter's force cannot deface
This branch his hue,
So let no change of love disgrace
Your friendship true,
You were mine own and so be still,
So shall we live and love our fill

Then I may think myself to be Well recompensed,
For wearing of the tree that is
So well defended
Against all weather that doth fall
When wayward winter spits his gall" ¹

The most original of this early group is THOMAS SACKVILLE. He is not a cheerful writer, but he had real imagination, with nothing of that mannored prettiness which makes much of his contemporaries' work so wearisome. His Mirror for Magistrates gives a powerful picture of the underworld where the poet describes his meeting with famous Englishmen who had suffered misfortune. This work is not all from Sackville's pen, but the Prologue and design are his, and the Prologue has a Dantesque intensity about it, and a power of allegorising, unequalled save in the pages of Spenser. Sackville's technical skill is far superior to his predecessors'—superior to any but the great names of the age. Undoubtedly he is the most original poetic force between Chaucer and Sidney.

COMPLAINT OF THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM

So long as fortune would permit the same,
I liv'd in rule and riches with the best ;
And pass'd my time in honour and in fame,
That of mishap no fear was in my breast ;
But false fortune, when I suspected least,
Did turn the wheel, and with a doleful fall
Hath me bereft of honour, life, and all

Lo, what avails in riches floods that flows ?
Though she so smil'd, as all the world were his
Even kings and kesar's bidden fortune's throws,
And simple sort must bear it as it is.
Take heed by me that blith'd in baleful bliss :
My rule, my riches, royal blood and all,
When fortune frown'd, the feller made my fall.

For hard mishaps, that happens unto such
Whose wretched state erst never felt no change,
Agrieve them not in any part so much
As their distress, to whom it is so strange
That all their lives, nay, pass'd pleasures range,
Their sudden woe, that aye wield wealth at will,
Alights their hearts more piercingly must thrill.

For of my birth, my blood was of the best,
First born an earl, then duke by due descent :
To swing the sway in court among the rest,
Dame Fortune me her rule most largely lent,
And kind with courage so my corpse had blent,
That lo, on whom but me did she most smile ?
And whom but me, lo, did she most beguile ?

Now hast thou heard the whole of my unhap,
My chance, my change, the cause of all my care ;
In wealth and woe, how fortune did me wrap,
With world at will, to win me to her snare,
Bid kings, bid kesar, bid all states beware,
And tell them this from me that tried it true :
Who reckless rules, right soon may hap to rue.

"Thence come we to the horror and the hell,
The large great kingdoms, and the dreadful reign
Of Pluto in his throne where he did dwell,
The wide waste places, and the huge plain,
The wailings, shrieks, and sundry sorte of pain,
The sighs, the sobs, the deep and deadly groan ;
Earth, air, and all, resounding plaint and moan

Lo here, quoth Sorrow, princes of renown,
That whilom sat on top of fortune's wheel,
Now laid full low, like wretches whirled down,
Ev'n with one frown, that stayed but with a smile :
And now behold the thing that thou, erewhile,
Saw only in thought : and what thou now shalt hear,
Recount the same to kesar, king, and peer "

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY

"If he goes on in the course he hath begun, he will be as famous and worthy a gentleman as over England bred." These were the words spoken by the Earl of Essex, a few minutes before he died, soon after his arrival in Ireland, where he had gone to take high official office with Sidney in his train. He was anxious to make Sidney his son-in-law : "I wish that he might match with my daughter . . . He is so wise, virtuous, and godly."

Philip Sidney was born on the 30th November 1554, in the beautiful historic mansion of Penshurst, in Kent—Sir Henry Sidney, his father, being engaged at this time in the thankless task of governing Ireland. His mother, Lady Mary Dudley, was a daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, the nobleman whose schemes as queen-makor lost him his head, and it was at this tragic period of their family history that Sidney's life began.

The accession of Queen Mary occurred a few months before Sidney's birth, and her husband, Philip of Spain, with the widowed Duchess of Northumberland, Sidney's grandmother, were the dismal sponsors at his baptism. His attendants had come under the prevailing gloom of that period, and it is perhaps due to these surroundings that Sidney's thoughts inclined to a serious cast.

After his early childhood, spent at Penshurst, he was taken to Ludlow Castle, and from there was sent to the famous Shrewsbury School. When quite a child, he could write letters in French and Latin, and was ever an eager pupil. At the age of fourteen he left Shrewsbury, and went to Christ Church, Oxford. At school he had met Fulke Greville, afterwards Lord Brooke, a friendship sprang up which lasted through life, and afterwards Greville became his biographer.

Greville's deep affection and admiration for his friend never ceased. He desired to have inscribed on his tomb : "Friend to Sir Philip Sidney." It is also recorded that Sidney's fascination extended amongst many others. His tutor at Christ Church also left directions for the following inscription to be recorded on his tombstone : "Sidney has been my pupil."

After Oxford, Sidney found it an easy matter to enter Queen Elizabeth's Court, his uncle, the Earl of Leicester, being at that time the Queen's favourite; and it was he who introduced him to the all powerful man of the day, Sir William Cecil, afterwards Lord Burghley.

It was while spending a vacation at Hampton Court with the statesman's family, that Sidney's magnetism was again noticeable. His host, a man of the world, discovers Sidney so attractive that he was at first anxious to secure him for a husband for his daughter, a girl of thirteen, but Sidney was discarded for a wealthier suitor. Subsequently a marriage was arranged with the Earl of Oxford, and we can quite understand why these two young rivals, who were fated to see so much of each other at Court, could never become friends.

We now come to the time when Sidney leaves England for a tour on the Continent, lasting three years. A great deal of this period was spent in Venice, where his studies extended over many subjects, among them being astronomy and music. The great Italian painters made a deep and lasting impression on him. History and Italian literature, added to the study of the poetry of Tasso, were amongst the many interests that laid hold of Sidney; at the end of his three years' foreign experience Sidney returned to England an accomplished writer.

In 1576 he was staying with his uncle Leicester at Kenilworth, where the Queen was regaled with one of the most elaborate entertainments on record. It is very probable that Shakespeare, who lived only a short distance away, may have been brought to Kenilworth to see the wonderful scenes. After the Kenilworth festivities Sidney went with the Queen and Court to visit the Earl of Essex at Chartley Castle. It is here he fell in love with Penelope, the Earl's twelve-year-old daughter. As we have seen, the Earl was most anxious for the match, his dying words being in praise of his young friend But though no marriage was to take place, the attachment inspired Sidney to address a series of sonnets to the lady, whom he called "Stella," and Sidney, for the purpose of these literary effusions, named himself "Astrophel" This beautiful friendship continued, with the approval of Sidney's wife, after "Stella's" marriage, almost to the end of his life

At the age of twenty-three, 1577, Sidney was entrusted by Elizabeth to carry congratulatory messages to the Elector Palatine at Heidelberg, and the new Emperor Rudolph the Second, at Prague The Queen's government also ordered him to visit Antwerp to congratulate the Prince of Orange on the birth of a son William the Silent, who was never known to waste words, came under the spell of Sidney's charm, and declared "that in Sidney the Queen of England had one of the greatest and ripest counsellors that could be found in Europe" Although his diplomatic missions were so great a success, he quickly lost the ground he had gained with the Queen through his defence of his father's exertions as Lord Deputy in Ireland, and his opposition to Elizabeth's projected marriage with the Duke of Anjou

At this time the Queen heard of the secret marriage of her favourite Leicester, and all Leicester's family, including Sidney, suffered from her anger. Sidney was not sorry to leave the Court, and we find him becoming an occupant in the house of his sister, the Countess of Pembroke, with a sense of relief It was here, in this house in Wiltshire, that Sidney wrote his famous romance, Arcadia.

He now sought a reconciliation with the Queen, not unsuccessfully, and received official promotion—that of Steward to the Bishop of Winchester, while he also became a Member of Parliament for Kent In 1583 a knighthood was bestowed, and more promotion followed; he was appointed joint-Master of the Ordnance, and in the autumn of the same year he married, at the age of twenty-nine, the daughter, who was only fourteen, of Sir Francis Walsingham

Part of the ensuing three years of Sir Philip Sidney's short life were passed amid new scenes Soon after his marriage, Sidney accepted with gratitude the Queen's orders to accompany his uncle Leicester to the Netherlands, to help in checking the career of Spain In his one encounter, that at Zutphen, he received a wound which (October 2, 1586) proved fatal It was at Zutphen that there occurred the famous incident of the soldier and the cup of water Sidney saw the man suffering, and put the cup from his own lips, saying: "Thy need is greater than mine"

His Writings—His literary work occurred between the years 1578 and 1582, though nothing was published till after his death The Arcadia appeared in 1590, in an unfinished state, and appeared again in 1598, complete. About 1580 Apologie for Poetrie was written In 1591 this work was named Defense of Poesie. The Astrophel and Stella Sonnets appeared in 1593, numbering one hundred and eight, and eleven songs by many a contemporary song-writer in deftness of fancy, he has produced a body of work which for its versatile excellence places him in the foremost rank of his time.

Less brilliant than Marlowe, less witty than Lyly, inferior to Spenser in glamour, and excelled

Of his Arcadia and its remarkable influence, mention is made elsewhere. Here may be noted the discerning critique—The Defense of Poesie—where he uttered those poignant simple words that go to the root of all poetry: "I never heard the old story of Percy and Douglas, that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet."¹

His quick and sensitive imagination enables him to pluck out the very soul of song. "It is not uning and versing that maketh a poet, no more than a long gowne maketh an advocate, who tho' he pleaded in armour should be an advocate and no soldier"

But his most remarkable literary work is to be found in the series of sonnets, Astrophel and Stella, first published after his death There was undoubtedly a personal element in these love verses, Sidney (Astrophel) having been in love with Penelope Devereux (Stella), who afterwards made an unhappy marriage, but allowance must be made for a poet's fancy, and there is no need to treat them as entirely autobiographical

More than most poets, Sidney has suffered at the hands of the uncritical enthusiast and the sour detractor By some he has been lauded as co-equal with Spenser, by others as cold and artificial The open-minded student cannot fail to realise the injustice of both these verdicts As a many-gifted personality, he is probably second to none; as a poet, he is certainly inferior to Spenser in power of expression and in range

A man of exquisite culture with a delicate palate for all that is fine in literature, he knew precisely what to say, but lacked at times the executive power to say it in the right way. This is largely due to want of experience in writing, and his later verses are greatly superior to his earlier efforts

But, if some of his work seems more literary in inspiration than original and first hand; if, as compared with Spenser, the lines on occasion drag somewhat nervelessly, there are rare flashes of beauty, fine notes of passion, unforgettable phrases.

We recall such lines as:

"Feel I said my Muse, look in thy heart and write";

such verses as:

"Doubt you, to whom my Muse, these notes intendeth

Which now my breast o'ercharged to music lendeth?

To you, to you! all song of praise is due:

Only in you my song of praise is due";

such melodious things as:

"Ring out your bells, let mourning shewes be spread,
For Love is dead";

and the even more familiar:

"My true love hath my heart, and I have his"

THE LOVER'S LITANY

Ring out your bells! let mourning shewes be spread,
For Love is dead.

All love is dead, infected
With the plague of deep disdain;

THE DRAMA

Worth as nought worth rejected,
And faith, fair scorn doth gain.
From so ungrateful fancy,
From such a female frenzy,
From them that use men thus,
Good Lord, deliver us !

Weep, neighbours, weep ! Do you not hear it said
That Love is dead ?

His deathbed, peacock's Folly ;
His winding-sheet is Shame ;
His will, False Seeming wholly ;
His sole executor, Blame.
From so ungrateful fancy,
From such a female frenzy,
From them that use men thus,
Good Lord, deliver us !

Let dirge be sung, and treants rightly read,
For Love is dead

Sir Wrong his tomb ordaineth
My mistress' marble heart ;
Which epitaph containeth
" Her eyes were once his dart."
From so ungrateful fancy,
From such a female frenzy,
From them that use men thus,
Good Lord, deliver us !

Alas, I lie. Rage hath this error bred,
Love is not dead.
Love is not dead, but sleepeth
In her unmatched mind :
Where she his counsel keepeth
Till due deserts she find.
Therefore from so vile fancy,
To call such wit a frenzy,
Who love can temper thus,
Good Lord, deliver us !

A DIRTY

My true-love hath my heart, and I have his,
By just exchange one to the other given :
I hold his dear, and mine he cannot miss,
There never was a better bargain driven :
My true-love hath my heart, and I have his.
His heart in me keeps him and me in one,
My heart in him has thoughts and senses guides :
He loves my heart, for once it was his own,
I cherish his because in me it bides :
My true-love hath my heart, and I have his."

Taking leave of these lesser men, we may regard Sir Philip Sidney as closing the earlier period, and ushering in the great creative period of Renaissance

THE DRAMA

INTRODUCTION

(a) Its General Influence

Two points of special interest detach themselves in connection with the drama. What was the effect upon our literature as a whole ; how did it affect our national life and character ?

Upon our literature the drama is incomparably the greatest force of the time : it inspired our grandest poetry as well as our sweetest lyrics, it gave variety, flexibility, and clarity to our prose. It inspired our poetry, because the exigencies of the stage demanded word pictures that should conjure up clearly and vividly the scene suggested ; because the exigencies of acting demanded the eloquent exhibition of elemental emotions and swift transition of mood, because the exigencies of individualising demanded nice distinctions of diction. Philosophic reflection, poignant introspection, joyousness of heart, agony of spirit ; all these things clamoured for utterance in the drama. Elizabethan poetry voiced them all. The drama made for intensity of expression ; it made also for extensivity.

As against the 6000 words of the Old Testament it is computed there are about 15,000 in Shakespeare. The racy marrow that lay in the popular vernacular was used by the drama ; the quaint technique with which the performances abounded, served again as grist. Small wonder, then, that we look with such pride upon the Elizabethan Age.

Last benison of all to literature, it created blank verse and thus handed on to Milton the torch with which he glorified our poetry.

How did it affect our National Life ? It focussed the patriotic feeling of the nation and enabled Englishmen to feel more clearly and intensely, that spirit of nationality which had been growing up ever since the battle of Bosworth. The average man learned his history at the theatre ; he understood as he had never done before, something of the country's story, of its struggle in the past, of its fight for freedom, of its weakness in times of civil strife. He saw the evils of Court favouritism, of kingly oppression, and of ecclesiastical tyranny.

Such plays as Henry V stirred the playgoer much as Chevy Chase stirred Sir Philip Sidney. Not only in Shakespeare but in Jonson, Heywood, Chapman, Beaumont and Fletcher, the epic of Britain and the tale of British glory was chanted.

The Puritan may have looked askance at the Playhouse ; and had reason for his drastic measures in the time of Charles. But he owed a rich debt to the drama for having stirred the conscience of the nation in the past, and given her so clear a vision of her corporate life.

(b) Its Nature

Drama may be defined as an articulate story presented in action.

It must be articulate—that is, spoken ; for a pantomime is a story in action ; and the orator who declaims may give us an articulate story, though not necessarily in action. This articulate story presented in action is intended to appeal through the medium of another art—the art of mimicry, which is the actor's art. It must lend itself therefore to this secondary art, and in so far as it suggests matter that lies beyond the range of mimicry it fails in its intent.

The story must be articulate, it must also be in action. This constitutes Drama—but it does not differentiate effective from ineffective drama. That depends on the story, and for effective drama conflict of some kind is essential. There must be some clash between man and his surroundings. If the conflict be a trivial one, presented with a dash of caricature, we get a farce. If a serious one, ending happily for hero and heroine, we have a comedy. If a serious one with an unhappy ending, we term it a tragedy.

Turning now from this brief consideration of the nature of drama to its historical evolution, we are met by the fact that drama is the earliest of all the imitative arts.

(c) Its Origin and History

The origins of the drama have always been deeply rooted in the religious instincts of mankind. This is true of the Greek, Indian, Chinese, Egyptian, and also of the modern Christian drama. The ancient Greek drama never lost its kinship with the religious ceremonies of the people. Dionysus, God of Life and Death, the God of Wine, and of the fertile Earth, was the father of Greek Comedy and Tragedy. The production of a play was a sacred function that every citizen had a right to attend. The Roman drama was an offshoot of the Greek, but in the days of the late Empire it fell into a degraded and corrupt state. So, when Christianity became the state religion, the theatre was heartily frowned upon. But it was as futile to hope to suppress the drama as to suppress laughter and tears, and before long the Church was found utilising the very tendencies she had endeavoured to crush, so that it is true to say, the "cradle of the drama" in Europe, and more particularly in England, "rested on the altar." The clergy were obliged to find some method of teaching and explaining to the ignorant masses the doctrinal truths of religion. The services of the Church were in Latin, and even if the Bible had been accessible to the laity, few could read it. Hence, in very early times, the Gospel stories were illustrated by a series of living pictures in which the performers acted the story in dumb show.

In the next stage the actors spoke as well as acted their parts. Special plays were written by the clergies, at first in Latin and later in the vernacular French. These early plays were known as Mysteries or Miracles. The very word "mystery" bespeaks its ecclesiastical origin, since the word comes from the French Mystère derived from ministère, because the clergy, the ministerium or ministerium ecclesiæ, themselves took part in these plays.

In England the term Miracle is used indiscriminately for any kind of religious play, but strictly speaking the term Mystery is applied to the stories taken from the Scripture narrative, while Miracles are plays dealing with incidents in the lives of Saints and Martyrs.

The history of the English drama is rooted in lay as well as in religious history. It may be well at this point to sketch the main lines of development, before dealing in greater detail with the early plays that merged gradually into Elizabethan drama.

Pausing then to consider the lines of development shown by the drama from Plantagenet times down to the era of Elizabeth, we find certain distinctive stages, whilst underlying the entire movement is a twofold appeal.

The drama appeals to two instincts deeply rooted: (1) The craving for amusement. (2) The desire for improvement. This twofold appeal accounts for the complex origin of the drama, and enables us to differentiate the lay from the sacred element.

Regarding the first—the lay element and the craving for amusement—we note how that in the Middle Ages the juggler, the tumbler, and the jester ministered to the needs of the time. They are found in the twelfth century, and Langland tells us how gaily and unblushingly they flourished in the fourteenth century, though the serious-minded wished to restrain them "to a modest hilarity." Much of it was very primitive feeling, but there were dialogues and repartees of which fragments only have survived. The Middle Ages sorely needed a Peppys. Of those entertainers, the jester was the best. He lived by his wits in a very literal manner, disgrace and death following upon an unsuccessful sally and he survived into Shakespeare's day, though fallen then from his high estate to play the fool between the acts of a play. What he had been at his zenith we may judge from the picture of Touchstone, of Feste, and the Fool in Lear. Such debates as The Owl and the Nightingale influenced the development of the drama, for before Chaucer's time some of these were turned into story form (the story being borrowed from the budget of some wandering minstrel).

The most important entertainments of the Middle Ages, however, were supplied by the Pageants and the May Games, and by the Mysteries and Miracles of the Church. Roughly speaking, we may say that the Juggling and Clowning heralded the coming of Farce and Comedy, the Pageants anticipated the Historical Drama, whilst in the May Games we have a foretaste of the Masques and Pastoral Plays so popular in Elizabethan times.

Passing from the lay to the sacred element, it is remarkable what use the Church made of the rough humours already noted in the clownings and debates. The Church made skilful use of these, moulding them to her purpose and, in the parlance of a familiar tag, "combining instruction with amusement."

Drama is obviously inherent in the very ritual of the Church, and the Mass itself was a factor in dramatic development. The Seasons of the Year suggested the subject matter of Plays: Christmas, Easter, stories derived from the Bible, called Mysteries, stories from the lives of the Saints, called Miracle Plays. Early in the Middle Ages the clergy celebrated Holy Days—Christmas, Easter, &c.—by playing scenes from the Life of Christ.

The first positive stage in the development of the drama is marked by the performance of these stories in the church.

The second stage is reached when the play emerges from the church into the market-place. This was effected when the guilds were entrusted with the performances in the fourteenth century. It was customary for each craft to represent a play according to its particular trade. For instance, the Fishermen presented the Flood; the Vintners, the Marriage at Cana. The work was very seriously taken by the guilds, lack of competence and unpunctuality being met by heavy fines.

Performances were given on cars or scaffolds in the open spaces of the town. There was no attempt at scenery, but attention was given to stage properties. There was a monstrous head with movable jaws to represent Hell; and, in addition to a rich costume, the actor had some symbol to denote his part—e.g. St. Stephen had a stone; God was symbolised by the Papal dress.

The play of Noah gives us some insight into the nature of these plays, and shows the blinding of rough English humour with didactic purpose. For though the drama had its source in sacred story, in the method of telling we can trace the influence of the old English amusements—the pageants and May games, the horse-play of the juggler, and the quips of the jester.

Noah having finished the Ark, informs his wife of the fact, and begs her to enter Dame Noah, however having determined to go on a jaunt with a crony, declines the invitation with some finality of manner. After an altercation, in which the services of the son Japhet are enlisted, she is compelled to enter. But no sooner is than in a true shrewish spirit she boxes her husband's ears! And he finds, poor man, that although sheltered from one storm he has exposed himself to another.

On the whole, Miracle Plays proved more popular than Mysteries, probably on account of their fresher subject-matter. Each big town had its own cycle of plays—e.g. York, Chester, Coventry.

The third stage is reached when the Mystery and Miracle Play give place to the Morality and Interlude. In the Mystery and Miracle, serious and comic elements were interwoven. Now they part: the Morality presenting the serious and the Interlude the lighter side of things. The Morality was frankly didactic, dealing in abstractions and allegory. The characters typified certain qualities—e.g. Sin, Grace, Repentance. The Interlude aimed merely at amusement. Famous examples of both types of play are found in Everyman and the Four P's of Heywood.¹

Moralities continued to flourish up to the end of the sixteenth century, and were popular in the heyday of Shakespeare's fame.

The fourth stage sees the beginning of English tragedy; for Tragedy preceded Comedy, in England as in Greece. We have reached now the influence of the Renaissance, and see the effect of classical influences. Seneca's Tragedies, with their earnest and strenuous atmosphere, attracted the writers of the day; and Gorboduc, the first English drama, is the result. This was written by Sackville and Norton, and played before Elizabeth at Whitehall in 1562. When published it was called Ferrex and Porrex. Its intrinsic merits are slight, for it was frankly imitative, and its verse is stiff and lifeless. But the classical model served to give some form and coherence to the crude shapelessness of the drama at the time.

Of more importance at this period was the development of English Comedy, as exemplified by Ralph Roister Doister (c. 1566), and Gammer Gurton's Needle (1575), plays rich in English humour; the first (the better of the two) showing a keen sense of dramatic movement.

Let us resume now our consideration of the earlier forms of drama.

In the first place, the Miracle Plays

One of the earliest examples of the miracle play has been preserved in an Orleans MS., and concerns St. Nicholas. It is written in Latin, with old French refrains.

The play of *St. Nicholas*¹ affords a good illustration of what in the first place was merely an acted sermon. On the Saint's day, the image of the Saint was removed from its shrine and a priest dressed as the image took its place. The service commences but a pause is made; another priest, dressed as a rich heathen, comes in at the church door, approaches the shrine where he deposits his treasure and asks the Saint to guard it for him, while he is on his journey. As soon as the heathen has departed, robbers enter the church, creep up to the shrine and steal the treasure. Soon the heathen returns, and finding his treasure stolen flies into a rage, beats and upbraids the Saint who has failed to protect his property. Then the image moves, steps down from the pedestal, goes out and reasons with the robbers and compels them to restore their ill-gotten goods. Terrified, the thieves return to the church, and again place the treasure at the feet of the Saint. The image returns to its place. The heathen rejoices, and adores the image. Another priest now appears representing the Saint himself, and bids the heathen to worship God alone. The play ends with the conversion of the heathen to the true faith. The service then proceeds to a conclusion.

The great festivals of the Church's year afforded opportunities for these performances which gradually became more elaborate, singing and music being introduced; and eventually they became no longer mere ritualistic ceremonies but real dramas—as in the Easter Office and the Office of the Shepherd.

At an interval in the Easter Service three priests, representing the three Marys, slowly and sadly advance up the church to where a grave has been prepared. On the way they sing a lamentation; arriving at the grave, they see an angel arrayed in an alb, with a mitre on his head, a palm in his left hand, and a branch of candlesticks in his right. He asks them whom they seek, and the women reply, Jesus of Nazareth. The gospel narrative is followed and finally a priest, personating the Saviour, appears, announcing his Resurrection. The choir then burst in joyous Alleluas and the play ends with the singing of the Te Deum.

The Office of the Shepherds was performed on Christmas Eve. A cradle was placed on the altar and beside it an image of the Virgin Mary. A number of the clergy represented the shepherds and entered the church carrying crooks and having with them real sheep and dogs. Some of the shepherds pretend to go to sleep, while others watch their flocks. Suddenly a choir-boy, dressed as an angel, mounts the pulpit and, preceded by blasts from the trumpeters, announces the birth of Christ. Immediately a choir of singers in the clerestory sing "Glory to God in the Highest." The shepherds proceed up the church to the altar where other priests show them the child and bid them announce his birth to the people. The shepherds adore the Child and his Mother and march through the church singing a hymn of praise.

Another early Christmas play concerns the Slaughter of the Innocents. The part of the Innocents is taken by the choir-boys! The other characters by monks.

In one part of the church was erected a manger, in another a throne for Herod, still another represented Egypt. The story is then set forth in very few words, the choir singing anthems at intervals. At the end of the play, the choir-boys (having risen from the dead) enter the choir, the throne of Herod is occupied by Archelaus, and an angel bids the Holy Family return from Egypt. The performance concludes with the Te Deum.

The actors in these performances were the priests, monks, and members of the choir, but it is very probable that in distant towns and villages it would not always be possible to confine the actors to the clerical staff, hence laymen were allowed to take part in these representations.

An old Dutch novel called A Merye Jest of a man that was called Howleglas (Ulenespiegle) affords an instance of an amusing hoax by Howleglas on the priest at the customary Easter play, in which "11 of the simplest persons that were in the town played the 11 Marios."

The home of the drama was in the church, arising out of the services of the church, from the gradual union of dumb show, action, and speech, the dialogues at first in Latin, then in French or Anglo-Norman, and finally in English—the language of the common people—and at once the religious drama became exceedingly popular. The wandering minstrels, story-tellers, &c., quickly added them to their repertoire, and acted scenes from the Bible story or the legends of the Saints, to crowds of people outside the churches. The clergy at once proceeded to excommunicate these unauthorised players and began to give performances in their churches on a more extensive scale. At once the churches became so crowded that it became necessary to enact them in the churchyards, and probably on account of the desecration, they were very soon removed to the open spaces and streets.

The members of the city companies, the trade guilds and the wandering minstrels soon assisted in rendering them, and very soon the Christmas and Easter plays were brought together, and a cycle of short plays dealing with events from the Creation to the Last Judgment were formed.

When laymen began to act in them, comic interludes were introduced—although the clergy still took part.

Nor did acting altogether cease in the churches.

The first miracle play known to have been acted in England was the miracle play of St. Katherine, mentioned by Matthew Paris as having been acted at Dunstable about 1100. It was given under the direction of one Geoffrey, a schoolmaster from France, who borrowed from St. Albans the copes, books, &c., for the performance. During the night, Geoffrey's house was burnt down, and the costly vestments and properties were destroyed. The disaster led to Geoffrey forsaking the world and entering the monastery of St. Albans as a monk, and of which he became the Abbot in 1119.

William FitzStephen, a monk of Canterbury, wrote an account of the City of London, in which he mentions the miracle plays and their popularity; "London, instead of common interludes belonging to the theatres, has plays of a more holy subject—representation of those miracles, which the holy confessors wrought, or of the sufferings wherein the glorious constancy of the martyrs did appear." He also describes a play on the life of Thomas Becket.

At the end of the thirteenth century, these plays had passed into the hands of the laity, and were rendered by the trade guilds. The observance of the Festival of Corpus Christi came to be associated with the performance of these plays in which each guild or craft undertook to produce a scene. The simple miracle play had evolved into a series of plays that began with the Creation, covered the chief events in Bible history, and ended with the Day of Judgment.

Four great cycles of plays have come down to us—viz. York, Chester, Towneley (Wakefield), Coventry—besides a few fragments of plays that were acted in other places.

The York cycle forms one of the most interesting that have survived. It consists of forty-eight plays that were performed by the trade guilds from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century. Although only forty-eight have been preserved, the records of the city of York show that in 1415 fifty-one plays were acted. The number of plays varied according to the guilds taking part. Each trade guild was supposed to act a distinct play, and as the guilds grew or declined in numbers and importance, a new play was added, or one omitted when the guild was too poor to produce the play or had perhaps ceased to exist.

The York plays are written in the Northumbrian dialect, and an endeavour is made, by varying the metre and diction, to give suitable expression to the characters in the plays. They have dramatic life, and are on the whole reverent in tone. Even the bad characters receive sympathetic treatment.

Herod stands up for one oppressed, and Pilate rigidly observes justice.

The first play in the series deals with the Creation of the World, and the Fall of Lucifer. Three plays set forth the Fall of Man, and their expulsion from Paradise. Next follows the story of Cain and Abel. Cain refuses to obey the angel's command and give a tenth of his goods to God—arguing "if he be moste in mighte and mayne, what need has he?" The eighth and ninth plays deal with the building of the Ark, and the Flood, and were acted by the Shipwrights, Fishmongers, and Mariners, who introduced touches which amuse a modern reader but were doubtless received with becoming gravity by the mediæval audience. Indeed, such anachronisms are constantly occurring throughout the plays—g Noah, when he wishes to find out if the Flood has abated, casts out the lead; the duty of paying tithes is insisted on in Cain. The Nativity was played by the Thatchers' Guild and the Stable at Bethlehem was represented by a tumble-down building much in need of repair. The Shepherds bring as offerings a brooch with a little tin bell attached, a horn spoon, and some nuts threaded on a ribbon.

A number of plays deal with different incidents in the Life of Christ, the Passion and Crucifixion. The thirty-seventh play is the Harrowing of Hell—a play that always delighted the people, from its realistic presentation. A square, embattled tower—the entrance to which was through a huge and hideous dragon's gaping mouth, glaring eyes, enormous nose—represented the mouth of Hell.

"An hideous hole, all waste, withouten shape,
Of endless depth, o'erwhelmed with ragged stone,
With ougly mouth, and grisly jaws doth gape,
And to our sight confounds itself in one."

When the mouth was open, fire and smoke issued forth—produced by a brazier and bellows hidden behind. Drums were beaten and horns blown, tin cans were banged, and amidst all this din the devil and his imps leapt in and out the flames, dragging the wicked characters below and stirring up the unfortunate people consigned to Limbo. Christ comes to deliver his Saints from torment, but the evil-doers are left.

Other plays follow, dealing with the Resurrection, Ascension, &c., and finally the Day of Judgment. A full list of the plays performed in 1415, and the parts taken by each guild, was drawn up by Roger Burton, the Town Clerk of York, and still exists. Other plays outside the cycle were also acted in York. A play of St George on Midsummer Day; a play on the Lord's Prayer,¹ and a Creed play.

Whilst each play was in the hands of the trade guild, the city authorities exercised careful supervision and control. A proclamation was issued by the Mayor in which men were forbidden to go armed, with the exception of knights and squires, and to hinder the procession. The pageants might not be played but in the places assigned to them, and the actors were bidden to be ready to play "at the mid-hour between four and five in the morning." Disregard of these regulations involved heavy penalties. After a time the restriction of the pageants to certain places was removed, and it was ordered that "those persons should be allowed to have the play before their houses who could pay the highest price for it." In 1426 an attempt was made to have the plays performed on the Vigil of Corpus Christi, by the advice of William Melton of the Friars Minors, who commended the plays but disapproved of the "revellings, drunkenness, shouts, songs and other insolencies" which had disgraced the solemn procession in which the Sacrament was carried through the streets. The citizens, however, refused to accede to this, and the plays were performed on Corpus Christi Day and the procession was postponed until the next day.

THE TOWNELEY PLAYS

These were acted at Woodkirk, near Wakefield, and are sometimes known as the Wakefield Plays, deriving their first title from the fact that the MS. volume containing the text was discovered in the library of Towneley Hall in Lancashire. Some of the plays may have been acted at the two fairs which were held annually at Woodkirk. Five of the plays are almost identical with plays in the York cycle, and some of them were acted by the trade guilds of Wakefield.

The second Shepherd's Play is prefaced by a comic interlude that has been described as the first farce in the English language.

The shepherds are out in the fields on Christmas Eve, they begin to grumble at the weather, their heavy taxes:

"We are so lamed
We are made hand-tamed
With these gentilly men", of the trials of matrimony:

"We silly wed-men dree mickle woo";

of their hard work and low wages. Presently they lie down to sleep, a notorious thief "Mac" with them. As soon as the shepherds are soundly snoring, Mac slips off with a fat sheep on his back. He hurries home and awakens his wife, Gill. She is afraid he will be hung. Mac declares he can get more by stealing than those who toil and labour, and mentions his many escapades. His wife reminds him:

"But so long goes the pot to the water
At last it comes home broken."

They decide in the end to put the sheep into the cradle, dressed as a babe, and pretend the child was born that night. They succeed after a good deal of effort in placing the sheep in the cradle, and cover it with a blanket. Mac then returns to the shepherds, lies down again and pretends to be asleep. One by one the shepherds waken, and begin to tell their dreams—how they had seen Mac clothed in a wolf's skin, carry off a sheep. They arouse the sham sleeper, who says he has dreamt that his wife has born him a son, he must hasten home and see if it is well. After his departure the shepherds miss one of the sheep, and suspecting Mac, they follow him home and demand admission to his house. They charge Mac with the theft.

They search the house but find nothing. One of the shepherds begs leave to kiss the child ere they go:

"Give me leave him to kiss, and lift up the clout:
What the devil is this? He has a long snout!"

The shepherds recognise the sheep by the mark on his ear, although Mac protests the child is a changeling. As a punishment Mac is tossed in a blanket, until the shepherds are tired. They lie down to sleep again, an angel appears singing "Gloria in excelsis," and exhorts them to rise and go to Bethlehem; the usual miracle play follows. The shepherds go to Bethlehem, with their gifts and worship.

The Wakefield cycle consists of thirty-two plays commencing with the Creation, which was acted by the Barbers of the town. The second play deals with Cain and Abel. In the character of Garcia, Cain's servant, appears the first clown, that later developed into the Fool of Shakespeare's plays.

Garcia addresses the audience on his entry:

"All hayle—all hayle, both blithe and glad
For here come I a merry lad,
Be peasse your dyn (cease your noise) my master bad,
Or else the devil you spode.

Fellowes, here I you forbode,
To make nother nose, ne cry;
Who so is so hardy to do that dede,
The deville hang hym up to dry."

The usual series of plays follow: Noah; Abraham and Isaac, Jacob and Esau, the Old Testament prophecies of Christ, Pharaoh; the taxing of the world by Caesar Augustus; the Annunciation, Salutation, and Nativity, the Visit of the Wise Men, the Flight into Egypt, the Slaughter of the Innocents, the Purification, Jesus among the Doctors, John the Baptist, the Last Supper, three plays on the Passion and the Crucifixion, Harrowing of Hell, the Resurrection, the Appearance of Christ to the Disciples, the Ascension, Doomsday, the Raising of Lazarus, and the Hanging of Judas.

THE CHESTER PLAYS

The Chester plays show a more serious and didactic purpose than the other cycles. The plays, of which there are twenty-five, were acted by the trade companies of the city on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in Whitsun week from 1268 to 1577, and again in 1600. The series commences with the Fall of Lucifer, acted by the Tanners, next came the Creation and the Fall. The Creation was rendered more realistic by sending into the crowd as many strange animals as could be obtained, and by sending a flight of pigeons into the air.

The Deluge, again afforded opportunities for humorous treatment. The refusal of Noah's wife to enter the Ark occasions wordy warfare between the two:

Noah. Good wyffe, doe nowe as I thee bydde—
Noah's Wife. Be Christe, not or I see more neede
Thou stand all the daye and stare."

Eventually the Ark is finished, and all enter. Noah's wife, in strong language, declines to enter unless her gossip come in also. Noah may row where he likes and get a new wife. At last Japhet compels his mother to enter by main force, whereupon she boxes Noah's ears!

The Sacrifice of Isaac, which forms the fourth play in the Chester series, has in it a pathetic element. God calls to Abraham to take his son Isaac and offer him as a sacrifice. Abraham obeys with willingness. He tells Isaac to get ready:

"O Isaake, my darling deare,
My blessing now I give thee heere,
Take up this faggot with good sheere
And on thy backe it bring,
And ser with us I will take."

They go to the place of sacrifice, where Isaac is frightened at seeing his father carrying a sword. Abraham at last tells Isaac he must kill him:

"Alas father, is that your willle
Your owne chuld for to spill
Upon this hilles brink.
If I have trespassed in any degree
With a yard you may beat me;
Put up your sword, if your will be,
For I am but a chuld."

Abraham replies that he must obey God's command. Isaac then says:

"Father seeing you must nedes doe see
Let it pass lightly and over go
Kneeling on my knees two
Your blessing on me spread"

Isaac is bound and laid on the altar, but at the critical moment the angel appears and his hand is stayed. God appears and pronounces a blessing on Abraham and his seed. At the close of the play a messenger rides through the crowd to announce the coming of the next pageant of Balaam and his Ass, a play that is only found in the Chester collection. This was followed by the usual series.

THE COVENTRY PLAYS

A complete cycle of plays have been preserved which are said to have been acted at Coventry on the Festival of Corpus Christi. Thus, however, rests on uncertain evidence, and if the plays belong to Coventry it is thought probable they were acted by the Grey Friars of the town and were not connected with the trade guilds. The MS. dates from the time of Henry VI (c. 1488), and consists of forty-two plays which were, however, not all acted in one year—the custom being to perform the first twenty-eight in one year, and the remainder the next year.

Apart from these plays, Coventry was famous for its religious dramas. The trading companies acted Miracle Plays from a very early date unto 1580, when the performances were suppressed for a time. They were revived in 1584 for a brief period, but the days of the miracle play were over, and in the year 1591, took place the last performance in Coventry.

Heywood (1530), in his Four P's, refers to the Coventry plays:

"For as good hap would have it chance,
This devil and I were of old acquaintance,
For oft, in the play of Corpus Christi
He hath playd the devil at Coventrie."

The character of Herod in the Coventry plays offers an example of early melodrama. Herod is a braggart:

'I stamp, I stare, I luke all about,
Might I take them I would turn them on hot coals.
I run, I rave, and now I am mad.'

Herod was dressed as a Saracen in a gown of gaudy colours. He wore red gloves, and bore a sceptre and painted wooden sword. His face was concealed by a mask, and he wore an iron helmet on his head. He rageth on the platform, he descends into the street and rageth again.

As these plays were acted as late as 1591, it has been thought probable that Shakespeare may have witnessed them. In addition to these cycles of plays, single plays were acted in various parts of the country; at Newcastle-on-Tyne and in Cornwall, where they were enacted in round enclosures of earth and stone.

THE PRODUCTION OF THE PLAYS

The records of the cities which produced these plays contain many entries with respect to their production. The guild having had a play assigned to it was bound under heavy penalties to enact the play every year, and contributions towards the expenses were levied upon each member. The next step was to procure the pageant book. If a new play was required, a learned monk or scholar was commissioned to write it. The selection of the players, the rehearsals, the furnishing, the properties, dresses, and simple scenery were matters considered with care and attention. The plays, as we have already noted, were acted upon a movable stage or "pageant" scaffold upon four or six wheels, divided into two parts or rooms, an upper and a lower. The upper was either open at the top or covered in with a canopy, the lower room, enclosed with painted cloths, served as a dressing-room for the performers. The lower part frequently represented Hell—the stage itself the Earth—the upper part Heaven. On the great day of the pageant, the narrow streets were thronged with crowds of people, many of whom had travelled long distances to witness the performances. Lords and ladies, knights and squires mingle with monks and pedlars—yeomen and their wives, palmers, pilgrims, merchants, tradesmen, and apprentices jostle each other.

The Heralds ride through the streets, and pre-coded by trumpeters read the Bans or proclamations; the plays were then acted, each in their order, at the proper stations.

The miracle plays ceased to be acted about 1600, but by that time the regular drama was established. The miracle plays had performed their work, they had spread through the land a love of acting, and stimulated men's minds to the comprehension of the essentials of the drama. The common people had already a national tradition so strong that when attempts to conform the English drama to the classical models were made, the native genius asserts itself even in these, until in Shakespeare it reaches the supreme height of the Romantic School.

MORALITY PLAYS

Moralities began to be acted in the reign of Henry VI, and like the miracle plays continued to flourish until the beginning of Elizabeth's reign. The morality is a drama in which the characters are allegorical, symbolical, or abstract—the main purpose of the play being didactic. The allegorical characters to be found in some of the earlier miracle plays owe their introduction to religious sources. They are not essential to the story. One of the earliest morality plays was The Castle of Perseverance (c. 1400, Henry V), a drama of the old faith. The spiritual progress of Mankind from the day of his birth to the Day of Judgment is set forth. The world, the flesh and the Devil enter boasting their might. The Good and Bad Angels strive to possess the Soul of Mankind. He forsakes the Good Angels and consorts with the Seven Deadly Sins. From their power he is released by Confession and Penance and safely lodged in the Castle of Perseverance. The Seven Deadly Sins attack the Castle and are repulsed by the roses discharged by the Virtues—the symbols of the Passion. He is lured from the Castle by Avarice, and in spite of warnings he gives himself to her. Finally Death claims him, and in terror he prays to Misericordia. Dying, he appears before the throne in heaven and his soul awaits judgment. "Let him drink as he brewed" is the claim of Justice; but Mercy pleads the Passion of Christ and the Soul of Mankind is saved.

The Interludes dealing with the Old Faith gave place to others that set forth the teaching of the Reformation, e.g. Hyche Scorne, Lusty Tentres (1550 ?), New Custom (1573 ?). Others concerned the New Learning, Nature of the Four Elements (1517-19), The Trial of Treasure (1567 ?).

By far the most popular of all the Moralities is that of Everyman, which has been reproduced in recent years—"by figure a moral play, showing how the Father of heaven sendeth death to summon every creature to come and give account of their lives in this world."

The Moralities with their allegorical characters led to greater attention being paid to the plot, whilst gradually the abstract personification began to emerge into real people with individual idiosyncrasies. The Moralities, like the Miracles, were adapted to the audience. Comic scenes were introduced to relieve the seriousness of these mediæval "problem" plays. The Vice, a character peculiar to the Morality, was allowed to enter between the scenes and amuse the people with a humorous interlude. The Devil was also a comic character. A number of plays exist in which the transition stages of the Morality can be plainly discerned. Comedy and Morality in Tor's Tuler and his Wife (1569), Tragedy and Morality in King Cambyeses (1561) and Apus and Virginia (1563), History and Morality in Bales' King Johan (c. 1548).

The Morality approaches nearer to the actual drama when abstract virtues and vices are replaced by real people.

THE INTERLUDES

The Interludes of John Heywood stand midway between the Moralities and the regular drama, since in the Interlude the allegorical characters have disappeared. The Morality was a sermon in disguise, the Interlude aimed at amusement and entertainment. It is possible that Interludes of music, jesting, story-telling, had always to a greater or lesser extent accompanied feasts and banquets, but it was left to John Heywood, in the reign of Henry VIII, to give the Interlude a definite place not only in literature but in the evolution of the drama. Heywood was born in North Mimms in Hertfordshire, he was a Roman Catholic and a friend of Sir Thomas More, who obtained for him his position at Court, as a producer of entertainments for the King's pleasure. This he kept through the reign of Edward VI and Queen Mary. On the death of Queen Mary he is said to have fled from the country. He died in exile sometime between 1577 and 1587.

The Mery Play between Johan Johan, the husband, Tib his Wife, and Sir John the Priest, printed in 1553, has been attributed to Heywood. This story of the intrigues of a cleric with a faithless and shrewish wife is of value as a specimen of early comedy and also as testimony to the licence allowed by Roman Catholic writers in treating of the established priesthood. The Interlude of the Four P's (1540), i.e. the Palmer, the Pardoner, the Poticary, and the Pedlar, is the best known of all the Interludes. Four servants attired according to their respective characters enter at the proper interval during the banquet. The Palmer describes the shrines he has visited, and the wonders he has seen ; the Pardoner replies that doubtless he has returned no wiser than when he went, he extols the gratifying benefits of his office :

" Give me but a penny or two pence,
 And as soon as the soul departeth hence,
 In half an hour, or three quarters at the mo
 The soul is in heaven with the Holy Ghost "

The Poticary now enters, and joins in the contention, declaring that no one enters heaven without the aid of the Poticary. Finally, the Pedlar enters and being asked what he has in his pack, opens it and discloses his wares, inviting the others to buy.

The Palmer answers :

" Nay, by my troth, we be like friars ;
 We are but beggars, we be no buyers "

A lively conversation ensues, followed by some part singing. The Pardoner renews the argument respecting the relative value of their callings, requesting the Pedlar to be the judge. He declares himself unfitted to judge of the greater matters, but he has observed they have one gift in common, in which he considers himself skilled enough to be their judge, and that is in lying ! Let them each make a trial of their skill in that direction, and see which of them can tell the greatest lie.

The Poticary tells the story of a marvellous cure, the Pardoner follows with a story of his visit to Purgatory and to Hell to recover a lost soul. He is allowed to enter the latter place through the friendly offices of the devil :

" For as good hap would have it chance
 The devil and I were of olde acquaintance,
 For oft in the play of Corpus Christi,
 He hath played the devil at Coventrie "

Being the soul of a woman, permission is readily accorded by Satan, since :

" All the devils within this den
 Have more to do with two women
 Than with all the charge we have beside . . . Apply thy pardons to women so,
 That unto us there come no mo ! "

The Palmer expresses great surprise and astonishment " that women in hell such shrews can be " He has travelled through many towns and cities throughout Christendom. He has seen five hundred thousand women, yet in all the places he has been, he had never seen or heard of " any woman out of Patience ! "

Poticary. By the Mass, there is a great lie
Pardoner. I never heard greater, by our ladye.
Pedlar. A greater ! Nay, know ye any so great ?

The Palmer is therefore awarded the prize

The Palmer. I am a Palmer, as ye see,
 Which of my life much part have spent
 In many a fair and far country :
 As Pilgrims do, of good intent.
 At Jerusalem have I been Before Christ's blessed sepulchre :
 The Mount of Calvary have I seen,
 A holy place, you may be sure.
 To Jehosaphat and Olivet
 On foot, God wot, I went right bare :
 Many a salt tear did I sweat,
 Before my carcase could come there,

Yet have I been at Rome also,
And gone the stations all a-row;
S. Peter's shrine and many mo,
Then, if I told all, ye do know¹

The Pardoner. I say yet again my pardons are such,
That if there were a thousand souls on heap,
I would bring them to heaven as good cheap
As ye have brought yourself on pilgrimage
In the least quarter of your voyage,
Which is far aside heaven, by God!
There your labour and pardon is odd.
With small cost and without any pain,
These pardons bring them to heaven plain:
Give me but a penny or two pence,
And as soon as the soul departeth hence,
In half an hour, or three-quarters at the most,
The soul is in heaven with the Holy Ghost²

Another Interlude by Heywood is The Mery Play between the Pardoner and the Frere, printed in 1533, but which was written before 1521.

The demand for entertainments of this kind led to the formation of small companies of actors being maintained in the houses of great noblemen. Successful Interludes were given in public when leave was granted to the players. The freedom with which questions of religion and politics were handled in these entertainments led to restrictions and penalties. Thus it came about that with the inauguration of the regular drama—companies of players were ready to perform in them.

Gorboduc

The first English tragedy was written by Thomas Sackville and Thomas Norton, and was acted by the Gentlemen of the Inner Temple before Elizabeth, on the Banqueting Day of the Grand Christmas festival of the Inner Temple, January 18, 1561.

Sackville, who afterwards became Lord Buckhurst, had already attained a reputation as a poet, by his sonnets and the Induction to the Mirror for Magistrates.

The argument of the play is as follows:

"Gorboduc, King of Britain, divided his realms in his lifetime to his sons Ferrex and Porrex. The sons fell to dissension. The younger killed the elder. The mother, that more dearly loved the elder, for revenge killed the younger. The people moved with the cruelty of the fact, rose in rebellion, and slew both father and mother. The nobility assembled, and most terribly destroyed the rebels; and afterwards for want of issue of the Prince, whereby the succession of the crown became uncertain, they fell to civil war, in which both they and many of their issues were slain, and the land for a long time almost desolate and miserably wasted."

The story is divided into five acts. Norton wrote the first, second, and third, and Sackville the fourth and fifth. The action takes place behind the scenes, and each act ends with a chorus, in imitation of the tragedies of Seneca. It departs from the classical model in the use of dumb show and is written in blank verse—first used by Surrey in translating a part of Virgil's Æneid, and now for the first time applied to the drama.

Gorboduc treats of an episode in national history, the story being taken from Geoffrey Monmouth's Chronicle, chosen for the specific purpose of emphasizing the need for "concord and unity" at this particular time, and the evils that arise from civil dissensions. The play pleased the Queen so much that it was acted again a fortnight later. A pirated edition of the play was printed in 1565 by one William Griffith, who "getting a copy thereof at some young man's hand that lacked a little money and much discretion, in the last great Plague Anno 1565 about five years past, while the said lord was out of England and T. Norton far out of London, and neither of them both made privy put it forth exceedingly corrupted." The authorised version, which is thus prefaced, was issued in 1570.

The following may serve as an illustration of the metre of the play:

Videna (the Queen) (Alone) Why should I live, and linger forth my time
In longer life to double my distress?
O me, most woeful wight, whom no mishap
Long ere this day could have bereaved hence.
Might not these hands, by fortune or by fate,
Have pierced this breast, and life with iron reft?
Or in this palace here, where I so long
Have spent my days, could not that happy hour
Once, once have happened, in which these buggy frames
With death by fall might have oppressed me?

Both the Misfortunes of Arthur, acted before the Queen at Greenwich in 1587, and Tancred and Gismunda (1568), follow Gorboduc in construction, but the classical type of play soon died out.

Ralph Roister Doister

The first regular English comedy, based on the model of the Latin comedy, was produced in 1541 or earlier. The play is usually attributed to Nicholas Udall, head master of Eton from 1534 to 1541. Udall was born in Hampshire in 1506. He was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and came under the influence of the teachings of More, Colet, and Erasmus. Udall and a number of other young men were arrested in 1527 by order of Wolsey, for possessing Tyndale's translation of the New Testament and Luther's Tracts. The students saved their lives by making a public recantation. After leaving Oxford, Udall seems to have become a schoolmaster in the North. In 1533 Udall was in London, and shortly afterwards was appointed headmaster of Eton, where he remained until 1541.

It was the custom at large public schools to act Latin plays on special occasions. The idea seems to have occurred to Udall to substitute an English play for the usual comedy from Plautus or Terence. Hence the production of Ralph Roister Doister.

Ralph Doister, the hero of the play, is a braggart and a coward; he is wealthy but foolish. Matthew Merygreeke, a character modelled on the parasites of the classical plays by flattery and bullying, is able to fool Roister Doister to the top of his bent. He imagines that he is in love with Dame Custance who is already plighted to Gawm Goodluck, a merchant. While Goodluck is absent on a voyage, Ralph sends love tokens and messages to Dame Custance. The latter, although she has nothing but contempt for Ralph and his protestations, finding she cannot get rid of him, treats him with humorous raillery. A servant of Goodluck's reports to him the condition of affairs, and he returns filled with jealous suspicion. Dame Custance is now in a difficult position. She is finally extricated by the testimony of Tristram Trustie, and the admissions of Ralph himself. An amusing scene occurs when Dame Custance flouts his advances. Ralph declares he will fire her out of the house and destroy all her goods. The Dame calls forth her servants to do battle with the enemy.

I will call forth my folks, that without any mocks
If he come again we may give him raps and knocks.
Madge Mumblecrust, come forth and Tibet Talkapace
Yea and come forth too Mistress Annot Alyface.

An. Alyface I come

Tibet. And I am here

M. Mumble And I am here too, at length.

C. Custance Like warriors, if need be, ye must show your strength.

The man that this day hath beguiled you,
Is Ralph Roister Doister, whom ye know well now,
The most lout and dastard that ever on ground trod.

Tyb Talk I see all folk mock him when he goeth abroad.

C. Custance. What, pretty maid? will ye talk when I speak?

Tyb Talk No, forsooth, good mistress.

C. Custance Will ye my tale break?

He threatened to come luther with all his force to fight,
I charge you if he come, on him with all your might.

M. Mumble I with my distaff will reach him one rap.

Tyb Talk. And I with my new broom will sweep him one swap.

And then with our great club I will reach him one rap

A. Alyface. And I with our skimmer will fling him one flap

Tyb Talk Then Trupene's firefork will lum shrewdly fray,

And you with the spit may drive him quite away.

C. Custance Go, make all ready, that it may be even so.

Tyb Talk For my part I shrew them that last about it go" [Exeunt.]

Ralph Roister Doister, while based on a careful study of Plautus, is not an adaptation of any particular play. Roister Doister may suggest the Pyrgopolinios or the Miles Gloriosus; and Merygreeke the parasite Gnatho, yet there is a distinctly native element which shows Udall to have been a shrewd observer; like John Heywood, he sketches his characters from life, and his work is an important link in the history of the drama. The classical form has absorbed elements belonging to both morality and interlude. Morygreeke has many qualities common to the Vice of the Moralities. The dual nature of the play is marked by the title, "Comedie or Interlude," and Udall is justly entitled to be called the "Father of English Comedy."

Gammer Gurton's Needle

"A Ryght Pithy, Pleasant and merrie Comedie: Intytled Gammer Gurton's Needle: Played on Stage not longe ago in Christes Colledge in Cambridge—made by Mr. S. Mr. of Art." Thus runs the title-page of the earliest edition of this play, printed by Thomas Colwell in 1575. The authorship has been attributed to Bishop Still, John Bridges, and more recently to William Stevenson,² a Fellow of Christ's Colledge from 1559–1581. Like Ralph Roister Doister in structure and form, it is modelled on Latin comedy, but the matter and characterisation are native.

² Henry Bradley in Representative English Comedies, ed. C. Gayley.

Gammer Gurton's Needle is the second English comedy, and one of the few remaining examples of the college plays, that were probably very numerous in the sixteenth century. In this we see the Interlude of John Heywood expanded and developed under the influence of the foreign classical school. The play affords a picture of English village life in Tudor times.

Gammer Gurton loses her needle—at that time an article of value; Diccon the Bedlam accuses Dame Chat the Alowife of stealing it. This upsets the whole village; the parson, the bailey, the constable, Doctor Rat—are all called in to assist in the emergency. The tumult and confusion increases, eventually the needle is found sticking in the breeches of Hodge, the Gammer's farm servant. The humour is heavy-handed and coarse, but the characterisation is vivid and skilful. Hodge has become a generic title for the farm labourer. Diccon represents a type common enough both before and after Shakespeare, but which has disappeared with the altered social conditions of modern days. Like "Poor Tom" (King Lear), Diccon is a half-witted wanderer, incapable of useful work and responsible for a good deal of mischief.

Gammer Gurton and Dame Chat are prototypes of generations of village gossips, who have, however, become more refined in the course of the centuries. On the whole, general opinion considers Gammer Gurton's Needle in merit to fall below that of Ralph Roister Doister.

Both plays follow the classical school in the division of the play into five acts, in beginning each new scene with the introduction of a new actor, in limiting the action to a single day, and the scene to a single street—before a row of houses.

Rowster Doister is stiffer and more formal in character than Gammer Gurton. The atmosphere of the latter is well illustrated by the famous drinking song, included in the play:

"Back and syde goo bare, goo bare,
Both hand and foot goo colde;
But Belly, God send thee good ale inoughe
Whether hyt be newe or olde.

I cannot eat but lytyll meate;
My stomache ys not goode,
But sure I thynke that I coude drinke
With hym that werythe an hooode
Drynke ys my lyfe; although my wyfe
Sometyme do chyde and scolde,
Yet spare I not to pleye the pottie
Of jolly good ale and olde.

Back and syde goo bare, goo bare,
&c. &c.

I love no roste but a browne toste
Or a orabbe in the fyer
A lytell bread shall do me steade
Mooch breade I never desyer.
Nor froste, nor snowe, nor wynde I trow
Can hurt me yf hyt wolde;
I am so wrapped withyn and lapped
With jolly good ale and olde."

One thing is clear from these works, and that is the gradual approximation of the drama to the life of the day—especially the comedy side. There is real vitality, but so far little literary grace or power. This gift, however, was now to be bestowed.

GAMMER GURTON'S NEEDLE

The initial stages of this glorification are due to a new school that had arisen, called "The University Wits"—a professional set of literary men. Of this little constellation, Marlowe is the central sun, and round him revolved as minor stars, Lyly, Greene, Peele, Lodge, and Nash.

JOHN LYLY was born c. 1554, and at the age of fifteen was sent to Magdalen College, Oxford, where he matriculated in 1571. At the time of taking his degree two years later, he was in some trouble with the college authorities, and known as a noted wit "averse to crabbed studies of logic and philosophy . . . and bent to the pleasant paths of poetry." His endeavour to procure a Fellowship through Lord Burghley being a failure, he then finished his arts course at Oxford in 1575, meanwhile studying at Cambridge, and was incorporated M.A. in 1579, during which time he was writing his noted Euphues, said by Charles Kingsley to be "as brave, righteous, and pious a book as man need look into."

Euphues was printed by Gabriel Cawood and published early in 1579. It at once made its author famous; a second edition was issued in August the same year, and eight subsequent editions appeared within seven years as well as a Dutch translation. The fame of Euphues brought Lyly into touch with Lord Burghley, who offered him employment, and always ambitious to get into Court circles, he at once accepted the post of Vice Master of St. Paul's and Savoy companies of child actors, for whom he composed several light dramatic pieces. He hoped that this post might lead to the important post of Master of Revels at the Court of Elizabeth, but in this he was disappointed, and on the St. Paul's company being disbanded in 1591, Lyly was out of employment.

Turning his attention to politics, he became several times Member of Parliament, and as a champion of the cause of the bishops in the Marprelate controversy wrote his celebrated tract, Pappe with an Hatchet, that is a sound boxe on the eare for the idiot Martin to hold his peace. This was privately printed in September 1589 under the pseudonym "Double V."

Little is known of Lyly after 1597, when he wrote some Latin verses in praise of the Queen. He died on November 30, 1606, and lies buried in the Church of St. Bartholomew-the-Less in the City of London.

His best known dramas include Alexander and Campaspe, probably played for the first time on New Year's Eve 1581; Sapho and Phao, 1584; Endymion (written round the friendship existing between the Queen and the Earl of Leicester), 1591; and Midas, 1592.

The plays of Lyly were written after the publication of Euphues (see post, p. 105), and were acted by "the children of Paul's before her Majesty." In character they were mythological or pastoral, and approximated to the Masque rather than to the narrative drama of Marlowe. They were written in prose intermingled with verse, and whereas the verse is almost wholly charming, the prose is often marred by the fantastic conceits that weary the reader of Euphues. Nor had Lyly that sense of the theatre displayed by many of his contemporaries, who lacked his sense of literary form and polished

wit. Among his plays are The Woman in the Moon, Campaspe, Midas, and Love's Metamorphosis.

But if his plays are less rich in concrete humanity, and in stage effectiveness, than those of Greene, Peele, and Lodge, his superior culture and finer sense of style provided compensations not to be despised. Perhaps the plays approximate more to the masques than the drama, and undoubtedly they gain by the interpolation of those delightful songs for which he was such an adept; yet his dialogue is really admirable at times, happy in clear-cut phrases and allusiveness. Finally, if not a born dramatist, he was a brilliant man, who did good service for the drama, on its more purely literary side.

GEORGE PEELE, of Devonshire origin, the son of James Peele, citizen and salter of London, was born about 1558, and as a free scholar was educated at Christ's Hospital from 1565-70. In March of the following year he went to Broadgate Hall (now Pembroke College), Oxford, and completed his degree in arts in 1579.

On leaving Oxford he came to London, where, in company with Marlowe, Greene, and Nash, he formed one of that band of dissolute young men endeavouring to earn a livelihood by literary work.

Peele was an actor as well as a writer of plays, for in 1589 we find him a member of the Lord Admiral's company, and two years later, when Queen Elizabeth visited Lord Burghley at "Theobalds," Peele was also present in his professional capacity.

Notwithstanding his profligate and irregular life, Peele was a hard worker; he not only wrote plays and poems but three pageants for ceremonial occasions in London.

The Arraignment of Paris, 1584; Edward I, 1593; The Battle of Alcazar, 1594; The Old Wives' Tale, 1595—the only known copies of these are one in the British Museum, and one in the library at Bridge-water House; David and Fair Bathsheba, 1599; and an earlier play now lost, entitled The Hunting of Cupid, supposed to have been written about 1591. Among other works may be mentioned Polyhymnia, 1590, a poem in blank verse, The Honour of the Garter, 1593; The Fall of Troy, published with A Farewell to Norris and Drake, 1589, and a thumb book 1½" x 1", with two lines on a page.

George Peele left behind him some half dozen plays, richer in poetic beauty than any of his group save Marlowe. His earliest work is The Arraignment of Paris; his most notable, perhaps, David and Bathsheba.

The Arraignment, which contains an elaborate tribute to the Queen, is really a Court Play of the Masque order; something akin to Lyly's work, but of a much higher dramatic power. It is essentially a Pastoral or Masque, shows great skill in the variation of metre, and if less musical on the whole than David and Bathsheba, has some striking passages of melodious beauty.

David and Bathsheba contains many lines of great beauty—not the rare sweeping beauty of Marlowe, but a gentler and more insinuating charm. Certainly, he shares with Marlowe the honour of informing blank verse with that musical quality that, in the later hand of Shakespeare, was to be one of its most remarkable characteristics.

Here is a passage :

Balthazar. Come, gentle Zephyr, trick'd with those perfumes
That erst in Eden sweeten'd Adam's love,
And stroke my bosom with thy silken fan.
This shade, sun-proof, is yet no proof for thee,
Thy body, smother than this waveless spring,
And purer than the substance of the same,
Can creep through that his lances cannot pierce :
Thou, and thy sister, soft and sacred Air,
Goddesses of life, and governess of health,
Keep every fountain fresh and arbour sweet ;
No brazen gate her passage can repulse,
Nor bushy thicket bar thy subtle breath.
Then deck thee with thy loose delightful robes,
And on thy wings bring delicate perfumes,
To play the wanton with us through the leaves.

THOMAS KYD (1558-95) was the son of a London notary, and received his education at Merchant Taylors' School. A dramatist and translator, he achieved great popularity with his first work The Spanish Tragedy, which was translated into German and Dutch, and in which Jonson is supposed by some to have been his collaborator. The record of his life and works is uncertain. He appears to have lived in straitened circumstances and suffered imprisonment "for treasonable and atheistical views." Cornelia, Jeronimo, The Rare Triumphs of Love and Fortune, Solyman and Perseda, and the Ur Hamlet are supposed to have emanated from his pen.

"Sporting Kyd," as Jonson called him, must be mentioned for his adherence to the Senecan School, and for popularising the "blood and thunder" element that proved one of the attractive features of the Pre-Shakespearean drama. Violent and extravagant he is always, but at any rate he helped to break away from the nerveless monotony of Gorboduc.

Putting aside his translation of Cornelia, The Spanish Tragedy is his only known play; and although its ranting style roused the contempt of Shakespeare, yet there are touches of genuine force behind the extravagances, and even extravagance is better than lifelessness.

Ghost. When this eternal substance of my soul
Did live imprison'd in my wanton flesh,
Each in their function serving other's need,
I was a courtier in the Spanish court.
My name was Don Androa, my descent,
Though not ignoble, yet inferior far
To gracious fortunes of my tender youth
For there in prime and pride of all my years,
By duteous service and deserving love,
In secret I possess'd a worthy dame,
Which hight sweet Bellimperia by name.
But, in the harvest of my summer joys,
Death's winter nipp'd the blossoms of my bliss,
Forcing divorce betwixt my love and me
For in the late conflict with Portingal
My valour drew me into danger's mouth,
Till life to death made passage through my wounds.
When I was slain, my soul descended straight
To pass the flowing stream of Achéron,
But churlish Charon, only boatman there,
Said that, my rites of burial not perform'd,
I might not sit amongst his passengers
Ere Sol had slept three nights in Thetis' lap,
And slak'd his smoking chariot in her flood,
By Don Horatio, our knight marshal's son,

My funerals and obsequies were done.
Then was the ferryman of hell content
To pass me over to the slimy strand,
That leads to fell Avernus' ugly waves.
There, pleasing Cerberus with honey'd speech,
I pass'd the perils of the foremost porch
Not far from hence, amidst ten thousand souls,
Sat Minos, Aeacus, and Rhadamant ;
To whom no sooner 'gan I make approach,
To crave a passport for my wand'ring ghost,
But Minos, in graven leaves of lottery,
Drew forth the manner of my life and death
"This knight," quoth he, "both liv'd and died in love ;
And for his love tried fortune of the wars,
And by war's fortune lost both love and life " 1

ROBERT GREENE, born about 1560, came from Norwich, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, which he entered at fifteen, and also at Oxford. He made an unfortunate choice of companionship, "amongst wags as lewde as my selfe," which followed him throughout his life.

Following the fashion of the day, he travelled abroad to the advantage of his literary power if not to his morals. On his return he lived hard and furiously; however, a fit of industry overtaking him he returns to Cambridge, this time to Clare Hall, and on taking his M.A. in 1583, left for London.

In 1580, while at Cambridge, he wrote his first work, Mamillia. On its publication in 1583 the heartiness with which it was received gave him fresh energy, and with a large number of adventurous tales and romantic stories, written usually at great pressure, sprang into fame.

"Easy come, easy go," soon found his purse "the bottom" of which "returned him a writt of non est inventus," and circumstance turns his hand to the drama, his patrons including Essex, Leicester, and Arundel.

In nature quarrelsome, he was seldom for any length of time on good terms with his friends, and his jealousy, especially of the young Shakespeare, took the form of a violent attack on him in his Epilogue to the Crow's Worth of Wit.

During one of his many fits of repentance, which were unfortunately neither deep nor lasting, he fell in love with "a gentleman's daughter of good account," whom he married in 1586, spent her fortune, and deserted her and his child a year later; she returned to her home and they never met again.

A few more years of work, riotous living, and repentances, his health gives way. After a surfeit of pickled herrings and Rhenish wine from which he never recovered, he died on November 2, 1592, in abject poverty, owing £10 to a poor shoemaker in whose house he lived.

The day before his death he wrote a pathetic letter begging his "sweet wife, as ever there was any good will or friendship between thee and mee" to "see my host satisfied of his debt" and to "Forget and forgive my wrongs done unto thee. . . Farewell."

His plays comprise Orlando Furioso, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay, Alphonsus King of Aragon, Looking Glass for London and England (with Lodge), and George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield. Among his other works the most important are Pandosto, from which Shakespeare took the plot for The Winter's Tale: Penelope's Web, and his partly autobiographical Groat's Worth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance.

Greene was a story-teller and pamphleteer who turned his attention to drama, chiefly because drama was a paying thing. Yet in so far as he is a story-teller, he manages to hold the reader's attention despite irrelevances and prolixities. But although he relies on some of the old devices of the Miracle and Morality, and does not disdain the mechanical funniments of the Interlude, he contributes to the development of the drama by his sincerity and real insight into character.

Let us take as an example his most effective play, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay. This deals partly with the tricks of the Friar (based on a legend of the famous Franciscan) and partly with a straightforward romantic love-story—though not too straightforward to admit of those complications between two men in love with one maid, that give variety and interest to the tale. There is comic relief of a kind, that doubtless pleased the more unsophisticated. But the chief merit of the play lies in the lively method of presenting the story. It is not uninteresting to compare Greene's necromancer—Bacon—with a similar character treated by Marlowe in Faustus. Greene's magician is merely an ingenious conjuror; Marlowe's a man of mystery. The one character shows merely a lively fancy, the other a vivid imagination.

Where Lyly excels in literary polish, and Peele in melodic charm, Greene achieves distinction in the vigorous humanity of his characterisation, and if Peele could write more charming love lyrics, Greene could handle better a love story.

Greene's dying exhortation to his brethren in the craft, has a curious interest for the historian as well as the student of character.

"To those gentlemen his quondam-acquaintance, that spend their wits in making plays, R G wisheth a better exercise and wisdom to prevent his extremities." Marlowe, "famous gracer of tragedians," is requested "to abandon his blasphemies and atheistical opinions." Nash is required to moderate his satire. Peele is singled out for encomium, "no less deserving than the other two, in some things rarer, in nothing inferior."

The theatre is execrated. "Base-minded men all three of you, if by my misery ye be not warned; for unto none of you, like me, sought those burrs to cloave—those puppets, I mean, that speak from our mouths, those antics garlished in our colours."

Finally, he points derisively to the "upstart crow beautified with our feathers, that, with his 'Tiger Heart wrapt in a Player's Hide,' supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you; and being an absolute Johannes factotum, is in his own conceit the only Shake-scene in the country." What vexes him is that one of the actors for whom he wrote should be the means of taking the bread out of the mouths of scholars.

The fact is that Greene, a vain and irritable man, is incessantly seeing the youthful genius Shakespeare sweeping all before him. The cry is comprehensible enough, for one of Greene's temperament, and some excuse may be made for him. But no utterance of that time more clearly shows the imperious power of the master dramatist of the age.

The dramatic work of Lodge and Nash is almost negligible; certainly they are inferior to their contemporaries, remarkable though they be in the domain of fiction.

We pass to the greatest of the band, to the great protagonist of Elizabethan drama—CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE.

In February 1564, in the parish church of St. George the Martyr, at Canterbury, the register bears witness that a certain small child, "the sonne of John Marlowe, a shoemaker," was christened Christopher.

Kit Marlowe's early years were spent in that quiet cathedral city, once the busy Mecca of devout pilgrims, now a resting-place for courtiers and ambassadors on their way to and from the Continent. Educated at the King's School, Canterbury, through the help of a patron he went up to Cambridge in 1581, and obtained his degree in 1583. Of his life after 1583, little is known. In 1587 his first play, Tamburlaine, was produced, and took the public ear at once, by reason of its impetuous force, its splendid command of blank verse, and its sensitiveness to beauty.

Tamburlaine is a Scythian shepherd obsessed with the idea that his mission in life is to be "the scourge of God" and a terror to the world till "Immortal Jove says, Cease, Tamburlaine!" He pursues and overcomes the mightiest monarchs of the Eastern world with the bloodthirstiness of a savage beast, captive kings drag his chariot to the field of battle for further conquest, and with their queens imprisoned in cages, at length dashing out their brains rather than exist for further indignity. Yet Tamburlaine is possessed of a personal magnetism that cannot be withstood:

"Sooner shall the sun fall from his sphere
Than Tamburlaine be slain or overcome"

says the Persian warrior sent to quell him.

Cowardice is an abomination for which he slays one of his sons; and to teach them endurance he does not hesitate to lacerate his own flesh. Smitten with pain and sickness, "the ugly monster Death," though he follow, cannot instil terror into him—"Let us march," he says, "and weary Death with bearing souls to hell"—but even Tamburlaine the mighty conqueror must yield place to a mightier.

Tamburlaine was succeeded by The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus, in which the dramatist gives an old mediæval legend a glowing Renaissance setting. The story of the alchemist who sells his soul to the Devil never lost its fascination, and in late years Faustus became more of the heartless sensualist than the headstrong magician. It was in this form that Goethe found the story and turned it to his own use. In the ancient legend the Faustus barter his soul in return for some years of gaiety and pleasure. Marlowe's Faustus desires pleasure also, but incidentally only, it is every form of joy that he would drink off freely. He is a genuine incarnation of the Renaissance spirit, and has nothing of that calculating, introspective nature peculiar to Goethe's gentleman. Following Faustus came The Jew of Malta, a play rich in fine episodes, and with a glorious opening, but lacking the grip and imaginative appeal of the earlier plays. Edward II, his last play, is from the technical point of view also his best. Lacking the intensity and rhythmic beauty of the earlier plays, it shows rare skill of construction, while the characterisation is wholly admirable. To some extent no doubt it inspired Shakespeare's Richard II, and the abdication scene is obviously modelled on Marlowe's.

Marlowe's other work for the stage is almost negligible. The Massacre of Paris survives, it is true, in a fragmentary and corrupt condition, but this dramatisation of contemporary French History is strangely lacking in power and interest. The Tragedy of Dido, written in conjunction with Nash and published after Marlowe's death, has a certain lyric sweetness, but bears little impress of Marlowe's greatness, and is supposed to be an early work, greatly altered and added to by his collaborator. A great portion of Henry VI is from Marlowe's pen, and more happily reminiscent. But the outstanding work, putting aside the four plays above discussed, is the fragmentary Hero and Leander, a poem of singular freshness and beauty.

In 1593 Marlowe, probably retreating from the plague then raging at London, stayed in the little village of Deptford, and was here slain in a drunken brawl by a "hawdy serving man, and a rival of his lewd love." He was then twenty-nine years of age, and his brief, strong life, albeit its tragic close, had done much to renovate and glorify the English drama. A rebel in thought as well as in imagination, Marlowe reminds us of his own Faustus. His genius had serious limitations. Deficient as it was in humour, sympathetic insight, and subtlety, along its own lines it was supremely great.

Marlowe had dreamed his early dreams in the great cathedral city. And a dreamer he always remained. For despite his roving life and dissipation, despite his full-blooded vitality and love of the world, his real compelling life was the life of the imagination.

His Writings

What did he do? (1) He raised the subject matter of the drama to a higher level. He provided big heroic subjects that appealed to the imagination: Tamburlaine—a world conqueror, Faust in pursuit of universal knowledge, Barabas with fabulous dreams of wealth; Edward II with his mingling nobility and worthlessness, sounding the heights and depths of human nature.

The insatiable spirit of adventure; the master passions of love and hate; ideals of beauty; the greatness and littleness of human life—these were his subjects. That he had the knowledge and power to deal with them adequately, could not be said, but it is sufficient that he interested his fellow-men in them, and recalling his brief, meteoric, and unhappy life, it is marvellous, not that he made so many mistakes, but that his achievements were so high.

(2) He gave life and reality to his characters.

They were no longer puppets pulled by a string; but living and breathing realities. You can feel the fierce exaltation of the conqueror, Tamburlaine; the vibrant passion and rapturous longing of his Faust; the fierce selfishness of his Barabas.

(3) He took the blank verse of the Classical School, hard and unflinching as a rock, and struck it with his rod till the waters of human emotion gushed forth. The old rhyming lines of Romantic drama he put aside; blank verse had little grip, when he took it in hand, but he fathomed its immense possibilities, and saw how it could be made the expression of the finest wit or the most delicate fancy.

Its "infinite variety" was beyond his power to express; that remained for his successors to show; but its colour and energy he revealed. He "taught successors to play upon its hundred stops" if he could not play upon them himself.

How did he do it? He found blank verse consisting of lines, each ending with an accented monosyllable, each line standing by itself; a thing of nerveless monotony. He varied the rhythmic pauses, altered the accents, made the metre to suit the subject, instead of fitting the subject to the metre; and bade farewell to the "jiggling veins of rhyming mother wits; and such conceits as clownage keeps in pay."

(4) He gave a unity to the drama, hitherto lacking.

Plays before had been formless: a succession of isolated scenes often with no proper connecting link. And although, compared with Shakespeare, the work of Marlowe seems often turgid and unwieldy, yet it shows quite sufficient promise to show us the extent of Shakespeare's indebtedness.

Indeed it was many years before Shakespeare could rise to Marlowe's height, and fine and interesting as is Richard II—it was not merely modelled on Edward II, but falls short of that play in its characterisation and imaginative power.

Of Marlowe's influence on Shakespeare, more will be said later. It is sufficient to note it and emphasize here the direction in which the influence lay.

Reviewing the trend of Marlowe's work, these points then have to be borne in mind:

- (1) He glorified the matter of the drama—by his sweep of imagination (vide Stories).
- (2) He vitalized the manner and matter of the drama—by his energising power (vide Characterisation).
- (3) He clarified and gave coherence to the drama (vide Verse).

Marlowe saw clearly enough that the Romantic drama was suited to the needs of the nation, and that therefore no other form of drama could express so well its abundant, concrete life. But he saw also that for the Romantic drama to be a thing of beauty as well as a force, the medium of blank verse must be chosen. No finer tribute was paid him than that given by Michael Drayton, in Epistles of Poets and Poesy (1627):

"Neat! Marlowe, bathed in the Thespian springs
Had in him those brave transalpine things
That the first poets had: his raptures were
All air and fire which made his verses clear;
For that fair madness still he did retain
Which rightly should possess a poet's brain."

¹ Ingenuous.

"Fair madness" is a satisfying phrase fit to rank beside the noble suggestion of Keats, that "Poetry should please by a fine excess."

Marlowe's work has three marked characteristics:

- (1) Its pictorial quality;
- (2) Its ecstatic quality;
- (3) Its vitalising energy

(1) Its pictorial quality.—Marlowe has been called the Father of English Dramatic Poetry; just as Defoe is termed the Father of English Fiction, and Chaucer the Father of English Narrative Poetry.

There were, of course, pictorial possibilities in the disjointed efforts preceding, but the effect on the imagination may be compared with that of a cheap magic lantern to a fine dissolving one. We are given occasional flashes of life with much that was blurred and chaotic. The old chronicle plays meandered on with no sharp visualising power; the imitations of Seneca, the comedy ventures à la Plautus, lack not only life, but charm of presentation.

Sackville's lines drag; Lyly's affectations worry; but Marlowe with his instinct for selecting those scenes that best impress the imagination and those similes that strike home most effectively, made of the drama a thing of beauty.

With Keats and Morris, Marlowe shares an intense appreciation of colour effects, there is the glitter of gold and scarlet about his verse:

"The pavement underneath thy chariot wheels
With Turkey carpet shall be covered,
And cloth of arras hung about the walls;
I'll oblige for thy princely eye to pierce;
A hundred bassoes clothed in crimson silk,
Shall ride before thee on Barbarian steeds,
And when thou goest, a golden canopy
Enclas'd with precious stones . . ."

In reading those lines we think of the rich ornament in The Eve of St Agnes.

The magic of old-world names holds him. He treats them like jewels to give warmth and colour to his verse:

"Is it not passing brave to be a king
And ride in triumph thro' Persepolis?"

Here indeed is the poet's joy in words.

And there is reason for it. It has been well said that Tamburlaine was the work of the first great poet who uses our modern English speech. And superb was the use he made of it.

Compare the dragging and toneless lines of Gorboduc with Tamburlaine, and note how the verse glitters and sparkles.

"O hard and cruel hap, that thus assigned
Unto so worthy a wight so wretched end,
But most hard, cruel heart, that could consent
To lend the hateful destinies that hand
By which, alas, so heinous crime was wrought!"

Tamburlaine's eager and feverish search across the world for some vision to satisfy his dreams reminds us of

"The desire of the moth for the star;
Of the night for the morrow;
The devotion to something afar
From the sphere of our sorrow."

¹ Gorboduc.

But the pictorial quality is no mere visualising of a dreamer's fancy, it shows the inspiration of that spirit of adventure which was in the air.

Tamburlaine is a kind of monstrous Drake. His thirst for conquest, his passion for discovery, is the passion of Drake, of Hawkins, and of Frobisher. In Tamburlaine's last speech he speaks of what may yet be discovered, and it is a speech which would flush the cheeks of the swarthy sailors in the audience. We have always to remember that Columbus is the pioneer of the age no less than More; and that many poets of the time, like Raleigh, were also voyagers.

(2) Its ecstatic quality.—This is well exemplified in the speech of Faustus:

"Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss.

(Kisses her.)

Her lips suck forth my soul! See, where it flies!

Come Helen, come give me my soul again—

Here will I dwell, for Heaven is in these lips;

And all is dross that is not Helen!"

It is indeed a fire that burns through his verse, and gives it glow and radiance, mellowing the harsh crudities and coarse outlines:

" . . . Ah, my good Lord, be patient, she is dead
And all this raging cannot make her live;
If words might serve, our voice hath rent the air;
If tears, our eyes have watered all the Earth;
If grief, our murdered hearts hath streamed forth blood,
Nothing prevails, for she is dead, my Lord.
Had I as many souls as there be stars—
I'd give them all for Mephistopheles."

Here is the thirst for beauty expressed:

"What is beauty, sayeth my sufferings, then?
If all the pens that ever poets held
Had fed the feeling of their masters' thoughts,
And every sweetness that inspired their hearts,
Their minds and muses on admired themes;
If all the heavenly quintessences they still
From their immortal flowers of poetry,
Wherein, as in a mirror, we perceive
The highest reaches of a human wit;
If these had made one poem's period,
And all combined in beauty's worthiness,
Yet should there hover in their restless heads
One thought, one grace, one wonder, at the least,
Which into words no virtue can digest."

What matter for drama the Northern Sagas would have yielded him: Lohengrin, Tannhäuser, the story of Sigurd?

The ecstatic note in his verse is seen also in Barabas:

Barabas is waiting for his daughter, who has tricked his foes of their treasure; simulating love and religion to further her father's base projects. Thus, Barabas:

" . . . Like the sad-presaging raven that tolls
The sick man's passport in her hollow beak,
And in the shadow of the sun at night
Doth shake contagion from her sable wings,
Vex'd and tormented runs poor Barabas
With fatal curses towards these Christians.
The uncertain pleasures of swift-footed time
Have ta'en their flight, and left me in despair;
And of my former riches rests no more
But bare remembrance; like a soldier's scar,
That has no further comfort for his maim.
O Thou, that with a fiery pillar led'st
The sons of Israel through the dismal shades,

Like Abraham's offspring; and direct the hand
Of Abigail this night! or let the day
Turn to eternal darkness after this!
No sleep can fasten on my watchful eyes,
Nor quiet enter my distemper'd thoughts
Till I have answer of my Abigail."

Then the treasure is found and thrown down to him

"O my girl,
My gold, my fortune, my felicity,
Strength to my soul, death to mine enemy;
Welcome the first beginner of my bliss!
O Abigail, Abigail, that I had thee here too!
Then my desires were fully satisfied:
But I will practise thy enlargement thence:
O girl! O gold! O beauty! O my bliss!"

[Hugs the bags.]

In his joy he forgets danger, until reminded of it by his daughter. He, softened and excited, kisses her, and rises into sentimental raptures:

"Farewell my joy, and by my fingers take
A kiss from him that sends it from his soul."

A cursory examination of Marlowe's work might incline the reader to think that his nature was highly passionate. Of passion, however, in the primal, full-blooded sense of the word, there is really little in Marlowe's writings. He is rather excitable and ecstatic, moved to exuberant expression by certain appeals to the imagination, such as the appeal of beauty, but not profoundly emotional as were Shakespeare, or Beaumont and Fletcher, or Webster.
He never suggests the man of the world, the student of human nature, always the wistful visionary; living in a world of his own, a world of beauty and wonder.

(3) Its vitalising energy—Culminating proof of his originality and artistic instinct—he discarded the classic convention for the romantic. He saw clearly enough that the Romantic drama was better suited to the exigencies of insular genius.

This vitalising energy redeemed the Tamburlaine from absurdity, and gave a beauty and lifting power to the Faust legends which won the praise of Goethe.

He is not content with vague description, but actualises his subject—as in the pageant of the Seven Deadly Sins in Faustus. Many a mediæval poet had sung of them. Marlowe gives them life and reality.

To the modern reader, the gruesome physical touches strike as distasteful and jarring, where they do not merely amuse. But childish as some of the theatrical effects seem, these are but the overflowings of a strong and vital imagination.
One moment we think of Pyramus—thus is "Ercles vein, the tyrant's vein," and are reminded of the "Raging shocks and shivering shocks."

At the next moment we pass from the ridiculous to the sublime, and the vibrant music of his eloquence takes us by the throat and compels our admiration.

Marlowe's genius did not incline him much to the lyric, though his famous Passionate Shepherd shows what he could do in this direction. But his fragmentary narrative poem, Hero and Leander, has a fresh, sensitive beauty transcending the coarser magnificence of young Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis. The haunting line:

"Who ever loved that loved not at first sight!"

lingered long in Shakespeare's memory.

He had, of course, the defects of the temperament of his age: a frequent, over-luxuriance of imagination, a lack of restraint, an extravagance bordering on the ridiculous. But no criticism can obscure the greatness of his genius. He found the drama crude and chaotic; he left it a great force in English literature.

EARLIER RENASCENCE AND PROSE

The Novel: Lyly—Greene—Lodge—Sidney—Nash, &c.

THE ENGLISH NOVEL

THE eager, inquisitive spirit that flamed up at the Renaissance could not exhaust itself entirely in the expansion of our poetry, or even in the creation of the romantic drama, for in achieving this it realised also the compelling interest of everyday actualities.

The favourite story-teller of Chaucer's time had been the minstrel. He it was, as we have seen, who first familiarised the common folk with the legends of Arthur and his Knights, of Charlemagne, with such verse tales as Gauvain and the Green Knight, and the popular Guy of Warwick. Needless to say, the art of story-telling in the minstrel's hands was of a rough and crude kind. They broadened and coarsened the Arthurian Romances to suit the taste of their primitive-minded hearers; but in so doing they introduced a contemporary note, interlarding their tales with ridicule of the decadent mediæval church, and thus giving that flavour of actuality, which paved the way for the Novel of Elizabeth's time.

While they were doing this, our first great realistic poet, Chaucer, was helping with finer artistry to create a distaste for the high-falutin mediæval romance. He effected this directly in Troilus and Cressida, an ancient romance treated as a genuine character study; indirectly in his epic of contemporary life, The Canterbury Tales.

Here, then, in Chaucer's time is the first stage in the development of the Novel from the old Romance that had its inspiration in the songs of the minstrel.

The next stage is marked by the publication of Malory's Morte d'Arthur. With the matter of this remarkable book I have dealt elsewhere; it is sufficient to emphasize the fact that while ostensibly a great prose romance garnered from the romantic treasures of the Middle Ages, yet, by virtue of the simple directness of its language, it proved an admirable model to the prose story-teller of Renaissance England. The confusing intricacies, the long-windedness of the legendary tales on which it is based, are swept aside. Giving us the cream of mediæval romance, it yet awoke a desire for stories more in touch with the life of the day.

It is quite true that for many years to come, throughout the first half of the sixteenth century, Romance held a foremost place in the popular imagination, largely owing to the energy and enterprise of Caxton, who printed romantic stories from Spain, Germany, and Italy, to the infinite disgust of sober-minded Ascham. They ceased, however, to dominate the educated classes as they had done formerly. Even Malory's work was admired less for its matter than for its style. Romanticism survived, not the old romance. The Tales are still there, but the attitude towards them is different. The old romantic themes are yet familiar enough, but they are either regarded as picturesque relics of a bygone age, or else serve the Elizabethan dramatist as material to be woven into the concrete actualities of the drama.

Had it not been for Italy, the Novel might have tarried for another hundred years. Rhetoric and song were indigenous to the race: Sponsor, Marlowe, Shakespeare would have found articulate speech, Italy or no Italy. But it may reasonably be doubted whether we should have had the Elizabethan novelist.

Why was the influence of Italy so suddenly and imperatively felt?

Largely because of the newly awakened rage of the day for foreign travel, which helped to spread Italian fashions both of dress and literature.

Moreover, Italy was the home of the Novel. It was here that Boccaccio, in 1350, first attempted those prose tales of amorous adventure, The Decameron—"Novella Storia." The term originally meant a fresh story, but soon Novel was applied to any story in prose as distinct from a story in verse, which retained its old appellation of Romance.

Travel stimulated also the translation of Italian literature. So that those who could not afford to travel could at least learn something of this literary El Dorado through translations.

The mediæval Romance dealt with a legendary past. The Novel dealt with the realities of everyday life. In this lay its compelling attraction.

There was no more popular book than William Painter's collection of Italian Stories. He was the Clerk of the Ordnance in the Tower, and his translation not merely inspired the Romantic drama but interested English readers in Italian fiction specifically, and the art form of the Novel generally. Thus he paved the way for the English novel as well as providing a background for the English drama.

In his proface he says:

"Pleasant they be for that they recreate and refresh wearied minds defatigated either with painful travail or with continual care, occasioning them to shrin and to avoid heaviness of mind, van fantasies and idle cogitations. Pleasant so well abroed as at home, to avoid the grief of winter's night and length of summer's day, which the traveller on foot may use for a staye to ease the wearied body, and the journeyes on horseback, for a chariot or less painful means of travail in steade of a merry companion to shorten the tedious toil of weary ways."

Stephen Gosson declared rightly enough, that

Painter's volume had been ransacked to furnish the playhouses of London. Shakespeare borrowed from him generously in Romeo and Juliet, and The Merchant of Venice; and Beaumont and Fletcher, Peele, Marlowe, Webster, and others availed themselves only less liberally of his stories.

The Elizabethan prose writers who distinguished themselves in prose fiction were John Lyly, Robert Greene, Thomas Lodge, Sir Philip Sidney, and Thomas Nash.

JOHN LYLY (see ante, p. 99) is the pioneer of the English novel, the first stylist in prose, and the most popular writer of his age. A young Kentish man, with slender financial resources and very few friends, he had the good fortune to attract the attention of Lord Burghley, who became his patron.

In 1579 Lyly published the first part of his famous fiction, Euphues, the Anatomy of Wit, which was received with general delight and approbation. It was written designedly for ladies, and in his quaint preface he modestly prefers his claim: "It resteth, ladies," he declared, "that you take the pains to read it but at such times, as you spend in playing with your dogges, and yet I will not pinch you of that pastime for I am content that your dogges be in your laps, so Euphues may be in your hands, that when you shall be weary in reading the one, you may be ready to sport with the other." Finally he adds slyly that "if they desire to slumber after dinner, it will bring them to sleep far better than beginning to sew and pricking their fingers when they begin to nod."

Such insidious courtesy and modesty were not without result. The ladies were duly flattered; the Euphues was to be seen everywhere in the boudoirs of ladies, and the author became as much sought after and petted as is a popular actor to-day. Perhaps the great dames were touched by his diffidence in not seeking to take a first place in their hearts, but content to share attention with the lapdog.

The language of the Euphues did not, however, with its involved artifices of speech, emanate from Lyly. Derived from Ovid, Plutarch, and Pliny, originally it was unported from Spain, and one of its exponents, Guevara, became extremely popular. The Golden Book of Marcus Aurelius was written by this gentleman and translated by Lord Berners (1532) and by Sir Thomas North (1572). Here we find the same monstrous profusion of similes that we see in Euphues, the same combination of sententious reflection and fanciful conceits, that proved so much to the taste of many readers.

In the structure of his work, Lyly is Spanish, but there is much more moralising in Lyly than in Guevara, and more sentiment. That no doubt is another reason for his popularity. From Lyly to the present day, the most popular writers of fiction have always been sentimental and didactic.

Euphues was a good-looking, nimble-minded Athenian youth who goes first to Naples, then to England to study men and governments. His volubility is remarkable, and he uses his friend Philautus as a kind of conversational Aunt Sally against whom to hurl his sententious wisdom. Once indeed, during the voyage to England, Phil-autus does rebel; "In faith, Euphues, thou hast told a long tale, the beginning I have forgotten, the middle I understand not, and the end hangeth not together. . . . In the meantime it were best for me to take a nap, for I cannot brook these seas, which provoke my stomach sore."

The name itself is explained by Ascham thus (Schoolmaster, 1570); "Euphues is he that is apt by goodness of witte and applicable by readiness of will, to learning, having all other qualities of the mind and parts of the bodie that must another day serve learning, not troubled, mangled or halfed, but sound, whole, full, and able to do their office."

There is plenty of abuse, quite in the vein of modern denouncers of the "Smart Set" and "The Sins of Society," of the superfluities of Elizabethan dress, and of feminine charms. "When they be robbed of their robes, then will they appear so odious, so ugly, so monstrous, that thou wilt rather think them serpents than saints, and so like hags, that thou wilt fear rather to be enchanted than enamoured."

Obviously, the ladies of the time were flattered than otherwise at the appellation of serpent, and the word "hag" of course here is synonymous with witch. No woman objects to be called a witch. But through all the seeming bitterness about women, there runs a delicate compliment to their fascination and power, and though setting out to cure love and to distract the lover's attention from matters of the heart, he really seeks only to show how to retain the lady's affection, and how to dissemble anger and grief with her inconsistencies.

There was a sequel to this romance which appeared in 1580, in which England and English ways are held up in terms of the highest praise. And if before, Lyly has said hard things about women, he makes rich amends in his glowing panegyric of English gentlewomen. Indeed, he excuses his tirades unnecessarily—since women never objected to being abused for their fascination and wiles—on the ground that he had referred to Italian women. As he knew nothing whatever of Italian women, this explanation carries small conviction; but as very few of his readers knew anything about them also, save through the highly-coloured medium of Boccaccio, it mattered little.

English women are so beautiful, he says, that the traveller cannot help exclaiming, "There is no beauty but in England." In other countries, he remarks witheringly, "they all have lovers and spend their time painting their faces; but in this Island they are in prayer devout, in bravery humble, in beauty chaste, in feasting temperate, in affection wise, in mirth modest, in all their actions though courtly, become women, yet Angels become virtuous." After this magnificent tribute Philautus is naturally advised to take an English wife; whilst Euphues, picturesquely unsociable to the last, retires to his native Greece, carrying with him recollections of a country not inferior to a Paradise.

But with all this idealising, it is clear that we have parted from the novel of picturesque abstractions and vague mythology, and are dealing with present-day manners. Lyly does his best, moreover, to give a realistic atmosphere to his conversation, and in his reflections he dexterously deals with matters that concern everyday life. The mixture of frivolity and fantasy—with solid moralising—was quite agreeable to the taste of his readers. On the surface there was a great deal of light-heartedness and trifling in English Society, but deep down the seriousness of the Briton, not perceived at first sight, existed and kept England from the vices and excesses that weakened at that time such nations as Spain.

There are witty turns of speech in Lyly worth remembering:

"It is a blind Goose that cometh to the Fox's sermon."

"Thou must halt cunningly to beguile a cripple."

"The best charm for an aching tooth is to pull it out, and the best remedy for love is to wear it out."

Sayings like these recall the modern apothegms of George Eliot.

The style is marked by the constant use of antithesis and alliteration, which at times becomes mannered to a wearisome extent, but often gives agreeable force and pungency to the matter:

"... Where salt doth grow nothing else can breed.

Where friendship is built no offence can harbour."

A defect in Lyly's prose style is his excessive fondness for classical authorities—a fondness that overburdens his prose with a torrent of allusions, comical rather than impressive. Fickleness and constancy, when mentioned, bring with them interminable lists of mythological ladies and gentlemen remarkable for these characteristics. He is not content with an illustration: an allusion with him is synonymous with cataloguing.

In the hands of a great literary artist such as Burton, this characteristic is used with a deliberate quaintness that amuses us, just as Lamb could turn the involutions of Elizabethan prose to deliciously humorous account. Less interesting even than this mythological weakness, is the habit of Lyly to employ references to fictitious natural history, largely derived from the legends of animal and plant lore in the old Bestiaries that preceded genuine biological studies.

How far Lyly regards these things as scientific truths, we do not know, nor does it much matter; but using them as literary decorations suggests how grievously he mistook the art of adornment.

Take for instance this passage:

"I have read that the bull being tied to the fig-tree loseth his strength, that the whole herd of deer stand at the gaze if they smell a sweet apple, that the dolphin by the sound of music is brought to the shore. And then no marvel it is that if the fierce bull be tamed with the fig-tree, that women, being as weak as sheep, be overcome with a fig; if the wild deer be caught with an apple, that the tame damsel is won with a blossom; if the fleet dolphin be allured with harmony, that women be entangled with the melody of men's speech, fair promises, and solemn protestations."

Small wonder that Shakespeare poured ridicule on it in his early plays.

While there is much that is interesting in Lyly's work, his prose style suffers from the serious defect of ignoring the distinction between prose and verse. It is the prose of an age that found its most effective medium in verse.

ROBERT GREENE, who succeeded Lyly, if less brilliant, attains a greater simplicity in his later writings. He was a happy-go-lucky Bohemian, who had no patron, and lived on his wits. His first novel is poor and imitative, but in Pandosto (1589), from which Shakespeare took his Winter's Tale, he showed real originality. The most considerable factor made by Greene to the development of the novel is to be found in his pamphlets rather than in his conventional fiction, for here he writes from personal knowledge of the "underworld" of his day. Especially vivid is his Life and Death of Ned Browne, a notorious cut-purse, wherein he anticipates the "low life" scenes of Defoe and Smollett.

He has a happy touch of individualising his characters, as may be seen from the following from A Quip for an Upstart Courtier:

"I espied afar off a certain kind of an overworn gentleman attired in velvet and satin, but it was somewhat dropped and greasy, and boots on his legs, whose soles waxed thin and seemed to complain of their master, which treading thrift under his feet had brought them unto that consumption. He walked not as other men in the common beaten way, but came compassing circumcirca, as if we had been devils, and he would draw a circle about us, and at every third step he looked back as if he were afraid of a halley or a squireant. . . .

"A poet is a waste good and an unthrif, that he is born to make the taverns rich and himself a beggar. If he have forty pounds in his purse together, he puts it not to usury, neither buys land nor merchandise with it, but a month's commodity of wenches and capons. Ten pounds a supper, why 'tis nothing, if his plough goes and his ink-horn be clear. Take one of them with twenty thousand pounds and hang him. He is a king of his pleasure, and counts all other bores and peasants that, though they have money at command, yet know not like him how to domineer with it to any purpose as they should. But to speak plainly, I think him an honest man, if he would but live within his compass, and generally no man's foe but his own."

Another writer of fiction to be noted is Thomas Lodge, the studious friend of Greene. He travelled much in the earlier years of his life, and while journeying he wrote several romances; one entitled Rosalynde (1590), which inspired Shakespeare's As You Like It.

THOMAS LODGE, the son of a rich London merchant who had also been Lord Mayor, was born in 1557, and educated at Merchant Taylor's School and Oxford, where he was the friend of Lyly.

Choosing law as a profession, he studied for a time at Lincoln's Inn, but the craze for travel seized him; he abandons the law and sets out first to the Canary Islands and then to South America. During this time he wrote his famous Rosalynde—"Euphrates' golden legacie . . . fetcht from the Canaries"—published in 1590; Robert the Devil, 1591; Euphrates' Shadow, "the battaile of the senses wherein youthful folly is set down"—published under the editorship of Greene in 1592, while Lodge was travelling; and The Margarite of America, 1596. His principal dramatic works are The Wounds of Civil War, and A Looking Glass for London and England, neither of which were very popular. He also wrote many poems and was a voluminous translator.

Having, as we suppose, tired of travel as a recreation, and literature as a profession, he settled down to make a livelihood in another direction. Studying medicine at Oxford, he took his degree of M.D. in 1603, and built up a large practice, followed his profession for twenty-two years, and died in affluence in 1625.

Lodge also derived from Lyly, but not in the same way as did Greene. Lodge had travelled, as did many young men of that time, over distant seas, looking for opportunities abroad rather than at home to advance him. These did not come, but during the long journeys by sea he wrote several romances; one entitled Rosalynde being of special interest to us, for from it Shakespeare, with a quick eye for a good story, evolved the plot of As You Like It.

Far removed are his prefaces from the simpering, deprecating prefaces of Lyly. He has his own little way with the Critics. If they do not like his books, let them hold their peace, otherwise he will throw them overboard to feed cods. This is swashbuckling with a vengeance.

Rosalynde is itself a remodelled version of an old mediæval tale. In the Middle Ages it was called The Tale of Gamelyn, and Chaucer had intended weaving it into his Canterbury Tales, but died before effecting this. Originally it was merely a story of valour with no love interest whatever. Lodge remedied the deficiency, and invented Rosalynde; he also gave us the fair she-page, and her friend Phoebe, the hard-hearted shepherdess.

Rosalynde, daughter of the deposed king, who leads a forester's life in the woods of Arden, is exiled from Court, and departs with Alinda her friend, daughter of the Usurper—Rosalynde being dressed as a page.

"I thou seest," says Rosalynde, quite in the spirit of Shakespeare's heroine, "am of a tall stature, and would very well become the person and apparel of a page; thou shalt be my mistress, and I will play the man so properly, that trust me in what company so ever I come, I will not be discovered. I will bring me a suit and have my rapier very handsomely at my side, and if any knave offer wrong, your page will show him the point of his weapon."

The Forest of Arden in Lodge's story would have amazed the Royal Geographical Society. It is placed near the vineyards of Gascony, and is full of those bewildering shrubs usually confined to cheap provincial theatres. Pine trees, fig trees, and lemon trees grow amicably together, with convenient strips of pasture for sheep, and animals from all parts of the globe. Shepherds and shepherdesses abounded, who embodied not only the domestic virtues but scholarly attainments. Sonnet writing was as child's play to them; and French and Latin tags abounded. Here, too, is the shepherdess Phoebe, "as fair as the wanton that brought Troy to ruin." Rosalynde's page-name is Ganimede, and in the novel she shows qualities fully as attractive as she does in the play, though not possessed of so pretty a wit. Phoebe, deceived as in Shakespeare by Rosalynde's doublet and hose, falls in love with her, and in the novel Rosalynde treats her more kindly than does her more brilliant counterpart in As You Like It.

Everything turns out happily, and although there is much brave fighting, none gets killed for whom one cares a jot; and there is a triple marriage to conclude the tale.

Here is a passage from Rosalynde's advice to Phœbe;

"Such my fair shepherdess as disdain in youth, desire in age, and then are they hated in the winter, that might have been loved in the prime. A wrinkled maid is like a parched rose, that is oast up in coffers to please the smell, not worn in the hand to content the eye. Love while thou art young, lest thou be disdained when thou art old, and if thou love, love like that of Montanus, for if his desires are many, so his desires are great."

Lodge never did anything better than Rosalynde. He was not a prolific writer like Greene, nor, despite his boastful valour, a dare-devil.

The fourth important name in the fiction of the time is THOMAS NASH. "Ingenuous, ingenious, fluent, facetious Thomas Nash," as his friend Lodge called him. The emphatic quality was the facetiousness. There was a strain of humour in Lyly, and fitful outbursts of gaiety in Greene, but both Lodge and Sidney showed rather a contemplative wit than humour or mirthfulness. It is otherwise with Nash, he has a rich fund of humour that partakes somewhat of Rabelais' uproarious quality.

Nash, like Greene, took the rogue in hand and painted with skill and fidelity the needy adventurer of the time: The Unfortunate Traveller, or The Life of Jack Wilton (1594), but unlike his contemporary, he did so with a smile on his lips. He found the English novel suffering from too much sentiment, and promptly freshened it with his light-hearted humour.

He died at the age of thirty-three, having shortened his days, says his friend Dekker, "by keeping company with pickled herrings."

The chief point, then, that distinguishes Nash from his contemporaries is his "comedy" attitude towards life. There is another point worth notice. His style is neither Euphuistic nor Arcadian. Eschewing the literary affectations and manners of his day, he did his best to cultivate an individual style, vigorous, easy, and vital, which was well suited to his subject-matter.

The Unfortunate Traveller, or The Life of Jack Wilton (1594)

The hero is a lively young page with less money than wit, who has a smattering of Latin with which he embellishes bombastic conversation and succeeds in persuading casual acquaintances that he is of more importance than his position would imply.

Travelling in France on one occasion, attached to the Court of Henry VIII, he is present at the siege of Tournay, to which "a number of my creditors that I coosned can testifie."

Jack, on the look-out for fresh adventure, fixes as one of his victims at this time mine host of the canteen, who was "an olde servitor, a cavalier of an ancient house as it might appeare by the armes of his ancestre, drawen very amiably in chalk on the inside of his tent doore," but who is always boasting of his ancient pedigree.

One day, finding the old man "counting his barrels, and setting the price in chalke on the head of everie one of them" Jack approaches with politeness and requests to be allowed a private talk with him, as he has important matter to communicate.

"With me, young Wilton?" quoth he, "marie and shalt. Bring us a pint of syder of a fresh tap into the 'Three Cups' here; wash the pot!"

"So into a backe roome he lead mee, where . . . he badde me declare my minde, and there upon he dranke to me on the same."

Beating about the bush in order to gain time, our hero starts by flattering his man; he tells him he has always admired him, "partly for the high discent and linage from whence he sprung, end partly for the tender care and provident respect he had of poore soldiers," and amazement that he should condescend "in his own person to be a victualer to the campe; a rare example of magnificence and courtesie, and diligently provided, that without farre travel, every man might have for his money syder and cheese lus bellyfull. Nor did he sell his cheese by the way onely, or lus syder by the great, but abast himselve with his own hands to take a shoemakers knife; a homely instrument for such a high personage to touch, and cut it out equally like a true justiciarie in little pennyworthes that it would doo a man good for to looke upon. So likewise of lus syder, the pore man might have lus moderate draught of it (as there is moderation in all things) as well for lus dore or lus dandiprat as the rich man for lus hallo soure or lus demer." The old man swallows the bait, and Jack proceeds: "Why, you aio everie childs fellow; any man that comes under the name of a soldior and a good fellow, you will sitte and bear companie to the last pot, yea, and you take in as good part the homely phrase of, 'Mine host heeres to you,' as if one saluted you by all the titles of your haronie. Thove considerations, I saie, which the world suffers to slip by in the channell of carelessness, have moved me in ardent zeale for your welfare, to forewarne you of some dangers that have beset you and your barrels."

"At the name of dangers hee start up, and bounst with his fist on the board so hard, that lus tapster over-hearing him, cried: 'Anon, anon, sir!' and outcrug with a bow askt lum what he wanted."

Irate at the interruption, but "for feare of displeasing me he moderated his furre, and onely sending lum for the other fresh pint" and bids lum look to the bar and "come when he is cald with a devilles name."

By this time Jack and his host are beginning to show signs of the "syder" they have consumed and both "fall to weeping." This is, Jack thinks, the "psychological moment," and forthwith tells his tale; how he heard that the innkeeper, by letters secreted in empty barrels, is giving valuable information to the enemy. The man protests. Jack will not listen, and hints at high treason. Still further details on the part of the man which Jack ignores, and declares there is only one way of setting aside the dangerous rumours. He must make himself very popular with the soldiers. How can it be done? Jack suggests, after due consideration, that the best way would be by supplying free drinks to the army.

The host in great fright eventually agrees to follow Jack's advice, which is carried on for a time, but the trick is discovered soon after, and Jack is well whipped, but not hard enough to make him sufficiently repentant to forsake his evil ways, or damp his spirits: "Here let me triumph awhile," says he, "and ruminate a line or two on the excellence of my wit!"

Many more like adventures take place before Jack leaves France. He gives an amusing description of his fine clothes on his return to London.

"I had my feather in my cap as big as a flag in the fore-top . . . my cape cloake of blacke cloth overspreading my back like . . . an elephantes eares . . . and my hands without gloves, all a mode French."

Jack Wilton, written as was customary in the form of memoirs, is dedicated to the Earl of Southampton, the patron, it will be remembered, of Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis.

Like others of its class, right down to Pickwick, it has but slight coherence, and consists of a series of episodically strung together, and is bewilderingly incoherent at times. But there is some capital characterisation, and one or two strong scenes of real dramatic value.

Wilton, like Gil Blas, has little money, but plenty of wit and resource and a smattering of scholarship. He careers over the Continent, deceiving everyone he can, getting into all manner of difficulties. He has some excellent gibes at contemporary acting, in a manner that reminds one of Hamlet's caustic advice. Says he:

"One as if he had been playing on olay floore, stampingly trode the stage so harde with his feete, that I thought verily he had resolved to doe the carpenter that sette it uppe some utter shame. Another fung his armes like cudgelles at a pearre tree, inso much as it was mightily dreaded that hee would strike the candles that hung above their heades, out of their sockets and leave them all darke."

In a third characteristic of Nash, his Italian temperament, he resembles Benvenuto Cellini. A lover of poetry, gaiety, and passion, he hated the Puritan, and those who chronicle things.

Here is a sample from his varied wares, in the picture of a merchant's wife, from Pierce Penilesse:

"Mistress Minx, a merchant's wife, that will eat no cherries, forsooth, but when they are at twenty shillings a pound, that looks as simperingly as if she were benighted, and jets it as gingerly as if she were dancing the canaries: she is so fittful in her speech, as though she spake nothing but what she had first sewed over before in her samplers, and the puling accent of her voice is like a feigned treble, or one's voice that inter-opts to the puppet's. What should I tell how squeamish she is in her diet, what toil she puts her poor servants unto, to make her looking-glasses in the pavement? how she will not go into the fields, to cower on the green grass, but she must have a couch for her convey; and spends half a day in pranking herself if she be invited to any strange place? Is not this the excess of pride, signior Satan? Go to, you are unwise, if you make her not a chief saint in your calendar."

SIDNEY'S "Arcadia"

Of Sidney's work as a poet mention has been made. His Arcadia remains to be noticed, for it marks a well-defined stage in the history of the novel.

Preceding writers had been more or less disciples of Lyly and imitators of Euphuism. Sidney invented a new style. And for a while Arcadianism displaced Euphuism. This book, written in 1580, appeared after Sidney's death. It was written primarily to please his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. In essence it is a romance with a pastoral flavouring. There is more characterisation and more movement, though less humour, than we find in Lyly; more passion than in Greene, if less actuality; and a finer vein of poetry than in Lodge, though more inequality in interest. The style, despite of artificialities, rises at times to a level of high beauty. With Lyly's Euphuus it may take its place as one of the dominant influences of the time.

Professor Raleigh has well said that the "Arcadia" is in some sort a halfway house between the older romances of chivalry and the long-winded 'heroic' romances of the seventeenth century. Action and adventure are already giving way to the description of sentiment, or are remaining merely as a frame on which the diverse-coloured flowers of sentiment may be brodered."

French influences more considerably affect Sidney than his predecessors. Perhaps he is of all of them the least touched by the magic of Italy, though he was a great admirer of Spanish literature.

Pamela's Prayer, from "Arcadia"

"Kneeling down, even where she stood, she thus said: O All-seeing Light, and eternall Life of all things, to whom nothing is either so great, that it may resist, or so small that it is contemned, looke upon my misery with thine eye of mercy, and let thine infinite power vouchsafe to limit out some proportion of deliverance unto mee, as to thee shall seeme most convenient. Let not injurie, O Lord, triumph over mee, and let my faults by thy hand bee corrected and make not mine unjust enemy the minister of thy Justice. But yet, my God, if, in thy wisdom, thus be the aptest chastisement for my unexcusable folly. If this low bondage be fittest for my over-high desires, if the pride of my not enough humble heart, be thus to be broken, O Lord, I yeeld unto thy will, and joyfully embrace what sorrow thou wilt have me suffer. Onely thus much let me crave of thee . . . let calamity be the exercise, but not the overthrow of my vertue: let their power prevaile, but not prevaile to destruction: let my greatness be their prey. let my pains be the sweetness of their revenge: let them, if so it seeme good unto thee, vex me with more and more punishment. But, O Lord, let never their wickednesse have such a hand, but that I may carry a pure minde in a pure body. And pausing a while. And, O most gracious Lord, said shee, what ever become of me, preserve the vertuous Musidorus!"

Dekker, whose dramatic work has already been noticed, also essayed fiction. But although he has shown some measure of Nash's gaiety and shrewdness of observation in the "Picaresque" stories which he essayed, it is as a dramatist and writer of prose, other than fiction, that he is most entitled to remembrance. With the close of the Elizabethan period, the first period of the English novel came to an end. During the next century French romance, of the extravagant and artificial order, came into fashion for the class who cared about fiction. But, as we shall see, if the seventeenth century produced no great novelist, it produced many writers who contributed indirectly to the amazing development of the Novel which took place in the eighteenth century.

¹ Pamela's Prayer, from Arcadia, Book III. Also in the "Eikon Basilike, the portraiture of his sacred majesty in his solitude and sufferings," among the "prayers used by his majesty in the time of his sufferings, delivered to Dr. Juxon, Bishop of London, immediately before his death. . ."

THE EARLIER RENAISSANCE AND PROSE

Introduction—Prose other than Fiction: (1) The Development of Style; (2) The Art of Criticism.

INTRODUCTION

DURING the fifteenth century Latin was the vehicle of prose, and works of importance were almost entirely written in that tongue. Three names alone stand out before the time of Caxton, as makers of English—Reginald Pecock, Sir John Fortescue, and the Paston Family.

Pecock's personality was a remarkable one. He was a Welshman by birth, and an Oxonian by training. Having taken Orders, he soon distinguished himself as an opponent of Lollardy. His zeal brought in his wake numerous foes, and as the most effective attack against an enemy was the charge of heresy, this heresy hunter was charged himself by his political foes of heretical tendencies. He escaped death by recantation, of errors he had never held, and died finally in imprisonment. One of his offences was that he wrote in English, another that he urged the use of reason in confuting arguments. This is the line he adopted in the Repressor, but his learning excited both jealousy and suspicion, and the one argument in strong favour was to suppress by merely citing adverse authorities. That Pecock abjured at this time was sufficient to damn him, in an age when the faintest show of tolerance towards a heretic, even if it took the innocent form of quietly pointing out his errors and trying to dissuade him by the method of what Arnold called "sweet reasonableness."

The language in which he wrote is fairly clear, but the English is often stiff and formal. Yet there is something of the vigour and colloquial ease that began to show themselves later in Ascham.

In Sir John Fortescue, we see the politician, as in Pecock we see the theologian. He was a constitutional lawyer, a traveller, and conversant with other modes of government. His treatise, The Difference between an Absolute and a Limited Monarchy, is a critical approval of English rule. The book was completed about 1470, and it is supposed that the book was intended for Henry VI. It is an interesting piece of controversial writing.

THE PASTON LETTERS

The interest of the Paston Letters is historical rather than literary.

This collection of the papers and correspondence of a well-to-do Norfolk family, give us considerable insight into the domestic life of the time. We realise the anarchy that prevailed and the friction between the nobles and the business class, the necessity for seeking royal favour, the practice of the manorial courts, and the various domestic embroilments that occur in large families. The problem of the daughter is especially emphasized. Sons were more easily managed, but daughters, unless speedily married, were apt to be looked on as mere onoumbances. They were denied any voli-tion of their own, and indeed the patria potestas is strongly in evidence as regards both boys and girls, even when they had grown up.

Altogether, this collection of letters is a document rich in human interest, and as a picture of the social life of the age is unequalled for its plenitude of curious and informing detail.

Sir John affects literature, but it is the literature of the Middle Ages.

PROSE OTHER THAN FICTION

From Ascham to Hooker

(i) THE DEVELOPMENT OF STYLE

The shopkeeper of the day, whether he be fishmonger or bookseller, was not content to await in the shadow of his shop for the welcome customer. He stood on the threshold and hailed him cheerfully: "What lack ye, gentles?" . . . then followed a description of the commodity the lack of which he was prepared to supply.

Ever since the Middle Ages, shops had been arranged in groups like at a fair, and hard by St. Paul's or Westminster Hall, the booksellers flocked together.

"I pray ye: see any fresh new bookes? Look I beseech you for your love, and buy for your money!"

A sign of the times is the prevalence of books dealing with England and English customs. The novelists of the day laud their country and decry the foreigner, and even that worthy Elizabethan divine, William Harrison, who took the English to task for their extravagance, is none the less possessed of the new national spirit that animates everyone.

"If we have weaknesses, these be nought to the vices of our neighbours." Stubbes in his Anatomie of Abuses, Lyly in his Euphues, each congratulate themselves that they are English.

Shakespeare, of course, in his chronicle plays, was to do much to foster this feeling; but he did not kindle it. It was there ready to break out at the least encouragement.

Stow, Holinshed, and Camden embark on the history of their country. Holinshed dives into the past, Stow deals methodically with the present; Camden discusses religious affairs, Hakluyt gives expression to the maritime adventures of the age.

Elizabethan prose falls into two main periods: the first culminating in Hooker; the second in Bacon.

The translation of the New Testament by Tyndale had given a potent impulse to the study of English, and although the influence of the classical writers unduly prolonged the habit of writing in Latin—note More's Utopia—yet the use of our own vernacular found many advocates, and towards the end of the century proved a fairly established custom.

ROGER ASCHAM (1515-1568) may be taken as a starting point.

Roger Ascham is known as a distinguished writer, a fine classical scholar, and an entertaining correspondent. He was born at Kirby Wiske, near Thrusk in Yorkshire, in the year 1515, and died in 1568. He became a student of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1530 and soon obtained his fellowship, notwithstanding his well-known sympathy with the Reformed doctrines. Later, he was appointed University Reader in Greek, and in 1546 University orator. Amongst "past-times" for gentlemen he gives cock fighting an important place, but Ascham's chief interests were music, writing, and archery.

His first work to attract attention, Toxophilus—devoted to archery, one of his favourite recreations—he published in 1545, and dedicated it to Henry VIII. In 1548 his reputation gained for him the position of tutor to the Lady Elizabeth at Chesnut.

The years 1550-53 were lived on the Continent, chiefly at Augsburg; he was then secretary to Sir Richard Moryson or Morison, who held the post of ambassador to Charles V. When he returned to England he obtained the Latin secretaryship to Queen Mary. This prominent post being given to a Protestant, has occasioned great surprise. His extreme care and tact helped him to escape suffering in any way for his opinions.

On the accession of Elizabeth, who was once his pupil, he remained at Court and became the Queen's tutor as well as secretary. These posts were held by Ascham until the end of his life.

PUBLICATIONS

Toxophilus, published 1545.

Schoolmaster, published 1570, after his death.

Report of Germany.

Two hundred and ninety-five letters, Latin and English, partly official and partly personal.

Ascham, a sturdy old scholar of the more formal type, was a Puritan in his tastes, and opposed to the new taste for Romance, but an undoubted pioneer of good, direct English prose.

His treatise on Cock Fighting—for which he had a weakness—is unhappily lost. But his Toxophilus, and Schoolmaster published after his death, furnish us with good examples of his strenuous efforts as a formative force in English prose. Even his letters are not negligible. Begun in Latin, he passes gradually to his mother tongue, and the ultimate rejection of Latin as a literary form of expression is due to his deliberate intention to write in "the English speech for English men."

Of his two considerable works, Toxophilus, the poem on archery is the more pleasing discursion; the Schoolmaster, the more important in its bearing on English prose. Both illustrate egregiously not merely the worth and excellence of the old scholar, with his ingrained suspicion of Italian romances, but also the characteristics of the typical Saxon teacher who never fails to combine praise of bodily culture with that of the mind, and who, for all his love of books, is a keen sportsman at heart.

The use of alliteration and antithesis he retains, seeing no more clearly than did his successor Lyly, how these mediæval tricks, never very effective in verse, are still more out of place in prose. On the other hand, following good classical models, he wrought out a clear, concise, and yet not over concise, style.

In an age so saturated with rhetoric and ornate conceits, it is a great tribute to Ascham that he should have achieved a prose at once simple and straightforward, yet never bald nor unmusical.

"I can teach you to shoot fair, even as Socrates taught a man once to know God. For when he asked him what was God? 'Nay,' saith he, 'I can tell you better what God is not, as God is not ill, God is unspeakable, unsearchable, and so forth.' Even likewise can I say of fair shooting, it hath not this discommodity with it nor that discommodity, and at last a man may so shift all the discommodities from shooting that there shall be left nothing behind but fair shooting. And to do this the better you must remember how that I told you when I described generally the whole nature of shooting, that fair shooting came of these things, of standing, nocking, drawing, holding and loosing: the which I will go over as shortly as I can, describing the discommodities that men commonly use in all parts of their bodies, that you, if you fault in any such, may know it, and go about to amend it. I fault in archers do exceed the number of archers, which come with use of shooting without teaching. Use and custom separated from knowledge and learning, doth not only hurt shooting, but the most weighty things in the world beside. And, therefore, I marvel much at those people which be the maintainers of uses without knowledge, having no other word in their mouth but thus use, use, custom custom. Such men, more wilful than wise, beside other discommodities, take all place and occasion from all amendment. And thus I speak generally of use and custom."

Professor Saintsbury calls his prose "a go cart to habituate the infant limbs of English prose to orderly movement." It is no unfair description.

The prose of Lyly has already been discussed in relation to the novel. A few general remarks may still be made, however, with reference to its place in the development of English Letters.

Ascham's prose, clear, forcible, and serviceable as it was, did not lend itself readily to the literary graces demanded of the story teller; and "Euphuism," with all its grave defects, did impart a colour and individuality to prose of distinct value, it carried the revolt against simplicity too far, he erred in confounding often more glitter with splendour, and artificiality for distinction, but it is easier to depreciate him than to appreciate him rightly, and he did much to establish the point that "Manner is as worthy of study as Matter." He is the first English stylist.

Sir Philip Sidney brought forward our prose another stage. Considering him here as a stylist, he put aside the elaborate affectations of Lyly, and while not free from mannerism, struck a happy comparison between the straightforward simplicity of Ascham and the highly coloured complexity of Euphuism. His prose at its best is both simple and melodious, strong and sweet, and he achieves for prose much what Spenser did for verse.

"The Poet doth not only show the way but giveth so sweet a prospect into the way as will entice any man to enter into it. Nay he doth, as if your journey should be thro' a fair vineyard, at the very first give you a cluster of grapes, that full of that taste you may long to pass further."¹

THE DEFENCE OF POESY

"Our tragedies and comedies, not without cause, are cried out against, observing rules neither of honest civility nor skilful poetry. Excepting 'Gorboduc' (again I say of those that I have seen) which notwithstanding, as it is full of stately speeches, and well sounding phrases, climbing to the height of Seneca his style, and as full of notable morality, which it doth most delightfully teach, and to obtain the very end of poesy; yet, in truth, it is very defectuous in the circumstances, which grieves me, because it might not remain as an exact model of all tragedies. For it is faulty both in place and time, the two necessary companions of all corporal actions. For where the stage should always represent but one place; and the uttermost time presupposed in it, should be, both by Aristotle's precept, and common reason, but one day, there is both many days and many places artificially imagined.

"But if it be so in 'Gorboduc,' how much more in all the rest? where you shall have Asia of the one side, and Africa of the other, and so many other under kingdoms, that the player, when he comes in, must ever begin with telling where he is, or else the tale will not be conceived. Now shall you have three ladies walk to gather flowers, and then we must believe the stage to be a garden. By and by, we hear news of shipwreck in the same place, then we are to blame if we accept it not for a ruck. Upon the back of that comes out a hideous monster with fire and smoke, and then the miserable beholders are bound to take it for a cave; while, in the meantime, two armies fly in, represented with four swords and bucklers, and then, what hard heart will not receive it for a pitched field?"

"Now of time they are much more liberal; for ordinary it is, that two young princes fell in love; after many travails she is got with child; delivered of a fair boy, he is lost, groweth a man, falleth in love, and is ready to get another child, and all this in two hours' space, which, how absurd it is in sense, even sense may imagine, and art hath taught and all ancient examples justified, and at this day the ordinary players in Italy will not err in. Yet will some bring in an example of the Lunuch in Terence, that containeth matter of two days, yet far short of twenty years. True it is, and so was it to be played in two days, and so fitted to the time it set forth. And though Plautus have in one place done amiss, let us lut it with him, and not miss with him. But they will say, How then shall we set forth a story which contains both many places and many times? And do they not know, that a tragedy is tied to the laws of poesy, and not of history, not bound to follow the story but having liberty either to feign a quite new matter, or to frame this history to the most tragical convenience? Again, many things may be told, which cannot be shewed; if they know the difference betwixt reporting and representing. As for example, I may speak, though I am here, of Peru and in speech digress from that to the description of Calicut, but in action I cannot represent it without Pacolet's horse. And so was the manner the ancients took by some 'Nuntius,' to recount things done in former time, or other place.

"Lastly, if they will represent an history, they must not, as Horace saith, begin 'ab ovo,' but they must come to the principal point of that one action which they will represent. By example this will be best expressed, I have a story of young Polydorus, delivered, for safety's sake, with great riches, by his father Priamus to Polymnestor, King of Thrace, in the Trojan War time. He, after some years, hearing of the overthrow of Priamus, for to make the treasure his own, murdereth the child, the body of the child is taken up, Hecuba, she, the same day, findeth a sleight to be revenged most cruelly of the tyrant. Where, now, would one of our tragedy-writers begin, but with the delivery of the child? Then should he sail over into Thrace, and so spend I know not how many years, and travel numbers of places. But where doth Euripides? Even with the finding of the body, leaving the rest to be told by the spirit of Polydorus. This needs no farther to be enlarged; the dullest wit may conceive it.

But, besides these gross absurdities, how all their plays be neither right tragedies nor right comedies, mingling kings and clowns, not because the matter so carrieth it, but thrust in the clown by head and shoulders to play a part in majestic matters, with neither decency nor discretion, so as neither the admiration and commiseration, nor the right sportfulness, is by their mongrel tragi-comedy obtained. I know Apuleius did somewhat so, but that is a thing recounted with space of time, not represented in one moment and I know the ancients have one or two examples of tragi-comedies as Plautus hath Amphytrio. But, if we mark them well, we shall find, that they never, or very daintily, match hornpipes and funerals. So falleth it out, that having indeed no right comedy in that comical part of our tragedy, we have nothing but scurrility unworthy of our chaste ears; or some extreme show of doltishness, indeed fit to lift up a loud laughter, and nothing else where the whole tract of a comedy should be full of delight; as this tragedy should be still maintained in a well-raised admiration."

Even more successful was RICHARD HOOKER, "Judicious Hooker," as his epitaph styles him.

A Devonshire man, born in 1553, of good, industrious, middle-class stock, as a boy he was unusually earnest and grave. A desire for information—"Why this was, and that was not to be remembered?—Why this was granted and that denied?"—combined with his general demeanour, attracted the attention of his schoolmaster, who persuaded a well-to-do relative to assist in furthering the boy's studies. Later, he was brought to the notice of Bishop Jewel, who was so impressed by the lad's earnestness and learning, though but fifteen, that he procured his admission to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and supplemented the income allowed Hooker by his uncle.

Completing his arts course in 1576, he was elected a Fellow of his College; three years later, lecturer in Hebrew.

While at Oxford a particular friendship was formed with Edwin Sandys, author of Speculum Europæ, and George Crammer, a descendant of the celebrated Archbishop. For some reason not quite clear, Hooker and others, among them his old tutor Dr Reynolds, were expelled, but were reinstated almost immediately.

Ordained in 1582, he was shortly afterwards appointed to preach a Sermon at St Paul's Cross—an unfortunate incident as it transpired, for on this occasion he met his future wife, Joan Churchman, a woman most unfitted both by temperament and education to be the helpmeet for this grave, studious man, and he left the quietude of Oxford to become rector of Drayton-Beauchamp and a life of domestic unrest.

On the death of Alvey, in 1585, Hooker was appointed Master of the Temple, but differences of religious opinion arose with his Puritan colleague, Walter Travers, who was suspended by the Archbishop. Hooker, grieved at this, asked to be allowed to retire from the Mastership. He was then presented to the living of Boscombe, and made sub-Dean of Salisbury. Here he finished the first four books of his famous Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, entered in Stationers' Register, March 9, 1592, and published in 1594, the fifth in 1597, the sixth and eighth in 1648, the seventh not appearing till 1662.

In July 1595 he was presented to the living of Bishop's Bourne in Kent, where he remained till his death in 1600.

Hooker is described by his biographer, Izaak Walton, as "an obscure, harmless man, in poor clothes, of a mean stature . . . his body worn out, not with age, but with study and holy mortification."

The aim of Hooker was to give us a prose that should be at once simple and impressive. Sidney had combined simplicity with cadence. Hooker gave to the cadence a finer and more sustained rhythm. In point of time he is the forerunner of Lyly, but he certainly carried prose style to a higher stage of development, and if less powerful an influence in his day than either Lyly or Sidney, exerted in the long run a more potent one.

Theological literature very rarely lends itself to literary excellences. Of how few modern theologians can it be said that they had the art of saying well what they had to say. But Hooker will be remembered not merely as the first vernacular defender of the English Church, but as a writer of fine, eloquent prose.

Its distinguishing quality is its sustained dignity and sobriety. Judicious in his argument, he is equally self-restrained and moderate in style. Lacking the poetic genius of Sidney and the richer eloquence of Jeremy Taylor, he is a safer model.

And with him must be mentioned JOHN FLORIO, the first translator of Montaigne, and RICHARD KNOLLES, who materially helped to build up an orderly and systematic school of historical writings. Contemporary with Hooker is Sir Walter Raleigh, a striking personality of the Elizabethan type, and a remarkable though unequal proseman of the ornate school.

Sir WALTER RALEIGH, one of the most versatile, brilliant, and daring spirits of his time, whose achievements give a colour to the period in which he lived, was born near Budleigh Salterton in 1552. His father had married the widow of Otho Gilbert, thus Walter Raleigh was the half-brother of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, the explorer, who took possession of Newfoundland, our oldest colony, in 1583.

A youth of exceptional intelligence, from the first fond of out-door life, and addicted to books, Raleigh was for a time a student at Oriel College, Oxford, afterwards reading law in London. Of ardent, impetuous disposition, the study of law was soon abandoned. He was not eighteen when he became a soldier, fighting for the Huguenots' cause in France. His first encounter with the Spaniards was in 1578, when he went with Humphrey Gilbert to the West Indies. There was some little fighting, but the expedition was not a success. Two years afterwards he was in Ireland fighting against the rebels. He gave material help in suppressing the rebellion, acting with boldness, determination, and severity. He was rewarded with a grant of forty thousand acres of land in the counties of Waterford and Cork. By this time he had become known to Queen Elizabeth. Being a man of good appearance, and witty and sparkling conversation, it was not long before he was a favourite at Court. Knighted in 1584, and in 1585 appointed Lord Warden of the Stannaries and Vice-Admiral of Devon and Cornwall, he entered the House of Commons as Member for his native county.

The death of Humphrey Gilbert was an opportunity upon which he built the highest hopes. Gilbert had been given the right to take possession of an enormous area in North America, but his death prevented him from exercising this right. The Queen transferred the privilege to Raleigh. Aided by friends, he fitted out two ships. He had intended accompanying the expedition, but the Queen interposed. She was so pleased with his flatteries and protestations of devotion that she ordered him to remain in England, and he had to take up his residence at the Court. The expedition was so far successful that the following year Sir Walter and his friends sent out another. This time there were seven vessels—Sir Richard Grenville, Raleigh's cousin, being in command. It is said that to this second expedition we owe the introduction of tobacco and the potato to this country. These expeditions were part of Raleigh's scheme to colonise America. They cost him £40,000, or in our currency a quarter of a million, but were unsuccessful.

The potato was first cultivated in these regions on Raleigh's Irish estate. On one of his visits to Ireland he came to know Edmund Spenser, whom he introduced to Elizabeth. A plan to seize Spanish treasure-ships was formed in 1592—but again he was thwarted by the Queen in his desire to accompany it. One of Elizabeth's maids of honour was Bessie Throgmorton; Raleigh fell in love with her (he afterwards married her). The jealous Queen discovered what was going on, and was so angry that she sent Raleigh and his sweetheart to the Tower. They were detained there for some time.

Very characteristic of the time is the next expedition with which the name of Raleigh was associated. With a thirst for knowledge, a hatred of Spain, there was combined a desire for gain which infected all classes. Marvellous stories were abroad of fabulous wealth awaiting the bold and courageous in South America. To secure this gold would be at once to enrich one's self and to strike a blow at the Spaniard. This cupidity and patriotism inspired the wild spirits of Elizabeth's day. The project took hold of Raleigh's imagination. He sent agents to investigate, they returned able to tell him little or nothing. He decided to go himself. With an authority from the Queen and the aid of her chief ministers, he set out in search of El Dorado in 1595. There was fighting at Trinidad and the Spanish Governor was taken prisoner. Raleigh was cheered by hearing from him of an explorer who had told a wonderful story of the gold to be found near the banks of the river Orinoco. Ten boats containing one hundred men bore the expedition up the river. From the first immense difficulties were met, and terrible hardships were suffered. The boats were not fitted for their purpose. The heat was almost intolerable. The food supply was bad, and every night they had to sleep in the open air. Raleigh describes the journey in his Discovery of Guiana. They went up the river for four hundred and forty miles, and had to turn back, bringing with them only some tons of white spa (obtained from the river bank) in which appeared to be traces of gold. El Dorado was not discovered. It is of the irony of events that long after, gold in abundance was found at a spot not far from the point to which Raleigh travelled.

Raleigh was indomitable. Back in England, he was soon again fighting the Spaniards. He joined the fleet which made an attack on Cadiz, and took part in the expedition to capture Spanish treasure-ships in 1597. In both enterprises he showed great bravery and skill. James I came to the throne in 1603, and his succession marked the beginning of misfortunes which led Raleigh at last to the scaffold. Stripped of his official appointments, dismissed from the Court, an accusation was brought against him that he was attempting to place James' cousin, Arabella Stuart, on the throne and was plotting to seize the King. Raleigh's independence and freedom of utterance had made him many enemies. Cecil, the all-powerful minister, was not his friend. Elizabeth, though capricious in her treatment of him, had stood between Raleigh and his foes. She removed, he was now without a protector. There was no evidence that could be called evidence against him, but he was arrested; unmanned for the moment, he attempted to commit suicide. He was tried at Winchester, and on November 17, 1603, he was condemned to death as a traitor. All his property was confiscated. A month later he was reprieved. James would not pardon him or fix any period of imprisonment, but kept him a prisoner in the Tower. There he remained for twelve and a half years. During six of these years his wife bore him company. In the Tower he wrote his famous History of the World, and interested himself in chemical experiments. The high courage of Raleigh did not fail in the dreary confinement of the Tower. Ever hoping that he would be released, his mind was full of new schemes and plans for the realisation of his old ambitions. Among his friends were James' queen, and his heir Prince Henry. They regarded him as imprisoned unjustly. He unfolded to them his idea of a second expedition to Guiana, and petitioned the King many times to allow him to go. There was a chance of profit to the King in the scheme, and at length Raleigh was liberated. In 1617 he sailed in command of twelve vessels! One of the conditions on which he had been set free was that he should not take offensive operations against the Spaniards, but Guiana was claimed by Spain, and conflict was inevitable. Misfortune and defeat overtook the expedition almost at once. In an attack on a Spanish settlement at the mouth of the Orinoco his son Walter was killed, and the hostility of the settlers prevented him from going up the river. Broken-hearted he returned to England, attempted to escape to France, was caught and again became an inmate of the Tower. James was at this time negotiating a marriage between his son Charles and the Infanta of Spain, and it was necessary to show friendship to Spain. Raleigh had broken his promise not to molest Spanish dominions, and the King seized upon this. It was decided to carry out the sentence of death passed in 1603. Raleigh was beheaded at White Hall on October 29, 1618. On the scaffold he thanked God that he was allowed "to die in the light." "I have a long journey to take and must bid the company farewell." Feeling the axe's edge, he remarked with a smile, "This gives me no fear, this is a sharp medicine, but is a certain cure for all diseases!" He himself gave the signal to the executioner, bidding him, "Strike, man!"

Remarkable as was Raleigh's physical activity, no less restless was his mind. When imprisonment gave enforced leisure to the one, the other part of him went a-roving.

He was a verse-writer of distinction—does not Gabriel Harvey speak of his "fine and sweet invention"?—and wrote a fine sonnet that was appended to the first edition of the Faerie Queene and many poems signed "Ignoto," published in England's Helicon.

As to his prose, perhaps his most notable achievement was the History of the World, a serious, discursive review of the past and present—very popular for its treatment of Biblical history and early times, but disliked by James, "for being too saucy in censuring Princes." It is rich in fine passages of eloquent prose, and is also an interesting piece of self-revelation. Its chief defect, an entire lack of humour, is felt at times, but is largely counterbalanced by the picture it presents of a restless, adventurous, and ambitious spirit, with a rich sense of the fullness of life and a tragic appreciation of its ironies.

Our youth, our joys, our all we have,
And pays us but with rust and dust."

(II) THE ART OF CRITICISM

So far, English prose has been considered either for its imaginative qualities, as in dealing with the fiction, or with its technique, as in the foregoing remarks on prose style. Necessarily, the manner of saying the thing rather than the matter has engaged our attention. There is, however, another aspect of our literature than the artistic, and to this side we shall now turn. Here the matter is the thing of paramount importance. Not how the thing is said, but what kind of thing is said.

Once again, however, a start may conveniently be made with ROGER ASCHAM, and his general attitude will best be gathered from The Schoolmaster.

The first thing to strike us is his depreciation of the faculty of imagination. He had little care for poetry, still less for prose romance. Malory's Morte d'Arthur is singled out for special blame, seeing in it only "open man's laughter and bold bawdy." As a critical force, therefore, while valuable in simplifying and encouraging an English prose style, he was in active opposition to the general trend of the age as regards purely imaginative work. In itself, this was a sign of intellectual limitations; but it was no misfortune in an age when the imagination was encouraged to an unbridled extent, to have the matter-of-fact, conservative tendencies of Ascham.

In Gascoigne's Notes of Instruction, we have really valuable criticism on the important subject of prosody. He warns against the misuse of accents and the warning was a useful one, as not only the minor poets of the time but even so great a master as Spenser, proved careless in this respect. For instance he points out, we must say understand, not undersiand; makes a highly reasonable caution against excessive alliteration, and uses a phrase that Lyly and his school might well have taken to heart. We must be careful not to "hunt a letter to death."

Passing to STEPHEN GOSSON (1554-1624), we come into touch again with the Puritan onslaught on by Ascham.

Gosson himself was no mean scholar and versifier. At one time with a taste for dramatic writing, he suddenly forsook the delights of literature and denounced the art he had followed as a poisonous one. The poetry of the classical poet he finds tainted with loose paganism; and this moral laxity he detects in the theatre of the day as well as in the verse-making. The taint is not inherent in poetry, but as poetry exists is almost inseparable from it.

His argumentative methods may be gathered from the following quotation:

"The best play you can pick out, is but a mixture of good and evil how can it be then the schoolmistress of life? The beholding of troubles and miserable slaughters that are in tragedies drive us to immoderate sorrow, heaviness, wondrous weeping and mourning, whereby we become lovers of dumps and lamentations, both enemies to fortitude. Comedies so tickle our senses with a pleasanter vein, that they make us lovers of laughter and pleasure, without any mean, both foes to temperance. What schooling is this? Sometime you shall see nothing but the adventures of an amorous knight, passing from country to country for the love of his lady, encountering many a terrible monster made of brown paper, and at his return is so wonderfully changed, that he cannot be known but by some posy in his tablet, or by a broken ring, or a handkerchief, or a piece of cockle shell. What learn ye by that? When the soul of your plays is either mere trifles, or Italian bawdry, or wooing of gentlewomen, what are ye taught? For adventure you will say, that by these kind of plays the authors instruct us how to love with constancy, to sue with modesty, and to loath whatsoever is contrary unto us. In my opinion, the discipline we get by plays is like to the justice that a certain schoolmaster taught in Persia which taught his scholars to lie and not to lie, to deceive and not to deceive with a distinction how they might do it to their friends, and how to their enemies to their friends, for excuse, to their foes, in earnest. Whence many of his scholars became so skilful by practice, by custom so bold, that their dearest friends paid more for their learning than their enemies. I would wish the players to beware of this kind of schooling, lest that whilst they teach youthful gentlemen how to love and not to love, how to woo and not to woo, their scholars grow as cunning as the Persians."¹

To this vigorous attack Lodge essayed a reply,

¹ Plays confuted in five actions, 1582.

but though he certainly had the better case, he scarcely made the best of it. As Professor Saintsbury acutely says. "The assailants, in England at least, had for the time an unfair advantage, because the defence could point to no great poet but Chaucer. The real answer was being provided by one of themselves in the shape of the Faerie Queene."

Of far greater importance is Sir Philip Sidney's Apologie for Poetrie, by which he includes all forms of Romance, whether in verse or prose. He reminds his readers that all the greatest authors were really poets—Homer, Hesiod, Ennius, Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Chaucer; that the Roman called the poet vates (a prophet), and that we by using the Greek poet signify he is a maker, in fact a creator.

Then comes the famous reminder that "it is not rhyming and versing that maketh a poet," and the more famous confession, "I never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet." The abuses of poetry do not nullify its use; they may be corrected. The significance of Spenser's tribute is that it represents the dominant feeling of the Elizabethan for verse, it reveals its hold upon the age, and encourages its high note of laudation.

The Rules to be observed in Scottish Poetry (1585), by James the First, is a book of not much importance, but William Webbe's Discourse of English Poesie (1586) is of greater value.

Webbe was an enthusiastic admirer of Spenser—"the mightiest English poet that ever lived." With the poetry of Chaucer's age, however, he is not closely acquainted, and in his excursion into the poetry of the past, he displays no particular acumen.

Webbe's value lies less in his argumentative discussion than in his power of appreciation. He has a natural taste for fine verse, and it is on the appreciative side of criticism, not the judicial, that he claims recognition.

A DISCOURSE OF ENGLISH POESIE

"This place have I purposely reserved for one, who if not only, yet in my judgment principally deserves the title of the rightest English Poet, that ever I read, that is, the author of the Shepherd's Kalender, intitled to the worthy gentleman Master Philip Sidney, whether it was Master Sp or what rare scholar in Pembroke Hall soever, because himself and his friends, for what respect I know not, would not reveal it, I force not greatly to set down: sorry I am that I cannot find none other with whom I might couple him in this Catalogue in his rare gift of Poetry. although one there is, though now long since, seriously occupied in graver studies (Master Gabriel Harvey) yet, as he was once his most special friend and fellow poet, so because he hath taken such pains, not only in his Latin Poetry (for which he enjoyed great commendations of the best both in judgment and dignity in this Realm) but also to reform our English verse, and to beautify the same with brave devices, of which I think the chief he in hateful obscurity therefore will I adventure to set them together, as two of the rarest wits and learnedest masters of Poetry in England. Whose worthy and notable skill in this faculty, I would wish if their high dignities and serious businesses would permit, they would still grant to be a furtherance to that reformed kind of Poetry, which Master Harvey did once begin to ratify: and surely in mine opinion, if he had chosen some graver matter, and handled but with half that skill, which I know he could have done, and not poured it forth at a venture, as a thing between jest and earnest, it had taken greater effect than it did."

Another volume about this time, The Art of English Poesie (1589), is usually attributed to George Puttenham (1530?–1590).

Puttenham, unlike Webbe, does not excel in appreciation, but shows a wide knowledge of European literature, and a wise feeling for the relative merits of writers.

ON STYLE

"Style is a constant and continual phrase of speaking and writing, extending to the whole tale or process of the poem or history, and not properly to any piece or member of a tale, but is of words, speeches, and sentences together, a certain continued form and quality, many times natural to the writer, many times his peculiar by-election and art, and such as either he keepeth by skill or holdeth on by ignorance, and will not or peradventure cannot easily alter into any other. So we say that Cicero's style and Sallust's were not one, nor Cæsar's and Livy's, nor Homer's and Hesiodus', nor Herodotus' and Thucydides', nor Euripides' and Aristophanes', nor Erasmus' and Budeus' styles. And because this continual course and manner of writing or speech sheweth the matter and disposition of the writer's mind more than one or two instances can show, therefore there be that have called stylo the image of man (mentis character). For man is but his mind, and as his mind is tempered and qualified, so are his speeches and language at large, and his inward conceits to the metal of his mind, and his manner of utterance the very warp and woof of his conceits, more plain or busy and intricate or otherwise affected after the rate."

OF POETS AND POESY

"Wherefore, the nobility and dignity of the Art considered, as well by universality as antiquity and the natural excellence of itself, Poesy ought not to be abused and employed upon any unworthy matter and subject, nor used to vain purposes, which nevertheless is daily seen, and that is to utter conceits infamous and vicious or ridiculous and foolish, or of no good example and doctrine. Albeit in merry matters (not dishonest) being used for man's solace and recreation it may be well allowed, for as I said before, Poesy is a pleasant manner of utterance, varying from the ordinary of purpose to refresh the mind by the ears' delight.

Poesy also is not only laudable because I said it was a metrical speech used by the first men, but because it is a metrical speech corrected and reformed by discreet judgment and with no less cunning and cunningly than the Greek and Latin Poesy, and by Art beautified and adorned and brought far from the primitive rudeness of the first inventors, otherwise it may be said to me that Adam and Eve's aprons were the gayest garments because they were the first, and the shepherd's tent or pavilion the best housing because it was the most ancient and most universal. Which I would not have so taken, for it is not my meaning; but that Art and cunning, concurring with nature, antiquity and universality, in things indifferent, and not evil, do make them more laudable. And right so our vulgar rhyming Poesy, being by good wits brought to that perfection, we see is worthily to be preferred before any other manner of utterance in prose, for such use and to such purpose as it is ordained and shall hereafter be set down more particularly."¹

The next contribution of note to critical literature, is the volume Observations in the Art of English Poesy (1602), by Thomas Campion. A poet of much beauty and musical rhyming, he tilts laboriously—having in this matter the spirit of the Renascence with him—against rhyme. Perhaps the best argument against Campion is one of his own poems, most of these being written after his critical exercise.

Daniel's Defense came about five years later. It is pleasantly and graciously written, with due acknowledgment of Campion's abilities, and he takes up the strong position that arbitrary laws superimposed upon the verse of a people are absurd, and that the verse of a language is such as best harmonises with the matter of that language. Rhyme "gives to the ear an echo of a delightful right," and to the memory "a deeper impression of what is delivered."

EARLIER RENAISSANCE

The Call of the Sea in Renaissance Literature Mandeville—Hakluyt—Purchas, &c.

THE CALL OF THE SEA IN RENAISSANCE LITERATURE

MICHELET summed up the Renaissance in "the discovery of the world and the discovery of man." With the latter aspect, the culture and art of the movement are necessarily concerned. The richly veined humanity of the Italian Renaissance sufficiently emphasized this side, on the other, the revolution wrought in astronomy and the art of navigation introduced a new world as dazzling and surprising in its vast possibilities as the imaginative world opened by Michael Angelo and Shakespeare.

The sense of curiosity and the craving for adventure, indigenous to man and so long restricted to the tortuous word-spinning and Crusading zeal of the Middle Ages, received a tremendous stimulus that soon found expression in maritime discovery and commercial enterprise. The adventurous seaman was to open up not merely new countries but a new literature. Yet, the Call of the Sea was no new note in our literature, the white surf thunders grimly through Beowulf, and carries its salt sting and desolating grandeur throughout the whole of Saxon poetry.

After the Norman Conquest, when the English were becoming more civilised, and the seaman adventurer was merged into the bartering merchant, the Call of the Sea is lost in other cries, and even Chaucer's Shipman fails to carry conviction. But with the Renaissance, once again we can hear the roar of the ocean and can taste the salt brine.

The adventurous spirit in our literature, hitherto, had been practically confined to that extraordinary mixture of outrageous fable and genuine travel entitled the Travels of Sir John Mandeville; that had sufficed during the late Middle Ages to satisfy the craving for wonders beyond our narrow seas. It really mattered very little that there was "no such person"—indeed it took several ventures to find that out, so distinct is its impress of a genial, curious, broad-minded personality revealed in this mosaic of many men's wanderings, for its enormous popularity testified not merely to the love of the marvellous but to the passion for knowledge about the other countries, which is characteristically English.

The serious recording of voyagers, however, was a thing not begotten in England. It came, as might be expected, from Spain and Italy. Peter Martyr of Anghina catechised the navigators of the time, being commanded to write a history of Spanish explorations. This he did with a thoroughness and enthusiasm that soon communicated itself to others. His great work De Orbe Novo, written between 1511 and 1532, was translated into several languages. An Italian, Pigafetta, told the story of Magellan's voyage, other works followed in quick succession, inspiring Englishmen once again, after many years, to challenge the mysteries of the ocean. It is true that the Age of Discovery nominally opened with the voyages of Cabot, but there is no literary impulse to set these down, and when later on Hakluyt essayed to tell the story, he found the slenderest of material.

One of the earliest names in the new literature of the sea is that of RICHARD EDEN, an industrious compiler of Spanish achievements with the laudable object of inspiring his country to go on and do likewise. He further published a book on the Art of Navigation, 1581. In his style he is clear and unpretentious, and as an interpreter of maritime discovery, he is worthy of a place of honour.

Meanwhile, in 1553, Sir Hugh Willoughby had perished in his voyage to the North-East, an account of which was written in Latin by Clement Adams and translated later by Hakluyt.

After this came the remarkable voyages of Sir JOHN HAWKINS in 1582, 1584, 1587. On the third occasion he wrote an account of his experiences in a brisk and forcible style, made none the less attractive by the occasional vein of philosophic meditation.

In 1576 George Gascoigne wrote a preface to a Discourse of a Discoverie, for a new passage to Cathay, attributed to Sir Humphrey Gilbert. The tract was written primarily to convince Gilbert's brother, who looked upon the project as a wild and foolish thing. Gilbert was prepared to admit its hazardous character, not, however, that it was impossible to "common capacities," as his brother alleged. For himself, he declared, "He is not worthy to live at all who, for fear of danger or death shunneth his country's service . . . since death is inevitable and the fame of virtue immortal."

Martin Frobisher found a literary sponsor in his friend Captain George Best, who described in vigorous and direct speech Frobisher's struggles in the North-West (1577). Meanwhile Eden's industry in dealing with the general literature of discovery, both at home and abroad, is supplemented by Richard Willey. While during the last few years of the century Sir Richard Hawkins adds the existing information on the lives and theories of the early explorers. The great literary exponent of this spirit of adventure, however, is Richard Hakluyt; who summarised and co-ordinated much previous work on the subject, and is the greatest contemporary authority on all pertaining to the sea exploits of the age.

RICHARD HAKLUYT was born about 1553, in Herefordshire, of good British stock notwithstanding his name, and educated at Westminster School and Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1574, and M.A. in 1577, leaving Oxford with a special enthusiasm for the study of geography and travels, first implanted by his cousin Richard Hakluyt of the Middle Temple.

With all his love for voyaging, he does not appear to have travelled further than Paris, where he became Chaplain to the British Embassy shortly after his ordination in 1583, although he had published Divers Voyages touching the Discovery of America and the Lands adjacent . . ., his first volume, in 1582.

During a short visit to England in 1584, Hakluyt submitted to Queen Elizabeth, a treatise recommending the plantation of certain uncultivated parts of America, written at the request of Sir Walter Raleigh, who was very keen on the colonisation of America by the English. (This paper being lost for some considerable time, was not printed till 1877, when it was published at Cambridge, Massachusetts, among the Collections of the Mame Historical Society.) However, the authorities were so impressed with it at the time that the author was promised the next vacant prebend at Bristol, to which in 1586 he was admitted.

Remaining in Paris for five years longer, Hakluyt translated and published an account by Laudonnière of voyages in Florida. In 1598 he returned to England, and a year later published in one folio volume The Principal Navigations, Voyages, and Discoveries of the English Nation. In April 1600 he became rector of Witheringsett-cum-Brockford in Suffolk, prebendary in 1602, and archdeacon of Westminster in 1603.

Hakluyt was twice married. He died on November 26, 1616, and is buried in Westminster Abbey.

To Hakluyt we are indebted for a translation of Adam's account of Willoughby's adventures; for a record of Gilbert's best voyage, with its memorable pen picture of the last scene in which the doughty old seaman figured.

Frobisher's voyages were given by him for the first time connectedly, and the thoroughness and zeal with which he threw himself into the work of a chronicler, is sufficiently illustrated by the profound influence which his many volumes exercised upon the poets and dramatists of the age.

This influence was due to two things; due in the first place to the imaginative stimulus of the subject matter, to the compelling magic encompassing those that go down to the sea in ships; due in the second place to the simple, unaffected directness of the writers—men unversed in literary artifice, and in the affectations of the day, conscious only that they had something to tell that was worth the telling.

HAKLUYT'S VOYAGES

"Whoso maketh navigation to these countries hath not only extreme winds and furious seas to encounter withal, but also many monstrous and great islands of ice: a thing both rare, wonderful, and greatly to be regarded.

"We were forced sundry times, while the ship did ride here at anchor, to have continual watch, with boats and men ready with hawsers, to knit fast unto such ice which with the ebb and flood were tossed to and fro in the harbour, and with force of oars to haul them away, for endangering the ships.

"Our general on certain days searched this supposed continent with America, and not finding the commodity to answer his expectations, after he had made trial thereof, he departed thence, with two little barques, and men sufficient, to the east shore, being the supposed continent of Asia, and left the ship, with most of the gentlemen, soldiers and sailors, until such time as he either thought good to send or come for them.

"The stones on this supposed continent with America be altogether sparkled and glister in the sun like gold; so likewise doth the sand in the bright water, yet they verify the old proverb, 'All is not gold that glistereth.'

"On this west shore we found a dead fish floating, which had in his nose a horn, straight and torquet, of length two yards lacking two inches, being broken in the top, where we might perceive it hollow, into which some of our sailors putting spiders they presently died. I saw not the trial hereof, but it was reported unto me of a truth, by the virtue whereof we supposed it to be the sea unicorn.

"After our general had found out good harbour for the ship and barques to anchor in, and also such store of gold ore as he thought himself satisfied withal, he returned to the Michael, whereof Master Yorke aforesaid was captain, accompanied with our master and his mate, who coasting along the west shore, not far from whence the ship rode, they perceived a fair harbour, and willing to sound the same, at the entrance thereof they espied two tents of seal skins, unto which the captain, our said master, and other company resorted. At the sight of our men the people fled into the mountains; nevertheless, they went to their tents, where, leaving certain trifles of ours as glasses, bells, knives, and such like things, they departed, not taking anything of theirs except one dog. They did in like manner leave behind them a letter, pen, ink, and paper, whereby our men whom the captain lost the year before, and in that people's custody, might (if any of them were alive) be advertised of our presence and being there.

"On the same day, after consultation, all the gentlemen, and others likewise that could be spared from the ship, under the conduct and leading of Master Philpot (under whom, in our general's absence, and his lieutenant, Master Beast, all the rest were obedient), went ashore, determining to see if by fair means we could either allure them to familiarity, or otherwise take some of them, and so attain to some knowledge of those men whom our general lost the year before.

"At our coming back again to the place where their tents were before, they had removed their tents farther into the said bay or sound, where they might, if they were driven from the land, flee with their boats into the sea. We, parting ourselves into two companies, and compassing a mountain, came suddenly upon them by land, who, espying us, without any tarrying fled to their boats, leaving the most part of their oars behind them for haste, and rowed down the bay, where our two pinnaces met them and drove them to shore. But if they had had all their oars, so swift are they in rowing, it had been lost time to have chased them."

The successor of Hakluyt was SAMUEL PURCHAS (c. 1575-1626), whose literary executor he became. Born at Thaxton, and educated at Cambridge, he was also a cleric and held various benefices, including that of the important rectorship of St. Martin's, Ludgate

Hill, in the City of London. He is known by his three compilations: Purchas his Pilgrimage, or Relations of the World and the Religions observed in all Ages and Places . . . ; Purchas his Pilgrim, or the History of Man ; Hakluyt Posthumus, a History of the World in Sea Voyages and Land Travels, &c.

Inferior to Hakluyt as a writer, and less interesting as a man, he is none the less notable for the addition he made to sea records of the time; especially true in the earlier years of the seventeenth century. He reflects the same keen spirit of nationality, and his abridgments of the writings of Spanish and Portuguese discovery, enlivened by his own notable imagination, make good reading. He is less simple and direct than Hakluyt, and succeeds mere by the interest of his matter, than by his manner, which is touched too often by the literary mannerism of the age. From the time of Purchas the literature of discovery began to merge into the more prosaic literature of travel and colossal history.

But the Call of the Sea, if less insistent, never fails to find some expression in our literature, whenever romanticism wells to the surface, as it does from time to time, and despite changing fortunes, the glamour of the salt ocean re-asserts again its ancient power.

The freshening influence of Hakluyt and his comrades upon contemporary English prose was a matter, therefore, of real moment. His imaginative influence was even more remarkable, and Professor Walter Raleigh in a fine essay dealing with Hakluyt's Voyages, has shown how many-sided and pervading was the inspiration of this quest for adventure.

In Marlowe, we find it perhaps at its height. Marlowe's restless imagination and insatiable curiosity seized hungrily on the stuff o' travel for his plays, and did not Stow declare that Drake was "as famous in Europe and America as Tamburlaine was in Asia and Africa"?

Assuredly, then, there is the spirit of Hawkins and of Drake in Tamburlaine and Faust, it is hard to imagine The Tempest and Pericles of Shakespeare, with their vivid descriptions, without the sea chronicles of the time; or the stirring speeches of Othello, with no Hakluyt to give colour and substance to the romantic visions of the poet.

Throughout this great era of the drama and of poetry, the Call of the Sea persists, and from Spenser's Faerie Queene to the New Atlantis of Bacon, and the Paradise Lost of Milton, we may trace its spell. With the decline of the Renaissance, it dies down as a stimulus to our literature; and the matter-of-fact, common-sense attitude of the eighteenth century found its plenary inspiration elsewhere. None the less the spirit of adventure had its own triumph even in that age, and the stirring exploits that had stirred into flame the genius of Marlowe, descended on that brilliant, home-loving journalist, Defoe. So a literature that started with Tamburlaine ended with Robinson Crusoe.

THE HEIGHT OF THE RENASCENCE

Spenser and his Contemporaries—Earlier Song Writers and Sonneteers.

SPENSER AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES

"AN over-faint quietness," wrote Sir Philip Sidney in 1581, "should seem to strew the house for poets." Hitherto the scholar and courtier had ruled the domain of fantasy with pleasing and graceful though not very vital results. But the words were no sooner uttered than a force came into poetry that speedily dispersed the "over-faint quietness." Spenser came at a crucial moment in English Poetry. The spell of Italy had taken hold of our senses, without gripping the heart and conscience. Ascham's suspicion of the novel, and his hostile attitude towards Italian influence, did at any rate represent one side of national feeling. The revival of letters had merged into the Protestant Revolution; but the influence of Germany and Italy were hitherto antagonistic forces in our literature. It is impossible not to feel that the verso of Surrey, and of Gascoigne, reflect only in part national character and temperament. Now in Spenser, the Puritan side and the artistic side are merged and reconciled. Spenser is at once the child of the Renaissance and the Reformation. On one side we may regard him with Milton as "the sage and serious Spenser," on the other he is the Humanist, alive to the finger-tips with the sensuous beauty of Southern Romance.

EDMUND SPENSER

In "Merry London, my most kindly nurse," in his own words, Edmund Spenser was born about 1552. His father (of a Lancashire family related to the noble house of Spencer) was a journeyman cloth-maker, and was living in London before 1550. Of his mother, Elizabeth, nothing is known. His education began as a "poor scholar" under the "spending of the money of Robert Nowell," and at Merchant Taylor's School opened in 1561. In 1569 he matriculated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and in 1576 took his degree of M.A. There is little doubt, judging from work he did at this time, that he shewed remarkable ability. His Miscellany, published by Dr Jan van der Noodt, called "A Theatre for Worldlings," showed considerable promise, but was only later acknowledged by Spenser. At Pembroke College he matriculated as a sizar, which indicates his poverty. A sizar's duties consisted of menial work for which bread and lodgings were returned as payment. It was here he met Harvey and Edward Kirke, the latter a fellow-sizar. They both became stimulating and sympathetic friends to Spenser. Harvey, who was a Fellow of the College, deeply interested himself in Spenser, and being himself a student of literature, there is no doubt his good influence was considerable. It was at a later period that this power was to be feared, Harvey's pedantic suggestions being deleterious to the free growth of Spenser's powers.

After obtaining his degree, Spenser left Cambridge, and despite the poor social position occupied there, his affection lasted until the end of his life for "my mother Cambridge." From there he went on a visit to his kinsfolk in Lancashire. At this time Spenser was in poor health, possessing very little money, and with no plans for the future. During this visit, it is supposed he met a woman of higher social pretensions than his own, with whom he fell in love, and who figures as Rosalind in much of his future work. She disdained the poor poet, but instead of this disappointment driving him to despair, it aroused him to make fresh efforts. Harvey writes to him to "forsake his shire" and come to London where he will present him to the Earl of Leicester. Spenser followed Harvey's advice, and on his arrival an introduction takes place. Leicester is impressed and offers him secretarial employment and his abode in Leicester House. Sir Philip Sidney, the Earl's relative, became acquainted with Spenser here, and a friendship which was deep and life-lasting began between the two poets. Spenser soon felt the influence of the culture he was surrounded by. Leicester House gave him the opportunity of meeting the great in every walk of life. His ambitions were stirred and he seriously began his literary career. The Shepheard's Calendar was published in 1579, and although it placed Spenser immediately in the highest rank of living writers, Drayton declared "Master Edmund Spenser had done enough for the immortality of his name had he only given us his The Shepheard's Calendar, a masterpiece if any."

The poet was suffering from pecuniary embarrassment. His great hope when he entered Leicester House was that it was the gateway to a substantial official position. Just as he was feeling that Leicester was disappointing in this respect, a position was offered which for a time quietened Spenser's uneasiness.

In 1580 Spenser secured the post of secretary to Lord Grey de Wilton, who had just been made Lord Deputy of Ireland. Had he been able to exercise his own wishes he would never have left "Merry London." He loved his native town, and only accepted the office in Ireland thinking it would lead him home again to a permanent official post. He went to Dublin with the Queen's Deputy and no doubt was present at the Desmond Rebellion. His View of Ireland tells of the terrible scenes in the Munster province, and no doubt shocked his gentle poetic nature and made him long more than ever for England. As there seemed no prospect of his being able to return, he applied himself to his duties and preferments quickly came to him. He obtained many good positions which he held with his secretaryship. Much land was given him, he had many congenial companions who thoroughly appreciated his genius and stirred him to give the world more proofs of his poetic genius. At Kilcolman, an old castle of the Desmonds, in the beautiful country of the Galtee Hills, County Cork, Spenser began to reside in 1588. Among other visitors came Sir Walter Raleigh, and listened with wonder and admiration to Spenser's reading of the beginning of the great poem the Faerie Queene. Raleigh, himself a poet, read to Spenser his poem Cynthia. Through the sympathetic understanding and appreciation of Spenser's work the two writers soon became close friends. For an interesting account of their connection, see Colin Clout's Come Home Again, Spenser's autobiographical poem. Raleigh was anxious that the Faerie Queene, even in the incomplete poem, should at once be published. It was owing to his persuasion that Spenser accompanied him to Court in order that Queen Elizabeth might see their writings. Spenser was quite willing to rush away to his beloved London, ever hoping that he might have the good fortune to meet with the official appointment which would keep him there. The three completed books were published and dedicated to the Queen. Their reception was all that could be desired, and their success immediate. The Queen granted him a pension of fifty pounds a year. We must remember how much greater a sum that represented then compared to the present day. It would have been larger but for Lord Burghley's interference. Poets seeking lucrative positions were not looked upon with much favour by the great statesman. Spenser never forgave Lord Burghley. The smallness of the pension would not allow him to give up his post in Ireland, so once more he had to return. Late in the year 1591, he is again attending his duties as Clerk of the Council and working at the Faerie Queene. We may presume the following two years were passed in this way, until we come to the great change which took place in his private life. This was his marriage on June 11, 1594, to Elizabeth Boyle, daughter of James Boyle, and a relation of Richard Boyle, who was later Earl of Cork. Little is known of the bride except what can be gathered from his Amoretti and Euphanelion. There were four if not five children born. 1595 sees him once again in London, but in 1597 he returned with his wife and children to Kilcolman. Having previously resigned his Clerkship to Sir Richard Boyle, a relation of his wife's, he was appointed in 1598 Sheriff of Cork. In this year Tyrone's rebellion arose. The Castle Kilcolman was set on fire and Spenser had only just time to escape with his household. It was thought for some time that his youngest child had perished in the flames.

In 1599, on January 16, Spenser died in a tavern in King Street, Westminster. There is a tradition that he was in extreme poverty at the end, even wanting bread. To Jonson we owe the statement that "he refused twenty pieces sent him by my Lord Essex, saying he was sure he had no time to spend them."

The poet died at the early age of forty-seven and lies in the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey, the funeral expenses being borne by the Earl of Essex. It was the Queen's wish that the responsibility of a monument above his grave should be due to her, but her purpose was frustrated by a dishonest royal servant, who stole the money given him for the work. The grave was left unhonoured for twenty-one years, when Ann Clifford, Countess of Dorset, raised a monument on which was inscribed: "Here lyes expecting the second cominge of our Saviour Christ Jesus, the body of Edmund Spenser, the Prince of Poets in his Tyme, whose divine spirit needs noe other witness than the workes which he left behind."

The Shepherd's Calendar is modelled on the artificial pastoral popularised by the Renaissance, and inspired by Virgil and Theocritus. Technically it is a poem of considerable merit, and shows great adroitness in dealing with various old-time metres in a fresh and masterly way. While his love of allegory leads him to pretty pieces of word painting such as the delightful Oak and the Briar. Comparing the poem with the verse preceding it, one realises the richness, the warm pictorial beauty, and sense of amplitude hitherto alien to our poetry.

But The Shepherd's Calendar pales in significance beside the Faerie Queene.

This poem was neither written in England nor inspired by England. Ireland is the inspiration; Ireland is the scenic background, Ireland supplies the stuff of adventure; Ireland—the troublous, storm-tossed Ireland of Elizabeth's reign.

The enemies of Gloriana were flesh and blood enemies; the knights came from Elizabeth's Court—were not Raleigh, Ormonde, and Grey of their number? And for this reason, perhaps, this poem has been called the Epic of the English Wars in Ireland under Elizabeth.

The poem reveals a sober, chaste, and sensitive spirit; one keenly alive to sensuous beauty, but kept from the grossness and coarseness of some of his brilliant contemporaries by a mind of singular refinement, and beauty is for him of the supremest value in life. Small wonder that Keats was fired by his verse, for certainly his famous phrase, "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever," is entirely Spenserian in sentiment.

The poem set out to be a story with twelve knights of Elizabeth who undertake various enterprises in her honour. But the poet had, unlike Chaucer, little gift of lucidity, and soon wanders off the main road into the flowery meads of fancy. Starting in the middle of one of the adventure, he never completes his initial design, and the poem is merely a lovely mosaic into which are woven deeds of chivalry and pictorial fantasies, and grave moralising. From the pleasaunces and excitements of chivalry Spenser takes his ideas; yet he is not content merely to tell an entertaining story as Tasso and Ariosto had done, but to present his visions in a framework of high and noble purpose. Indeed, in a letter to Raleigh he avows his purpose is "to fashion a gentleman . . . in virtuous and gentle discipline."

What differentiates Spenser from, say, Shakespeare the poet is the equable calm that pervades even his fervour. Sensitive to every phase of imagination and beauty, there is always a dreamy atmosphere about his verse. The sharp, vivid intensity of Shakespeare is not his, but he has his own particular charm.

His genius is epic, not lyric, he is a story-teller, not a singer. He has something of Homer's ancient simplicity, though not the poignancy. But the similes are primal and direct.

A wounded hero falls

" . . . as an aged tree,
High growing on the top of rocky cliff."

His is a rich ornate imagination; yet it rarely becomes turbid and oppressive. If it lacks Marlowe's thrill, it certainly also lacks his violence. It is a thing of prismatic colouring, refracting the white light of common day in delicate rainbow hues. The symbolism behind his faerie music need not trouble us; and we may enjoy the adventures of his Knight of the Cross defending his beloved Una, almost without realising that it is a battle between truth and falsehood with which he is concerned.

The Amoreth—love sonnets, fall far below the level of Shakespeare's splendid series; and that curious undertone of melancholy that sounds through most Renaissance poetry is blended here delicately with frank and sensitive delight in the beauty and splendour of things. Intenser in its passion, and therefore more arresting in its hold upon the reader is the Epithalamion. There is no relatively short poem that exhibits more happily the sensuous sweetness, and the rapture of Spenser's best work, than this poem.

The manuscript of Colin Clout was sent to his friend Sir Walter Raleigh on his arrival back in England in 1591, but was not published till 1595. It is livelier than most of Spenser's work, the dreamy languor that hangs like a silver mist over his pictures is here thrown aside for a space. It is a brilliant piece of vigorous retrospect, and a happy and affectionate tribute to Raleigh's protection.

His prose work on Ireland is an able and thoughtful contribution to the Irish problem from the English point of view. Granting the point of view—that could scarcely have been otherwise with one in Spenser's position—it shows an insight into the causes of disaffection, and a frank criticism of English rule, in advance of the time. The book displays a side of Spenser's powers not illustrated in his poetry; a shrewdness of insight, and on the whole a fair and judicious spirit.

Spenser has been happily called the "poet's poet." In his own day he influenced a large number of verse writers, of more or less power. Cowley and Dryden at a later period testified to his inspiring influence as a literary artist; Milton paid him warm tribute; and even Pope, whose poetic faculty is so different in kind from that of the Elizabethan, admitted to his compelling magic. The indebtedness of Keats and Tennyson is easily comprehensible, but the most significant testimony to the greatness of this romantic Puritan lies in the power he wields over versifiers so alien in imaginative vision as Dryden and Pope. The height of a mountain can never be fairly gauged till the looker-on is at a distance and can measure the relative importance of the hills before him. Lesser heights dwindle and melt into the horizon as we pass through the contumacious Spenser like Shakespeare still stands up sharply and distinctly against the skies, intervening hills of minor importance may have shut him off from those of us in the plain, but ascend any of our own heights—Browning, Tennyson, and William Morris—and we see him at once. And even those who have never read a line of the Faerie Queene have met him unknown and unrecognized in The Earthly Paradise. Limitations he had, of course, the splendour of Shakespeare is beyond his grasp, and the fine austerity of Milton. But no poet in any age or clime had a richer and fuller sense of sensuous loveliness than he, or a more masterly command of the resources of rhythmic music and pictorial phrasing, such as would reveal this loveliness in words.

FAERIE QUEENE

The Patron of true Holynesse
Foule Error doth defete
Hypocrite him to entrappe,
Doth to his home entreate.

I

A gentle Knight was pricking on the plaine,
Ycladd in mightie armes and silver shielde,
Wherein old dints of deepe woundes did remaine,
The cruell markes of many a bloody fiele,
Yet armes till that time did he never wield,
His angry steede did chide his foming bitt,
As much disdainning to the curbe to yield:
Full jolly knight he seemed, and faire did sitt,
As one for knightly giuts and fierce encounters fitt.

II

And on his brest a bloodie Crosse he bore,
The deare remembrance of his dying Lord,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he wore,
And dead, as living, ever him ador'd.
Upon his shield the like was also scor'd,
For soveraine hope which in his helpe he had
Right faithfull true he was in deede and word,
But of his cheere did seeme too solitarie sad;
Yet nothing did he dread, but over was ydrad.

III

Upon a great adventure he was bound,
That greatest Gloriana to him gavo,
(That greatest Glorious Queene of Faery lond)
To winne him worshippe, and her grace to have,
Which of all earthly thinges he most did crave:
And ever as he rode his hart did earne
To prove his puissance in battell brave
Upon his foe, and his now force to learne,
Upon his foe, a Dragon horrible and stearne.

IV

A lovely Ladie rode him faire beside,
Upon a lowly Asse more white than snow,
Yet she much whiter; but the same did hide

Under a velle, that wimpled was full low;
And over all a blacke stole shee did throw.
As one that inly mourned, so was shee sad,
And heave sate upon her palfrey slow;
Seemed in heart some ludden care shee had,
And by her, in a hute, a milkewhite lambe shee had

V

So pure and innocent, as that same lambe,
Shee was in life and every vertuous lore,
And by descent from Royal lynage came
Of ancient Kinges and Queenes, that had of yore
Their scepters stretcht from East to Westerne shore
And all the world in their subjection hold;
Till that infernall feend with foule upore
Forwasted all their land, and their expeld;
Whom to avenge shee had this Knight from far compeld

VI

Behind her farro away a Dwarfie did lag,
That laze seemed, in being over last,
Or wearied with bearing of her bag
Of needments at his backe. Thus as they past,
The day with cloudes was suddaine overcast,
And angry Jove an hideous storme of raine
Did poure into his Lemans lap so fast,
That everie wight to shrowd it did constrain,
And thus faire couple eke to shroud themselves were faine.

VII

Enforst to seeke some covert nigh at hand,
A shadie grove not farr away they spide,
That promist ayde the tempest to withstand,
Whose loftie trees, yclad with sommers pride,
Did spred so broad, that heavens light did hide,
Not perceivable with power of any starre:
And all within were pathes and alleys wide,
With footing worne, and leading inward farr
Faire harbour that thorn seems, so in they entered ar.

VIII

And forth they passe, with plume forward led,
Joying to heare the birdes sweete harmony,
Which, therein shrouded from the tempest dred,
Soomd in their song to scorne the cruell sky.
Much can they praise the trees so straight and hy,
The sayling lino, the Cedar proud and tall,
The vine-propp Elmo, the Poplar never dry,
The buldore Oake, sole king of Forrests all,
The Aspine good for staves; the Cypress funorall,

IX

The Laurel, meed of mightie Conquerours
And Poets sage, the Firre that weepeth still;
The Willow, worne of forlorne Paramours,
The Eugh, obedient to the bendlers will;
The Birch for shaftes; the Sallow for the mill,
The Murthe sweete-bleeding in the bitter wound,
The warlike Beech, the Ash for nothing ill,
The fruitfull Olive; and the Platane round;
The carver Holme, the Maple seldom inward sound.

X

Led with delight, they thus beguile the way,
Untill the blustering storme is overblowne,
When, weening to returne whence they did stray,
They cannot finde that path, which first was showne,
But wander too and fro in waies unknowne,
Furthest from end then, when they nearest weene,
That makes them doubt their wits be not their owne.
So many pathes, so many turnings seene,
That which of them to take in diverse doubt they been.

Book II Canto I

xxxii

"Joy may you have, and overlasting fame,
Of late most hard atchievment by you donne,
For which enrolled is your glorious name
In heavenly Regesters above the Sunne,
Where you a Saint with Saints your seat have wonne;
But wretched we, where ye have left your marks,
Must now anew begin like race to runne,

God guide thee, Guyon, well to end thy warke,
And to the wished haven bring thy weary barke ! ”

XXXIII

“ Palmer,” him answered the Redcrosse knight,
“ His be the praise that thus achiev’ment wrought,
Who made my hand the organ of his might :
More then goodwill to me attribute nought ;
For all I did, I did but as I ought.
But you, faire Sir, whose pageant next ensues,
Well mote yee see, as well can wish your thought.
That home ye may report thrise happy newes,
For well ye worthy bene for worth and gentle thewes.”

XXXIV

So courteous conge both did give and take,
With right hands plighted, pledges of good will.
Then Guyon forward gan his voyage make
With his blacke Palmer, that him guided still :
Still he him guided over dale and hill,
And with his steady staffe did point his way ;
His race with reason, and with words his will,
From fowle intemperance he ofte did stay,
And suffred not in wrath his hasty steps to stray.

XXXV

In this faire wize they traveld long ylere,
Through many hard assayes which did betido ;
Of which he lionour still away did beare,
And spred his glory through all countryes wido.
At last, as chaunst them by a forest side
To passe, for succour from the scorching ray,
They heard a ruefull voice, that dearely crido
With piercing ehreikes and many a dolefull lay ;
Which to attend awhile thow forward steps they stay.

XXXVI

“ But if that carelesse heinous,” (quoth she) “ despise
The doome of just revouge, and take delight
To see sad pageants of mens miseries,
As bownd by them to live in lives despite ;
Yet can they not warne death from wretched wight.
Come, then ; come soone ; come, sweetest death, to me,
And take away this long lout loathed hight :
Sharpe be thy wounds, but sweete the medicines be,
That long captived soules from weary thraldome free

EPITHALAMION

Open the temple gates unto my love,
Open them wide that she may enter in,
And all the postes adorne as doli behove,
And all the pillours deck with garlands trim,
For to receive this Saynt with honour dew,
That cometh in to you,
With trembling steps, and humble reverence
She cometh in before th’ Almighty’s view ;
Of her ye virgins learne obedience,
Whon so ye come into those holy places,
To humble your proud faces :
Bring her up to th’ high altar, that she may
The sacred ceremonies there partake,
The which do endless matrimony make ;
And let the roing Organs loudly play
The praises of the Lord in lively notes ;
The whiles, with hollow throates,
The Choristers the joyous Anthems sing,
That all the woods may answer, and their echo ring.
Behold, whiles she before the altar stands,
Hearing the holy priest that to her speakes,
And blesseth her with his two happy hands,
How the roses flush up in her cheekes,
And the pure snow, with goodly vermill stayne,
Like crimson dyde in grayne,
That even th’ Angels, which continually
About the sacred Altare doe remaine,
Forget their service and about her fly,
Oft peeping in her face, that seems more fayre
The more they on it stare,
But her sad eyes, still fastened on the ground,
Are govern’d with goodly modesty,
That suffers not one looke to glauce awry,

Which may let in a little thought unsownd.

Why blush ye, love, to give to me your hand,
The pledge of all our band ?
Sing, ye sweet Angels, Alleluja sing,
That all the woods may answer, and your echo ring

PROTHALAMION

Calm was the day, and through the trembling ayre
Sweet-breathing Zephyrus did softly play . . .
Along the shoare of silver streaming Themmes ;
Whose rutty Bancke, the which his River hemmes
Was paynted all with variable flowers,
And all the meades adorned with daintie gemmes.

There, in a Meadow, by the Rivers side,
A Flocke of Nymphes I chaunced to espy,
All lovely Daughters of the Flood thereby,
With goodly greenish locks, all loose untido,
As each had bene a Brydo ;
And each one had a little wicker basket,
Made of fine twig, ontrayled curiously,
In which they gathered flowers to fill their flasket,
And with fine Fingers crept full feateously
The tender stalkes on hye.

Of every sort, which in that Meadow grew,
They gathered some, the Violet, pallid blew,
The hille Dazie, that at evening closes,
The virgin Lillie, and the Primrose trow,
With store of vermill Roses,
To decke their Bridegromes posies
Against the Brydale day, which was not long :
Sweete Themmes ! runne softly, till I end my Song.

With that I saw two Swannes, of goodly howe
Come softly swimming downe along the Lee
Two fairer Birds I yet did never see ;
The snow, which doth the top of Pindus strew,
Did never whiter shew,
Nor Jove himselfe, when he a Swan would be,
For love of Leda, whiter did appear ;
Yet Leda was (they say) as white as he,
Yet not so white as these, nor nothing neare ;
So purely white they were,
That even the gentle streame, the which them bary,
Seem’d foule to them, and bad his billowes spaw
To wet their silken fonthiers, lest they might Soyle their fayre plumos with water not so fayre,
That shone as heavens light,
Against their Brydale day, which was not long
Sweete Themmes ! runne softly, till I end my Song.

Then forth they all out of their baskets drew
Great store of Flowers, the honour of the field,
That to the sense did fragrant odours yield,
All which upon these goodly Birds they threw
And all the Waves did strew.
That like old Peneus Waters they did scorne,
When downe along by pleasant Tompos shore,
Scattered with Flowers, through thesaly they streame,
That they appear, through Lillies plenteous store,
Like a Brydes Chamber dore
Two of those Nymphes, meane while, two Garlands bound

Of freshest Flowers which in that Mead they found,
The which presenting all in trim Array,
Thow snowy Forheades therewithal they crowned,
Whilst one did sing this Lay,
Prepar’d against that Day,
Against their Brydale day, which was not long :
Sweete Themmes ! runne softly, till I end my Song.

Ye gentle Birdes ! the worlds fayre ornament,
And heavens glorie, whom this happie howe
Doth leade unto your lovers hisseful bower,
Joy may you have, and gentle hearts content
Of your loves complement ;
And let fair Venus, that is Queene of love,
With her heart-quelling Sonne upon you smile,
Whose smile, they say, hath vertue to remove
All Loves dislike, and friendships faultie guile
For ever to assuile.

Let endless Peace your steadfast hearts accord,
 And blessed Plentie wayt upon your bord :
 And let your bed with pleasures chast abound,
 That fruitful issue may to you afford,
 Which may your foes confound,
 And make your joyes redound
 Upon your Brydale day, which is not long :
 Sweete Themmes ! runne softly, till I end my Song.

Above the rest were goodly to bee seene
 Two gentle Knights of lovely face and feature,
 Beseeming well the bower of amie Queene,
 With gifts of wit, and ornaments of nature,
 Fit for so goodly stature,
 That like the twins of Jove they seem'd in sight,
 Which decks the Bauldricks of the Heavens bright ;
 They two, forth pacing to the Rivers side,
 Received these two fayre Brides, their Loves delight ;
 Which, at th' appointed tyde,
 Each one did make his Bryde
 Against their Brydale day, which is not long :
 Sweete Themmes ! runne softly, till I end my Song.

EARLIER SONG WRITERS AND SONNETEERS

Spenser's allegorical and descriptive vein of poetry inspired a number of his contemporaries and successors to work this vein much further. Some, however, there were who were caught more particularly by the passion for sonneteering, whilst others inaugurated that liting school of song writers that flourished from Elizabethan times down to the close of the Restoration period.

First, concerning the Sonneteers. At an earlier period Surrey and Wyatt had shown some skill in this direction, but between 1593 and 1600 there was an amazing outburst of this form of poetry, and scarcely less remarkable than the fertility is the quality attained by a few names otherwise obscure in our literature.

Putting aside the work of the greater men, of Sidney, Spenser, and Shakespeare, there are the names of Barnes, Fletcher, Lodge, Daniel, Drayton, Constable, and Fulke Greville, and uncertain and varying as was the excellence of their craftsmanship, their work is at times equal to that of the great master himself.

The word "sonnet" is probably an abbreviation of the Italian sonetto (a little sound), and was a short poem recited originally to a musical accompaniment. Like the lyric, it was a single emotion or idea expressed in rhythmic melody, and it differed from the ordinary lyric less in conception than in form—as anyone may see for himself by comparing, say, one of Shakespeare's Sonnets on Love with one of his Songs on Love. The lilt and abandonment of the lyric are replaced by a more deliberate manner, a more austere treatment. There may be the same intensity of feeling, and an equal scope for fancy, but in one case it affects one like the scent of a wayside flower, in the other like the fragrance of a well-ordered garden.

The sonnet began to take shape as a special metrical form under Fra Guittone d'Arezzo, in the thirteenth century. He perfected the mechanism, Petrarch and Dante crowned it with beauty and power. The sweetness of its music at length attracted the early poets of the Renaissance, but they lacked the cunning to make it yield up its magic. Then came Sidney with his caressing sweetness, who showed what might be done with it, and from his time the sonnet swiftly passes from a metrical experiment into poetry.

Without discussing here the various divergences from the Italian form of sonnet, made by English verse writers, we must not overlook the fact that the formal modifications characterising the Shakespearean form were first of all introduced by Daniel and Drayton. Drayton's sonnet, A Parting, is a magnificent piece of verse, sure in its handling, at once strong and restrained in its expression of passion.

A PARTING

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part,—
 Nay I have done, you get no more of me ;
 And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart,
 That thus so cleanly I myself can free ;

Shake hands for ever, cancel all our vows,
 And when we meet at any time again,
 Be it not seen in either of our brows
 That we one jot of former love retain.

Now at the last gasp of love's latest breath,
 When his pulse failing, passion speechless hea,
 When faith is kneeling by his bed of death,
 And innocence is closing up his eyes,

—Now if thou would'st, when all have given him over
 From death to life thou might'st him yet recover !

Daniel's work, though less masterly, is skilful and pleasing always, occasionally touching great heights ; but Daniel, no less than Drayton, did for Shakespeare's sonneteering, much what Marlowe did for his blank verse. They showed the way, his genius did the rest.

Around Spenser are a number of verse writers, who, while influenced largely by him and to a less extent by Sidney in their choice of subject, have yet sufficient creative power of their own to make us realise the richness of the poetic wealth now to our hand. There is GILES FLETCHER, graceful and fantastic ; the many-sided THOMAS LODGE, whose madrigals are unexcelled for dainty sweetness ; WILLIAM PERCY, to whose scholarly gifts might be added the more dubious accomplishment of copious ale-drinking, and whose work is suggestive of contemporary French as well as the usual Italian influences, the mysterious "J. C." with his pretty aphoristic gift displayed in six-line stanzas.

There are also NICHOLAS BRETON, versatile in moods and methods, but at his happiest in sentimental conceits ; and HENRY CONSTABLE, whose sonnets have no small measure of Spenser's sensuous charm.

"My Lady's presence makes the Roses red,
 Because to see her lips they blush for shame.
 The Lily's leaves, for envy, pale became ;
 And her white hands in them this envy bred.
 The Marigold the leaves abroad doth spread ;
 Because the sun's and her power is the same.
 The Violet of purple colour came,
 Dyed in the blood she made my heart to shed
 In brief all flowers from her their virtue take,
 From her sweet breath, their sweet smells do proceed
 The living heat which her eyebeams doth make Warmeth the ground, and quickeneth the seed.
 The rain, wherewith she watereth the flowers,
 Falls from mine eyes, which she dissolves in showers."

Some of these writers belong to the group of song-writers that constitute a special side of Renaissance poetry. These will be more conveniently considered later, as they extend well into Jacobean times and merge almost imperceptibly into the lyricists of the Restoration period.

Descriptive poetry, whether purely narrative, or satirical in object, belongs more peculiarly to the Spenserian province. Some consideration of this may well round off this chapter.

Five noteworthy names here are DANIEL and DRAYTON, LODGE, HALL, and DONNE.

Of the first two, something already has been said; but these two men were more than sonneteers. Daniel was a prosoman as well as a poet, witness his spirited Defense of Rhyme. He was a west country man with an ardent imagination and an admirable technique. Art laid restraining hands upon him, and choked, as she often failed in doing, the tendency of the day to extravagance and audacity. Yet he is in no way dull, and has the gift—rare enough at any time, especially in Elizabethan—of moralising agreeably and pleasantly. His historical poem Rosamund is perhaps his best descriptive piece; quiet, restrained, yet full of pathos.

Michael Drayton is one of the most astonishing writers of his time. His versatility was amazing, and there is scarcely any side of poetic craftsmanship which he could not tackle with success. His literary life opens in 1591, with the Harmony of the Church; his sacred verse not pleasing, he reappears in 1593 with the Shepherd's Garland, an experiment in pastoral verse. Then came the Barons' War, and England's Heroical Epistles, while in later life the colossal Polyolbion, inspired by patriotic sentiment. As an historical poet he may be regarded as the Scott of his age, and his Ballad of Agincourt is a splendid specimen of its kind. Quite in another key is the quaint and fantastic Nymphidia; while his satirical gift is well illustrated in short poems like The Owl and The Man in the Moon.

From "Polyolbion"

Of Albion's glorious isle the wonders whilst I write,
The sundry varying soils, the pleasures infinite,
(Where heat kills not the cold, nor cold expels the heat,
The Calms too mildly small, nor winds too roughly great,
Nor night doth hinder day, nor day the night doth wrong,
The summer not too short, the winter not too long.)
What help shall I invoke to aid my Muse the while?
Thou genius of the place (this most renowned isle),
Which liv'st long before the all-earth-drowning flood
Whilst yet the world did swarm with her gigantic brood,
Go thou before me still thy circling shores about,
And in this wand'ring maze help to conduct me out;
Direct my course so right, as with thy hand to show
Which way thy forests range, which way thy rivers flow;
Wise genius, by thy help that so I may descry
How thy fair mountains stand, and how thy valleys lie.

PIGWIGGIN'S ARMOUR

From "Nymphidia"

And quickly arms him for the field,
A little cockle shell his shield,
Which he could very bravely wield;
Yet could it not be pierced
His spear a bent both stiff and strong.

And well near of two inches long,
The pike was of a horse-fly's tongue,
Whose sharpness nought reversed.

And puts him on a coat of mail
Which was of a fish's scale,
That when his foe should him assail,
No point should be prevailing:
His rapier was a hornet's sting,
It was a very dangerous thing,
For if he chanc'd to hurt the King,
It would be long in healing.

His helmet was a beetle's head,
Most horrible and full of dread,
That able was to strike one dead,
Yet did it well become him.
And for a plume a horse's hair
Which, being toss'd with the air,
Had force to strike his foe with fear,
And turn his weapon upon him.

Himself he on an earwig set,
Yet scarce he on his back could get,
So oft and high he did curvet,
Ere he himself could settle.
He made him turn, and stop, and bound,
To gallop and to trot around,
He scarce could stand on any ground,
He was so full of mettle.

TO HIS COY LOVE

I pray thee, leave! Love me no more!
Call home the heart you gave me!
I but in vain, that Saint adore,
That can, but will not, save me!
These poor half-kisses kill me quite!
Was ever man thus served!
Armed at an ocean of delight,
For pleasure to be starved!
Show me no more those angry breasts,
With azure riverets branched!
Where whilst mine eye with plenty feasts;
Yet as my thirst not stanch'd!
O Tantalus, thy pains ne'er tell!
By me thou art prevented!
'Tis nothing! to be plagued in Hell;
But thus, in Heaven tormented!
Clip me no more in those dear arms;
Nor thy "life's comfort!" call me!
Oh, these are but too powerful charms
And do but more enthrall me!
But see, how patient I am grown:
In all this coil about thee!
Come, now thing! let thy heart alone!
I cannot live without thee!

Satire in English verse had made its first orthodox appearance in Skelton. There is satirical fancy, of course, to be found in our poetry from Saxon times onwards; but the first definite satirist is Skelton. Gascoigne's Steel Glass is less clumsy; and he is followed by Joseph Hall with his Virgdemarum; Lodge's satires are not equal to his romantic work, but Hall, though far inferior in general literary power, is a better artist in the domain of satire; and is interesting as a social historian. Donne is so much more than a satirist, and his writings have so many striking points of interest that he is best considered in dealing with the late Renaissance period.

So far, the poetry passed under notice has been of the satiric, descriptive, or formally sentimental kind. To find a livelier mood we must turn to a school of poetry that sprung up about the time of Spenser—the lyric school—and gave expression to the more sensitive and more capricious moods of the Elizabethan.

The lyric was already a literary force both in Italy and France; but until 1580 it did not impress itself upon English imagination. What brought about the sudden flowering of the lyric? To some extent the persistent study of foreign poetry, but chiefly the growing popularity of music.

Such brilliant musicians as BYRD, TALLIS, and DOWLAND needed articulate expression for their sweet lute melodies. The gift of song no doubt was dormant in many an Elizabethan verso-writer. It needed some outside stimulus to call it forth, and assuredly at no time in our history has there been so rich a company of singers, some already famous in other directions as dramatists or novelists, many quite unknown save for their "short swallow flights of song."

WILLIAM BYRD is the earliest of these singers, but his verse is characterised by its quaint moralising rather than by any flight of fancy. Lighter in texture are the Songs of John Dowland, famed for his "heavenly touch upon the lute." In the last years of the sixteenth century he published two volumes of "Songs and Aires." Take this charming snatch from the first volume (1597):

"Dear, if you change, I'll never choose again;
Sweet, if you shrink, I'll never think of love,
Fair, if you fail, I'll judge all beauty vain,
Wise, if too weak, more wise I'll never prove Dear, sweet, fair, wise! Change, shrink, nor be not weak,
And, on my faith, my faith shall never break."

CAMPION distinguished himself in three capacities, putting aside his fame as a musician. He wrote masques, among the best of their kind; displayed his nimble wit and scholarship in Latin verse, and discussed in prose form the values of music and poetry.

Campion's songs are light as thistledown, and float away in the air. Of his sonnetecring we have already spoken.

Following these came JOHN DANIEL, ROBERT JONES, THOMAS MORLEY, and in the early years of the seventeenth century a crowd of names, about whom in many cases little is known save for the gay and tender lyrics ascribed to them.

SHAKESPEARE'S ENGLAND

Were we to fall asleep like the man in the Dream of John Ball, in this grey, noisy, bewildering London of ours, and then awake, not in the thirteenth century, but in the age of Shakespeare, what should we see? We should find ourselves in a quaint, picturesque city, about the size of Hyde Park, of narrow, tortuous streets, high-gabled, red-roofed wooden houses, and pleasant flower gardens, flanked about with green meadows, and windmills. No turbid, dingy river then, but what Spenser rightly called the "silver streaming Thames," busy with merchandise and gay with silk-covered tilt-boats, and merry-makers. For the river is the great highway of the time, and country cousins up to see the sights and young gallants bent on roystering, favour it alike, in preference to the crowded, cobbled streets.

Piccadilly is a country lane lush with flowers, King's Cross and Whitechapel are quiet, rural spots. At Holborn, we are skirting the meadows, and Regent Street is in Arcadia. Southwark is a pleasure-making village with its old Tabard Inn and rustic surroundings. From Temple Bar to Westminster, the way is gorgeous with spacious mansions, and formal gardens that run down to the water side.

Westminster, of course, was a city in itself, with its Palace, its Great Hall, its Almonry, its noble Abbey. But the traveller who struck up northwards would find himself among the buttercups where now curves Shaftesbury Avenue. From all parts of England, men turned towards London, dazzled by its pictorial splendour and material comforts.

Certainly she was attractive enough to the eye, both of the pleasure-seeker and the man of business. The latter saw in her black-fronted taverns, places where he could hire seamen for adventuring on the Spanish Main, while he gauged the trading possibilities of the new craze for literature under the shadow of Westminster. The pleasure-seeker, after enjoying the fashionable promenade down the great aisle of St. Paul's, or the bazaar-like excitement of the Royal Exchange, could elect between the Bear Gardens across the water or one of those strange novel entertainments without the City, at "The Curtain" in Shoreditch or "The Globe" in Southwark. The countryman would note with wonder the ancient walls that hung their grey protecting arms around the city, and would gaze, in mingled horror and fascination at the grim battlements of the Tower, dark with years, sinister with secrets; the symbol of despotic power and princely munificence. On the grassy plain of Spitalfields he could watch the artillery exercise; could appraise the city archers on the marshy ground of Finsbury, and duly admire the royal hunting ground, afterwards known as Hyde Park.

The streets are ill-lighted and roughly paved, with no footpaths for the cautious pedestrian; the houses are nameless and unnumbered, known by the flapping signs that projected from their doorways. The traffic is not considerable, happily enough, as it is, it requires no small skill to avoid the splashing from those on horseback and from the few cumbrous chariots that ground their way along.

Let us turn aside for a moment from the rough street and into an Elizabethan mansion with its formal old garden. Looking in at the front gate, we may see the wide terraces and broad straight walk, the geometrical flower beds, the trimmed yew hedges and intertwining willows, the inevitable fountain and florid Renaissance sculpture.

More imposing is the interior with its spacious galleries and huge bedrooms, rich in embroideries and tapestries, but poor in what we to-day should call comforts. For there are rushes for carpets and benches for chairs.

Back again into the streets. What a medley of colour and costumes! The men and women seem to be living in a perpetual fancy dress ball. There is little to differentiate the sexes in the matter of gorgeous ornament. William Harrison, household chaplain to Lord Colham, sternly reproves the extravagance of the time. "Oh how much cost is bestowed nowadays upon our bodies and how little upon our souls, how many suits of apparel hath the one, and how little furniture the other."

Portia's remarks upon one of her lovers hit off happily the fashion of the day: "He is a proper man's picture, but alas, who can converse with a dumb show? How oddly he is suited; I think he bought his doublet in Italy, his round hose in France, his bonnet in Germany, and his behaviour everywhere."

False hair was greatly in request; and a curious and ghastly touch is given to a contemporary account of Mary Stuart's death by the description of how the beautiful, glossy tresses fell away, disclosing short grey hair, as "one of three score and ten years old."

I do not know that the Elizabethan lady was more artificial than many society women to-day. She has been taken to task severely—one cannot say unfairly—for her gorgeous apparel, her innumerable costumes, her dyes, her perfumes, her "magic" for preserving the complexion, but after all, are not these things to be found in Bond Street and Regent Street to day? Stiffly starched ruffs (starch was introduced about this time) and jewel-embroidered stomachers are no longer popular; but that is merely by a freak of fashion.

The difference in costume is best seen by comparing the modern nobleman or city man with the Elizabethan gentleman.

"Men," declared Harrison roundly, "are transformed into monsters. Some lusty courtiers and gentlemen of courage do wear other rings of gold, stones, or pearl in their ears, whereby they imagine the workmanship of God to be no little amended. But (he concludes) they rather disgrace than adorn their persons, as by their niceness in apparel, for which I say most nations not unjustly deride us, also for that we do seem to imitate all nations round about us, wherein we be like to the polypus or chameleon." Ribbons and roses adorned the locks of the exquisites; the waists were pinched in; the hands artificially whitened; mirrors peeped from their girdles; high-heeled boots improved the stature; whilst the hair was treated in the most fantastic ways.

What would be the daily ritual of a typical Londoner, not engaged in commerce? He would rise at daybreak and partake of a heavy breakfast of meat, fish, and ale—for tea was still a thing of the future. After breakfast, he might go to the apothecary's shop, where tobacco could be bought, and maybe look in at the bookseller's if of a studious turn of mind, and look at the latest novel by Lyly or Lodge, with a view to giving such to one of his women folk. Afterwards, at eleven, he would go to "Paul's Walke," inside the great city Cathedral, a place fitly summarised as "the meeting place of friends, the resort of poets, actors, gallants, traders and cheats; a club, a promenade, a sanctuary, a mart. There can you see your tailor, chat with your friends, hear the latest news about Drake, and dodge your creditors." Thus did a contemporary, John Earle, describe it: "A heape of stones and men, with a vast confusion of Languages, and, were the Steeple not sanctified, nothing liker Babel. The noyse in it is like that of Bees, a strange humming or buzzie,—mixt of walking, tongues and feet: it is a kind of still roare or loud whisper. It is the great Exchange of all discourse, and no business whatsoever but is here stirring and afoot."

From St. Paul's, back for the midday dinner, along the aristocratic Strand, and by the big shops of King Street, Westminster, with the cry of "What d'ye lack, gentles, what d'ye lack?" in your ears. Itinerant hawkers through the roadway, ready to oblige with anything, from lace to apples. After another big meal with more ale and meat, the drama, at three o'clock, may well serve to while away the afternoon.

What was the theatre like?

These early theatres were primitive concerns, large wooden sheds, partly thatched with rushes, a flagstaff on the roof, and surrounded by a trench. They clustered round the swampy ground beside the Thames, and gave rise to a good deal of vexation to quiet citizens in the neighbourhood. For around these playhouses in the afternoons the narrow, tortuous streets were so crowded by a noisy, frivolous concourse that "business suffered in the shops, processions and funerals were obstructed, and perpetual causes of complaint arose."

Despite objections by the residents, and bitter criticism by the Puritans, now beginning to be a force in the social life, theatres multiplied rapidly, and we gather from the Histrio-Mastix of Prynne that in 1633 there were nineteen permanent theatres in London, which for a town of 300,000 inhabitants sufficiently indicates the intense interest taken in the drama.

The difference between the private and public theatres did not lie, as might be imagined, in the fact that admission was by invitation in the one, by payment in the other, but in the construction. The private theatres were designed on the model of the Guild Halls; the public theatres on those of the Inn Yard. The private theatres were the more luxurious, being fully roofed and seated. In the public theatres, on the other hand, the auditorium, as in Ancient Greece, was open to the sky, only the stage being roofed. Thus the pleasure of sight-seeing was of a doubtful kind in bad weather.

Close to the Globe Theatre was the famous Bear Garden, and the propinquity of the illustrious bear-seekers was sufficiently evident to the noses of the audience.

There were no tickets. A penny (about five-pence in our money) admitted to standing room in the yard. Rich spectators watched the performance from boxes on each side of the stage, paying about twelve shillings in modern reckoning for the privilege of a seat. In the upper proscenium box were the orchestra of "The Globe," the largest in London, composed of ten performers, with drum and trumpets for the martial scenes, oboes and flutes to suggest sentimental passages.

The fashionable part of the house was on the stage itself. There sat the Royal patrons of the theatre, Essex and Southampton, with their friends. Failing seats, these gentlemen sprawled upon the rush-strewn boards, over which they spread their rich cloaks. Here also sat the dramatic poets of the time, to whom were accorded a free pass. Most important of all to us were the shorthand writers, commissioned by piratical booksellers, who took down the dialogue, under pretence of criticising it, and thus preserved for posterity many plays that otherwise would have been lost.

If we complain to-day of Society people who chatter in the stalls and boxes and annoy the players, what would have been thought of the ceaseless hum of conversation between the fashionables on the stage, interspersed with calls for drinks and lights for their pipes? For smoking went on, as in our music halls, throughout the performance.

No very strenuous objection, however, seems to have been raised either by the actors or the audience. They accepted the interruption just as they accepted the primitive scenery, as in no way disturbing the theatrical illusion.

Certainly a great deal was left to the imagination of the spectator, which was not so disastrous a thing as many may think in an age when scarcely anything is left to the imagination.

A trumpet blast started the performance. Then came the Prologue, spoken by an actor in a long black coat. The giving of a tragedy was signalled by draping the stage with black; for a comedy, blue hangings were substituted. A placard hung upon one of the stage doors bore the legend of Venice or Verona, as the case might be; no other indication was there of the mise-en-scène. In the battle scenes an entire army scurried in and out through a single door. One can understand the apology of the Prologue in Henry V.:

" . . . Pardon, gentles all,
The flat unraised spirits that have dared
On this unworthy scaffold to bring forth
So great an object: can this cockpit hold
The vasty fields of France? or may we cram
Within this wooden O the very casques
That did affright the air at Agincourt? "

To keep up the spirits of the audience (occasionally damped by untoward storms of rain), there was a jester to dance between the acts.

No women ever appeared on the stage, and very few attended the theatre at all. It was far too rough a place. The Queen summoned the players to Court on special festivals—Twelfth Night, and so on; and Shakespeare's Company often gave a "Command" performance. Hence in some of the plays, notably A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Merchant of Venice, flattering allusions are made for the benefit of the Queen.

After the performance, if you came on horseback, you looked out for your boy (there is a tradition that Shakespeare once took charge of the horses), then mounted your steed and clattered homeward, taking perhaps on the way one of the many taverns. The tavern played an important part in the life of the day. "It is," says a contemporary, "the busy man's recreation, the idle man's business, the melancholy man's sanctuary, the stranger's welcome, the Innes a Court man's entertainment, the scholar's lundiness and the citizen's curtesie. It is the studie of sparkling wits and a cup of Canary their booke where we leave them."

The concourse at "The Mermaid" had been largely brought together by Sir Walter Raleigh. The kindred souls who met there constituted a kind of Club in days when Clubland was not thought of. Truly a noble gallery, that included Shakespeare, Jonson, Beaumont, Fletcher, Selden, Carew, Donne, and many others of note. No more convivial spirit amongst them than Jonson, whose "particular vanity" was "a pure cup of rich canary wine," of which he says, "we will sup free but moderately." A pious aspiration which at times, perhaps, remained merely a pious aspiration.

Fuller's description of the two great poets is well known, but it bears repetition: "Many were the wit combats between him (Shakespeare) and Ben Jonson, which two I behold like a Spanish great galleon, and an English man of war. Master Jonson (like the former) was built far higher in learning, solid but slow in her performances. Shakespeare, with the English man of war, lesser in bulk but lighter in sailing, could turn with all tides, tack about and take advantage of all winds, by the quickness of his wit and invention."

Yes; this quickness, the quality which enabled him to paint so supremely the many-sided life of his age.

In this age, Society could be divided broadly into two main divisions—the Gentry and the Citizens. Country squires came up at certain seasons when suits were heard at Westminster, to get their disputes settled, and sometimes spent what was intended for legal business on the pleasures of the town. Jonson suggests rules for making a town gallant out of a country clown:

"Twere good you turned four or five acres of your best land into two or three trunks of apparel—you may do it without going to a conjuror . . . learn to play at primero and passage, and even (when you lose) have two or three peculiar oaths to swear by that no man else swears; . . . when you come to play be humorous, look with a good staroched face, and ruffle your brow like a new boot, laugh at nothing but your own jests, or else as the noblemen laugh . . . and even when you are to dine or sup in any strange presence, hire a fellow with a great chain (though it be copper its no matter), to bring your letters feigned from such a nobleman, or such a knight, or such a lady."

Bob Sawyer would have rejoiced at the last suggestion, it is worthy to rank with his Church strategy.

After that it may be dark. If on horseback you may get home safely, but if on foot, the wise man takes a link-boy to light him home; and arms himself with one of those ash-tree oudgels, in which sturdy Dr Johnson placed such confidence as a protection against injuries.

What about country life in these times?

The initial thing that strikes us is the unsanitary condition of the country towns. Brick and stone were gradually coming into use; but wooden houses abounded, with windows of horn (glass was a luxury) and lattice-work. The streets were for the most part narrow, tortuous, and full of refuse. It was hard to go a dozen paces without falling over a pig; while there seemed to be mass meetings of poultry at every turn. It was considered quite "Progressive" when some of the corporations forbade live stock in the streets without attendants. Every pig must have a keeper.

Lead pipes for water were not invented till 1538, the water supply coming from wells and running along the streets in open conduits or wooden pipes to the market cross or public fountain.

The villages were built higgledy-piggledy around a large green, with its Maypole and open pool, and contrasted significantly with the snug, trim estates of the country squires, with comfortable, well-arranged gardens, and picturesque, timbered houses.

The village churches, with their well-kept graveyards, made a good second so far as orderly appearance went, and they abounded in picturesque monuments to eminent crusaders and local worthies. The heavy handle of the church door—still a feature of old Norman churches—was for the benefit of fugitive criminals. The wrong-doer could cling to this door till it be opened, and obtain sanctuary for forty days, with leave to embark for some foreign country in case of murder.

The high roads, the pride and glory of Roman Britain, were in a grievous state. They were supposed to be maintained at the expense of the Crown. But the Crown, as a rule, found other more congenial means of spending money. This gave point to Gratiano's sarcastic joke, in The Merchant of Venice:

"Why this is like the mending of highways in Summer,
When the roads are fair enough"

The age was emphatically an unscientific one, and its crudely superstitious character is reflected in the literature of the time. Nor was this primitive imagining peculiar to the common people, though with them of course it was most manifest. The great Lord Bacon could refer to Copernicus as a "man who thinks nothing of introducing fiction of any kind into nature, provided his calculations turn out well." And he so far shared in the prevalent belief in charms that he maintained that precious stones "may work by consent upon the spirits of men to comfort and exhilarate them."

The medicine man of the day was no whit more satisfactory than Chaucer's Doctor of Physic. Should you wish to be bled, there was the barber-surgeon, for bleeding and teeth drawing. Should you desire a medicine, the apothecary could be consulted. But this gentleman "in tattered weeds with overwhelming brows" had little to offer besides love philtres and charms. Should you wish to send an inconvenient acquaintance hastily to the "bourne from which no traveller returns," you might rely upon him with a measure of confidence; but if you were merely anxious to postpone your own visit there, the apothecary's treatment was less satisfactory.

A special magic of healing attached to the dead—a draught of spring water from the skull of a murdered man; pills compounded from the skull of a man that had been hanged; the touch of a dead man's hand—in all of these much virtue was supposed to lie.

There were two famous physicians of Shakespeare's time, Dr. Andrew Boorde and Dr. Dee. Dr. Boorde insisted on the therapeutic value of washing your face only once a week, and wiping it with a scarlet cloth. Dr. Dee, the Mortlake astrologer, consulted the stars as to the best date for Elizabeth's coronation. She retained him always as her special physician, and made him Chancellor of St. Paul's. Like many of his age, he was an alchemist, and declared that his intercourse with "good" spirits in visions had shown him how to transmute gold from baser metals.

Here, in matters that the science of to-day has made clear and orderly for us, we see the Elizabethan mind at its worst. We see the futilities of the riotous fancy, not the riches. In its imaginative literature we see the riches. The Renaissance of classical learning, the stimulus of maritime discovery, the moral problems raised by the Reformation, above all the physical zest for life—and the oneness of beauty and truth; all these influences now bearing upon the social and intellectual life of the day.

Men realised for the first time, the richness and melody of their native tongue. The pageantry of words succeeds the pageantry of the streets. Men gloried in the beauty of language and became word-intoxicated.

Yes, it was an age pre-eminently when England realised

"The world—

The beauty and the wonder and the power,
The shapes of things, their colours, lights, and shades,
Changes, surprises . . ."

The psychological legacy of the Renaissance and Reformation movement was twofold: a splendid access of self-confidence, and an irrepressible faculty for self-expression whether in action or in literature. Man believed in himself, trusted in his powers, dared the Fates as he had never done before. In Shakespeare's time just as in Chaucer's, the gay and jocund crowds stand out against the dark, mysterious background of the Unknown. Chaucer's "privy thief" called Death remains yet a gaunt, sinister figure. But in Shakespeare's day there is one difference. The helplessness of man in the hands of the inscrutable Fates which was strongly and constantly present to the mediæval mind, carries no longer the same appeal. Chaucer faced the tragic issues of life with a kind of stoical reticence, as if to say, "The less said of these things the better. Accept them we must, we can't help ourselves, why dwell on them?" This was not the way of Shakespeare, he faced them boldly, and although he had too tenacious a grasp of the concrete facts of life to cry "Peace" where there was no peace, yet throughout his plays there breathes a sturdy self-reliance and sense of human responsibility.

"Men at some time are masters of their fates,
The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
But in ourselves, that we are underlings."¹

¹ Julius Caesar.

"Our remedies oft in ourselves do lie,
Which we ascribe to heaven."¹

Self-reliance, I have said, was a characteristic of the age. Self-expression was another.

Just as a man relied on himself; believed in his own powers, and buoyed with hope, thought no enterprise too perilous to attempt; so did the Elizabethan give amplest expression to passion and instinct.

After the self-repression and austerity of the Middle Ages, they exulted in their new-found freedom, like men let out of the Old Bastille.

In literature and life alike, they were impatient of rule and convention, caring only to give expression to their own special characteristics. To be different from your neighbour; to borrow whatever style in dress or in letters seemed best to suit your disposition. That was the aim. Naturally this led to some excess.

But the wheat and tares grow together, and happily the wheat has more vitality than the tares.

Alongside of the coarseness, the violence, the brutality, may be found splendid endurance, exalted passion, and a broad and tolerant humanity. The people who loved the crude delights of the cock-fight and the bear garden, delight none the less in the self-questioning of a Hamlet and the sentimental refinements of a Faerie Queene.

It was an age of intense curiosity, and exuberant joy of life.

The aggrandisement of wealth, the discovery of other worlds, the acquisition of knowledge; these matters which our more prosaic age seeks after with cooler calculation, and more scientific precision, were sought after by the Elizabethans in the eager, idealising, adventurous spirit of youth. Life was a glorious adventure; and knowledge itself a fantastic game. "Men are fools that wish to die"—that was the burden of Elizabethan song. To suck the marrow out of life; to find out all that was worth knowing; to realise all that was worth the feeling—such was the ideal of Shakespeare's age.

SHAKESPEARE

HIS LIFE

"THESE plays have had their trial and stood out all appeals." "The applause, delight, and wonder of our stage." These remarks were written in his lifetime by his brother playwrights. Their comments were not all so dulcet and flattering, yet even the, perhaps pardonable, envy of Greene testified to the power of this new dramatic force.

Queen Elizabeth had been reigning nearly six years when William Shakespeare was born, and of no literary genius whose work is universal in its appeal, is so little definitely known as a man and private citizen.

We move in an atmosphere of guesswork, illumined by a few occasional flashes of history. Out of these legends and rumours a fair-seeming and probable story has been constructed, and to avoid the irritating iteration of "perhaps," and "possibly," the account of Shakespeare's life has been given in simple straightforward fashion. But much of it is only conjecture.

John Shakespeare, his father, was the son of Richard Shakespeare, a small farmer living in Smithfield, a village close to Stratford. The son John was described as a glover in a lawsuit in the year 1556, but hides, corn, and general agricultural products were also included in his apparently multifarious business connections. He married Mary Arden in 1557, whose people were also farmers but in a better position than her husband's kinsfolk. Some small landed property was inherited through Mary Arden. There were born to John and Mary, four sons and two daughters: Joan in 1558 and Margret in 1562—both dying in infancy. The third child was William Shakespeare. His father's affairs for the first thirteen years of William's life were in a prosperous condition, for during that time John Shakespeare was elected an alderman (1565), and three years later he was mayor or bailiff. Diminishing business in 1577, when he was still an alderman, necessitated him paying only half his rate—three shillings and fourpence, instead of six shillings and eightpence, our police rate, in those days called "pike and bill rate," and in the next year, through business losses, he was obliged to mortgage some of his property. It was then that William Shakespeare was removed from school and an attempt was made to initiate him in the business of buying and selling the goods his father was concerned in. At the age of eighteen he was pressed, it is believed, into a hasty marriage with Anne Hathaway, by her friends. She was a daughter of Richard Hathaway, who farmed in the close-lying village of Shottery. Anne at the time of their marriage was eight years older than her boy-husband. The date of the marriage contract is November 28, 1582, and in the following May a daughter was born, whom they named Susanna. Twins followed, and were baptized (Hamnet and Judith) on the 2nd February 1595, taking their names probably from Hamnet and Judith Sadler, who were friends and neighbours of Shakespeare. It is recorded that thirty-six shillings and eightpence was left by Hamnet Sadler, at his death, to Shakespeare, to buy a ring. There is no evidence to show how Shakespeare was supporting his growing family. His father's position had been steadily going down, and his family had increased to five. In 1585, having no goods to distrain on, he was arrested. William Shakespeare could have had no assistance from his father. A tradition referring to this period assumes that a short time before 1586, Shakespeare lived the life of a schoolmaster in a village near Stratford. A more likely tale tells us of an escapade in Sir Thomas Lucy's Park, Charlecote. The story goes that a deer was stolen; Sir Thomas ordered Shakespeare to be whipped and imprisoned. If this be so, we may accept the statement that Shakespeare revenged himself by caricaturing Sir Thomas Lucy in presenting him as Justice Shallow in The Merry Wives of Windsor, and in the Second Part of Henry IV.

Shakespeare had been married four years when he made up his mind he would leave his native town and try his fortune in the great City. He had seen the players at Stratford, and instinct must have led him to seek them out when he arrived in London. Bidding good-bye to his wife and three children, he started his long walk to the capital, calling at Oxford on the way. London continued to be his home until the year 1609. Six years of hard work had to pass before he seemed to have made much headway, and in those six years, the most obscure in his whole career, there is a legend of him tending visitors' horses outside the playhouse. However that may be, his abilities soon brought him into notice, and he then became a member of one of the best acting companies. These performances doubtless took place in the first theatre known in England. This house was known as The Theatre, and was situated in Shoreditch. Later they moved to the Rose, a playhouse on the Bankside, Southwark, built in 1592. Before his connection with the Globe Theatre, Shakespeare had acted and written plays for a theatre in Newington Butts (1594), The Curtain and The Theatre in Southwark. The famous Globe Theatre—"The Wooden O"—was the scene of Shakespeare's greatest successes. With this theatre and the Blackfriars' Theatre, Shakespeare identified himself until the end of his professional life. It is conjectured he never left England. Occasional tours in the provinces formed the extent of his travelling. Other companies of English actors are known to have toured on the Continent, but there is no evidence that he did so. It is a pity that we have no reliable record of the characters Shakespeare portrayed; though report assigns the Ghost in Hamlet, and Adam in As You Like It, to their creator.

In 1594 we hear of him acting with William Kemp and Richard Burbage, the two leading actors of their time, before Queen Elizabeth at Greenwich Palace. The Lord Chamberlain paid them for their services £13, 6s. 8d. The Queen, wishing to express her delight with the performances, in an unusually expensive mood added a further sum of £6, 13s. 4d. The two amounts would equal in our currency the sum of £160. Love's Labour's Lost and The Comedy of Errors were probably the plays thus favoured, these two plays being the most popular at the Court. During the remaining nine years of Elizabeth's life, many performances were given at her palaces.

When the Earl of Southampton was sentenced to imprisonment for life as a punishment for his association with the Earl of Essex in a rebellion (1601), Shakespeare, fortunately, had little need of his always generous patron. He was now at the height of his dramatic career, and in a position to help many of his younger struggling contemporaries, whom he was wont to meet in Bread Street, at the famous Mermaid Tavern. Playwriting and other literary work probably brought him in three hundred pounds a year. This, with his salary as an actor, would give him an income of over one thousand pounds a year, without adding his share in the profits of the Globe Theatre, and after, at the Blackfriars' Theatre. At the same time he did not forget his native town. He made efforts to raise the family name and fortune; discharging parental debts, at the same time also making himself responsible for their future. In 1609 the College of Heralds gave them their grant of arms. Earlier than this he had purchased the largest house in Stratford, called New Place. After Queen Elizabeth's death (1603), Shakespeare's successes continued, and under the reign of James the First, his popularity became even greater. No great Court festivities were complete without Shakespeare and his company, and there was a constant demand for the great writer's plays.

At what we account, the early age of fifty-two, Shakespeare's health began to fail. His home was now in Stratford, and thither came Ben Jonson and Michael Drayton to cheer their friend. But perhaps these "merry meetings" proved too merry for an indifferent constitution. It is certain that Shakespeare contracted a fever which hastened his death. On Tuesday, April 23, 1616, he died. His burial, two days afterwards, took place inside Stratford church.

In a sonnet by William Basso, after commenting on the fact of Shakespeare not being buried in Westminster Abbey, he exclaims:

"Under this carved marble of thine own,
Sleep, brave tragedian, Shakespeare, sleep alone."

At Shakespeare's death, his wife and two daughters were living. Judith, the younger, married Thomas Quiney, a son of a neighbour, only two months before her father's death. John Hall, a physician, had married Susanna in 1608, and her tombstone inscription gives the opinion that she had inherited some of her father's wisdom and wit. This daughter became possessor of New Place and most of her father's property. To Judith a silver and gilt bowl, also a tenement in Chapel Lane (in remainder to the elder daughter) and £300. To his wife, "his second best bed and its furniture." Three of his friends, who were fellow-actors, received 26s. 8d. to buy memorial rings. Sic transit gloria mundi.

HIS WORK

The period of Shakespeare's literary activity extends over twenty-four years (1588-1612), and this may be broken up into four sub-periods.

THE FIRST PERIOD (1588-94) Here historical plays predominate. He continues the work of Marlowe, and essays to mirror the broad national features of Plantagenet life. The one tragedy, Romeo and Juliet (1592), is essentially a young man's tragedy, strong in lyric beauty though lacking the grandeur and breadth of the later tragedies; while The Merchant of Venice (1594), though in form a comedy, is in a sombre framework of tragic irony, relieved by a golden thread of romance.

For the rest, he writes in buoyant spirits a social extravaganza, Love's Labour's Lost (1591); a rollicking farce, The Comedy of Errors (1592); a sentimental romance, Two Gentlemen of Verona (1591); and a fantastic romance, A Midsummer Night's Dream (1594-5).

Marlowe probably had a share in the Henry VI plays; he frankly inspired Richard III and Richard II; King John being the first of the historical plays which shows an emergence from the domination of Marlowe.

To this period belongs also his earlier verse.

The Early Poetry

While Shakespeare was winning his first successes as a dramatist (1591-4), he appeared suddenly before the public in a fresh capacity. To his patron, the handsome, gallant Earl of Southampton (Henry Wriothesley), he dedicates the "first heire of my invention"—Venus and Adonis. It has all the procreancy of youth, and is written in an exuberant, unrestrained vein, different from the disciplined power and passion that he so soon attained.

It may well be, that he imagined this literary "wild oat" would interest a man of Southampton's pleasure-loving taste, and was anxious to gratify so influential a man. Burdened as the poem is with the excessive heats of youth and an over-luxuriant fancy, there are the insignia of sweet and melodious poetry about it. When, moreover, in conjunction with this we take the nobler poem Tarquin and Lucrece, with its finer restraint and more exalted imagery, none could deny the incursion into literature of a fresh and original force.

"Lucrece," declared Michael Drayton, "was revived to live another age," and the reference to Colin Clout, to one "full of high thoughts and invention," was probably intended for Shakespeare.

The SECOND PERIOD (1594-1600). Shakespeare has now found himself. There are three historical plays here, finer in quality than those preceding, the two plays of Henry IV (1597) and Henry V (1598). Henry V is the more showy, and has been well described as a "National Anthem in five acts", but the Henry IV plays are far richer in humour and psychological power. Of the comedies, The Taming of the Shrew (1595) and The Merry Wives of Windsor (1598) are cast in the early farcical vein, though the handling is easier and stronger; Much Ado about Nothing (1599) is on a higher plane of wit; while in As You Like It (1600) and Twelfth Night (1600) humour and romance blend in perfect proportion.

Meanwhile, in 1594, a fresh essay in poetry is signalled.

The Sonnets

The majority of the sonnets were written probably in 1594, when Shakespeare had gained the patronage of the Earl of Southampton. The popularity of the sonnet was then at its height, and already we have seen what men like Daniel and Drayton, Spenser and Sidney made of it. The form he chose was not the Italian form, and consisted of three decasyllabic quatrains, each rhyming alternately, and rhyming couplet to conclude. Although unequal in power and beauty, they show a far maturer touch than that displayed in the splendid though undisciplined Venus and Adonis, and Tarquin and Lucrece. How far they express personal experience and voice the emotions of the man rather than the fancy of the artist, it is impossible for us to determine.

Among the commentators will always be two rival schools; the one claiming that here "Shakespeare unlocked his heart"; the other denying that the Sonnets were more than literary exercises. At a first reading the unprejudiced, and one may add unsophisticated reader would imagine certainly that he was listening to some intimate personal confession, and that no flash of real emotion, no gleam of memory lights up these verses, is highly improbable. At the same time we have to remember that love-sickness with all its reproaches, its plants and its entreaties, was one of the literary conventions of the age. The poet of the time might take some incident in his own career or in that of some contemporary, and concentrate his literary fancies upon that. Sidney did this in his Sonnet cycle, and Shakespeare often illustrates, from contemporary life, some aspect of his dramas. But these are more spring-boards for the poet's imagination to leap from into the Unknown. There is no need to regard them as autobiographical confessions.

In fact Sidney himself frankly referred to those who "... do dictionary method bring Into their rhymes running in rattling rows—

... that poor Petrarch's long deceased woes
With new-born sighs and demised wit do sing."

On the other hand, just as Shakespeare borrowed with royal and genial unconcern, a plot or a character that might strike his fancy (though rarely without glorifying it), so here the student may find palpable parallels between many Shakespearean conceits and those that deck the verse of Daniel and Drayton. As many of Drayton's sonnets were written and available before the date assigned to Shakespeare's, it is not unreasonable to regard the greater man as the borrower here. He is saturated, moreover, with the stock illustrations of Renaissance poetry in the description of the seasons or of a lover's emotion, and though he gave to these ingenious turns and charming touches of his own, he is obviously indebted to the many English disciples of such masters as Petrarch and Ronsard. But if not affording necessarily a clue to his heart, these sonnets afford, as all genuine literary work does, a clue to his personality and temperament, while there are occasional touches of autobiography that no reasonable critic could confute.

Roughly speaking, the impression we have of Shakespeare the Man from the plays is confirmed by the Sonnets. Making all allowance for the dramatic mask that enables the writer to identify himself sympathetically with a particular emotion, we find it quite possible to detach certain vital characteristics that showed us a man of an eager, sensitive nature—one intensely alive to the pleasure of the senses, and to the beauty of the physical world.

The most vivid impression of the man derived from his wealth of dramatic imagination, is the instant sanity of outlook. This is less apparent in the Sonnets, not merely because they cover only his earlier years, but because probably some love affair had troubled him, because also he was beginning to find out something of the tricks of friendship and comradeship, in the Court circle to which he was a new comer. There is a lack of emotional balance at times in the Sonnets, whatever allowances may be made for literary convention. And into all the conventional sighs and tears of love, that are the common stock of every contemporary sonneteer, there is suddenly projected a story of intrigue very different in colour and complexion.

Sonnet cxliv starts the tale: "Two loves I have of comfort and despair," and we hear of a man and a woman both of whom the poet had loved dearly. The man had been his dear friend, but the woman suddenly becoming enamoured of him, had drawn him from his allegiance to the poet. Shakespeare makes every allowance for the man; his youth and attraction and inexperience. He feels more bitterly towards the woman. She, he feels, had turned from him towards his friend in sheer wantonness of spirit. But he yields up his mistress rather than lose the comradeship of his friend.

It is possible that the young and brilliant friend is Southampton, his patron; and without assigning any paltry prudential motive to Shakespeare for surrendering his love so readily, we can understand the feeling of the young dramatist, who feels he is no match in bearing and accomplishment for the Earl.

The young poet is responsive to the æsthetic influences at Court, his dawning genius has attracted the attention of the cultured and witty circle that revolves round the Queen. Shakespeare, with all his fastidious sensibilities aroused—for had he not always been an alien to the coarse minds of his own class no less than to the ignorance and crudeness of the mob?—finds himself for the first time amid surroundings that appeal irresistibly to his sense of beauty and refinement, no less than to his literary ambitions. The brilliant young nobleman has taken note of him, and Shakespeare is transported into a heaven of delight. To find a patron is the ambition of every contemporary man of letters, and we need not construe the rapturous compliments of Shakespeare to Southampton, as the fulsome flattery of a snobbish spirit.

In any case—for the reproach of snobbishness hurled against the dramatist may be disregarded for the moment—there is no reason to doubt the sincerity of his attachment, and it is easy to understand how that a temporary lack of balance may have arisen in the poet's mind. The surroundings are all so new; every cultured courtier who greets him with a friendly word, is a Solon; every pretty, soft-eyed woman who coquettes in the fashion of the day with the new comer, is an angel of light. One of them—it may be that the "black-eyed wanton" beauty, Mary Fitton, is the woman in question—takes a fancy to him which he in his inexperience construes as love. Upon her he empties all the passionate devotion of his nature, to find out later something of the capriciousness of the sex. He realises he has been fooled; sees also that it is madness for him to compete with such men as Southampton. The patron is not to blame; the poet is anxious to find every excuse for him. The woman has deliberately entangled him. What could he do? He realises her fascination and cannot blame his friend. The woman he has lost; but he will not forego the friendship of his brilliant rival.

Other than love matters rouse his jealousy; and these also he meets in the same spirit. His friend is interested in other writers. Instinctively he resents the interest, fearing perhaps he may be passed on one side. Yet he strives hard, and not unsuccessfully, to argue down this natural resentment, and does full justice to their work; comparing one as a worthier pen, and comparing him to a vessel of "tall building and goodly pride."

Who these rival poets are and who the woman, there is insufficient data to determine. Various have been the conjectures; but where evidence is so slender, it seems superfluous here to enter into battle with the myriads of Shakespeare's commentators on the point. What does seem established, and what after all matters most, is the fact that these intrigues are genuine personal experiences woven into a fabric, that abounds in the fictitious agonies and loves of every aspiring poet.

One other point of psychological interest remains.

Throughout Shakespeare's plays there is a curious emphasis upon a special physical type, black-eyed and pale-faced. Such is always the type of inconstancy and depravity. Romeo is stabbed by "a white wench's black eye"; Biron is infatuated by "a whtely wanton with a velvet brow." Recalling these allusions by the light of the fickle "dark ladies" of the Sonnets, it is not unreasonable to imagine that here we have memories of this capricious love that serve the dramatist in his studies. Dramatic imagination may do much, but the astounding creation of Cleopatra, with her "infinite variety" of moods, her stormy sensuality, yet compelling power, becomes only explicable if we see in it a bitter experience of the man transformed by poetic genius and dramatic splendour into an imperishable picture—"Wretched men" are "cradled into poetry" by wrong and "learn in suffering what they teach in song."

THE THIRD PERIOD (1600-1608). In the third period Tragedy predominates, and we reach here the culminating point of Shakespeare's power as a dramatist. The romances of the period, All's Well that Ends Well (1605), Measure for Measure (1604), and Titus Andronicus (1603), are essentially tragedies set in a key of forced comedy; they are rich in poetry, but leave a confused and unpleasant impression upon the mind.

Incomparably greater are the tragedies. Starting in grave measured style with Julius Caesar (1601), he rises to greater heights of drama and reflective poetry in Hamlet (1602); while in Othello (1604), King Lear (1605), and Macbeth (1606)—that superb trilogy of plays—imaginative subtlety and passionate intensity make of these dramas the most superb and compelling in our literature.

THE FOURTH PERIOD (1608-12). The last period opens with Tragedy; Antony and Cleopatra (1608), with weaker dramatic grip than its immediate predecessors, but fully as ripe in the strength of its characterisation. Coriolanus (1609), Timon of Athens (1608), Henry VIII (1612), and Pericles (1608) are only fitfully great, the three latter, perhaps only Shakespearean in part; but when in the eventide of his career he turned again to his first love, Romance, we get Cymbeline (1610), The Tempest (1611), and The Winter's Tale (1611).

The tragic period has left behind it a legacy of spiritual power and imaginative subtlety that make the last works of the dramatist a fitting psalm of farewell.

Nature of the Shakespearean Drama

In Shakespearean drama almost every phase of the life of the age is mirrored, from the particular craze and fashion of the moment to the broad, general characteristics of the national life.

Shakespeare was fully alive to the necessity of dealing with familiar themes. Much of the topicality we miss to-day, for its interest was a transient one, and Shakespeare's fame does not depend on it; but for an intimate understanding of the dramatist, we must take this element into consideration.

Travelling was the rage of the day, and Italy the goal of those finishing their education. Rosalind makes fun of Jaques: "Wear strange suits, disable all the benefits of your own country; be out of love with your nativity; or I will scarce think you have swam in a gondola!"

Thus Love's Labour's Lost (1591) was in its inception a social satire dealing with the fashions and fads of the day. Euphuism¹ and extravagance in dress are derided with as much topicality of allusion as a play of Mr. Bernard Shaw's would show to-day. The Elizabethan pedant figures amusingly in Holofernes, who has been "at a great feast of languages and stolen the scraps." Hotspur's speeches abound in reference to current fashions—e.g. he speaks of velvet guards on the dresses of fashionable city ladies, and there are many references in the plays to favourite games and sports—e.g. the mention of tennis in Henry V.

The historical plays are admirably true to life, but to Elizabethan rather than to Plantagenet life. Eastcheap, the haunts of Prince Hal and Falstaff, abounds in taverns in Shakespeare's day. There was no "Boar's Head" in the time of Henry IV.

The Merry Wives depicts accurately middle-class provincial life, and the fashions in dress for men and women are commented on and described in The Merchant of Venice, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Richard II.

And just as he deals with ephemeral fads and crazes and some passing event, so does he deal on a much larger scale with the broad phases of Elizabethan national life. The dull-witted country constable is held up for ridicule in Love's Labour's Lost and Much Ado about Nothing. The elaborate ritual of Court life is depicted in A Midsummer Night's Dream and Antony and Cleopatra; its trickeries and pretentiousness in Hamlet, Timon of Athens, and Cymbeline.

The mass of the people believed whole-heartedly in the existence of good and bad spirits. And the literature of the time exhales this belief to a remarkable extent. Preaching to Elizabeth in 1588, Bishop Jewel appealed to her to take extreme measures against witches and wizards.

It was in vain that Reginald Scott, in 1584, tried to stem the tide of current opinion in his Discoverie of Witchcraft: men and women, particularly women, had only to evince some eccentricity of manner to be accounted guilty of witchcraft and forthwith to be burned. How far Shakespeare himself believed in these influences we do not know: what we do know is the impressive dramatic use he made of the spirit world in Hamlet and Macbeth: the apparition at Elsinore, the witches on the desolate heath, the ghostly visitor at the banquet. The last instance, where the vision (unlike the two others) is plainly subjective, not being perceived by Lady Macbeth or the other guests, tends to show that Shakespeare well appreciated the "tricks" played by "strong imagination." But in other cases he frankly voices the popular belief in sorcery and witchcraft. Joan of Arc is depicted as a witch in Henry VI. Hamlet asks the Ghost:

"Be thou a spirit of health or goblin damn'd,

Bring with thee airs from heaven or blasts from hell?"

We hear of portents before the death of Julius Caesar:

"Ghosts did shreek and squeal about the street!"

The disgusting potions supposed to be brewed by witches, and possessing magical qualities, are particularised by Shakespeare in the scenes with the witches.

We look upon A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Tempest merely as charming fantasies; but the fairy world in the Wood near Athens, the Spirits that obey the behest of Prospero, were as real to many of Shakespeare's audience as Helena and Lysander, Miranda and Ferdinand. And I feel sure that it was not Prospero the philosophic recluse, but Prospero the magician, who appealed primarily to the Elizabethans.

In short, superstition was everywhere, and the London hostel no less than the wayside inn, the merchant's palace as well as the shepherd's hut, resound with tales of wonders, omens, and portents of "presages and tongues of heaven."

In all of these matters Shakespeare was of his age. That is, the Elizabethan side of him. An astute borrower, with a ready eye for a good plot wherever he might chance to find it; a skilful reader of the pulse of the public; a gentle, sensitive, sensuous and somewhat melancholy man; often called upon against the grain, we may conjecture, to satisfy the rough taste of the "groundlings."

But there is the universal side of the man. He was of his age; but he was also of the ages. And this by virtue not so much of his dramatic power, which often suffers through the loose texture of his work, but of his incomparable poetry and insight into human nature. He is the supreme poet in an age of great poetry, because his poetry is wider in range and deeper in feeling than that of his contemporaries. He touches every mood: of graceful sentiment, as in the romantic comedies; of delicate fantasy, as in the fairy plays; of philosophic meditation, as in the tragedies of the mid-period; and of poignant passion, as in the later tragedies. In the verse that bodies forth such primal things as love, hate, hope, despair, courage, endurance, Shakespeare towers above his fellows. When we think of Lear in his desolation, of Othello in his last anguish, of Macbeth in his soul agony, and the despair of Cleopatra—we think of English literature at its grandest.

Yet it is precisely here, on Shakespeare's dramatic genius, that the criticism of to-day is the least favourable.

Among modern critics are to be found several stalwart heretics who attack, point-blank, Shakespeare's power of characterisation, sneer at what they call the "emptiness" of his philosophy and "ready-made morality," and accuse him of arrant snobbery.

No serious attempt has been made—the task indeed were futile—to question his genius as a poet; but a number of modern writers (Tolstoy being the most famous) have done their best to detach him from his niche among the great creative artists of the world and to place him "in the second order . . . with Dickens, Scott, and Dumas."

The three points especially singled for criticism, his outlook on life, his power to portray character, and his outlook on society—so far as we can construe it from his writings, these things may well be considered more fully. Not that Shakespeare's reputation is in any grave danger from the attack of the heretic; since one who has compelled the homage of men so divorgent in critical taste as Ben Jonson, Samuel Johnson, Hazlitt, Lamb, Coleridge, Shelley, Arnold, Rossetti, Swinburne, Victor Hugo, Lessing, Schlegel, Goethe, Heine, has little to fear from a few reactionary spirits, however able.

Some may question even, whether it is worth while to raise the point; and if it were merely a matter of dealing with a few wilful paradoxes, then it would certainly be idle. But there are, I think, a number of earnest and thoughtful students to-day, who are in fundamental accord with the heretic's position, and to whom the sociological test is the one great test of a writer's power. Moreover, one cannot deny to the heretic's negations a certain substratum of truth, that has been obscured by indiscriminate Shakespearean idolatry.

The heretic's position is by no means wholly to be deprecated. He has certainly done a good work in dispelling the "good strong stupefying incense smoke" that is apt to collect about every idol; and in obliging the enthusiast to account intelligently for the faith that is in him.

Let us examine first of all, the charge of "empty philosophy" urged against Shakespeare. The taunt is flung out in opposition to the claim of philosopher maintained by some on his behalf. The taunt is an idle one, but not more idle than the philosophic credentials. The truth is that in any clear and definite sense of the term there is no philosophy in Shakespeare's writings, nor any pretence at a philosophy. To a generation nurtured on essayists like Carlyle and Ruskin, novelists like George Eliot and George Meredith, poets like Wordsworth, Shelley, and Browning, it seems the proper thing to expect from the man of letters a more or less explicit theory of life—religion, ethics, social politics—and we fail to realise that this notion of a "message" upon life and its meaning, is essentially modern and utterly alien to the Elizabethan spirit.

"Snakes in Iceland. There are no snakes in Iceland!" We may apply that old story to Shakespeare's philosophy. There is no philosophy. Shakespeare was an artist and concerned primarily not with postulating theories of life, but with the stuff of life itself. You have a dozen different points of view, but no definite conclusion.

"Others abide our question—Thou art free!
We ask and ask—Thou smilest and art still."

This may irritate the modern reader who is accustomed to the artist preacher, but it is absurd to urge it as an intellectual disqualification.

The vital point at issue is how far has the artist succeeded in dealing with the raw material of humanity? He cannot be blamed for not doing what he never undertook to do. The attempts made by some of his admirers to squeeze a philosophy of life out of the utterances of his characters, seem as unfair as it is foolish. Let us take them as we find them: the fatalism of Kent, the meliorism of Edmund, the despairing cry of Macbeth where life is "a tale told by an idiot full of sound and fury signifying nothing"; the serene melancholy of Prospero to whom "we are such stuff as dreams are made on"; cynical Jacques, and idealistic Brutus; each has his value as a human document, each perhaps falls in with some mood of its creator, but none are to be taken as other than the expression of one content to live life to the full, in place of weaving theories about life.

The artist has his place in the scheme of things, quite as much as the philosopher. But I shall be reminded that the greatness of the artist has been called into question—especially in his power to portray live men and women.

True to me is the strangest and most unaccountable charge of all, for surely no writer ever maintains his hold upon the imagination of successive ages, without a profound and searching knowledge of human nature. Mere popularity is no test of greatness. The idol of one age is often relegated to the lumber-room of the next. But a man who appeals to the many not merely in his own time, but in other times—that man must appeal to the universal instincts of human nature. In other words, he must have the root of the matter in him. If Shakespeare be superficial as a reader of men, then indeed it were vain to call him great. Knowledge of human nature is the touchstone alike of great poetry and great prose. All that is needed here is the fiat of the creative imagination. "Let there be Light . . . and there was Light!"

To illustrate this aspect of Shakespeare's art there is no need to dwell on even the great characterisations such as Hamlet, Macbeth, Iago, Othello, Desdemona, Rosalind, Juliet. One may take studies less complex in delineation and note the same subtlety and searching insight.

What could be finer than the closing scene of Antony's life, when after his frailties have illumined scene after scene, there breaks out a certain greatness in him that has never been subdued ?

Antony. She hath betrayed me, and shall die the death.
Mardian. Death of one person can be paid but once,
And that she has discharged. . . .

Antony. Dead then ?

Mardian. Dead.

Antony. Unarm Eros ; the long day's task is done,
And we must sleep.

Probing the criticism of Shakespeare's psychology, it seems to me that it is due, at bottom, to a dislike of the form of the Elizabethan drama, and the belief that it blurs the presentment of character. This point is certainly worth consideration, for it may be urged, with some show of reason, that blank verse serves to encourage unnatural dialogue, and to make for stilted phraseology. Is, then, this convention of blank verse inimical to the presentation of the finer shades of characterisation ? It may be admitted that verse drama is a convention ; but all art presupposes some convention. No stage dialogue is wholly natural. Our most realistic plays to-day are, in their way, quite as conventional as the Elizabethan drama. It is not the business of art to imitate life ; but to produce the illusion of life. Words must be, just as incidents must be, selected. Admitting this, the objector may still urge that the illusion of life is far less possible under the conditions of the Elizabethan drama. Humour expresses itself in quite another way from the emotion of anger, love, or jealousy. Certain emotions may well find expression in sonorous lines ; with others, such a convention is ludicrous. Most certainly, and surely no one realised this more clearly than Shakespeare. Romeo talks in verse, Falstaff in prose ; indeed the same character speaks alternately in verse and prose, according to the mood. When Rosalind is in holiday humour she drops into prose ; when Othello's greatness is obscured by sheer animal passion, he speaks prose ; and the simple, comic character talks in prose all the time.

The question further reduces itself to this. When Shakespeare confines himself to verse, can he in this medium only, achieve intricate psychological effects ? For a reply, we have but to consider such speeches as Shylock's scenes with Antonio, tingling with fine irony ; Hamlet's soliloquy, charged with subtle alternations of mood ; the amazingly clever presentment of nervous irritability in the later scenes of Richard III., when the man's nervous system is breaking down under the strain of misfortune ; the famous duologue between Macbeth and his wife after the murder, where the passages of verse reveal most wonderfully the workings of the soul ; and one of Lear's long speeches, where the reader can feel the speaker struggling hard against the insidious oncoming of madness. Many more instances could be adduced. Surely these suffice.

Limitation of space precludes my quoting these, so I will rely upon the very play that Tolstoy singled out for scorn—King Lear. Mark how well the oncoming madness of the distraught king is suggested in this tirade :

"Darkness and Devils !
Saddle my horses ; call my train together—
Degenerate bastard ! I'll not trouble thee."

O let me not be mad, not mad, sweet heaven—
Keep me in temper : I would not be mad.

I prithee, daughter, do not make me mad :
I will not trouble thee, my child, farewell ;
But yet thou art my flesh, my blood, my daughter,
Or rather a disease that's in my flesh,
Which I must needs call mine ; thou art a boil—
. . . But I'll not chide thee.

You think I'll weep ;
No, I'll not weep :
I have full cause for weeping ; but this heart
Shall break into a hundred thousand flaws,
Or ere I'll weep. O fool, I shall go mad !"

Further, of his insight into character, it may be said that a ready test of the actuality of his characters is the impression they make on the modern reader. Portia, Rosalind, Beatrice, Cleopatra, Juliet, are startlingly modern. Placed beside the women of Sheridan or Goldsmith, and you realise how the latter are dated and how alive and fresh are the former. Beside them even the women of Dickens and Thackeray seem old-fashioned. And the reason is that Shakespeare's women have the primal qualities of womanhood common to every age, and therefore can never be dated.

And there is subtlety no less than actuality.

With what masterly touches the figure of rash, hot-tempered Harry Percy is drawn ! How impatient he is about the medical advice on the field of battle :

" . . . He made me mad
To see him shine so brisk and smell so sweet,
And talk so like a waiting gentlewoman :
Of guns and drums and wounds—God save the mark !—
And telling me, the sovereign'st thing on earth
Was pannaecia for an inward bruise !"

Prince Henry characterises him in pleasantly humorous fashion :

"I am not yet of Percy's mind, the Hotspur of the North, he that kills me some six or seven dozen of Scots at a breakfast, washes his hands and says to his wife, 'Ere upon this quest life ! I want work !' 'O my sweet Henry,' says she, 'how many hast thou killed to-day !' 'Give my roan horse a drench,' says he, and answers, 'Some fourteen,' an hour after : 'a trifle—a trifle'"

He is a born fighter ; intrepid, independent, honourable ; he has humour and geniality. But he is not the great warrior. Superficially only is he a romantic figure. Place him beside Othello and mark the difference. There is no deep imagination, no fine artistic feeling, no largeness of heart about Percy. He hates music, is jealous of others' merits, and although his famous utterance "Tell truth and shame the devil" is a fine one, yet it is inspired no little by his want of feeling with the mysterious side of things. But there is an honest rationalism about the man which commands respect.

Glendower. I can call spirits from the vasty deep.

Hotspur. Why, so can I, or so can any man ;

But will they come when you do call for them ?

Glendower. Why, I can teach you, cousin, to command the devil.

Holspur. And I can teach thee, coz, to shame the devil
By telling truth: tell truth and shame the devil.

While with unerring insight Shakespeare differentiates such vital rogues as Falstaff, the tavern haunter, and Autolycus, the vagabond of the fields.

Two points remain for consideration; they are both implied in the sociological criticism at present so rife. According to this, Shakespeare is to be condemned for his poor, ready-made morality, and for his egregious snobbery.

The ethical criticism is largely inspired by the modern tendency to look at the literary artist as a potential teacher. Many artists are teachers. Browning was one, so was Meredith, so was Ibsen, so was Tolstoy. But no Elizabethan dramatist ever dreamed of assuming the teacher's rôle. "Our true intent is all for your delight"—to amuse and entertain, that was the sole ambition of the writer of plays. When he happened to be a man of genius he could not help doing more than this, but it was incidental and accidental. There is no definite moral teaching in Shakespeare's plays, but being a great artist of wide range, he necessarily presented ethical problems as a part of human life, not with a view to discussing their rightness or wrongness.

What we have to ask ourselves therefore is what kind of man do the plays reflect? Do they picture one above or below the average moral standard of his day?

Let us present a test.

A characteristic of the Elizabethan was intolerance. Tolerance indeed, in Tudor times, was quite an unknown quantity. Not only was it rare to find, but it was regarded not as a virtue but as a lamentable weakness.

In some of the fine souls, Sir Thomas More for instance, we find it advocated; but More's own sentiments could not withstand the pressure of public sentiment; and his own career as Chancellor is certainly not remarkable for tolerance, or even bare justice.

The current feeling about the Jew is expressed in Marlowe's Barabas. To put it briefly, he was a monster outside the pale of consideration. What did Shakespeare do for him? Without any sentimentality, he pictured him as a man:

"Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer, as a Christian? If you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? If you poison us, do we not die?—And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge? If we are like you in the rest, we will resemble you in that. If a Jew wrong a Christian, what is his humility? Revenge. If a Christian wrong a Jew, what should his sufferance be by Christian example? Why, revenge. The villainy you teach me I will execute; and it shall go hard but I will better the instruction."

Another test of a writer's moral attitude, using the word in a large sense, is his treatment of the courtisan. You may glorify her with the immoralists, or condemn her with the pietists; either attitude is common enough in literature. What is uncommon is the broad, generous outlook that without in any way construing black as white, seeks to show the "soul of goodness" in things evil. Now, surely no man of superficial "ready-made" morality could have painted that splendid sinner, Cleopatra, not splendid as some French writers would have made her because of her sinning, but despite it—great in spite of her viciousness and folly. Is it possible not to keep a place in one's sympathies and liking for that arch rogue, braggart, and coward Falstaff, or that careless, irresponsible vagabond, Autolycus? Is ready-made morality accountable for this? Not that Shakespeare's moral attitude is impeccable.

During those gloomy years, when it seemed for a time as if his faith in human nature had been shaken, during the writing of All's Well that Ends Well, Measure for Measure, and Titus Andronicus, there is much that is no better—if no worse—than the conventional morality of the day. The issue of All's Well is certainly anything but well. But the writer is so obviously sick at heart and cynical in mood during this time, that it is unfair to take it as a worthy sample of his art. Compare these plays with the cycle of great tragedies which follow, and how different the atmosphere. I take at random a snatch of dialogue between Hamlet and Polonius—Polonius the man of maxims, whose morality is certainly of the ready-made order:

Polonius. My lord, I will use them according to their desert.

Hamlet. God's bodykins, man, much better: use every man after his desert, and who shall 'scape whipping? Use them after your own honour and dignity, the less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty.

A suggestive passage surely, not merely for his own, but for our own age, a hint that the statesman who has to deal with subject races might well take as a hint.

One point remains for consideration. A number of modern writers on Shakespeare have insisted strongly on his snobbery, hinting that he was essentially undemocratic, hating the mob. According to one critic, Coriolanus is a "mine of insults" against the people. Even Dr Furnivall admits, "Shakespeare used the poor rather as material for fun to amuse his richer patrons with, than as folk with whom he felt. He doesn't show much sympathy with them—not so much as Chaucer, I think—but his representations of them are all in good part, and like those of Chaucer and Dickens, make his hearers think kindly of the men they laugh at."

Now, Shakespeare certainly had no liking for the rough, uneducated mob; he was a man of sensitive feeling, acutely responsive to breeding and culture, and had nothing of that demagogue spirit that leads men to play down to the "groundlings" for personal aggrandisement and popularity. Brutality and ignorance he hates heartily with Elizabethan frankness, and states it without equivocation in forcible language. Coriolanus is a plain unvarnished picture of mob fickleness and brutality. To call it a "mine of insults to the people" is ridiculous. No reader of Henry IV can say that Shakespeare was blind to the virtues and merits of the people at large. His pictures of moral worth are far less partisan than Dickens'. Want of sympathy with the poor in their sufferings I find nowhere. On the contrary, there is a passage in King Lear remarkable for its poignant sympathy.

"Take physic, pomp;
Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel,
That thou may'st shake the superfluous to them
And show the heavens more just."

Or take a comedy—As You Like It—and note how admirably the rustic spirits hold their own with the aristocrat.

Shakespeare no more spurned the poorer classes than he spurned the middle classes. It were quite as easy to make out a case from The Merry Wives of Windsor, showing how meanly he thought of the burgher class, or from Macbeth, and Othello, to show how meanly he thought of soldiers, as to see in Coriolanus "a mine of insults to the people."

It is quite probable that in those days when the man of letters was dependent on a patron, and when it was the custom to heap meaningless adulation on the Sovereign, Shakespeare was no better than his fellows. The fulsome compliments poured upon Elizabeth not merely by her courtiers but by the foreign ambassadors who wished to retain her regard, make dismal reading. Unhappily, snobbery and sycophancy are not peculiar to Shakespeare's time, and if Shakespeare was neither better nor worse than many of his contemporaries in this respect, there is reason to suppose that he accepted it carelessly, as a convention to be observed, and that it was not due to real littleness of mind and dwarfed sympathies. He was not a paragon of the virtues; he had his weaknesses both as a man and artist. But the marvel is that, typifying as he does the greatness and the defects of his age and generation, he should so far transcend his time as to speak to us to-day—at any rate to those of us who have ears to hear, despite our changes of thought and shifting of ideals—with an even greater compelling power than in his day and generation.

Plays of Doubtful Authorship attributed to Shakespeare

(1) Certain plays were published during Shakespeare's lifetime with his name or initials attached to them: Loocrine (1595), Sir John Oldcastle (1600), Thomas Lord Cromwell (1602), The London Prodigal (1605), The Puritan (1607), A Yorkshire Tragedy (1608), Pericles (1609).

(2) Certain plays were published after Shakespeare's death in association with his name: The Troublesome Reign of John (1622), and circulated anonymously in 1591; Two Noble Kinsmen (1634), by Fletcher and Shakespeare; and The Birth of Merlin, Shakespeare and Knowles (1662).

(3) Certain plays have been assigned to him on internal evidence in more modern times, for example, Edward III, Arden of Feversham, and Sir Thomas More.

This classification does not exhaust the number of plays imputed to him at some time or another, but it covers the most important, from the point of view of evidence.

On what grounds then do we exclude or include them? The answer is, almost entirely on internal grounds. External evidence helps us very little.

So contemptuously careless was Shakespeare of his plays that he allowed piratical booksellers to fust plays of inferior merit on the public with his name attached. Of his poetry he was jealous and took care; the dramas were written for the stage, what happened to them after, or what else was attributed to him he ignored.

Dealing with (1); the only plays sufficiently remarkable to demand consideration are Loocrine, A Yorkshire Tragedy, and Pericles. There is the slenderest evidence in the case of the others, evidence of no moment; nor indeed have the plays themselves any intrinsic value.

Loocrine is in no better plight as regards evidence, but it is an interesting piece of work. Modelled on the lines of Senecan tragedy, its blood and thunder style approximates more to the work of Kyd than that of any other known contemporary; though there is more tenderness and grace in certain passages than we find in plays by the author of The Spanish Tragedy, and a livelier sense of comedy.

On account of the two latter characteristics, perhaps, the play has been attributed in turn to Peele and Greene, while the rhetorical splendour of passages has suggested to some minds Marlowe. Neither in its treatment of character nor in its phraseology does it suggest Shakespeare's method at any point in his career. That is the most certain thing that we can advance about the play. The rest is an open question.

A Yorkshire Tragedy is a play of domestic life and deals with an actual occurrence, recorded by Stow and others. It is the tale of a profligate and his unhappy wife. The profligate is drawn with power and subtlety; and the temperament of the man is admirably suggested in the lines:

"O would virtue had been forbidden, we should then have proved all virtuous, for 'tis our blood to love what we are forbidden."

The whole play is remarkable in its sordid and unflinching tragedy; but written as it was in the first decade of the seventeenth century, its treatment of blank verse is markedly different from Shakespeare's at that time.

Pericles, though not mentioned in the first folio edition, is generally credited to Shakespeare; but whereas it was once thought to be one of his early writings, it is now found to be in accordance with his latest style, and is presumed to have been written about the time of Antony and Cleopatra.

The subject was a popular one. First treated in a Greek romance, it was often translated in the Middle Ages, and Gower deals with it in his Confessio Amantis. The story is a repulsive one, in many ways, dealing with an incestuous love, and when not repulsive is meandering and undramatic, but it certainly has been embroidered with some beautiful scenes and with some striking pieces of characterisation; that of Pericles himself for instance—one of those sensitive, introspective souls that Shakespeare excelled especially in depicting. That it may not be wholly Shakespeare's is not improbable, but outside of Shakespeare it would be hard to match some of the scenes for beauty of diction and masterly handling; for instance, the shipwreck passages.

Coming to the second category, the only play that need detain us is the Two Noble Kinsmen. It is modelled largely upon the old romance treated by Chaucer in The Knight's Tale; to which is added that element of Elizabethan realism for which the novel had already given men a taste. So we have two plots, set in a discursive background of masque-like splendour.

The play is extremely uneven in merit, but there can be no question of imaginative grasp attained at times. It is agreed that Fletcher had a hand in the work, but who the other collaborator is, has not been settled. Some have argued in favour of Massinger, and as Massinger's diction has a certain Shakespearean quality at times, it is possible that Massinger is the part author. The probabilities, however, are in favour of Shakespeare; for putting aside Acts II, III, and IV, assigned by most critics to Fletcher, the character of the diction and the method of treatment is far less like Massinger than Shakespeare. This has been ably pointed out by a writer in the Cambridge History of English Literature:

"In the mechanical elements of poetic rhythm, Massinger comes very near to Shakespeare; but, when we look deeper, and come to the consideration of those features of style which do not admit of tabular analysis, we find the widest difference. The diction of Massinger is, above all things, orderly and lucid. He shows, at times, passion and imagination; but he never allows these to check the stately decorum and even flow of his verse. Now, the diction of The Two Noble Kinsmen is of a peculiar nature, and Spalding, in his famous Letter, with others after him, naturally directed his attention to this, above all other things, in attributing these non-Fletcherian scenes to Shakespeare. In the profusion of striking metaphors, the copious outpouring of profound thoughts, and the extreme concision, often involving harshness and obscurity, of the utterance, these scenes bear a marked resemblance to the plays of Shakespeare's final period, and to nothing else in literature. Moreover, the very defects of these scenes are the same defects which we meet with in Shakespeare's so-called romances."

In the third category are a number of plays that, independently of the problem of their Shakespearean inspiration, merit our attention.

The play of Edward III, based on a story of Bandello's, is a remarkable piece of work. There is no external evidence in favour of Shakespearean authorship, though the play is often remarkably Shakespearean in style. The most plausible conjecture is that it is an old play touched up by the Master's hand. Frankly, I do not think too much must be made of what we may call the Shakespearean touch. Many had caught the trick of phrase—many of no mean power either as poets or playwrights—and because of this, plays have been assigned to Shakespeare. Just as surely as Mr Stephen Phillips' poems might be ascribed—were their authorship doubtful—to Tennyson.

In default of external evidence, nothing short of very strong and precise internal evidence should convince us as to Shakespeare's authorship in the case of these plays.

The play of Sir Thomas More is another illustration in point of this. There are touches of the Shakespearean manner, but nothing of the Shakespearean spirit. It is cleverly devised from materials supplied by Hall's Chronicle and Roper's biography; the characterisation of More, a delightful and congenial subject, is treated well, but many a contemporary dramatist might have written the play.

Arden of Feversham remains to be noted. Swinburne ascribes it unhesitatingly to Shakespeare. "It seems to me not pardonable merely, nor permissible, but simply logical and reasonable—to set down this poem as the possible work of no man's youthful hand but Shakespeare's."

Of the play's power there can be no question. Like A Yorkshire Tragedy, it is a grim, realistic study of domestic life, and like it also, the play is founded on fact. A dissolute wife kills her forbearing husband.

The subject is treated with psychological insight; but pace Mr. Swinburne, it is hard to find in its pedestrian verse more than a fleeting suggestion, here and there, of Shakespeare's magic. Perhaps pedestrian is too reproachful a term; the verse is bare and austere, seldom touched by beauty of thought or grace of diction, yet with a simple dignity and distinction of its own in its grim situations. But the universal simplicity of style, the unromantic treatment of the theme is not in harmony with Shakespeare's ardent and often over-rich imagination.

The play was first claimed for Shakespeare in 1770; it was published as early as 1592, a year in which Shakespeare was at work upon the earlier draft of Romeo and Juliet.

What a difference in the two plays, in order of imagination!

Whoever be the author, Arden is a splendid piece of work, and if Shakespeare be not the writer, as is a matter of considerable doubt, it is not unworthy of his genius, alien though it may be to the manifestations that we know.

SHAKESPEARE IN HIS PLAYS

I believe that all Shakespeare's great tragedies are the outcome of some profound personal experience, though not necessarily the actual experience related in the play. The invention of the dramatist has given them an habitat, the poet's insight has impressed the crude facts with a poignancy and passion that the man himself need not have necessarily experienced. But the underlying inspiration has been founded upon experience of life. Shakespeare has known what it was to feel the intellectual paralysis that comes from sensitive, probing introspection; he has been torn by the cruel devastation of jealousy; has tasted the bitterness of ingratitude among those he had reckoned his friends; has been brought face to face with those obstinate questionings of the Why and Whither that meet us in Hamlet. The form and texture of the plays reflect the creative imagination of the dramatic artist, but the spirit that animates the great utterances is surely something born of experience.

His life was a full, rich, and varied one; it is idle to suppose, then, that it contributed no fuel to kindle his powers into intense expression.

The great man of letters is always the stronger for being a great man of the world. The men of any age who have touched our hearts are the men that have faced the facts of life, looked the world straight in the face, and wrung from its harshest moments, inspirations for future travellers.

For some of them, weaker in purpose, less stable in endurance, the world proved too strong. Marlowe's brilliant career was cut short in a drunken brawl; while Greene and Nash wore away their powers of body and soul in reckless living.

Shakespeare as a man, though not immune from the weaknesses of his time and the infirmities of full and sensuous natures, soon realised, to use Shelley's words, that "Man who man would be must rule the Empire of himself." Had he not fashioned his life so well, this record he has left behind would have been impossible. Moreover, his compelling greatness lies in that he sounded sorrow and despair yet preserved to the end a brave front, a courageous confidence.

His work shows a gradual development of his genius. Beginning with high-spirited farce, he passes to fantastic romance, thence after a spell of English chronicle plays that help to strengthen his power of characterisation, gave him a firm grip on concrete realities, he turns to the higher comedy note of The Merchant of Venice, and the mellow romanticism of As You Like It. In his earlier work there is only one tragedy—Romeo and Juliet—and that is essentially a young man's tragedy; beautiful in its lyric poignancy, yet far inferior in imaginative intensity to the group of great tragedies. Before he came to these, his plays show a passing mood of bitterness and misanthropy, and abounding in fine poetry as are such plays as Trionius and Cressida, and All's Well that Ends Well, they lack the intensity and sanity of outlook that mark his best work. They are succeeded, however, by the tragedies, and while the earlier ones are more deliberate and analytical in treatment, the later ones are marked by swiftness and vehemence of thought and expression.

Yet, deeply as they stir the springs of pity and terror within us, they do not depress our vitality, as do many modern tragedies. Why is this? Largely, I think, because at bottom Shakespeare never loses faith in human nature, physical and moral horrors you may get, never the paralysing horrors of fatalism.

Finally, after the storm comes the calm of the first period. Once again, romance and comedy join hands, but there is no harking back. Delightful as the earlier romances are, the later ones are finer. There is a deeper and fuller interpretation of the possibilities of human life. Who would exchange Ariel for Puck, Prospero for Hippolyta, Caliban for Bottom?

There is no need for us to take all that Shakespeare gives us, with the indiscriminating idolatry that marked an older generation of Shakespearean critics; that would do him as great disservice as to accept the cramped and petty criticisms of the eighteenth-century commentators. Scholars like Dowden, Bradley, Brandes, and Swinburne have done much to give us a truer insight into the fundamental greatness of the writer; while the unwholesome pall of adulation has been effectively dispelled by the useful, if exaggerated strictures of such men as Shaw and Ernest Crosby. The reader may safely be left with these various mentors at his elbow, to discriminate the dross from the gold, so long as he allows no critic, however great, to stand ultimately between himself and his subject. He cannot then fail to realise that the work of Shakespeare at his best, belongs to the great race utterances of literature, and like them we have come to look on it as a portion of our intellectual and spiritual heritage.

THE POETRY OF SENTIMENT

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
Rough winds do shake the darling bude of May,
And summer's lease hath all too short a date;
Sometimes too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimm'd;
And every fair from fair sometime declines,
By chance or nature's changing course untrimm'd;
But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
Nor lose possession of that fair thou owest;
Nor shall Death brag thou wander'st in his shade,
When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st.
So long as men can breathe, or eyes can see,
So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
I summon up remembrance of things past,
I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste;
Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow,
For precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
And weep afresh love's long since cancell'd woe,
And moan the expense of many a vanish'd sight;
Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,
And heavily from woe to woe tell o'er
The sad account of fore-bemoaned moan,
Which I new pay as if not paid before.
But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
All losses are restored and sorrows end.

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments. Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove;
O, no! it is an ever-fixed mark,
That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
It is the star to every wandering bark,
Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.
Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his bending sickle's compass come:
Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
But bears it out even to the edge of doom.
If this be error and upon me proved,
I never writ, nor no man ever loved.¹

"Take, O, take thy lips away,
That so sweetly were forsworn;
And those eyes, the break of day,
Lights that do mislead the morn;
But my kisses bring again, bring again;
Seals of love, but seal'd in vain, seal'd in vain!"²

"O mistress mine, where are you roaming?
O, stay and hear; your true love's coming,
That can sing both high and low:
Trip no further, pretty sweeting;
Journeys end in lovers' meeting:
Every wise man's son doth know

What is love? 'tis not hereafter;
Present mirth hath present laughter;
What's to come is still unsure:

In delay there lies no plenty,
Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty,
Youth's a stuff will not endure."

THE POETRY OF FANTASY

Where the bee sucks, there suck I:
In a cowslip's bell I lie;
There I couch when owls do cry.
On the bat's back I do fly
After summer merrily.
Merrily, merrily shall I live now
Under the blossom that hangs on the bough.

Come unto these yellow sands,
And then take hands:
Courtied when you have and kiss'd
The wild waves whist:
Foot it feathery here and there;
And, sweet sprites, the burthen bear.

Full fathom five thy father lies;
Of his bones are coral made;
Those are pearls that were his eyes;
Nothing of him that doth fade,
But doth suffer a sea-change
Into something rich and strange,
Sea-nymphs hourly ring his knell:
Ding-dong."

THE POETRY OF PASSION

Othello Soft you; a word or two before you go
I have done the state some service, and they know't.
No more of that. I pray you, in your letters,
When you shall these unlucky deeds relate,
Speak of me as I am; nothing extenuate,
Nor set down aught in malice: then must you speak
Of one that loved not wisely but too well,
Of one not easily jealous, but, being wrought,
Perplex'd in the extreme; of one whose hand,
Like the base Indian, threw a pearl away
Richer than all his tribe, of one whose subdued eyes,
Albeit unused to the melting mood,
Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees
Their medicinal gum. Set you down thus;
And say besides, that in Aleppo once,
Where a malignant and a turbau'd Turk
Beat a Venetian and traduced the state,
I took by the throat the circumcised dog,
And smote him, thus.¹ (Stabs himself)

THE POETRY OF MEDITATION

Claudio. Ay, but to die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obstruction, and to rot;
This sensible warm motion to become
A knoed clod: and the delighted spirit
To bathe in fiery floods, or to reside
In thrilling regions of thick ribbed ice;
To be imprison'd in the viewless winds,
And blown with restless violence round about
The pendent world, or to be worse than worst
Of those, that lawless and incertain thoughts
Imagine howling—"tis too horrible!
The weariest and most loathed worldly life,
That age, ache, penury, and imprisonment
Can lay on nature, is a paradise
To what we fear of death."²

THE PSYCHOLOGIST

Servant. O master! if you did but hear the pedlar at the door, you would never dance again after a tabor and pipe; no, the bagpipe could not move you. He sings several tunes faster than you'll tell money; he utters them as he had eaten ballads and all men's ears grew to his tunes.

Why, he sings 'em over as they were gods and goddesses. You would think a smock were a she-angel, make not this chest bring out another, and the shears

"Jog on, jog on, the foot-path way.
And merrily hent the stile-a;
A merry heart goes all the day,
Your sad tires in a mile-a."

Beating and hanging are terrors to me; for the life to come, I sleep out the thought of it.¹

THE DRAMATIST

Enter LADY MACBETH

Lady M. That which hath made them drunk hath made me bold;
What hath quenched them hath given me fire. Hark!
Peace!

It was the owl that shriek'd, the fatal bellman,
Which gives the stern'st good-night. He is about it:
The doors are open, and the surfeited grooms
Do mock their charge with snores: I have drugg'd their possets,

That death and nature do contend about them,
Whether they live or die.

Macb (Within) Who's there? what, ho!

Lady M. Alack, I am afraid they have awaked
And 'tis not done: the attempt and not the deed
Confounds us. Hark! I had their daggers ready,
He could not miss 'em. Had he not resembled
My father as he slept, I had done't. (Enter MACBETH)

My husband!

Macb. I have done the deed. Didst thou not hear a noise?

Lady M. I heard the owl scream and the crickets cry.
Did not you speak?

Macb.

When?

Lady M.

Now.

Macb.

As I descended?

Lady M. Ay.

Macb. Hark!

Who lies i' the second chamber?

Lady M.

Donalbain.

Macb. This is a sorry sight. (Looking on his hands)

Lady M. A foolish thought, to say a sorry sight.

Macb. There's one did laugh in a sleep, and one cried "Murder!"

That they did wake each other: I stood and heard them.
But they did say their prayers, and addressed them
Again to sleep.

Lady M. There are two lodged together.

Macb. One cried "God bless us!" and "Amen" the other.

As they had seen me with these hangman's hands:

Listening their fear, I could not say "Amen,"

When they did say "God bless us!"

Lady M. Consider it not so deeply.

Macb. But wherefore could not I pronounce "Amen"?
I had most need of blessing, and "Amen"
Stuck in my throat.

Lady M.

These deeds must not be thought
After these ways; so, it will make us mad

Macb. Methought I heard a voice cry: "Sleep no more,
Macbeth does murder sleep—the innocent sleep,
Sleep that knits up the ravell'd sleeve of care,
The death of each day's life, sore labour's bath,
Balm of hurt minds, great nature's second course,
Chief nourisher in life's feast,—"

Lady M.

What do you mean?

Macb. Still it cried "Sleep no more!" to all the house
"Glamis hath murder'd sleep, and therefore Cawdor Shall sleep no more: Macbeth shall sleep no more."

Lady M. Who was it that thus cried? Why, worthy thane,

You do unbend your noble strength, to think
So brainlessly of things! Go get some water,
And wash this filthy witness from your hand.
Why did you bring these daggers from the place?
They must lie there; go carry them, and smear
The sleepy grooms with blood.

Macb. I'll go no more:
I am afraid to think what I have done;
Look on't again I dare not.

Lady M. Infirm of purpose!
Give me the daggers: the sleeping and the dead
Are but as pictures: 'tis the eye of childhood
That fears a painted devil. If he do bleed,
I'll gild the faces of the grooms withal,
For it must seem their guilt. (Exit. Knocking within.)

Macb. Whence is that knocking?
How is't with me, when every noise appals me?
What hands are here? ha! they pluck out mine eyes!
Will all great Neptune's ocean wash this blood
Clean from my hand? No, this my hand will rather
The multitudinous seas incarnadine,
Making the green one red.

Re-enter LADY MACBETH

Lady M. My hands are of your colour, but I shame
To wear a heart so white. (Knocking within) I hear a knocking

At the south entry: retire we to our chamber:
A little water clears us of this deed:
How easy is it then! Your constancy

Hath left you unattended. (Knocking within.) Hark!
more knocking:

Get on your nightgown, lest occasion call us
And show us to be watchers: be not lost
So poorly in your thoughts.

Macb. To know my deed, 'twere best not know myself. (Knocking within.)

Wake Duncan with thy knocking! I would thou couldst!

THE HUMOURIST

Falstaff. Hal, if thou see me down in the battle, and beside me, so; 'tis a point of friendship.

Prince. Nothing but a colossus can do thee that friendship. Say thy prayers, and farewell.

Falstaff. I would 'twere bed-time, Hal, and all well.

Prince. Why, thou owest God a death.

Falstaff. 'Tis not due yet; I would be loath to pay him before his day. What need I be so forward with him that calls not on me? Well, 'tis no matter, honour pricks me on. Yea, but how if honour pricks me off when I come on? how then? Can honour set to a leg? no; or an arm? no; or take away the grief of a wound? no. Honour hath no skill in surgery, then? no. What is honour? a word. What is in that word honour? What is that honour? air. A trim reckoning! Who hath it? he that died o' Wednesday. Doth he feel it? no. Doth he hear it? no. 'Tis insensible, then? yea, to the dead. But will it not live with the living? no. Why? detraction will not suffer it. Therefore I'll none of it. Honour is a mere scutcheon: and so ends my catechism.

FRANCIS BACON: His Life. His Work: Essays—New Atlantis—Henry VII.

FRANCIS BACON

THERE are few names that shine with greater brilliance than Francis Bacon's (or to give him his full title, Lord Verulam or Viscount St Albans) in the literary and scientific world at this day, nearly three hundred years after his death. His will contained the following: "For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches, and to foreign nations and the next ages."

London was the birthplace of this writer, philosopher, and statesman, the capital which claims to be the native place of so many of the great men of the sixteenth century. At York House in the Strand, on the 22nd January 1561, in the official residence of his father, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, Francis Bacon was born. He was the younger son of his father's second marriage. His mother, Anne Cooke, was a daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, a sister-in-law to Lord Burghley. She was a woman of strong character, highly educated, deeply religious, and interested herself in the Church's reformation. Her strong will and narrow Calvinistic beliefs, combined with her great classical knowledge, without doubt coloured and influenced her son's life from a very early age. When a very young boy, his serious mind and self-confidence attracted Queen Elizabeth's attention. Her "young Lord Keeper" was a title she merrily gave him. There were six children born of the first marriage of Sir Nicholas Bacon, and of the second, two, Francis and his brother Anthony, who was two years older.

At the early age of twelve years, Francis with his brother were entered as fellow-commoners at Trinity College, Cambridge, and at the end of two years Francis returned to London and began to study law. In 1576 he went to the English Embassy in Paris, as a Junior Secretary to Sir Amyas Paulet, who had just taken up the position of English Ambassador. Bacon, who was then sixteen, remained in France with Sir Amyas Paulet a little over two years. He was not nineteen when his father suddenly died, without providing for this son of his second marriage. This necessitated Bacon leaving France and at once deciding on his future profession. He went into the law, much against his inclination, and began his studies at once at Gray's Inn, whilst his whole nature was craving for the attraction of literature and philosophy. Being possessed of a very small income and the knowledge that he must make his own fortune before he had the necessary leisure to devote himself to his favourite studies, helped him to give his mind to his work. In 1582 Bacon was "called," and in four years afterwards was elected a bencher of his inn. He had looked in vain to his uncle, Lord Burghley, to assist him to obtain one of the many lucrative posts which the profession he had adopted held. When Bacon was twenty-three he turned his thoughts to Parliament. In political affairs, of course, Burghley's influence was paramount, and he exerted it to secure for Bacon a seat in the House of Commons as member for Melcombe Regis. Subsequently he sat for Taunton, and in 1593 he represented Middlesex. He soon became a prominent member of the House. On one occasion he managed to give offence to the Queen by opposing a grant demanded by the Government. Disappointed in his hopes of promotion, he detached himself from Burghley and strongly supported the policy of Lord Essex, who presented him with property at Twickenham, which Bacon was able to sell for eighteen hundred pounds, equal to about £12,000 at the value of money to-day. This gift was largely in the nature of a consolation for Essex's failure to obtain for him high legal office. It was due to Bacon's advice that Essex undertook the difficult problem of Ireland's government. Bacon never tired of pointing out to Essex that he, and he alone was fitted to successfully undertake the suppression of Tyrone's rebellion (1598) and then return to Court covered with glory. Bacon stood to gain whether his friend was triumphant or a failure. He could be of infinite service to him on his return if his mission proved successful, and if Essex returned disgraced, Bacon decided he could put him on one side, and the field would once more be clear. Essex, as a means to Bacon's greater advancement in the pursuit of position was certainly doubtful, so the sooner he was out of the way the better. The following year proved Essex's downfall. At his trial it was Bacon who pressed the evidence into a course which meant certain conviction of the prisoner, quite in opposition to the favourable conducting of the evidence by Sir Edward Coke. This trickery and meanness of Bacon's is hard to understand and harder to forgive. His whole mind was given up to self-advancement, and anyone standing in the way of this realisation must go.

Whilst Bacon had been giving much attention to his profession and politics, his literary activities had been considerable. In 1597 he published a volume of essays which at once showed the author to be a man of diverse talents. Bacon had discovered by the time James the First ascended the throne, that flattery and lies appeared to "bring" success.

He was knighted in 1603, became Solicitor-General in 1607, and in 1613 Attorney-General. The following instance proves that nothing would deter him from the carrying out of any purpose that might assist him in his duties: it is known he helped in the torturing of an old clergyman named Peachman, in order to force a confession of treason from this victim. The year before he became Solicitor-General, at the age of forty-five, Bacon married Alice Barnham, whose father had been a rich London merchant, and at his death had left his daughter two hundred pounds a year. This fortune represented a much larger sum than two hundred pounds represents to-day. It is to be remembered that it was eight times higher than the value of our currency. From his office as Clerk of the Star Chamber, Bacon drew an income of about two thousand pounds a year; thus, with his other posts, must have brought in yearly a large amount of money.

His love of show and lawlessness with regard to expenditure caused him to be always in debt. After his marriage he spent enormous sums on Verulam House, near St. Albans. The completion of this vast mansion, the magnificent furniture and decorations, together with an army of servants, far exceeded the amount of his income, and he was ever expending more than he received.

Bacon had no children. We may believe that he and his wife lived happily together for a considerable time. In his will he left her generously provided for, but at the close of his life he cancelled this provision "for just and grave causes, utterly revoked and made void, leaving her to her right only." As he died owing twenty-two thousand pounds, perhaps his wife had no great cause for annoyance. His flatteries to the King and his favourite, Buckingham, and his assiduous searching for prosperity, still continued. Buckingham used his great influence in endeavouring to secure the highest appointments for Bacon, with the full determination of using him afterwards for his own purposes. As soon as the office of Lord Keeper became vacant in 1617, Buckingham saw to it that Bacon should fill it. In January of the next year he became Lord Chancellor. Honour quickly followed. In six months he was made Baron Verulam and Viscount St. Albans in 1621. The year that placed him on the pinnacle of his ambitions, was the year in which his rapid downfall began. His great position as Lord Chancellor was terribly misused. Buckingham constantly required him to favour his friends. Bacon accepted bribes and presents and was obviously dealing unjustly. No longer could a parliamentary inquiry be put off. He was accused and admitted he was guilty of corruption, and threw himself on the mercy of his judges. "My lords, I beseech you to be merciful to a broken reed." As a punishment he was ordered to give up all offices of State, a life imprisonment in the Tower, and to pay a fine of forty thousand pounds. The King gave him his freedom the next day, and allowed the fine to go unpaid. He retired in disgrace to his country residence near St. Albans. His small private fortune, together with a pension of one thousand two hundred a year, which James had only a short time before given him, still remained to him. From this time until the end of his days, literature and science held him. Despite his busy life, his studies had never been neglected. Five years afterwards, on April 9, 1626, Bacon died at the age of sixty-five. In pursuit of his scientific researches when out driving, he alighted from his carriage one snowy day, and bought a fowl from a cottager, and had it killed, then stuffed the body with snow, intending to discover if the stuffing would preserve the flesh. The experiment cost him his life. Seized with a sudden illness, he was carried into the house of his friend, Lord Arundel, and put into a damp bed prepared by a servant in his master's absence. He became rapidly ill with bronchitis. His age, and weakness from his strenuous life, made recovery impossible. At St. Michael's Church, St. Albans, over his grave a monument may still be seen, which was erected by an admirer.

HIS WORK

Although Bacon had no great respect for the English language, holding that "these modern languages will at one time play the bankrupt with books," yet no man individually did more to give strength and simplicity to our tongue than he. So far, the great defect in English prose had been its prolixity and diffuseness. Bacon put an end to this. His scientific training helped him here, it suggested clarity. With his philosophical and scientific treatises, such as the Novum Organum, we need not concern ourselves here. From our point of view the chief writings to notice are the Essays, the Advancement of Learning, the History of Henry VII, and the New Atlantis.

The Essays, ten in number, were issued first in 1597, again augmented in 1612, and finally just before his death.

The genesis of these is interesting. He jotted down in talking, any brilliant or suggestive thing he heard, or any illuminating thought that struck him. These he put together into a book—constantly augmenting the stock.

Emerson is the one modern writer with whom Bacon may be fairly compared, for their method is much the same. In each case you have a series of trenchant and apparently disconnected sayings, where the writer endeavours to reach the reader's mind by a series of aphoristic attacks.

Comparing Bacon with his predecessors, Hooker, Sidney, Lyly, Ascham, it will be seen how widely he departs from the prolix methods of the day. In rhetorical power, musical cadence, quaint turns of speech, he is equalled by many of his contemporaries, excelled by a few, but for a clear, terse, easy writing, he has no peer save Ben Jonson, and even to-day his Essays are models of succinct, lucid prose.

No man of the age had greater foresight than he: for clear-headed, prudential considerations he was unequalled. Material success and services to humanity were his objects in life. These aims were sometimes in conflict, though he did his best to blend them, and when the tussle came, personal considerations won the day. He had a great brain; not a great soul. He was too fine a man to play for self-aggrandisement only, too sagacious a thinker to truckle to the shallow heads of the day; but he was not great enough to resist temptation. He was both too great and too little to succeed in life.

Yet his faults are obvious enough to the cursory student of history. It is more profitable to deal with his finer qualities.

HIS AIMS

It has been well said that "nothing throws so clear a light on the career of any great man as a knowledge of his character and aims when he made the first step into the world." Bacon has stated his aims clearly. It was primarily to be of use to the human race; secondly, to serve his country.

The aims were big sounding but were conceived in all sincerity, and were no mere grandiloquent notions. He was conscious of his power and felt justly that his type of mind was of a serviceable character.

Clear foresight, as I have said, was the predominating characteristic. Combined with this was a cautious, judicial spirit, an untiring industry, and an even, amiable disposition.

The whole aim of science in Bacon's view was to endow the condition and life of man with new powers and works. Truth and utility were ultimately one and the same. Vain abstractions Bacon abhorred. His was to be the method of induction—the new method—arguing from ascertained facts to principles. The first step, obviously, was to collect the facts.

The collection of facts!—that is his insistent point. To keep the eye fixed on Nature, and so receive her images as they are.

The main significance of Bacon's philosophic position lies in this, that he emphasizes the necessity for a critical analysis of experience.

"Man, the servant and interpreter of Nature, can do and understand so much and so much only as he has observed in fact or in thought, of the course of Nature, beyond them he neither knows anything nor can do anything."

Experience and observation! How valuable a lesson for an age in which the crudest superstition and the most childish fancies did service for scientific investigation. One has only to recall the medical theories and practices of the day, to see how badly Bacon's method was needed.

This may be added. Bacon has been called the parent of Modern Science. The phrase is only true of him if we look at Bacon's ideas, not his methods. His methods contributed nothing; his ideas everything. What he himself said of himself is truer than he perhaps imagined: "I only sound the clarion; but I enter not into the battle." He lacked the genius of investigator and inventor; he was a prophet rather than a general. He knew what ought to be done; but his ways of setting about it were faulty.

Said Voltaire: "The Chancellor Bacon did not yet know nature, but he knew all the roads that led to her."

But his ideas were true and right enough; and time has only confirmed their essential rightness; and they all lay in the systematic and wide examination of facts, as the primary step in Science; and the postponement of generalisation until data had been collected.

As an illustration of Bacon's prose style, we may take the following passage:

OF STUDIES

"Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested; that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read, but not curiously; and some few to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention. Some books also may be read by deputy, and extracts made of them by others, but that would be only in the less important arguments and the meaner sort of books; else distilled books are like common distilled waters, flashy things. Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man. And therefore if a man write little, he had need have a great memory; if he confer little, he had need have a present wit; and if he read little, he had need have much cunning to seem to know that he doth not.

"Histories make men wise, poets witty, the mathematics subtle, natural philosophy deep, moral, grave, logic and rhetoric able to contend."

"HENRY VII"

"As for the disposition of his subjects in general towards him, it stood thus with him, that of the three affections which naturally tie the hearts of the subjects to their sovereign, love, fear, and reverence; he had the last in height, the second in good measure, and so little of the first, as he was beholden to the other two.

"He was a Prince, sad, serious, and full of thoughts and secret observations, and full of notes and memorials of his own hand, especially touching persons. As, whom to employ, whom to reward, whom to enquire of, whom to beware of, what were the dependences, what were the factions, and the like; keeping, as it were, a journal of his thoughts. There is to this day a merry tale; that his monkey, set on as it was thought by one of his chamber, tore his principal note-book all to pieces, when by chance it lay forth, whereat the court, which liked not these pensive accounts, was almost tickled with sport."

If the Essays reflect Bacon's lucidity of method, and the History of Henry VII his eloquence, to the New Atlantis we may turn for some taste of his imaginative ideals.

THE "NEW ATLANTIS"

The key-note of the New Atlantis is the pursuit of knowledge, which in Bacon's view is a religious duty. Many of the scientific hints thrown out by Bacon as Utopian possibilities have now become everyday realities. Certainly we may claim to have "some Degrees of Flying in the Ayre." Ships and Boates for going under water." Modern medical science is familiar with "Chambers of Health where we qualify the Aire . . . for the cure of divers diseases." These are but a few illustrations of the way in which Bacon foreshadowed the trend of scientific research.

The style of the book is clear and direct. Comparing it as a Utopian picture with that of More, a few points of interest detach themselves

(1) More emphasizes the social, Bacon the intellectual well-being of the community

(2) The chief note in More's Utopia is simplicity of life, whereas the chief feature of the citizens of Atlantis is orderliness of life

(3) More is Puritan in his ideas of dress; Bacon favours a certain external splendour

(4) The tone of More's mind is democratic; of Bacon's aristocratic

Bacon's fragment, equally with More's more considerable work, has inspired future generations no less by its fertile suggestions than by its simple charm of narrative.

"Wee sayled from Peru, (wher wee had continued by the space of one whole yeare), for China and Japan, by the South Sea, taking with us Victuals for twelve Moneths, And had good Windes from the East, though soft and weake, for five Moneths space, and more. But then the Winde came about, and setled in the West for many dayes, so as we could make little or no way, and were sometimes in purpose to turne back. But then againe ther arose Strong and Great Windes from the South, with a Point East, which carried us up, (for all that we could doe) towards the North; By which time our Victuals failed us, though we had made good spare of them. So that finding our selves, in the Midst of the greatest Wildernesse of Waters in the World, without Victuall, we gave our Selves for lost Men, and prepared for Death. Yet we did lift up our Harts and Voices to God above, who sheweth his Wonders in the Deepe, Beseeching him of his Mercy, that as in the Beginning He discovered the Face of the Deepe, and brought forth Dry-Land; So he would now discover Land to us, that we mought not periah."

"We have also certaine Chambers, which wee call Chambers of Health, wher wee qualify the Aire as we thinke good and proper for the Cure of diverse Diseases, and Preservation of Health.

"Wee have also faire and large Baths, of severall

Mixtures, for the Cure of Diseases, and the Restoring of Mans Body from Arefaction: And Others for the Confirming of it in Strength of Sinneues, Vitall Parts, and the very Iuyce and Substance of the Body.

"We have also large and various Orchards, and Gardens; Wherin we do not so much respect Beauty, as Variety of Ground and Soyle, proper for diverse Trees, and Herbs. And some very spacious, wher Trees, and Berries are set, wherof we make diverse Kinds of Drinks, besides the Vineyards. In these wee practise likewise all Conclusions of Grafting, and Inoculating, as well as of Wilde-Trees, as Fruit-Trees, which producest many Effects. And we make (by Art) in the same Orchards, and Gardens, Trees and Flowers, to come earlier, or later, then their Seasons; And to come up and beare more speedily then by their Naturall Course they doe. We make them also by Art greater much then their Nature, and their Fruit greater and sweeter and of differing Tast, Smell, Colour, and Figure, from their Nature. And many of them we so Order as they become of Medicinall Use

"Wee have also Meanes to make diverse Plants rise by Mixtures of Earths without Seedes, And likewise to make diverse New Plants, differing from the Vulgar; and to make one Tree or Plant turne into another

"We have also Parks, and Enclosures of all Sorts, of Beasts, and Birds, which wee use not onely for View or Rareness, but likewise for Dissections, and Tralls; That thereby we may take light, what may be wrought upon the Body of Man. Wherin we finde many strange Effects, As Continuing Life in them, though diverse Parts, which you account Vitall, be perished, and taken forth, Resusitating of some that seems Dead in Appearance, And the like. We try also all Poysons, and other Medicines upon them, as well of Chyrurgery, as Physicke. By Art likewise, we make them Greater, or Taller than their Kinde is, And contrary-wise Dwarfie them and stay their Growth. Wee make them more Fruitfull, and Bearing then their Kind is, and contrary-wise Barren and not Generative. Also we make them differ in Colour, Shape, Activity, many wayes. We finde Meanes to make Commixtures and Copulations of diverse Kindes, which have produced many New Kindes, and them not Barren as the generall Opinion is. We make a Number of Kindes, of Serpents, Wormes, Flies, Fishes, of Putrefaction, Wherof some are advanced (in effect) to be Perfect Creatures, like Beastes or Birds; And have Sexes, and doe Propagate. Neither doe we thus by Chance, but wee know before hand, of what Matter and Commixture, what Kinde of those Creatures will arise."

Significance of His Work

Of Bacon's contribution to critical thought mention is made elsewhere. Regarding here his work as a whole, we may say that the best summing up is expressed in his own words: "A bell ringer who is up first to call others to church." In his Advancement to Learning, he is one of the earliest to seek to consolidate and unify his knowledge; in his Essays he is the pioneer of clear sententious English, that suggests rather than expounds, and blends dignity with familiarity, in that pleased and attractive manner which is the secret of the power of all our great essayists. Again, in his Henry VII he shows the possibilities of a flowing, orderly, and picturesque narrative that shall compel attention without recourse to strained conceits. Finally, in his New Atlantis, with its plea for a College of Scientific Research, he started a movement that led to the foundation of our Royal Society, and inspired in a later era that stupendous undertaking the French Encyclopédie. Despite the marks of philosophy, with which it is customary to adorn Bacon, it may be questioned whether he will be seriously regarded as a great thinker. Here again he is the "bell ringer" to thought, rather than the profound reasoner. His literary methods are then of the orator, not the dialectician; he is not good in argument; not reliable even in exposition. He saw the value of scientific precision, and the careful accumulation of facts, but his own cast of mind is not adapted to the carrying out of his own admirable precepts.

In fact he is a valuable, intellectual irritant rather than a constructive force; an intellectual irritant with fine rich literary resources at his command; fertile in illustration, luminous in suggestion, and with considerable power to challenge and arrest the attention. Cowley well compared him with Moses on Pisgah, surveying the Promised Land, but not entering into possession. That dictum goes to the root of the matter.

THE DECLINE OF THE RENASCENCE

Introduction: The England of Milton and Bunyan: Puritanism and its Significance.

INTRODUCTION

THE ENGLAND OF MILTON AND BUNYAN

MILTON was born on December 9, 1608, at Black Spread Eagle Court, in Bread Street. Thus was Puritanism nourished in the very bosom of the Renaissance, for was not the famous Mermaid Tavern hard by, where the great Elizabethan poets and wits foregathered and caroused. Yet what a change of atmosphere in passing from the England of Shakespeare to the England of Milton.

Shakespeare stands first and foremost for the concrete realities of life; his words and phrases tingle with vitality and thrill with warmth. Milton is concerned rather with theorising about life, his lines roll over the mind with sonorous majesty, now and again thrilling us as Shakespeare did with the "fine excess" of creative genius, but more often impressing us with their stateliness and power, than moving us by their tenderness and passion.

There is a stern inflexibility here also that bespeaks the growing Puritanism of the age. A goodly leaven of Puritanism is a heritage of our Saxon nature. For a while the exultation of the Renaissance swept the Englishman off his feet, but the excesses that every tidal movement brings along with it soon sobered him. The fanatic who had so long denounced the drama to deaf ears, at last found an uneasy listener, for the baser elements in the drama were triumphing now that Shakespeare's voice had been stilled. There were fine souls yet, but the glory of the drama was assuredly on the decline.

Jonson, with shrewd insight, saw the marks of moral deterioration about him, and though there was abundant talent in many of his brilliant contemporaries, realised that that would not save the drama. So he brings to the fore that theory of literature which makes of it a fitting instrument of moral education. Shakespeare interpreted life, Jonson, and after him Milton, satirised it and moralised it. Such a course was less popular than Shakespeare's, but the needs of the age were its justification.

Puritanism began with Ben Jonson, though it found its greatest poetical exponent in Milton, its greatest prose exponent in Bunyan.

Two influences contributed especially to the moulding of the England now under consideration. The first is the influence of the great dramatists and poets of Elizabeth's reign. They had helped to make the people realise their solidarity as a nation by their chronicle plays. They had given them high ideals, a hatred of tyranny, and a spirit of independence that was to fit them for conflict with the Stuarts. Such was the legacy of great Elizabethan drama.

The drama that awaits our notice has many claims upon our admiration, some on our affection; but it lacks that grip-hold of the national conscience of which Marlowe and Shakespeare knew the secret.

The second influence is that of the Bible. The Scriptures, hitherto reserved for the select few, are now spread broadcast for men and women to consider and expound for themselves. The Bible is to be seen everywhere, heard of everywhere; it points an argument in the House of Commons; inspires the soldier on the field of battle; leavens the official despatches; the barber quotes it to his customer, the Puritan critic cites it against his enemies, and even those who foregathered at the tavern intersperse the news of the day with discussion of doctrines.

The term "Puritan" usually calls up the picture of an austere figure, garbed in black, with lank hair, a man with no feeling for art, no sympathy with the graces and amenities of life, a sour, crabbed, and gloomy personage.

That such Puritans existed is quite true, that such a picture is an absurd travesty of the best type of Puritan is equally true. Unfortunately, Puritanism has been associated in the popular mind with the extravagances of extremists. Thus, no doubt, is partly due to the fact that the stage, which the Puritan never regarded with favour, has revenged itself by perpetuating a caricature whenever it dealt with Puritanism. Even our own generation has witnessed Sir Henry Irving in a play where every artifice is used to idealise the portrait of Charles and to belittle the portrait of Cromwell.

In literature, not till Carlyle wrote his famous History did any adequate picture exist of the great political Puritan, and Macaulay was only expressing wittily the thought of his time when he wrote of the Puritan, that he disliked bear-baiting not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectator.

Anyone who wished to "purify" the usages of the church was called a Puritan, and it is a mistake to associate the term entirely with Nonconformity.

Many, of course, found it better to worship separately, as they could not get their forms sufficiently purified; but others were content to pursue the work of purification from within the Church. Puritanism had its Mores as well as its Luthers.

Ineffectual as Monasticism had proved in its declining years, it had supplied an ideal which the serious and devout sorely missed now that it had been uprooted. To such, largely men of intense if narrow imaginations, moral fervour, and tenacity of purpose, Puritanism supplied the necessary inspiration. They seized upon its principles with eager enthusiasm, and found in it the wherewithal to combat the shallow and light-hearted.

The artist owes Puritanism a grudge for the ruthless destruction of so much that was beautiful in the art treasures of London. But the extremist is to be blamed largely for this. The finer type of Puritan was by no means insensible either to the beauty of art or to the innocent joys of life. Milton wrote Masques; Colonel Hutchinson was an expert dancer; Cromwell delighted in music and encouraged musicians. In fact, the representative Puritan was by no means the dull dog he is painted, and Cromwell had less in common with some of the violent sectaries of his day than with some of the finer spirits among the Royalists.

If we turn from Milton, to regard for a moment Cromwell, the secret of Puritan dynamics is more fully disclosed. There was little about Cromwell of that hardness and austere reserve, common to many Puritans, and characteristic certainly of Milton. Milton triumphed because of his fiery sincerity and high imagination; Cromwell because of his genuine kindness of heart and his rare sense of justice. From the days when he was an obscure member of the House to the time when he held the destinies of the country in his hand, no one of his contemporaries equalled him for the dogged consistency and unselfish bravery with which he championed the cause of the poor against the rich. There was none to plead for them, and he stepped forward despite the danger then attaching to any sympathisers with the people.

And just as his zeal on their behalf and his kindness of manner attached the poorer classes to him, so did his unpretentious directness and "familiar rustic carriage" endear him to the soldiers whom he led.

There was nothing here of that genuine "Kill-Joy" attitude which made the Presbyterian so unpopular. Cromwell could relax on occasion, as his friends well knew, and that the more gracious elements of his character were not oftener forthcoming we may attribute to the seriousness of the work he had to do.

Yet no man courted popularity less than he did, or felt more acutely lack of sympathy. But there was something Titanic about his resolution; never did he flinch from any course of which his conscience approved. We may criticise the wisdom and the humanity of certain aspects of his policy; its sincerity and patriotism or—considering his age and generation—its tolerance, we cannot. "See what a multitude of people come to attend your triumph?" was said to him on one occasion.

"More would come to see me hanged," was the grim reply. No doubt it was perfectly true. To be well hated and misunderstood is both the privilege and tragedy of the strong man.

Admirable as a destructive force, Cromwell found the work of construction too hard; nor can we wonder at this, realising the stupendous difficulties that faced him. But he left a fruitful legacy of ideas behind him, none more fruitful than his insistence on liberty of thought in the teeth of the extremists of the day. Thus it was that attracted Milton towards him, and the saintly George Fox. It is quite true that the toleration he preached, moderate as it may seem to us to-day, was swept aside at the Restoration, yet it was not destroyed. It is also true that Puritanism had proved itself unfitted to be the sole inspiration of national statecraft. But I believe that it supplied the leaven of the far-reaching Benthamite reforms in the earlier half of the nineteenth century. "And if," as Mr. Gardiner has said, "his Puritanism descended from the proud position to which he had raised it," we may at any rate add, adapting the dictum on Charles, that it was greater in its fall than ever it had been in its days of power.

Yet with the glory of Puritanism as a dominant political force, it entered for yet a third time into our literature in the work of Bunyan. Of the Bedford tinker's work as literature, something will be said in its proper place. Here it may be affirmed that for sheer power over the hearts of men, Bunyan is unrivalled save by Shakespeare himself.

I. THE DRAMA

BEN JONSON

No one of the great vital personalities of the Elizabethan age is so well known to us as Ben Jonson. From his early precocious days when at Westminster School he attracted the attention of the historian Camden, down to the time when he was leading spirit of the Mermaid Tavern, numbering among his friends all the great men of the day, we seem to see the man as he was, sincere, brave, quarrelsome, and versatile; a good hater, an equally good lover, copious in speech, keenly critical in insight, a careful scholar, with a fine touch of poetry in his composition; the "huge galleon" of Fuller's famous account, notable for his wit combats with the "English man of war" Shakespeare. In physique big and unwieldy, with the uproarious egotism of his famous namesake; in intellect clear-headed, thoroughgoing, though often amazingly pedantic; in disposition, rough and satiric, yet essentially good at heart. Such was "Rare Ben Jonson": literature has never had a more indefatigable servant; nor life a more unflinching taster.

Born about the year 1573, a month after the death of his father, Ben Jonson was the son of a gentleman from the Border Counties, who for his zeal on behalf of the religion of the Reformers was imprisoned, and his estates sequestered, when Queen Mary came to the throne. Forced to leave his home, he came to London and became a minister in Westminster. Little, however, is definitely known of Jonson's antecedents.

When Jonson was two years old his mother married a tradesman who did the utmost for his little stepson; though "brought up poorly," his education was not neglected; he was sent first to the parish school of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Charing Cross, afterwards to Westminster School through the kindness of Camden, the scholarly historian, then second master. Here it was the foundations were laid that afterwards enabled the poet to build up his monumental fame as a poet and dramatist.

Camden took an intense interest in the lad and his work, of which Jonson was not unmindful; it was to Camden he dedicated his finest comedy, Every Man in His Humour, in 1596, and also acknowledged the debt he owed his old master in a poem:

"Camden! most reverend head, to whom I owe
All that I am in arts, all that I know!"

On leaving Westminster School he was apprenticed by his stepfather to his own trade, that of a builder, and it is not surprising to hear that Jonson "could not endure" the work. How could such work—whether it were in the office among estimates, specifications, and endless columns of figures, or in the more manual labour of piling up bricks and mortar—be congenial to a youth who had spent his school days among the classics of Greece and Rome! Can we wonder that he broke with the home ties and enlisted as a private soldier, and that many legendary stories are the outcome of this time spent with the army in the Low Countries?

On returning to London about the year 1592, though but twenty, he married; his wife he describes as "a shrew, yet honest"—perhaps with good reason for her shrewishness, if we take into account Jonson's own references to his early life,—and for some years they lived apart. Of several children not one outlived their father, an infant daughter who died in 1594, and a son, seven years of age, who died of the Plague in 1603, are both commemorated in his poems.

About the time of his marriage Jonson turned to the stage for employment, both as actor and playwright. He made his first appearance at a third-rate theatre in Clerkenwell, and afterwards joined Philip Henslowe's company, he was not a successful actor, and a duel with Gabriel Spencer of the same company, in which Spencer lost his life, ended Jonson's career in that branch of the profession. On his trial for the deed Jonson barely escaped paying the extreme penalty, and was branded in the thumb with the letter T. (i.e. Tyburn). While in prison he changed his religion and, "on trust" he says, became a Romanist; twelve years later he abjured the Roman faith and returned to the Anglican.

After the trial a temporary breach took place between Henslowe and Jonson, and a play that was being written by Jonson for Henslowe's company was passed on to George Chapman to complete. At this the poet showed considerable annoyance, and considering himself slighted, he sought revenge by offering his new comedy, Every Man in His Humour, to the Lord Chamberlain's company of players, who were only too delighted to score against a rival manager; they produced it with much success in 1598, with Shakespeare in the cast. The feud between Henslowe and Jonson did not last; the poet was too valuable an adjunct to the company to ignore for long, and the following year he was asked to write for them again. Jonson bore no malice, and gave them Every Man out of His Humour.

Jonson's self-esteem, arrogance, and independent character led him into many squabbles with his fellow-playwrights, who took the usual means of retaliation by caricaturing and ridiculing each other in their plays. Dekker and Marston for some reason fell under the lash of Jonson in The Poetaster (1601), and Jonson is made their butt in Satiro-mastix, or the Untrussing of the Humorous Poet. As Marston dedicated The Malcontent to Jonson in 1604, and the three are found collaborating in The Phoenix and the Turtle, we may hope that the quarrel was just the outcome of a little passing professional jealousy. Cynthia's Revels (1600), another satirical play, roused society against him.

While living in the house of Lord D'Aubigny, Jonson was writing his first tragedy, Sejanus, which he dedicated to his noble patron. It was acted at the Globe Theatre in 1603, but not printed till the following year with a preface declaring that "It is not the same with that acted on the public stage, wherein a second hand had a good share."

Two years later the poet again suffers imprisonment. In company with Chapman and Marston, Eastward Ho was produced, and in it, as the Scots thought, some uncomplimentary remarks were made on them and their country. The authors were threatened with the loss of their ears and noses, but this indignity was spared them, and on their release, without trial, Jonson gave a supper party. So few allusions to Jonson's parents are made throughout his life that it may be interesting to quote a passage from the Conversations: "At the midst of the feast his old Mother dranke to him, and shew him a paper which she had (if the sentence had taken execution) to have mixed in the prison among his drinke, which was full of lustie strong poison, and that as she was no churle, she told, she minded first to have drunk of it herself."

With the accession of James I began a long series of Court entertainments, and the poet was in great request by the Royal Family and various noblemen and others in their pageants to welcome the new Sovereign. The Satyr was given at Althorp on June 3, 1603, before the Queen and Prince Henry, The Pirates, at the Highgate residence of Sir William Cornwallis, and the first masque, Blacknesse, at Whitehall on Twelfth Night, 1605. The manuscript of which, dedicated to the Queen and signed by Jonson, is now in the British Museum.

A quarrel with Inigo Jones, the famous Court architect, who was also responsible for the stage properties and scenery for the Court masques, resulted in the temporary withdrawal of Royal patronage from Jonson. Both these men were masters and masterful, each wanted his own way, and the result seems to have been a fulfilment of the old adage that "a little dog at home can keep a big dog out."

Nevertheless Jonson's fame reached its height about the year 1611. With all his activity in Court circles he had been equally busy on behalf of the playgoing public, and his more lasting work was produced about this period: Volpone, or the Fox was staged at the Globe in 1605; Epicene, or the Silent Woman in 1609, by the Children of Her Majesty's Revels, The Alchemist (1610), Catalina (1611), and The Devil is an Ass (1616), by the King's Men; Bartholomew Fair in 1614. Then came a break; necessity compelled Jonson to return to the stage in 1625, with the Staple of News, and again in 1629 with The New Inn, the latter did not survive a first performance—"not acted," Jonson says, "but negligently played" and "most squeamishly beheld and censured"—so he relieved his feelings in the celebrated Ode to Himself.

"Come leave the loathed stage,
And the more loathsome age,
Where pride and impudence, in faction knit,
Usurp the chair of wit!
Indicting and arraigning every day,
Something they call a play.
Let their fastidious, vain
Commission of the brain
Run on and rage, sweat, censure, and condemn,
They were not made for thee, less thou for them."

For a time Jonson had acted as secretary to Sir Walter Raleigh and tutor to his son, journeying with them to Paris in 1612, where, according to Drummond, there were occasions when tutor and pupil might have been more profitably employed.

In 1618 Jonson started upon his famous pedestrian feat from London to Scotland, and on reaching Edinburgh was given a hearty welcome by the Literary Society of that city; on he went to Hawthornden and remained as the guest of William Drummond for three weeks. Drummond kept some notes of their conversations with remarks not always flattering to his guest, which he published later. On January 25, 1619, he left Scotland for London, where he arrived about the end of April. While in Scotland the University of Oxford honoured him by offering him an M.A. degree—formally conferred upon him on July 19, 1620, while at Oxford Jonson was the guest of Richard Corbet of Christ Church, and one of his finest epitaphs is that On Vincent Corbet, the father of his host. The following year the King promised him the reversion of Master of the Revels after the deaths of Sir George Buc and Sir John Astley. This post had always been the poet's ambition to occupy, but it is "ill luck waiting for dead men's shoes," and Sir John outlived him. King James, however, appointed him Laureate, but Jonson refused a knighthood.

One of the disasters of his life occurred between the years 1621-23, in the burning of his library, even at this time said to be one of the richest in England—a large number of his own works were lost in the conflagration—and brought forth his Ereca-tion against Vulcan.

Jonson's health began to decline in 1626; attacks of palsy and droopy became frequent, but on the death of Middleton in 1628 he was appointed Chronologer to the City with a salary of 100 marks, but it does not appear that he did any serious work in this direction. The salary was withdrawn in 1631, but restored in 1634 by wish of the King. A poem to King Charles in 1630, in which he suggests that his salary as Laureate should be raised from marks to pounds had the desired effect, with the addition of a tierce of canary wine, of which Jonson was very fond.

During the suspension of his salary as Chronologer, the poet was in very needy circumstances, and a piteous letter was sent to the Duke of Newcastle in which he asked his patron to "succour my present necessities"—"I have neither fortune to repay," wrote Jonson, "nor security to engage that will be taken." Many friends came to his assistance, among whom he numbered the Earl of Pembroke, who had been in the habit of sending him £20 annually "to buy books," the Sidneys of Penshurst, Lord D'Aubigny, with whom he had resided for some years, and Sir Walter Raleigh, who is said to have founded the famous club at the Mermaid Tavern.

How regularly could the portly figure of Jonson, laughingly referred to as the "Tun of Heidelberg," be seen wending his way along Fleet Street to Cheapside, then rounding the corner into Bread Street where the famous Mermaid was situated, there to join that Bohemian company of playwrights and statesmen, bishops and nobles, poets and prosemen, who were proud to be "sealed of the tribe of Ben," and the younger among them whom he called his "sons"—how he loved and commemorates them!

Shakespeare, "Soul of the age . . . thou art a monument without a tomb" Beaumont, "How I do love thee" and "am not worthy the least indulgent thought thy pen drops forth!" Donne, "the delight of Phoebus and each Muse, Who, to thy one, all other brains refuse" Then there is Herrick's commendation of the master where each verse of his "out-did the frolic wine;" and Beaumont's well-known lines:

"What things have we seen
Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been
So nimble and so full of subtle flame
As if that every one from whom they came
Had meant to put his whole wit into a jest,
And had resolved to live a fool the rest
Of his dull life"

During the last few years of his life he was confined to the house with ever recurring attacks of palsy and droopy that made it difficult for him to move about, and death must have come as a relief to the tired body as it did on August 6, 1637, and a final resting-place found for it in the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey. By some misfortune, though money had been given to raise a monument to his memory, this was not done, and it was left for a stranger to inscribe "O Rare Ben Jonson" on the bas-relief placed upon the Abbey Wall.

HIS WRITINGS

The first thing to realise about his work is that in his sharp and incisive criticism of famous contemporaries, he was actuated entirely by a well-considered theory of the drama, quite opposed to the methods of Shakespeare and other exponents of the romantic drama. There was never any petty spite or jealousy in his criticisms; sharply as he chided the great Master on occasion, no other has left a more splendid or more memorable tribute to his genius than he, in declaring that his works were "not of an age, but for all time."

There is, despite all the natural contentiousness of the man, an invincible honesty, a fine generosity, that make his criticism especially valuable.

With his non-dramatic writings we are concerned elsewhere. It is sufficient there to emphasize the strength and clarity of his prose, the charm and grace of much of his verse. Unlike Marlowe, he leaned towards classic rather than romantic methods. Unlike Shakespeare, he deals with human life in sections rather than as a whole, being content to satirise manners rather than to paint men and women. In his drama, he is a moralist first and foremost, afterwards the artist. But his scope is very wide, comprising tragedies, comedies, masques, and farces.

His masques, replete in folk-lore learning, and classical imagery, are enlivened with gay interludes and pretty flights of fancy, for which he has less scope in the orthodox drama. If some of his contemporaries excelled him, as certainly they did in lyric sweetness and abandon, or displayed a more delicate invention on the purely imaginative side, no other writer of the time equalled, much less excelled him, in the all-round excellence of the masques, in the piquant blend of scholastic learning and fantastic frippery, indeed the famous Court masque of Jacobean times owes its form and comeliness largely to his indefatigable labours. Akin to the Masques, is the unfinished Pastoral, The Sad Shepherd, written with a lightness of touch, and delightful abandonment, that comes on the reader as a surprise.

We may regard the comedies and tragedies under three aspects, especially characteristic of Jonson.

(1) His Technical Skill as a Playwright

When first he threw in his lot with the playwrights, he frankly followed the current demand for romantic drama, showing no small skill in adopting the full-blooded romantic manner. Even here, in the early years of apprenticeship, he displayed vigorous power of imagination, but romantic drama was not characteristically expressive of the man's personality. After his dismissal by the theatrical manager, Henslowe, a rival manager—William Shakespeare—came forward and helped him to put on his comedy, Every Man in His Humour. Here Jonson for the first time struck the anti-romantic note, and sought to establish a satirical comedy of manners framed in a definite plan. He saw clearly enough that despite the splendid, exuberant power of the Shakespearean drama, there was no underlying theory or convention, and that its tendency to become formless and chaotic would be a serious matter without the genius of such men as Shakespeare to guide and control.

In the prologue to Every Man in His Humour, Jonson puts forward his plan of reform, electing to "sport with human follies, not with crimes." The word "humour," as used by Jonson, implied some oddity of disposition, especially with regard to the manners of the day.

The invention of Bobadil is one of his happiest; and the whole play, while clear and coherent in its framework, is alive with cosmic power, happy and not too heavily underlined.

Jonson made quite clear how he disapproved of the happy-go-lucky selection of plots. He would have none of those who "waylay all the old books they can hear of, in print or otherwise, to farce their scenes withal . . . as if their imagination lived wholly upon another man's trencher." He came to the making of comedies with a fine knowledge of Old English Literature, and of the classics, and with an intimate acquaintance of London life in all its guises.

In the comedies that follow Every Man out of His Humour, and Cynthia's Revels, the same care for clearness and definition are observed; but the moral aim of the satirist is somewhat too obvious; and the machinery creaks at times rather painfully.

His next ventures are in the direction of tragedy—of these Sejanus and Catiline are the most noteworthy. Here he tried to carry out the same plan previously attempted in comedy. He wished to revert to the severe conventions of the classic drama. But the scholar trips up the artist this time, just as the moralist did before. In his endeavour to be genuinely historical, and to avoid all irrelevance, he becomes dull and pedantic.

Not that Sejanus and Catiline are complete failures. If the endeavour to preserve, so far as practicable, the dramatic unities (in Sejanus he gives up unity of Time) leads to dullness, and if his avoidance of comic contrasts found no compensating advantage in eloquent diction, yet the characterisation is always thoughtful and well considered, and at times arresting. But whatever the merits of these plays may be, they pale beside the rich power of the comedies that followed: Volpone, The Silent Woman, and The Alchemist.

Volpone, or the Fox, is a study in avarice.

Volpone is no common miser, he glories less in the hoarding of his treasure than in its acquisition; and he revels in the hypocrisies of those who are ever ready to fawn upon the rich man, fooling them to the top of their bent. The play is extraordinarily clever, and brilliantly constructed. Its defects lie in a certain hardness, and in lack of humanity. It deals relentlessly with the most contemptible qualities in human nature, and the bitterness of its cynical humour leaves an unpleasant taste in the mouth.

The Silent Woman is written in more genial vein. Here is comedy, with a dash of farce, and Coleridge considered it the most entertaining of the author's comedies. It is certainly highly amusing, and in point of construction fully as admirable as Volpone.

The story deals with a disagreeable old man, Morose, who has a special hatred of noise. Upon him is played a trick by his nephew, who introduces a boy dressed up as a woman, with a special gift for silence. This trait naturally commends itself to Morose, who marries Epicene and finds, after the wedding, that his wife is a perfect tornado of noise.

That "she" is also a boy, is speedily disclosed by the nephew, and the farcical denouement is accomplished with many ingenious turns and boundless vivacity. The characters one and all are vigorously and amusingly drawn.

The Alchemist gives us another and less farcical study in trickery, though there is abundant merriment in it, while there are excellent sketches of humbugs and gulls of every variety, one of the most successful being Sir Epicure Mammon. This play, like Volpone, is written in blank verse—prose being used in The Silent Woman—and the style throughout is animated and flexible, well suited to the subject matter.

For sheer fun and high spirits, however, Bartholomew Fair must take the first place. Inferior to the other comedies in constructive skill, and overdrawn in parts, it is an amazingly vivid and many-sided presentment of contemporary manners. The stage is crowded with amusing figures, the mountebank, the fussy politician, the "Ebenezer Suggs" of the day, and many others.

After an interval of nine years, came The Staple of News, modelled on Aristophanic lines, but lacking in the constructive power and comic invention of the earlier work, and those that followed show even a greater falling off; "mere dialogues" Dryden called them not unfairly. Indeed, Jonson was played out.

(2) His Gift of Detailed Observation

In treating of Jonson's craftsmanship, something has been said of this visualising power. Here is the most remarkable side of his power as a writer for the stage. Whether he is dealing with clear-cut characters or clear-cut parteees, he is equally happy. He has an eye for external peculiarities, unequalled by any of our men of letters save Smollett and Dickens. He points to the men of his day full of whims and cranks:

"When some one peculiar quality
Doth so possess a man that it doth draw
All his affects, his spirits and his power
In their confusions all to run one way;
This may be truly said to be a humour."¹

Note the touches with which he builds up Volpone's character:

"I gain
No common way; I use no trade, no venture;
Wound no Earth with ploughshares, fat no beasts
To feed the ehambles, have no mills for iron,
Oil, corn, or men to grind them into powder."

There is something of Dickens' enjoyment in the comic invention with which he overlays his figures. One recalls Zerk of the Land Busy in Bartholomew Fair, who pretended to be so greatly shocked by the gaudies, yet is discovered "fast by the teeth in the cold turney pie . . . with a great white loaf on his left hand and a glass of Malmsey on his right." Later on he moralises (à la Pecksniff at 'Todgers') about his food, "We may be religious in the minds of the profane, so it be eaten with a reformed mouth." He calls the fair "the shop of Satan," yet is surprisingly familiar with its devious ways. Ultimately he gets put in the stocks.

There is no more elaborate painter of London life than Jonson. Shakespeare paints with a bigger brush, but for detailed effects Jonson is supreme. He satirises vice with the vigour of Molière, but not with his adroitness. Had he lashed less furiously he might have kept a better edge on his rapier. Truly did a friend once say to him, "You write with a porcupine quill dipped into too much gall."

Yet this over emphasis was certainly not due to any blunted observation. His similes are neat and happy. For instance, this of an ill-bred man:

"He minds
A courtsey no more than London Bridge
Which arch was mended last."

And when he keeps his didacticism in check, as in that amusing farce, Bartholomew Fair, his observant humour finds abundant scope.

(3) His Graceful Fancy

In imaginative intensity Jonson is inferior not only to Shakespeare, but to Marlowe, Webster, Beaumont and Fletcher, and other contemporaries. But he had a graceful fancy which showed to rich advantage in the Masques; and here and there it lightens up the Comedies with luminous flashes.

His last work, The Sad Shepherd, contains some of his pleasantest conceits. The Shepherd laments his charming Earine, spring had died with her, and since then earth has borne but thorns:

"Here she was wont to go, and here, and here,
Just where those daisies, pinks, and violets grow;
The world may find the spring by following her. . ."

His lyrics have sweetness and abundant grace. As instances, there are the songs, "O do not wanton with those eyes," the "Celia" cycle, and the familiar paraphrase from Philstrates, "Drink to me only."

Yet with all these qualities, with an exuberant and graceful fancy, with his ripe scholarship, his clear visualising power, his satiric faculty, the plays of Jonson leave in the reader's mind a certain coldness. We feel something is lacking. We admire, but are not carried away; our minds are stimulated but the emotions are rarely gripped. We realise the greatness of the man, but—What then is the matter? The matter seems to be that his mind and imagination never fused with the white heat of creative passion as was the case with Shakespeare. His intellect tyrannised over his art. He was too intent on proving some moral thesis, and admirable as his satire is, he was ever forgetting the artist in the moralist and riding a folly to death; spoiling a humorous character by a multiplying of comic minutiae. None the less, many of the figures, despite the touch of caricature, are alive. His vitality and observant power endow them with life, and make us believe in them—anyhow for the time being—even if they do not enshrine themselves in our memories, as do the characters of Shakespeare.

But if there are very definite limitations to Jonson's attractiveness as a dramatist, it would be hard to exaggerate the remarkable influence he exercised on the drama. His jealousy for form and coherence, his scrupulous avoidance of the weaknesses of the Romantic drama, his shrewd penetrating observation of manners, these things may be traced in the work of Beaumont and Fletcher, of Chapman, Marston, and Middleton, of Randolph and May, to mention some who profited by Jonson's methods. After the Restoration his popularity increased, and although his serious efforts failed to attract, yet his comedies held the stage for many years, and proved more to the taste of the Court than the pastoral comedies of Shakespeare.

As an influence on other forms of literature, the "humours" of Jonson are not without literary descendants in the novel of the eighteenth and early nineteenth century. They can be met in the pages of Fielding; they crowd the stories of Smollett; and Dickens, who was certainly influenced by Smollett in his earlier work, was as certainly indebted to the comic inventiveness of Jonson.

There seems a fine appropriateness about his taking the part of Bobadil in Jonson's familiar comedy

VOLPONE, OR THE FOX

Mosca, introducing VOLPONE, with a piece of plate

Mosca You still are what you were, sir. Only you Of all the rest, are he commands his love, And you do wisely to preserve it thus, With early visitation, and kind notes Of your good meaning to him, which, I know, Cannot but come most grateful. Patron 'sir! Here's signior Volpone, is come . . .

Volpone (Faintly) What say you?

Mos Sir, signior Volpone is come this morning To visit you

Volp I thank him

Mos And hath brought

A piece of antique plate, bought of St. Mark, With which he hero presents you.

Volp He is welcome

Pray him to come more often

Mos Yes

Volp What says he?

Mos He thanks you, and desires you see him often.

Volp Mosca

Mos My patron!

Volp Bring him near, where is he?

I long to feel his hand

Mos The plate is here, sir.

Volp How fare you, sir?

Volp I thank you, signior Volpone;

Where is the plate? mine eyes are bad.

Volp (Pushing it into his hands) I'm sorry To see you still thus weak

Mos That he's not weaker (Aside)

Volp You're too munificent.

Volp No, sir, would to heaven,

I could as well give health to you, as that plate!

Volp You give, sir, what you can, I thank you Your love

Hath taste in this, and shall not be unanswer'd

I pray you see me often.

Volp Yes, I shall, sir.

Volp. Be not far from me

Mos Do you observe that, sir?

Volp Harken unto me still, it will concern you

Mos You are a happy man, sir, know your good.

Volp. I cannot now last long—

Mos. You are his heir, sir

Volp. Am I?

Volp I feel me going; Uh! uh! uh! uh! I'm sailing to my port, Uh! uh! uh! uh!

And I am glad I am so near my haven

Mos Alas, kind gentleman! Well, we must all

Volp But, Mosca—

Mos. Age will conquer.

Volp Pray thee, hear me:

Am I inscribed his heir for certain?

Mos. Are you?

I do beseech you, sir, you will vouchsafe To write me in your family. All my hopes Depend upon your worship. I am lost, Except the rising sun do shine on me.

Volp It shall both shine, and warm thee, Mosca

Mos. Sir,

I am a man, that hath not done your love All the worst offices, here I wear your keys, See all your coffers and your caskets lock'd, Keep the poor inventory of your jewels, Your plate and monies, am your steward, sir, Husband your goods here

Volp But am I sole heir?

Mos Without a partner, sir; confirm'd thus morning.

The wax is warm yet, and the ink scarce dry Upon the parchment

Volp Happy, happy, me!

By what good chance, sweet Mosca?

Mos. Your desert, sir;

I know no second cause.

Volp Thy modesty

Is not to know it, well, we shall requite it

Mos He ever liked your course, sir; that first took him,

I oft have heard him say, how he admired Men of your large profession, that could speak To every cause, and things mere contraries, Till they were hoarse again, yet all the law; That, with most quick agility, could turn, And (re-) return, (could) make knots, and undo them; Give forked counsel, take provoking gold On either hand, and put it up, these men, He knew, would thrive with their humility. And, for his part, he thought he should be blest To have his heir of such a suffering spirit, So wise, so grave, of so perplex'd a tongue, And loud withal, that would not wag, nor scarce Lie still, without a fee, when every word Your worship but lets falls, is a chequing!

[Knocking without]

Who's that? one knocks; I would not have you seen, sir

And yet—pretend you came, and went in haste:

I'll fashion an excuse—and, gentle sir,

When you do come to swim in golden lard,

Up to the arms in honey, that your chin

Is borne up stiff, with fatness of the flood,

Think on your vassal, but remember me:

I have not been your worst of clients

Volp Mosca!

Mos. When will you have your inventory brought, sir?

Or see a copy of the will?—Anon!

I'll bring them to you, sir. Away, be gone

Put business in your face

[Exit VOLPONE.]

Volp (Springing up) Excellent Mosca!

Come hither, let me kiss thee.

Mos. Keep you still, sir.

Here is Corbaccio

Volp Set the plate away:

The vulture's gone, and the old raven's come!

Mos. Botake you to your silence, and your sleep Stand there and multiply [Putting the plate to the rest.]

Now, shall we see

A wretch who is indeed more impotent

Than this can feign to be, yet hopes to hop

Over his grave—

Enter CORBACCIO.

Signior Corbaccio!

You're very welcome, sir!

1 Volpone, or The Fox, Act I.

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR

RABBI BUSY rushes in

Busy. Down with Dagon ! down with Dagon ! 'tis I, I will no longer endure your profanations.

Leath. What mean you, sir ?

Busy. I will remove Dagon there, I say, that idol, that heathenish idol that remains, as I may say, a beam, a very beam—not a beam of the sun, nor a beam of the moon, nor the beam of a balance, neither a house-beam, nor a weaver's beam, but a beam in the eye, in the eye of the brethren, a very great beam, an exceeding great beam ; such as are your stage players, rimers, and morrice-dancers who have walked hand in hand, in contempt of the brethren, and the cause ; and been born out by instruments of no mean countenance.

Leath. Sir, I present nothing but what is licensed by authority.

Busy. Thou art all licence, even licentiousness itself, Shimei !

Leath. I have the master of the revels' hand for't, sir.

Busy. The master of the rebels' hand thou hast. Satan's ! hold thy peace, thy sourrility, shut up thy mouth, thy profession is damnable, and in pleading for it thou dost plead for Baal ! I have long opened my mouth wide, and gaped, I have gaped as the oyster for the tide, after thy destruction, but cannot compass it by suit or dispute, so that I look for a bickering ere long, and then a battle.

Knock. Good Banbury vapours !

Cokes. Friend, you'd have an ill match on't, if you bicker with him here, though he be no man of the fist, he has friends that will to cuffs for him. Numps, will not you take our side ?

Edg. Sir, it shall not need ; in my mind he offers him a fairer course, to end it by disputation : hast thou nothing to say for thyself, in defence of thy quality ?

Leath. Faith, sir, I am not well-studied in these controversies, between the hypocrites and us. But here's one of my motion, puppet Dionysius, shall undertake him, and I'll venture the cause on't.

Cokes. Who, my hobby-horse ! will he dispute with him ?

Leath. Yes, sir, and make a hobby-ass of him, I hope.

Cokes. That's excellent ! indeed he looks like the best scholar of them all. Come, sir, you must be as good as your word now.

Busy. I will not fear to make my spirit and gifts known, assist me zeal, fill me, fill me, that is, make me full !

Winw. What a desperate, profane wretch is this ! Is there any ignorance or impudence like his, to call his zeal to fill him against a puppet ?

Quar. I know no fitter match than a puppet to combat with an hypocrite !

Busy. First, I say unto thee, idol, thou hast no calling.

Dion. You lie, I am called Dionysius.

Leath. The motion says, you lie, he is call'd Dionysius in the matter, and to that calling he answers.

Busy. I mean no vocation, idol, no present lawful calling.

Dion. Is yours a lawful calling ?

Leath. The motion asketh if yours be a lawful calling ?

Busy. Yes, mine is of the spirit.

Dion. Then idol is a lawful calling.

Leath. He says, then idol is a lawful calling, for you call'd him idol, and your calling is of the spirit.

Cokes. Well disputed, hobby-horse.

Busy. Take not part with the wicked, young gallant : he neigheth and hummeth ; all is but hynnyng sophistry. I call him idol again ; yet, I say, his calling, his profession is profane, it is profane, idol.

Dion. It is not profane !

Leath. It is not profane, he says.

Busy. It is profane.

Dion. It is not profane.

Busy. It is profane.

Dion. It is not profane.

Leath. Well said, confute him with Not, still. You cannot bear him down with your base noise, sir.

Busy. Nor he me, with his treble creaking, though he creak like the chariot wheels of Satan ; I am zealous for the cause——

Leath. As a dog for a bone.

Busy. And I say, it is profane, as being the page of Pride, and the waiting-woman of Vanity.

Dion. Yea ! what say you to your tire-women, then ?

Leath. Good.

Dion. Or feather-makers in the Friars, that are of your fashion of fast ? are not they with their perukes, and their puffs, their fans, and their huffs, as much pages of Pride, and waiters upon Vanity ? What say you, what say you, what say you ?

Busy. I will not answer for them.

Dion. Because you cannot, because you cannot. Is a bugle-maker a lawful calling ? Or the confection-makers ? such you have there, or your French jashoner ? you would have all the sin within yourselves, would you not, would you not ?

Busy. No, Dagon.

Dion. What then, Dagonet ? is a puppet worse than these ?

Busy. Yes, and my main argument against you is, that you are an abomination ; for the male, among you, putteth on the apparel of the female, and the female of the male.

Dion. You lie, you lie, you lie abominably.

Cokes. Good, by my troth, he has given him the lie thrice.

Dion. It is your old stale argument against the players, but it will not hold against the puppets, for we have neither male nor female amongst us. And that thou may'st see, if thou wilt, like a malicious purblind zeal as thou art.

Edg. By my faith, there he has answered you, friend, a plain demonstration.

Dion. Nay, I'll prove, against e'er a Rabbini of them all, that my standing is as lawful as his, that I speak by inspiration, as well as he, that I have as little to do with learning as he ; and do scorn her helps as much as he.

Busy. I am confuted, the cause hath failed me.

Dion. Then be converted, be converted.

Leath. Be converted, I pray you, and let the play go on.

Busy. Let it go on, for I am changed, and will become a beholder with you.

TO CELIA

Come, my Celia, let us prove,
While we may, the sports of love ;
Time will not be ours for ever,
He at length our good will sever.
Spend not then his gifts in vain.
Suns that set, may rise again ;
But if once we lose this light,
'Tis with us perpetual night
Why should we defer our joys !
Fame and renown are but toys.
Cannot we delude the eyes
Of a few poor household spies ;
Or his easier ears beguile,
So removed by our wile ?
'Tis no sin love's fruit to steal,
But the sweet theft to reveal :
To be taken, to be seen,
These have crimes accounted been.

Kiss me, sweet ; the wary lover
Can your favours keep, and cover,
When the common courting ray
All your bounties will betray
Kiss again, no creature comes
Kiss, and score up wealthy sums
On my lips thus hardly sundred,
While you breathe. First give a hundred,
Then a thousand, then another
Hundred, then unto the other
Add a thousand, and so more ;
Till you equal with the store,
All the grass that Rumney yields,
Or the sands in Chelsea fields.

Or the drops in silver Thames,
Or the stars that gild his streams,
In the silent summer-nights,
When youths ply their sto'n delights ;
That the curious may not know
How to tell 'em as they flow,
And the envious, when they find
What their number is, be pined.

ECHO'S SONG

Slow, slow, fresh fount, keep time with my salt tears ;
Yet, slower, yet ; O faintly, gentle springs :
Lest to the heavy part the music bears,
Woe weeps out her division, when she sings.
 Droop herbs and flowers,
 Fall grief in showers,
 Our beauties are not ours
 O, I could stall,

Like melting snow upon some craggy hill,
 Drop, drop, drop, drop,
Since nature's pride is now a wither'd daffodill

A SONG

Oh do not wanton with those eyes,
 Lest I be sick with seeing ;
Nor cast them down, but let them rise,
 Lest shame destroy their being.
Oh be not angry with those fires,
 For then their threats will kill me ;
Nor look too kind on my desires,
 For then my hopes will spill me.
Oh do not steep them in thy tears,
 For so will sorrow stay me ;
Nor spread them as distract with fears ;
 Mine own enough betray me.

- (b) POST-SHAKESPEAREAN DRAMATISTS (from Chapman to Shirley): Chapman—Marston—Dekker—Randolph—Rowley—Cockaine—Glapthorne—Davenant—Nabbes—Webster—Middleton—Heywood—Day—Tourneur—Massinger—Ford—Shirley.

POST-SHAKESPEAREAN DRAMA

CONTEMPORARY with Jonson is GEORGE CHAPMAN, a native of Hertfordshire, born near Hitchin in 1559, and educated at both Oxford and Cambridge ; after which it is said he joined some theatrical company touring Germany. On his return he became the protégé of Prince Henry, oldest son of James I, his patrons also including Somerset, and the Earl of Essex, to whom he dedicated some of his plays.

His principal dramatic works are The Blind Beggar of Alexandria (1596), two comedies, All Fools' (1599) and The Gentleman Usher ; two French tragedies, Bussy D'Ambois (1613) and The Admiral of France ; was a great collaborator with the well-known dramatists of his day, including Jonson, and the scholarly translator of the Iliad (1611), the Odyssey (1616), the Hymns (1624), and contributions from Hesiod, Juvenal, and Petrarch. He died in 1634.

Chapman is best known to the general reader by the striking tribute of Keats, while Swinburne's eloquent eulogy did much to call attention to his outstanding merit as a writer. Certainly, he is among the great men of the time, and whether as translator, as a writer of comedies, or as a verse maker, he claims our admiration. He is one of the collaborators in one of the very best comedies of the time, Eastward Ho, Jonson and Marston being also concerned in it. Judging from what we know of Marston's strongly coloured work, we should not rate his intervention as at all considerable ; and despite Jonson's satirical strength, there is an alertness and gaiety about it which is certainly not characteristic of "Rare Ben." On the other hand it shows considerable affinity with his own comedy, All Fools', and the inference that the capital merits of Eastward Ho are Chapman's, would not seem to be unfair.

His work, however, is distinctly uneven, and though his comedies are better than his tragedies, and remarkably able in many respects, it is as a translator that he will probably be best remembered.

His translation of Homer is recognised by scholars to be one of the very best in the language ; this is especially so as regards the Iliad, where he uses the fourteener, a prosodic form far closer to the rhythmic sweep of the original than the somewhat uninspiring heroic couplet used in the Odyssey.

Like Jonson, Chapman is sometimes embarrassed as an artist by his learning, and he has none of that play of fancy which is one of Jonson's most agreeable attributes as a writer. For this reason he is unable often—to use Swinburne's expressive phrase—"To clear his mouth of pebbles and his brow of fog." Yet when he did get rid of the pebbles and the mist, there were few stronger and more original forces with which to reckon.

JOHN MARSTON was born at Coventry about the year 1575, and took his degree at Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1594. His mother was the daughter of an Italian surgeon, his father a lawyer who wished his son to follow the same profession ; Marston, however, not finding legal studies particularly to his liking, turned to literature and published a number of satires in 1598, among them The Scourge of Villany, and The Metamorphosis of Pygmalion's Image being so distasteful to the church people that they were publicly burned by order of Archbishop Whitgift in 1599, and as there is in the same year an entry in Henslowe's Diary of a loan on September 28, "of forty shillings to the new poet Mr Maxton" (probably Marston), we may infer that things were not very prosperous with him, at the beginning of his career at all events.

For about eight years Marston followed play-writing as a profession, and in 1607 decided that he would change it for a more serious occupation, took Orders and was preferred to the living of Christchurch, Hampshire, where he remained fifteen years. Previous to this Marston had married the daughter of the Rev William Wilkes, chaplain to James I, and Jonson used to jestingly remark that "Marston wrote his father-in-law's preachings, and his father-in-law the comedies."

Three years after he resigned the living of Christchurch he died in London, and is buried in the Temple Church, beside his father.

Marston is essentially a tragic writer, though he made a reputation in his day as a writer of vigorous satires. Some of his modern critics find insincerity in his work, and it is probable that his heart was not in much that he wrote; but he was a man of brilliant parts and real poetic power, marred by an unfortunate taste for "Erotes vein . . . the tyrant's vein," so nicely put off in Shakespeare's lines. He is a writer who lends himself readily to effective extracts; for his work, though unequal, rises at times to heights of striking pathos, and illuminating irony.

Of his plays, Antonio and Mellida is perhaps the best, while The Revenge of Antonio, Antonio and Mellida, and The Malcontent, will furnish capital illustrations of his satirical and tragic powers.

We come now to THOMAS DEKKER, of whom we know less as a man than of any other remarkable man of the time, but whose genius, so highly praised by Lamb, few would be disposed to question.

Dekker was one of the hand-to-mouth writers of the age, one of the company of brilliant vagabonds who lived literally on their wits, and who wrought their comedies and tragedies out of the stuff of their own lives.

Of his prose, mention has been made elsewhere.

He was a frequent collaborator—more from need than from inclination one would wager—but his individual characterisations are clearly marked, and unmistakable. He was first and foremost a poet, with a poet's intuition of life, and in neither comedy nor tragedy is there that objective realism we find in Jonson and his followers. In his lighter plays he interprets the frailties and weaknesses of mankind with something of Shakespeare's imaginative observation, not with the incisive satire of Jonson; in his more serious plays, he shows the poet's insight into character, and his women are vital and expressive. Last, but not least, he was a singer of rare sweetness and delicacy, "Poetry enough for anything," as Lamb significantly and truly said of him.

THOMAS RANDOLPH, also a follower of Ben Jonson, was born at Nownham-cum-Badby in Northants, in 1605, and educated at Westminster and Cambridge; after a life of dissipation in London, his health failed, as did his pecuniary resources, and at the age of thirty he died of small-pox.

Notwithstanding his comparatively early death, Randolph had written six plays, Aristippus (1620) and The Conceited Pedlar, published in 1630, The Jealous Lovers in 1632, The Muses' Looking Glass, and Amyntas appearing after his death in 1638, in company with a volume of Poems.

Randolph was a clever and showy writer, with a taste for verse as well as for the drama, and had a distinct gift for comedy writing. His best work, probably, is The Muses' Looking Glass, which is a brilliant and spirited comedy set in the framework of the Morality Play.

Good also, in its way, is the pleasant pastoral, Amyntas.

It is less as an original force than as a talented and well-read adaptor and imitator, that Randolph will be remembered. Jonson's influence in his work is strong, and his special abilities lay certainly in the direction of the Jonsonian drama.

The last name of particular note is WILLIAM ROWLEY. He is best known as the collaborator of Fletcher, Middleton, Massinger, Webster, and Dekker, having a special knack of comic construction. He was in great request for amusing subplots, and excelled in depicting the humours of low life. In the work for which he is supposed to be solely responsible, such as A Match at Midnight, he shows the same comic power, together with a certain constructive neatness and homeliness of situation.

WILLIAM ROWLEY (c. 1585–c. 1642) was a member of the Queen's company of players in 1610, as well as playwright. In addition to the comedies—A New Wonder (1632), All's Lost by Lust, and A Match at Midnight (1633), A Shoemaker is a Gentleman (1638)—he also wrote an amusing picture of London life, A Search for Money, published in 1709.

Among the lesser lights of the day are Sir ASTON COCKAINE, a follower in the Jonsonian train, with a faculty for farcical situations. HENRY GLAPTHORNE, the friend of Lovelace, enjoyed some vogue as a writer of tragedy and comedy, and was passably good in both, without excelling in either. One of his plays which caught the ear of the public was a dramatised version of the Arcadia: Argalus and Parthena. Davenant helped to produce a remarkable change in the nature of the English drama, of which mention is made elsewhere; this fact is of more importance than the actual dramatic work accomplished by him—work, fair in quality of workmanship, though marred by the halting verse THOMAS NABBS, and DAVENPORT, both of whom belong to the Jonsonian school, did good work in comedy; the Microcosmus (1634) of Thomas Nabbes (a semi-masque), and the City's Night Cap of Davenport, may be particularised. A notable point about the work of Nabbes, is that he rises above the dirty humour that too often served for light relief in the drama of the day. There is a wholesome freshness about his work; and had his powers as an artist been higher, he would undoubtedly have taken a distinguished position among the playwrights of the day.

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER

From 1607 to 1613, these "twin souls of the drama" lived together a bachelor life in an old house on the Bankside, within easy reach of the theatres: they possessed all things in common, and shared even 'their clothes and cloaks between them.' This happy state of affairs lasted until Beaumont married an heiress and set up an establishment of his own.

We are told by a contemporary that there was "a wonderful consimilitude of phensy" between Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher, which caused that "dearness of friendship between them"; and also that "it was Mr. Beaumont's business to correct the superfluities of Mr. Fletcher's wit."

FRANCIS BEAUMONT, born at Grace Dieu in Leicestershire (c. 1584), was the son of a Judge of Common Pleas, and educated at Pembroke College (then known as Broadgates Hall), Oxford; here he remained till the death of his father in 1598, when he left suddenly without taking a degree. With the intention of following his father's profession he was entered at the Inner Temple in 1600, but the hilarious circle that frequented The Mermaid, The Sun, or the Triple Tun, had greater attractions for him than the dusty tomes of the Temple Library and the solemn company of the Common Room.

In 1602 he appears as the author of a poem, The Metamorphosis of Tobacco, which certainly reeks more of the Mermaid than the Temple; and in the following year with Salamacus and Hermaphroditus, though Beaumont's authorship of the latter has been questioned. After this he commenced writing for the stage in collaboration with Fletcher and other well-known dramatists. Several of Jonson's plays were produced with commendatory poems by Beaumont, notably Volpone, The Silent Woman, and Cataline, and it is thought that Beaumont's may have been the "second hand" that Jonson speaks of in the preface to Sejanus.

His last work was a masque for the Benchers of Gray's Inn on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth to the Elector Palatine; about the same time his own marriage took place to Ursula, daughter and co-heiress of Henry Isley, of Sundridge, Kent, unfortunately their happiness was of short duration. In 1616, at the age of twenty-eight, Beaumont died and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He left one baby daughter Elizabeth, and another, Frances, was born after his death.

JOHN FLETCHER, who was five years Beaumont's senior, was born at Rye in Sussex in 1570, and the son of the Dr Richard Fletcher, afterwards Bishop of London, who thrust his unwelcome religious ministrations upon the ill-fated Mary Stuart. As a pensioner student he entered Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where his father had formerly been president, and though showing signs of great scholarship and brilliance, there is no record of his taking a degree. In 1593 his father died, somewhat embarrassed in circumstances, and had but a few books to leave to be divided between his two sons, Nathaniel and John.

After his brilliant career as a dramatist, whether alone or in company with Beaumont and others, he was taken suddenly ill and died, it is said of the Plague, and was buried on August 29, 1625, in St Saviour's Church, Southwark, close to the Bankside where he and his friend had lived their early life together.

In all, about fifty-two plays are assigned to these dramatists, alone and in collaboration. Of these it has been somewhat difficult to define those that can be said with certainty to have been their individual work; the latest division of the principle plays, after much research by scholarly critics,¹ is given as follows:

BEAUMONT—The Woman Hater (1607), The Maske of the Gentlemen of Grayes-Inne, and the Inner-Temple, 1613.

FLETCHER—The Faithfull Shepheardesse, printed before May 1610, Wit without Money, 1614; The Loyal Subject, 1618; The Mad Lover, before March 1619; The Humorous Lieutenant, 1619; Women Pleas'd, 1619 or 1620; The Pilgrim, 1621; The Wild Goose Chase, acted 1621, printed 1652; The Island Princess, 1621; A Wife for a Month, licensed May 27, 1624; Rule a Wife and have a Wife, licensed October 19, 1624, printed 1640.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER—The Knight of the Burning Pestle, acted about 1609, printed 1613; The Scornful Lady, acted 1609 or 1610, printed 1616; The Cozcomb, acted about 1610; Philaster, acted about 1610, printed 1620; The Maid's Tragedy, acted about 1611, printed 1619; A King and no King, licensed 1611, printed 1619; Cupid's Revenge, acted about 1612, printed 1615.

It is generally supposed that, in the work of collaboration, Fletcher represented the creative force, Beaumont the critical. These men have left behind a large output of dramatic work, larger than that allocated to any other dramatist. Fletcher survived Beaumont for several years, and his own work is marked by grace and charm, and a wonderful fluency that borders on prolixity. He was particularly fond of an irregularity of metre, that whilst it gives the impression often of carelessness, and lack of art, seems to have been used designedly to give flexibility and ease to the style.

Examining the joint plays, we find abundance of prose (Fletcher never favoured prose) and a bright quality of humour, quite different from the boisterous fun with which Fletcher's own plays often abound. It is quite possible that Beaumont had more imaginative power than he is often credited with, but we have insufficient data to decide the mere question of respective qualities of genius. At the most, we can but guess from internal evidence at the share of each poet in the work of collaboration. One thing is certain, they blend in their best work in the happiest way, giving the impression of a single mind—and a mind of singular breadth and intensity.

One of the finest, if not the finest of the series, is The Maid's Tragedy. The scene is placed at Rhodes. The King has made one of the Court ladies, Evadne, his mistress, though this is unknown, and he contrives a marriage between her and a young courtier, Amintor. Amintor is loath to fall in with this arrangement, as he is in love with Aspatia and she with him, but he holds it his duty to obey the King's commands. So he makes the best of it, and is unpressed at any rate by the beauty and charm of his bride, not guessing at her awful secret. No sooner is she wedded than with brutal directness she informs her husband of her liaison with the King, and warns him it must continue. Amintor, with an abjectness inconceivable to modern minds, acquiesces in this hateful arrangement. But when Evadne's brother learns of the dishonour, he vows vengeance against the King. Evadne, stirred by his anger, vows she will take the matter into her own hands, and be her own avenger. Then one night when the King has visited her, she murders him in a scene of tragic horror. Melantus seizes the palace, and is subsequently pardoned by the King's successor, but Evadne and Aspatia die.

The repentance of Evadne is not very convincing, nor is the passive futility of the virtuous Aspatia attractive. Indeed, none of the characters, save that of the brother, Melantus, hold our sympathies; and the real grip of the play lies in the poignant writing of the big situations. There is certainly astounding force and passion in the dreadful murder scene, as well as in the even more horrible scene of Amintor's disillusionment.

Philaster also strikes the tragic note, and presents a fine study in jealousy; there is passion relieved by comedy in A King and No King; but for modern readers the attractiveness of these dramatists lies in their high spirits and the good, straightforward fun which we find in such comedies as The Scornful Lady, The Spanish Curate, The Wild Goose Chase—a kind of Elizabethan version of Shaw's Man and Superman—and The Knight of the Burning Pestle, with its delightful touches of middle-class life.

Mention must be made of The Two Noble Kinsmen, in which it is supposed Shakespeare had a hand; probably not in the characterisation but in the writing, which here and there has certainly the authentic flavour. If it be not Shakespeare's, it is a wonderful imitation.

Regarding the distinctive merits of the two dramatists, it may be said that, so far as we can judge, Beaumont excels in tragic dignity, probably also in constructive power; also he shows more delicacy, more insight in his characterisation, Fletcher, on the other hand, has greater flexibility, more variety and movement, and a greater sense perhaps of stage effects. If not a great artist, he was an extremely able craftsman, and if his imagination sounds no profound depths, runs frequently into charming fancies. As a lyricist, he is among the best of his kind; with a wide range of mood, from graceful odes, "Tell me, dearest, what is love?" to the boisterous conviviality of "Sit, soldier, sit and sing."

THE KNIGHT OF THE BURNING PESTLE

Enter SPEAKER OF THE PROLOGUE

Speaker of the Prologue From all that's near the court, from all that's great, within the compass of the city-walls, we now have brought our scene—

CITIZEN leaps on the Stage.

Citizen. Hold your peace, Goodman boy!

S. of Prol. What do you mean, sir?

Cit. That you have no good meaning: this seven years there hath been plays at this house, I have observed it, you have still girds at citizens: and now you call your play "The London Merchant." Down with your title, boy! down with your title!

S. of Prol. Are you a member of the noble city?

Cit. I am.

S. of Prol. And a freeman?

Cit. Yea, and a grocer.

S. of Prol. So, grocer, then, by your sweet favour, we intend no abuse to the city.

Cit. No, sir! yes, sir! if you were not resolved to play the Jacks, what need you study for new subjects, purposely to abuse your betters? why could not you be contented, as well as others, with "The Legend of Whittington," or "The Life and Death of Sir Thomas Gresham, with the building of the Royal Exchange," or "The Story of Queen Eleanor, with the rearing of London Bridge upon woolbacks?"

S. of Prol. You seem to be an understanding man: what would you have us do, sir?

Cit. Why, present something notably in honour of the commons of the city.

S. of Prol. Why, what do you say to "The Life and Death of Fat Drake, or the Repairing of Fleet-Privies"?

Cit. I do not like that, but I will have a citizen, and he shall be of my own trade.

S. of Prol. Oh, you should have told us your mind a month since, our play is ready to begin now.

Cit. 'Tis all one for that, I will have a grocer, and he shall do admirable things.

S. of Prol. What will you have him do?

Cit. Marry, I will have him—

Wife. (Below.) Husband, husband!

Ralph. (Below.) Peace, mistress.

Wife. (Below.) Hold thy peace, Ralph, I know what I do, I warrant ye. Husband, husband!

Cit. What sayest thou, cony?

Wife. (Below.) Let him kill a lion with a pestle, husband! let him kill a lion with a pestle!

Cit. So he shall—I'll have him kill a lion with a pestle.

Wife. (Below.) Husband! shall I come up, husband?

Cit. Ay, cony.—Ralph, help your mistress this way.—Pray, gentlemen, make her a little room. I pray you, sir, lend me your hand to help up my wife: I thank you, sir.—So.

WIFE comes on the Stage.

Wife. By your leave, gentlemen all: I'm something troublesome. I'm a stranger here. I was ne'er at one of these plays, as they say before; but I should have seen Jane Shore once, and my husband hath promised me, any time this twelvemonth, to carry me to "The Bold Beauchamp," but in truth he did not. I pray you, bear with me.

Cit. Boy, let my wife and I have a couple of stools and then begin. and let the grocer do rare things.

[Stools are brought.]

S. of Prol. But, sir, we have never a boy to play him: every one hath a part already.

Wife. Husband, husband, for God's sake, let Ralph play him! Beshrew me, if I do not think he will go beyond them all.

Cit. Well remembered, wife—Come up, Ralph—I'll tell you, gentlemen; let them but lend him a suit of apparel and necessities, and, by gad, if any of them all blow wind in the tail on him, I'll be hanged.

RALPH comes on the Stage.

Wife. I pray you, youth, let him have a suit of apparel—I'll be sworn, gentlemen, my husband tells you true: he will act you sometimes at our house, that all the neighbours cry out on him: he will fetch you up a couraging part so in the garret, that we are all as feared, I warrant you, that we quake again; we'll fear our children with him, if they be never so unruly, do but cry, "Ralph comes, Ralph comes!" to them, and they'll be as quiet as lambs.—Hold up thy head, Ralph, show the gentlemen what thou canst do; speak a huffing part; I warrant you, the gentlemen will accept of it.

Cit. Do, Ralph, do.

Ralph. By Heaven, methinks, it were an easy leap to pluck bright honour from the pale-faced moon; Or dive into the bottom of the sea.

Where never fathom-line touched any ground, And pluck up drowned honour from the lake of hell.

Cit. How say you, gentlemen, is it not as I told you?

Wife. Nay, gentlemen, he hath played before, my husband says, Mucedorus, before the wardens of our company.

Cit. Ay, and he should have played Jeronimo with a shoemaker for a wager.

S. of Prol. He shall have a suit of apparel, if he will go in.

Cit. In, Ralph, in, Ralph; and set out the grocery in their kind, if thou lovest me.

[Exit RALPH.]

Wife. I warrant, our Ralph will look finely when he's dressed.

S. of Prol. But what will you have it called?

Cit. "The Grocer's Honour."

S. of Prof Methinks "The Knight of the Burning Pestle" were better.

Wife. I'll be sworn, husband, that's as good a name as can be.

Cst Let it be so—Begin, begin; my wife and I will sit down.

S. of Prof I pray you, do.

Cst. What stately music have you? you have shawms?

S. of Prof Shawms! no.

Cst No! I'm a thief, if my mind did not give me so. Ralph plays a stately part, and he must needs have shawms.

I'll be at the charge of them myself, rather than we'll be without them.

S. of Prof. So you are like to be

Cst Why, and so I will be—there's two shillings;—(gives money)—let's have the warts of Southwark, they are as rare fellows as any are in England; and that will fetch them all o'er the water with a vengeance, as if they were mad.

S. of Prof. You shall have them. Will you sit down, then?

Cst Ay—Come, wife.

Wife Sit you merry all, gentlemen; I'm bold to sit amongst you for my ease.

[CITIZEN and WIFE sit down]

S. of Prof. "From all that's near the court, from all that's great

Within the compass of the city walls,
We now have brought our scene—Fly far from hence
All private taxes, immodest phrases,
Whatever may but show like vicious;
For wicked mirth never true pleasure brings,
But honest minds are pleased with honest things"—

Thus much for what we do; but for Ralph's part you must answer for yourself.

Cst. Take you no care for Ralph; he'll discharge himself, I warrant you.

[Exit SPEAKER OF PROLOGUE.]

Wife I'faith, gentlemen, I'll give my word for Ralph.¹

THIERRY AND THEODORET

Scene—Before the Temple of Diana.

Enter THIERRY and MARTELL.

Mart Your grace is early stirring.

Thi How can he sleep,

Whose happiness is laid up in an hour
He knows comes stealing toward him?

Oh, Martell,

Is't possible the longing bride, whose wishes
Out-run her fears, can, on that day she's married,
Consume in slumbers? or his arms rust in ease,
That hears the charge, and see the honoured purchase
Ready to gild his valour? Mine is more,
A power above those passions, this day France
(France, that in want of issue withers with us,
And, like an aged rive, runs his head
Into forgotten waters) again I ransom,
And his fair course turn right this day, Thierry,
The son of France, whose manly powers like prisoners
Have been tied up and fettered, by one death,
Gives life to thousand ages; this day beauty,
The envy of the world, the pleasure, glory,
Content above the world, desire beyond it,
Are made mine own, and useful.

Mart Happy woman

That dies to do these things!

Thi But ten times happier

That lives to do the greater! Oh, Martell,
The gods have heard me now! and those that scorned me,
Mothers of many children, and blest fathers,
That see their issues like the stars unnumbered,
Their comforts more than them, shall in my praises
Now teach their infant songs, and tell their ages
From such a son of mine, or such a queen,
That chaste Ordelia brings me. Blessed marriage,
The chain that links two holy loves together!

And in the marriage more than blest Ordelia,
That comes so near the sacrament itself,
The priests doubt whether purer!

Mart Sir, you are lost.

Thi I prithee, let me be so.

Mart. The day wears;

And those that have been offering early prayers
Are now retiring homeward.

Thi Stand, and mark then.

Mart. Is it the first must suffer?

Thi The first woman.

Mart What hand shall do it, sir?

Thi This hand, Martell,

For who less dare presume to give the gods

An incense of this offering?

Mart Would I were she!

For such a way to die, and such a blessing,
Can never crown my parting.

[Two MEN pass over the Stage.]

Thi What are those?

Mart. Men, men, sir, men.

Thi The plagues of men light on 'em!

They cross my hopes like hares!

[A PRIEST from the Temple passes over Stage.]

Who's that?

Mart A priest, sir.

Thi. Would he were gail!

Mart May not these rascals serve, sir,
Well hanged and quartered?

Thi No.

Mart. Here comes a woman.

Enter ORDELIA, veiled.

Thi Stand, and behold her then.

Mart I think, a fair one.

Thi. Move not, whilst I prepare her—May her peace, (Like his whose innocence the gods are pleased with,
And offering at their altars gives his soul
Far purer than those fires), pull Heaven upon her!
You holy powers, no human spot dwell in her!
No love of any thing but you and goodness
Tie her to earth! I fear be a stranger to her,
And all weak blood's affections but thy hope
Let her bequeath to women! Hear me, Heaven!
Give her a spirit masculine and noble,
Fit for yourselves to ask and me to offer!
Oh, let her meet my blow, dole on her death;
And, as a wanton vine bows to the pruner,
That by his cutting off more may increase,
So let her fall to raise me fruit!—Hail, woman,
The happiest and the best (if thy dull will Do not abuse thy fortune) France e'er found yet!

Ord. She's more than dull, sir, less and worse than woman,

That may inherit such an infinite
As you propound, a greatness so near goodness,
And brings a will to rob her.

Thi. Tell me this, then;

Was there e'er woman yet, or may be found
That for fair fame, unspotted memory,
For virtue's sake, and only for itself-sake,
Lies or dare make a story?

Ord. Many dead, sir;

Living, I think, as many.

Thi. Say, the kingdom

May from a woman's will receive a blessing,
The king and kingdom, not a private safety,
A general blessing, lady?

Ord. A general curse
Light on her heart denies it!

Thi Full of honour,

And such examples as the former ages
Were but dim shadows of and empty figures!

Ord. You strangely stir me, sir; and were my weakness

In any other flesh but modest woman's,

You should not ask more questions. May I do it?

Thi You may; and, what is more, you must.

Ord I joy in't

Above a moderate gladness. Sir, you promise

It shall be honest !

Ths. As ever time discovered.

Ord. Let it be what it may then, what it dare,
I have a mind will hazard it.

Ths. But, hark you ;

What may that woman merit makes this blessing ?

Ord. Only her duty, sir.

Ths. 'Tis terrible !

Ord. 'Tis so much the more noble.

Ths. 'Tis full of fearful shadows.

Ord. So is sleep, sir,

Or any thing that's merely ours and mortal -
We were begotten gods else : but those fears,
Feeling but once the fires of nobler thoughts,
Fly, like the shapes of clouds we form, to nothing.

Ths. Suppose it death !

Ord. I do.

Ths. And endless parting

With all we can call ours, with all our sweetness,
With youth, strength, pleasure, people, time, nay, reason ?

For in the silent grave, no conversation,
No joyful tread of friends, no voice of lovers,
No careful father's counsel ; nothing's heard
Nor nothing is, but all oblivion,
Dust and an endless darkness : and dare you, woman,
Desire this place ?

Ord. 'Tis of all sleeps the sweetest ;
Children begin it to us, strong men seek it,
And kings from height of all their painted glories
Fall like spent exhalations to this centre ;
And those are fools that fear it, or imagine
A few unhandsome pleasures or life's profits
Can recompense this place, and mad that say it,
Till age blow out their lights, or rotten humours
Bring them dispersed to the earth.

Ths. Then you can suffer ?

Ord. As willingly as say it.

Ths. Martell, a wonder !

Here is a woman that dares die.—Yet, tell me,
Are you a wife ?

Ord. I am, sir.

Ths. And have children ?

She sighs and weeps.

Ord. Oh, none, sir !

Ths. Dare you venture,

For a poor barren praise you ne'er shall hear,
To part with these sweet hopes ?

Ord. With all but Heaven,
And yet die full of children : he that reads me,
When I am ashes, is my son in wishes,
And those chaste dames that keep my memory,
Singing my yearly requiems, are my daughters.

Ths. Then there is nothing wanting but my knowledge,
And what I must do, lady.

Ord. You are the King, sir,
And what you do I'll suffer ; and that blessing
That you desire, the gods shower on the kingdom !

Ths. Thus much before I strike, then, for I must kill you,

The gods have willed it so ; they've made the blessing
Must make France young again and me a man,
Keep up your strength still nobly.

Ord. Fear me not.

Ths. And meet death like a measure

Ord. I am steadfast.

Ths. Thou shalt be sainted, woman ; and thy tomb
Cut out in crystal, pure and good as thou art,
And on it shall be graven, every age,
Succeeding peers of France that rise by thy fall,
Till thou lie there like old and fruitful Nature,
Dar'st thou behold thy happiness ?

Ord. I dare, sir. (Pulls off her veil)

Ths. Ha ! (Lets fall his sword)

Ord. Oh, sir, you must not do it !

Ths. No, I dare not !

There is an angel keeps that paradise,
A fiery angel, friend Oh, virtue, virtue,
Ever and endless virtue !

Ord. Strike, sir, strike ! (Kneels)

And if in my poor death fair France may merit,
Give me a thousand blows ! be killing me
A thousand days !

Ths. First, let the earth be barren,
And man no more remembered ! Russ, Ordella,

The nearer to thy Maker ; and the purest (Raises her)

That ever dull flesh showed us !—Oh, my heartstrings ! [Exit]

Mart. I see you full of wonder ; therefore noblest
And truest among women, I will tell you
The end of this strange accident.

Ord. Amazement

Has so much won upon my heart, that truly
I feel myself unfit to hear. Oh, sir,
My lord has shighted me !

Mart. Oh, no, sweet lady !

Ord. Robbed me of such a glory by his pity
And most unprovident respect—

Mart. Dear lady,

It was not meant to you.

Ord. Else where the day is,
And hours distinguish time, time runs to ages,
And ages end the world, I had been spoken.

Mart. I'll tell you what it was if but your patience
Will give me hearing.

Ord. If I have transgressed,

Forgive me, sir !

Mart. Your noble lord was counselled (Grieving the barrenness between you both,
And all the kingdom with him) to seek out
A man that knew the secrets of the gods ;
He went, found such an one, and had this answer -
That, if he would have issue, on this morning,
(For this hour was prefixed him), he should kill
The first he met, being female, from the temple,
And then he should have children. The mistake
Is now too perfect, lady.

Ord. Still, 'tis I, sir,

For may this work be done by common women ?
Durst any but myself, that knew the blessing
And felt the benefit, assume this dying ?
In any other 't had been lost and nothing,
A curse and not a blessing : I was figured ;
And ehall a little fondness bar my purchase ?

Mart. Where should he then seek children ?

Ord. Where they are ;

In wombs ordained for issues ; in those beauties
That bless a marriage bed, and make it proud
With kisses that conceive and fruitful pleasures :
Mine, like a grave, burns those loyal hopes,
And to a grave it covets.

Mart. You are too good,
Too excellent, too honest Rob not us,
And those that shall hereafter seek example,
Of such inextinguishable worths in woman,
Your lord of such obedience, all of honour,
In coveting a cruelty is not yours,
A will short of your wisdom ! make not error
A tombstone of your virtues, whose fair life
Deserves a constellation ! Your lord dare not,
He cannot, ought not, must not run this hazard ;
He makes a separation Nature shakes at,
The gods deny, and everlasting Justice
Shrinks back and sheathes her sword at.

Ord. All's but talk, sir ;

I find to what I am, reserved and needful ;
And though my lord's compassion makes me poor,
And leaves me in my best use, yet a strength
Above mine own, or his dull fondness, finds me,
The gods have given it to me. [Draws a dagger]

Mart. Self-destruction ? (Holds her.)

Now all good angels bless thee ! Oh, sweet lady,
You are abused ! this is a way to shame you,
And with you all that know you, all that love you ;
To run all you build ! Would you be famous ?
Is that your end ?

Ord. I would be what I should be.

Mart. Live, and confirm the gods then ! live, and be loaden

With more than olives bear or fruitful autumn !
 Thus way you kill your merit, kill your cause,
 And him you would raise life to. Where or how Got you these bloody thoughts ? what devil durst
 Look on that angel-face, and tempt ? do you know
 What 'tis to die thus ? how you strike the stars
 And all good things above ? do you feel
 What follows a self-blood ? whither you venture,
 And to what punishment ? Excellent lady,
 Be not thus cozened, do not fool yourself !
 The priest was never his own sacrifice,
 But he that thought his hell here.

Ord I am counselled

Mart And I am glad on't ; he, I know, you dare not.

Ord I never have done yet.

Mart. Pray, take my comfort,

Was this a soul to lose ? two more such women
 Would save their sex. See, she repents and prays !
 Oh hear her, hear her ! if there be a faith
 Able to reach your mercies, she hath sent it.

Ord Now good Martell, confirm me.

Mart. I will, lady,

And every hour advise you, for I doubt
 Whether this plot be Heaven's, or hell's your mother,
 And I will find it, if it be in mankind
 To search the centre of it. In the mean time,
 I'll give you out for dead, and by yourself,
 And show the instrument ; so shall I find
 A joy that will betray her.

Ord Do what's fittest,

And I will follow you

Mart Then ever live

Both able to engross all love and give !

[Exeunt]

JOHN WEBSTER (c 1580—c. 1625) Of Webster's parentage and early life we have little record. He probably followed the trade of a tailor as a means of livelihood, for we find he was made a freeman of their Company in 1603. Previous to this, however, in 1601, he began to write for the stage, collaborating with Marston in The Malcontent, and probably with Dekker for Philip Henslowe. Of his four plays—The White Devil (1612), The Duchess of Malfi (c 1614), The Devil's Law Case (1623), and Appius and Virginia (1654)—The Duchess of Malfi has been the only one of his plays presented on the modern stage : by Samuel Phelps in 1851, and Mr William Poel, who has done so much for the Elizabethan drama, in 1892.

Webster, like Beaumont, was partial to collaboration, but there is a sufficient body of single-handed work from his pen, and it is not hard to estimate his characteristics. Those plays are The Duchess of Malfi, The White Devil, The Devil's Law Case, and Appius and Virginia. Webster's reputation rests on the first two of these, the two latter being poor and negligible. Opinions differ as to which is the better. The Duchess of Malfi would probably win on a suffrage ; but for freshness and intensity of passion, it seems to me, The White Devil is Webster's masterpiece.

In passionate vigour, Webster is inferior to Beaumont and Fletcher, but for downright imaginative beauty and pathos, Webster is unapproachable, save by Shakespeare. Take for instance this :

"I have liv'd

Riotously ill, like some that live in Court,
 And sometimes when my face was full of smiles
 Have felt the maze of conscience in my heart :
 Oft gay and honoured robes their tortures try ;
 We think cag'd birds sing when indeed they cry."

1 Thierry and Theodoret, Act iv. so. 1.

There is much pathos and beauty also in The Duchess of Malfi, especially in the scene of the murder ; though the play as a whole strikes one as less fresh in conception and more obvious in its claim upon our sympathies. Yet there are memorable lines such as :

"Cover her face, mine eyes dazzle, she died young"

And one at least excellent sketch in the villainous Bosola

Both these plays present a study in Revenge—a subject dear to the heart of the Elizabethan dramatist. In Shakespeare's hands, there is a high note of duty that often ranges our sympathies, as in the case of Hamlet, with the avenger. But with Webster as with Tourneur, revenge is rather a fever of the blood than an impulse for justice, and in The Duchess of Malfi, our sympathies are entirely on the side of the unfortunate victim.

The story of The Duchess of Malfi is drawn, as so many of Shakespeare's were, from Painter's Palace of Pleasure, and it is probable that Sidney's Arcadia, so fruitful an inspiration to many contemporaries, influenced the style and treatment of the subject.

Webster's strength as a dramatist lay in his insight into character, and his sensitive poetic imagination. In these two tragedies, he reveals himself as in no other of his work, a great dramatist, with all the great dramatist's economy of effort, and his power to grip the imagination by subtle suggestions.

THE WHITE DEVIL

Re-enter GIOVANNI

Monticello, Your son, the Prince Giovanni. See, my lords,

What hopes you store in him, this is a casket
 For both your crowns, and should be held like dear.
 Now is he apt for knowledge, therefore know,
 It is a more direct and even way
 To train to virtue those of princely blood
 By examples than by precepts, if by examples,
 Whom should he rather strive to imitate
 Than his own father ? be his pattern, then ;
 Leave him a stock of virtue that may last.
 Should fortune rend his sails and split his mast.

Branchiano, Your hand, boy : growing to a soldier ?

Giovanni, Give me a pike.

Francisco, What, practising your pike so young, fair coz ?

Giov, Suppose me one of Homer's frogs, my lord,
 Tossing my bullrush thus. Pray, sir, tell me,
 Might not a child of good discretion
 Be leader to an army ?

Franc, Yes, cousin, a young prince
 Of good discretion might.

Giov Say you so ?

Indeed, I have heard, 'tis fit a general
 Should not endanger his own person oft ;
 So that he make a noise when he's o' horseback,
 Like a Dansk drummer,—O, 'tis excellent !—
 He need not fight—methinks his horse as well
 Might lead an army for him. If I live,
 I'll charge the French foe in the very front
 Of all my troops, the foremost man.

Franc, What, what !

Giov, And will not bid my soldiers up and follow.
 But bid them follow me.

Branch, Forward, lapwing !

He flies with the shell on his head.

Franc, Pretty cousin !

Giov The first year, uncle, that I go to war,
 All prisoners that I take I will set free
 Without their ransom.

Franco. Ha, without their ransom !
 How, then, will you reward your soldiers
 That took those prisoners for you ?
Giov. Thus, my lord ;
 I'll marry them to all the wealthy widows
 That fall that year.
Fran. Why, then, the next year following,
 You'll have no men to go with you to war
Giov. Why, then, I'll press the women to the war.
 And then the men will follow.
Mont. Witty prince !
Fran. See, a good habit makes a child a man.
 Whereas a bad one makes a man a beast.
 Come, you and I are friends.
Branch. Most wisely ;
 Like bones which, broke in sunder, and well set,
 Knt the more strongly.
Fran. Call Camillo hither.

[Exit MARCELLO.]

You have received the rumour, how Count Lodowick
 Is turned a pirate ?

Branch. Yes.

Fran. We are now preparing
 Some ships to fetch him in Behold your duchess.
 We now will leave you, and expect from you
 Nothing but kind entreaty

Branch. You have charmed me !

THOMAS MIDDLETON, of gentle birth and good education, was born in London about 1570. In conjunction with William Rowley he began to write for the stage in 1599 ; he collaborated also with Webster, Munday, and Drayton, in Cæsar's Fall, for which they received the not very munificent sum of £5 paid in advance by Philip Henslowe.

For a time Middleton held the post of City Chronologer, and was in great request as a composer of speeches for special public occasions ; one of his most famous being on the occasion of the opening of the New River in 1613—probably the dramatist was related to Hugh Myddelton of New River fame.

In 1624 he got into serious trouble with his play A Game of Chess, in which he used as characters several well-known public people, both Spanish and English. The Spanish Ambassador, Gondomar, complained to King James concerning "a very scandalous comedy" that was being acted by the King's players. James, who was in no wise anxious to incur a breach with Spain, took immediate action, and commanded both author and actors to be punished. However, as they were able to prove that the play had been "seen and allowed" by the Master of the Revels, they escaped any further punishment than a severe reprimand. The Game of Chess was only running for nine days but was presented to crowded houses, and brought the sum of £1500 to the author, so we may be sure it was with regret that he was forced to withdraw it.

In 1627 Middleton died in needy circumstances, and his wife, a Miss Morbeck, daughter of a Clerk in Chancery, shortly after his death was compelled to apply to the corporation of the City for relief.

Middleton's first play was The Mayor of Quinborough (c. 1596), printed in 1681 ; A Faire Quarrell (1617), A Mad World, my Masters (1608) ; The Roaring Girl (with Dekker) 1611 ; The Old Law (with Massinger and Rowley) ; The Changeling (1623)

Middleton stands on the same level as Webster, as a dramatist of high though spasmodic, imaginative power. He has less play of fancy than Webster, less power of pathos ; but on the other hand he has a rich comedy vein, quite out of the range of Webster. Of his serious plays, the finest is The Changeling. It has that displeasing piling up of horrors that we can rarely escape from in post-Shakespearean writers, but the picture of the stormy and guilty Beatrice and of her diabolical accomplice De Flores, is drawn with extraordinary force

On the other side, he is an admirable painter of manners, a vigorous forerunner of the Restoration comedies ; he has a lively humour, skill in conducting an intrigue, and an agreeable knack of easy dialogue. As a rule, he eschews any romantic flavouring, though that he could give this, and give it well, he showed in the comedy The Spanish Gypsy, and frankly aims at amusing the spectator without troubling himself much about probabilities of plot or characterisation. Among his successful efforts are A Mad World, my Masters, 1608, Anything for a Quiet Life, A Trick to Catch the Old One, and a satire on the Puritans, The Family of Love.

Middleton did best when collaborating, Rowley's help in The Changeling seems to have called forth Middleton's finest work. The opening of the play with the characters of Beatrice and of De Flores, sketched in outline, is by Rowley ; Middleton, taking up the thread of the story in Act II, subsequently makes of these characters splendid studies. The character of De Flores, the success of which is due to the mingling imagination of the two dramatists, is a masterpiece in its way of insistent horror. Middleton never reached so high a poetic level in other of his work, any more than he produced finer comedy than is afforded by certain scenes in Women beware Women.

Regarding his work as a whole, one is struck by its great inequality, both technically and intellectually. But there is scarcely anything of his without some redeeming feature, and at times he shows astonishing powers of tragic force and ironic portraiture, while his boundless energy gives life and ease to his style, even when it may be lacking in grace and dignity.

THOMAS HEYWOOD is certainly one of the most prolific writers of the day, if not the most prolific, and boasted to having a finger in two hundred and twenty plays. Perhaps, from the fragments of his work that have come down to us, it is impossible to place him so high as Beaumont and Fletcher, Webster and Middleton at their best. But many will find him a more generally attractive writer, and he had no inconsiderable power in the domain of both comedy and tragedy.

His most remarkable work is The Woman Killed with Kindness, where the injured husband by his tolerance and tenderness strikes compunction and remorse into the heart of his successful rival, and of the wife false to her vows. The character of the husband is somewhat too weak to impress, as Heywood meant it should, but despite this flaw, the pathos of the play is undeniable, and is achieved by simple and unforced methods. His chronicle plays are frankly written to appeal to the groundlings, but when he comes to his own times as in The

Fair Maid of the West, and The English Traveller, he shows as keen an appreciation as Middleton of contemporary manners.

Heywood, if not a great dramatist, is certainly an extremely versatile one, and did well both in the chronicle play, the comedy of manners, the romantic drama, and the mythological fantasy. Where he left the most individual impress of his abilities, however, was in the play of simple domestic emotions. This side of the drama is rarely touched by other contemporary writers, and the simplicity he achieved here was a quality not sought after in an age where flamboyant qualities and coarsely flavoured humour were so greatly in request. The domestic note, however, lies implicit where not explicit in many Elizabethan dramas, its appeal was sure to a certain class; and when the racking of the Restoration was over, the novelists of the next age found how deeply it attracted the middle class, tired and sated with the extravagances of romanticism and the salacities of the comedy of manners.

Meanwhile, it is well to remember that in the sentimental domesticities where the genius of Richardson found such ample expression, Heywood had been undoubtedly a pioneer. Steele was in the theatrical line of descent, but the sentimental drama of the eighteenth century fell far below, both in popularity and excellence, the sentimental novel. The Drama, so long in the ascendant, fell then to a secondary position.

In A Woman Killed with Kindness, Heywood definitely sounded this domestic note. The drama of the home has its roots in some of the old mediæval ballads, it finds its early flowering in Arden of Feversham (1592), and A Yorkshire Tragedy (1608), where it is blended with the crude horror of the old drama of blood. Shakespeare rarely touched it, if he does so it is rather for farcical purposes as in The Taming of the Shrew, or The Merry Wives, or to illustrate the elemental passions, as in King Lear.

The phrase "to kill a wife with kindness" that gives Heywood's play its title, is taken from a well-known proverb, quoted, by the way, in The Taming of the Shrew, produced only a few years previous to Heywood's drama.

The picture of the penitent woman is drawn with power and intensity, and here, rather than in the character of the magnanimous husband, much of the compelling strength of the play may be found. The whole story is set in a vivid background of contemporary English country life, with hawking in the morning and cards at night.

Here, indeed, lay his best claim to remembrance. Elsewhere he is the skilful playwright, here the dramatist of power.

THE WOMAN KILLED WITH KINDNESS

Anne. O with what face of brass, what brow of steel,
Can you unblushing speak this to the face
Of the espoused wife of so dear a friend?
It is my husband that maintains your state,
Will you dishonour him that in your power
Hath left his whole affairs? I am his wife,
Is it to me you speak?

Wendoll. O speak no more:
For more than thus I know and have recorded

Within the red-leaved table of my heart,
Fair and of all beloved, I was not fearful
Bluntly to give my life unto your hand,
And at one hazard all my worldly means.
Go, tell your husband; he will turn me off
And I am then undone: I care not, I,
'Twas for your sake. Perchance in rage he'll kill me;
I care not, 'twas for you. Say I incur
The general name of villain through the world,
Of traitor to my friend. I care not, I,
Beggary, shame, death, scandal, and reproach
For you I'll hazard all—why, what care I?
For you I'll live and in your love I'll die.

JOHN DAY, born in 1574, the son of a Norfolk farmer, was educated at Caius College, Cambridge. Little, however, is known of him. Henslowe's Diary mentions him as collaborating with Chettle, Dekker, and Haughton, at the close of the sixteenth century. His own plays include The Isle of Gulls (1606), Law Tricks and Humour out of Breath (1608), and his more famous Parliament of Bees (1641).

Day is a writer of considerable wit and fancy, with nothing of the tragic qualities of other contemporaries discussed previously, and with no special faculty for depicting the manners of the age. His imagination is lively and romantic, and he finds the happiest expression in such quaint satirical allegories as The Parliament of Bees. His work shows some affinity with the poetical temper of Sidney's mind, and with the fantastic side of Jonson's work.

There is little deep imaginative power in his work, for he had not the courage to break away from the tradition of his time, yet there are traces of freshness of treatment, that in bolder hands might have led to much.

For instance, his dialogue displays a taste for neat turns of speech, foreshadowing the brilliance of the Restoration comedy. It is sufficiently developed to give an agreeable quality to the work, but lacks the force and vitality that distinguished primarily the Shakespearean and Jonsonian schools. There is merit in The Isle of Gulls, suggested probably by Nash's Isle of Dogs, but The Parliament of Bees gives Day at his best, alert, fanciful, and agreeably bitter-sweet.

HUMOUR OUT OF BREATH

O early sorrow art got up so soon?
What, ere the sun ascendeth in the east?
O what an early waker art thou grown!
But cease discourse and close unto thy work.
Under this drooping myrtle will I sit,
And work awhile upon my corded net;
And as I work, record my sorrows past,
Asking old Time how long my woes shall last.
And first—but stay! alas! what do I see?
Most gun like tears drop from this mournful tree.
And see, it sticks like birdlime; 'twill not part,
Sorrow is even such birdlime at my heart.
Alas! poor tree, dost thou want company?
Thou dost, I see't, and I will weep with thee;
Thy sorrows make me dumb, and so shall mine,
It shall be tongueless, and so seem like thine.
Thus will I rest my head unto thy bark,
Whilst my sighs ease my sorrows.

CYRIL TOURNEUR (c. 1575–1626) is best known as the author of The Atheist's Tragedy (1611), but also served the King. On December 23, 1613, he was "granted 41s. for his charges and paines in carrying letters for his Majesty's service to Brussels." He accompanied the ill-fated expedition to Cadiz as secretary to Sir Edward Cecil, on board his flagship the Queen Anne, but was taken ill on the return journey, landed at Kinsale in the south of Ireland with one hundred and sixty others who were sick, and died there.

His work is more akin to Webster's, though less artistic, perhaps, and assuredly overweighted with frantic ferocities of the "blood and thunder" school introduced by Kyd. At his best, as in The Atheist's Tragedy, and The Revenger's Tragedy, he has passages of fine force—but a good deal of his work lacks the vivid intensity achieved by Webster and Massinger, by reason of its crude extravagance of violence, and lack of subtlety.

When we tear aside much of the fustian with which those tragedies are decked, we realise a genuine poetic power at work—a power embittered and darkened by an unwholesome outlook on life, yet a power none the less. Webster also took a sombre view of human life; but there was a greatness about his conception and a high beauty of vision, that places him far above Tournour.

THE ATHEIST'S TRAGEDY

Scene: In the Grounds of D'AMVILLE's Mansion

Enter D'AMVILLE, BORACHIO, and ATTENDANTS.

D'Am. I saw my nephew Charlemont but now Part from his father. Tell him I desire

To speak with him. [Exit SERVANT.

Borachio, thou art read In nature and her large philosophy. Observ'st thou not the very self-same course Of revolution, both in man and beast?

Bor. The same, for birth, growth, state, decay and death;

Only a man's beholding to his nature For the better composition of the two.

D'Am. But where that favour of his nature is Not full and free, you see a man becomes A fool, as little-knowing as a beast

Bor. That shows there's nothing in a man above His nature; if there were, considering 'tis His being's excellency, 'twould not yield To nature's weakness

D'Am. Then, if Death casts up Our total sum of joy and happiness Let me have all my senses feasted in The abundant fulness of delight at once, And, with a sweet insensible increase Of pleasing surfeit, melt into my dust.

Bor. That revolution is too short, methinks. If this life comprehends our happiness, How foolish to desire to die so soon! And if our time runs home unto the length Of nature, how improvident it were To spend our substance on a minute's pleasure. And after, live an age in misery!

D'Am. So thou conclud'st that pleasure only flows Upon the stream of riches?

Bor. Wealth is lord Of all felicity.

D'Am. 'Tis, oracle, For what's a man that's honest without wealth?

Bor. Both miserable and contemptible.

D'Am. He's worse, Borachio. For if charity Be an essential part of honesty, And should be practised first upon ourselves, Which must be granted, then your honest man That's poor, is most dishonest, for he is Uncharitable to the man whom he Should most respect. But what doth this touch me That seem to have enough!—thanks industry.

'Tis true, had not my body spread itself Into posterity, perhaps I should Desire no more increase of substance, than Would hold proportion with mine own dimensions Yet even in that sufficiency of state, A man has reason to provide and add. For what is he hath such a present eye, And so prepared a strength, that can foresee, And fortify his substance and himself Against those accidents, the least whereof May rob him of an age's husbandry? And for my children, they are as near to me As branches to the tree whereon they grow; And may as numerous be multiplied. As they increase, so should my providence; For from my substance they receive the sap, Whereby they live and flourish

Bor. Sir, enough. I understand the mark whereat you aim!

Three other dramatists of distinction, and more or less genius, remain to be noted, before closing this account of Shakespeare's immediate successors—Massinger, Ford, and Shirley.

Massinger continues the comedy of manners, started by Middleton, and contributed to it some remarkable pieces of vigorous characterisation, Ford, following in the wake of Webster, shows that the Elizabethan inspiration for tragic passion is on the decline. His work, though not devoid of poetic beauty and passion, can show nothing equal to the best scenes in Webster and Beaumont and Fletcher. Shirley, successful both in comedy and tragedy, excelled in tragedy. He is, perhaps, the best all round of the dramatists now under consideration; but the whole trend of the drama shows not merely a marked and gradual decline in power and beauty, but where it does shine out, it points to the emergence of a new school altogether.

Jonson's influence has persisted rather than Shakespeare's. His followers help to inaugurate the Restoration Drama, the followers of Shakespeare straggle aimlessly along, with no guiding ideal, imitating their Master's worst faults, and with little of his genius to give them insight and grip.

PHILIP MASSINGER was born in 1583, his father being a member of an old Wiltshire family. As was customary he became, while a boy, page to the Earl of Pembroke and Wilton, and is said to have been Queen Elizabeth's messenger on several occasions.

Educated at St Alban's Hall, Oxford, where "he applied his mind more to poetry and romances than to logic and philosophy," it is not surprising that he left without taking a degree.

Unfortunate throughout life, death came very suddenly on March 16, 1640; the register of his burial in St Saviour's, Southwark, merely records the fact that he was "a stranger."

Massinger is believed to have had a part in preparing both Henry VIII and Two Noble Kinsmen. His principal works are The Virgin Martyr (1622), with Dekker; The City Madam (1632); A New Way to pay Old Debts (1633); The Unnatural Combat (1639); The Maid of Honour (1628); Empire of the East (1631); and with Field wrote The Fatal Dowry in 1632.

Like many of his contemporaries, Massinger died

a good deal of collaboration, as, for instance, The Virgin Martyr, written by Massinger and Dekker. In such early work as The Unnatural Combat, he shows nearly all the weaknesses of the Shakespearean school, though the versification is spirited and at times dignified. Better than this is The Duke of Milan, especially if we regard the matter rather than the manner. Best of all is The New Way to pay Old Debts.

Plot, never a strong point with these dramatists, is at its weakest in Massinger, and this play is no exception; but the force and ingenuity with which certain situations are here devised, and the characterisation of Sir Giles Overreach—based on the extortioner, Moinpesson—is wholly admirable.

The City Madam also is rich in comedy, and despite some strong passages in the more serious writings of his later years—e.g. The Roman Actor—he is at his best in dramatic comedy. In addition to this he will be remembered for the skill and plastic ease of his blank verse, which, if rarely rising to any great heights of beauty or strength, is frequently musical and agreeably smooth, and at times forceful and dignified.

One cannot leave Massinger without paying a tribute to the excellence of his technique as a dramatist. There is progressive excellence in his workmanship, and The Roman Actor affords a good example of later neatness and dexterity with which he manipulated the raw material of his work.

Unlike many of his contemporaries, Massinger was happier in his male than his female characterisations, strongly and vigorously drawn as they are Paris, the Roman actor, and among the women the repentant Donasa, are fine presentations of widely different temperaments.

Subtlety is a term one would not apply to Massinger's psychology at any time. He paints boldly and firmly, but there is little light and shade. But within certain defined limits, he was an admirable dramatist, with an astonishing level excellence, when the prodigality of his output is considered.

Of JOHN FORD little is known except that he was a shy, reserved, melancholy man, born about 1586 at Islington in Devonshire, who came of good stock, his mother being a daughter of Lord Chief Justice Popham.

Leaving Devonshire for London in 1602, he was admitted at the Middle Temple, and wrote the plays by which he is known. He collaborated with Rowley and Dekker and saw their joint plays produced, but was over forty before he had the gratification of seeing one of his own—The Lover's Melancholy (1628)—staged at the Blackfriars and Globe. About the time of Massinger's death in 1639, Ford returned to his native county to end his days, and during the Civil Wars, being a strong Royalist, suffered hardly at the hands of the Parliamentarians. The date of his death is uncertain.

Ford, like his comrades of the pen, was a ready collaborator, but his claim to remembrance rests practically on two plays: 'Tis Pity She's a Whore (1627), and The Broken Heart (1629). His other work calls for no special comment, being fifth-rate and imitative, but in these two plays he displays a fine vein of poetical imagination, and has had the good fortune to find enthusiastic champions in Charles Lamb and Swinburne, but the student who reads their laudations may well take as a corrective the caustic criticism of Hazlitt, a captious, erratic, but rarely negligible critic.

Of these two plays, the more interesting is the first, though it may well be, as Hazlitt said, "It has been lamented that the play had a less exceptionable subject. I do not know, but I suspect that the exceptionableness of the subject is that which constitutes the chief merit of the play."

There is no question, however, about the spasmodic power of Ford in both plays, whether in the flamboyant death scene of Calantha, the more sternly tragic one of Orgilus in The Broken Heart, or the fierce intensity of the Annabella and Giovanni scenes of 'Tis Pity She's a Whore.

Ford, unlike many of his needy comrades, was always in affluent circumstances, and his choice of tragedy was certainly not the art expression of any tumultuous soul expression. But he was of a melancholy cast of mind—most countrymen not unfrequently are—and Suckling, in his Sermons of the Poets, speaks thus of him:

"In the dumps John Ford alone by himself sat
With folded arms and melancholy hat."

Of humour he has no trace, and he has no faculty for painting contemporary life, such as Middleton, Beaumont and Fletcher, and Massinger have. But he could write good, occasionally fine verse, shows great cleverness, and flashes of genius, in his treatment of crucial situations, and has a gift of song which, had it been equalled by insight into life and character, would have put him among the great dramatists of the age.

THE BROKEN HEART

Enter TECNICUS, and ORGILUS disguised like one of his Scholars.

Tec Tempt not the stars; young man, thou can'st not play

With the severity of fate; this change
Of habit and disguise in outward view
Hides not the secrets of thy soul within thee
From their quick-piercing eyes, which dive at all times
Down to thy thoughts: in thy aspect I note
A consequence of danger

Org Give me leave,
Grave Tecnicus, without foredooming destiny,
Under thy roof to ease my silent griefs,
By applying to my lacerated wounds the balm
Of thy oracular lectures. If my fortune
Run such a crooked by-way as to wrest
My steps to ruin, yet thy learned precepts
Shall call me back and set my footings straight.
I will not court the world.

Tec Ah, Orgilus,
Neglects in young men of delights and life
Run often to extremities: they care not
For harms to others who condemn their own

Org But I, most learned artist, am not so much
At odds with nature that I grudge the thrift
Of any true deserver; nor doth malice
Of present hopes so check them with despair
As that I yield to thought of more affliction
Than what is incident to frailty: wherefore
Impute not this retired course of living
Some little time to any other cause
Than what I justly render—the information
Of an unsettled mind; as the effect
Must clearly witness.

Teo. Spirit of truth inspire thee !
On these conditions I conceal thy change,
And willingly admit thee for an auditor.—
I'll to my study.

Ory. I to contemplations
In these delightful walks. [Exit TEONIOUS.]

Thus metamorphosed
I may without suspicion hearken after Pentheus's usage and Euphranes's faith.
Love, thou art full of mystery ! the deities
Themselves are not secure in searching out
The secrets of those flames, which, hidden, waste
A breast made tributary to the laws
Of beauty phylao yet hath never found
A remedy to cure a lover's wound.—
Ha ! who are those that cross yon private walk
Into the shadowing grove in amorous foldings ?

JAMES SHIRLEY was born in London, 1598, and educated at Merchant Taylor's School and Oxford. In 1623 he was appointed master of St Alban's Grammar School, and two years later began his work as a dramatist, but having joined the Roman Church and gained the patronage of the Queen, Henrietta Maria, he threw in his lot with the Royalists and served with them during the Civil War. In 1636 he settled in Dublin, where he wrote The Gamester and The Lady of Pleasure (1637) for a newly opened theatre. Singularly fortunate and prosperous during his early career as a playwright, he fell on evil times when the drama was banned by Parliament in 1642, and for twenty years seems to have lived a precarious existence; his home was burnt in the Great Fire of London, and he and his wife died on the same day in 1666.

Of his plays, the best known is The Maid's

Revenge (1626), others are The Wedding (1626), The Grateful Servant (1629), The Witty Fair One (1628), The Traitor (1631), and among his masques are A Contention for Honour and Riches (1633), The Triumph of Beauty (1646), and Cupid and Death (1653).

Shirley's work constituted a respectable table-land of merit. There are no peaks, but neither are there any dismal abysses of dullness and repulsive violence. He is versatile and could adapt his work to the prevalent requirements of the day. His serious dramas, such as The Traitor, contain fine lines and striking scenes; and his lighter plays have a mercurial gaiety and numbness of treatment, such as we rarely find outside of Wycherley and Congreve. In some ways he is the most proficient dramatist of manners before the Restoration, lighter in his touch than Massinger, with a pleasant extravagance, that suggests the first-rate writer of farces. He was also skilled in the writing of masques, e.g. The Duke's Mistress, the Contention for Honour and Riches, and could hold his own with some of the best lyrists of his time.

THE TRAITOR

Let me look upon my sister now :
Still she retains her beauty,
Death has been kind to leave her all this sweetness.
Thus in a morning have I oft saluted
My sister in her chamber : sat upon
Her bed and talked of many harmless passages.
But now 'tis night, and a long night with her
I shall ne'er see these curtains drawn again
Until we meet in heaven.

II. PROSE (a) The Bible and the English Divines. (i) The Bible and its Literary Influence— (1) The English Divines

(a) THE BIBLE AND THE ENGLISH DIVINES

(1) THE BIBLE AND ITS LITERARY INFLUENCE

The literary influence of the Bible is twofold. There is the rhetorical influence of the Old Testament, and the conversational influence of the New.

The Hebrew language had, from the time of Cadmon's hymns and Alfred's prose, proved a shaping force upon our literature. The reason for this may be found in the fact that much of the Old Testament is sheer poetry, and it was poetry of such a kind as found a peculiarly fitting expression in English prose. English verse is indebted to Hebrew song, for dignity and richness; but the two characteristics peculiar to Hebrew poetry, rhythm and parallelism, find ampler expression in prose. To understand this, we must realise clearly, in the first place, the nature of the Hebrew language.

Hebrew is notably deficient in abstract terms. It is amazingly concrete; and its intensely lyrical quality precludes any marked divergence between its verse and prose. Elemental, definitely simple, pictorial—we have in it the very stuff of which poetry is made:

"Who shall ascend unto the hill of the Lord ?
And who shall stand in his holy place ?
He that hath clean hands and a pure heart. . . ."

1 The Broken Heart, Act. I. sc. 3.

Saxon verse proved a more favourable medium than Saxon prose for exhibiting these Hebraic qualities; but as French and classical influences were brought to bear upon our tongue, even the distinctive beauty of Hebrew poetry was more clearly and conventionally expressed in English prose.

"The Bible," said Selden, "is rather translated into English words, than into English phrase. The Hebraisms are kept and the phrase of that language is kept."

There were special circumstances that made our prose so peculiarly adapted for the purpose. These need some consideration.

The prose of the Elizabethan age had in it a certain poetic quality characteristic of the age. This was all in its favour when the translators began the task of fashioning the Bible for English readers.

There is beauty in Wyclif's translation; but the Authorised Version is based almost entirely on that of Tyndale and Coverdale; for the prose of that time is free of mediæval cumbrousness. In addition to this poetic quality, there is something in the temper of the Elizabethan age, its exaltation, its high seriousness, that put it in spiritual touch with the Hebrew writers. Happily, moreover, in the Septuagint and Vulgate, the translators possessed versions of natural literary excellences. Availing themselves of these, they found to their hand a native prose, just ready for the shaping faculty that should make full use of the stark and simple grace of the Saxon tongue, recently enriched by the sonorous music of the ancient classics. The effect of this glorification of our prose may easily be seen in the writers of the succeeding age.

Bacon owed little to the Bible, his style was framed chiefly on classical models; but Milton's debt is a considerable one, inasmuch as whenever he achieves distinction in prose, it is by means of the Hebraic cadences. The historians, Clarendon and Fuller, catch some measure of the stately rhetoric of the Old Testament; while Sir Thomas Browne in his quaint Religio Medici, Robert Burton with his discursive Anatomy of Melancholy, and Jeremy Taylor, in varying ways, testify to its influence. Nor is the Old Testament the only literary force. Mention has been made of the conversational element in the New Testament. Both Old and New are seen in John Bunyan, whose style owes more to the Bible, probably more than does any other man of letters. The simple, flowing narrative of the Evangelists, the colloquial ease and force of the parabolic teaching, meet us in almost every page of The Pilgrim's Progress. Addison's conversational essay is certainly influenced by them; just as Swift reflects the sterner qualities of the prophetic books. While in our own day, it is sufficient to recall the stormy vigour of Carlyle, and the ironic eloquence of Ruskin, to realise the spell of Hebraism over our masters of prose.

Nor has the austere simplicity of the Bible failed to touch our poetry. If it did little to touch the artificial verse of the eighteenth century, it did much for the pioneers of the Romantic Revival, and the naked power of Wordsworth, the subtle suggestiveness of Coleridge, the fine restraint (even more than the fine excess) of Keats' best work, find their ultimate inspiration in the homely diction and elevated nobility of the Authorised Version.

(II) THE ENGLISH DIVINES (FROM FISHER TO JEREMY TAYLOR)

One of the reasons for the decaying power of the mediæval Church lay in the neglect of the art of Preaching. In an age when printing was still a thing of the future, and letters a solace and delight to the cultured few, the appeal to the mass of the people lay necessarily in spectacle and the spoken word.

Of the part played by the Religious drama in the life of the people, much has already been said. With the advent of the Reformation it is obvious why religious teaching by means of the drama should seem a perilous matter, and the Church sought to regain its pristine power through the more direct and unequivocal medium of the homily.

Preaching revived with JOHN FISHER, son of a wealthy landowner in Yorkshire. Born about 1459 at Boverley, he was educated at York and Cambridge, taking his degree in 1487, and successively became Fellow, Senior Proctor, Master of his college in 1497, Vice-Chancellor of the University 1501, Bishop of Rochester 1504, and Cardinal 1535, just before his death.

Appointed chaplain in 1497, to Margaret Counteess of Richmond, mother of Henry VII, he immediately interested her in the New Learning, and set to work to raise the standard of study and the financial condition of the University, just then at a very low ebb. A Chair of Divinity, and lectureships in Greek and Hebrew were endowed, and later Christ's College and St John's mainly founded by his exertions.

A man of strict life and "grete and singular virtua," he had no sympathy with the divorce principles of Henry VIII; suspected of this, he was imprisoned and his goods sequestered. As a churchman and supporter of the Papal cause he was strongly opposed to the King's supremacy, and for refusing, in company with Sir Thomas More, to subscribe to the Act of Succession in its entirety, was committed to the Tower; a calm, dignified, feeble old man, he was executed on June 22, 1535.

Fisher was an effective rhetorician with a gift for homely simile, and an unremitting zeal that enabled him to do a vast amount of speaking throughout his long and active life, and his eloquent account of the Lady Margaret, Countess of Richmond, whose Confessor he was, did more to enshrine the memory of that patroness of learning, than even the sculpture of Torrigiano.

Colet, his successor, was more of the scholar than Fisher; as an exponent of the Renaissance learning he had already made a name in Oxford lecture-rooms, and he carried his systematic exploration of the Scriptures into his work at St Paul's.

As one of the Progressive clergy Colet, like More, precludes, rather than belongs to, the Reformation Movement. But he attacked the lethargy and loose living of the clergy with as much vigour as did Latimer himself, nor did he hesitate to speak of the Pope as "wickedly distilling poison to the destruction of the Church." "O Jesus Christ," he exclaimed, "wash for us not our feet only, but also our hands and our head! Otherwise our disordered church cannot be far from death." Preaching to Convocation in 1511, he urged the clergy to reform themselves. But they neglected his exhortation, and Parliament shortly took the matter out of their hands.

Less rhetorical than Fisher, he is fully as earnest and direct, and courageous to a degree, never hesitating to reprove Wolsey or censure Henry VIII, when occasion arose.

The next man of note is Hugh Latimer, far less literary than his predecessors, yet unequalled for racy directness and pungent force.

HUGH LATIMER, the son of a farmer, an ecclesiastic unspoiled by success, was born at Thurstaston, Leicestershire, about 1485, educated at Cambridge, elected a Fellow of Clare Hall 1510, and ordained 1522. For not paying the customary fees, the Bachelor of Divinity degree conferred upon him by his University was cancelled in 1524.

His fearless defence of a woman unjustly imprisoned at Cambridge, combined with his support of the King's supremacy, brought him under the notice of Henry VIII, who appointed him chaplain to Anne Boleyn. In 1535 he became Bishop of Worcester, but on his commitment to the Tower he resigned his see.

A sturdy upholder of the doctrines of the Reformers, and a strong advocate of freedom in preaching, he seems to have caused some contention among the congregation at St. Margaret's, Westminster, as an item appears in the church accounts "for mending divers pews that were broken when Dr. Latimer did preach."

Having given an evasive answer to the Bishop of Ely's request for a sermon to confute the doctrines of Luther, which, as the Bishop said, "smelt of the pan," Latimer, in 1525, was inhibited in the Ely diocese.

From 1532 to 1554—according to the pleasure of the reigning powers—Latimer was continually in and out of prison for the straightforward expression of his opinions, and in company with Cranmer and Ridley met death with fortitude on October 16, 1556.

While at Cambridge, he gave promise of vigorous individuality, amply fulfilled in the sermons preached before Edward VI. No man gained the ear of this populace more effectually than he, or wielded a wider influence, till we come to the age of Wesley and Whitfield. His humour, his fiery impetuosity, his easy colloquial manner, are strangely at variance with the stately, ornate methods of the age. At times we are more reminded of our latter-day Spurgeon than of the Elizabethan divine, for he has an eye for a dramatic story and a witty anecdote, when he can best fix attention that way. He made the Bible stories living realities because he related them so closely with the history of the time. There is no more original figure in the ecclesiastical world, and if we miss the imaginative grace of Fisher and the ripe oration of Colet, we get compensating qualities of special value in those troublous times.

Latimer girded with great freedom and audacity at the lothargy of the clergy, and once, in a sermon at Paul's Cross, declared "There is one that . . . is the most diligent prelate in all England. And will ye know who it is? I will tell you! It is the Devil! Among all the pack of them that have cure, the Devil shall go for my money, for he appliest his business. Therefore, ye imprecating prelates, learn of the Devil to be diligent in your office. If ye will not learn of God, for shame learn of the Devil."

Frequently also he reprimanded the King himself, and to the King's face Henry received these homilies with good-humoured tolerance, and went his own way again.

A fine and noble-hearted soul, HOOVER, who succeeded, has some of Latimer's qualities, but is far less rich in sympathetic insight. RIDLEY, a shrewd and able man, interests us more as a personality than a preacher. JOHN BRADFORD and THOMAS LEVER carry on the Latimer tradition, Lever especially excelling in homely humour and fervent power.

THOMAS CRANMER: classical and biblical scholar, lawyer, courtier, sportsman, and accomplished gentleman, came of an old Norman family, was born at Ailaston, Notts, in 1489, and educated under a "marvellous, severe, and cruel school-master." Entering Jesus College, Cambridge, at the age of fourteen, he became Fellow at twenty-

one. After a further study of philosophy, logic, and the classics, he was appointed lecturer and tutor at Buckingham Hall, now Magdalen College, and took Orders in 1523.

An ardent supporter of the divorce between Henry VIII and Queen Catherine, promotion was rapid; he was appointed Royal Chaplain, sent on embassies to the Pope and Emperor of Germany, and, though hesitating at first on account of his marriage to accept "the high and chargeable office of primate and archbishop" offered him by the King, he afterwards accepted the see of Canterbury, and was consecrated March 30, 1533, "albeit a poor wretch and most unworthy."

A tool used by Henry to further his own ends, he at length receives the measure meted out to all that monarch's whilom favourites. For the courage of his opinions and with bitter repentance for the past, the gentle, vacillating Cranmer met death fearlessly at Oxford in 1556.

The Reformation Preachers

The era of the great preachers at Paul's Cross begins in the reign of Henry VIII, the previous preachers were all court officials. Not that under Henry there was a lack of engineered doctrine, but there were also, now and later, many vigorous independent preachers, both Catholic and Protestant.

There was at the east end of St. Paul's Cathedral an open piece of ground, where the citizens in mediæval times assembled for the folk-moot, and for making parade of arms for keeping the King's peace. Here it was that Paul's Cross was situated; here also was the huge clangorous bell which bade the citizens attend folk-moot, or called them to the muster of arms.

In the earlier years of Stow the Bell Tower was still standing, and he refers to it thus:

"Near unto the school (St. Paul's) on the north side thereof, was of old time a great and high Clocher or Bell House, with four bells, the greatest that I have heard; these were called Jesus bells, and belonged to Jesus Chapel, but I know not by whose gift. The same had a great spire of timber, covered with lead, with the image of St. Paul on the top; but it was pulled down by Sir Miles Partridge, Knight, in the reign of Henry VIII. The common speech then was, that he did set one hundred pounds upon a cast at dice against it, and so won the said Clocher and bells of the King; and then causing the bells to be broken as they hung, the rest was pulled down."

Sir Miles subsequently lost his head on Tower Hill, for matter "concerning the Duke of Somerset," and Stow records the fact with a certain amount of complacency.

In the time of Richard the First, the place had served a purpose, much as the Marble Arch does to-day, as a rallying-ground for Reformers of all kinds; and here did the craftsmen inveigh against the governing classes.

A Proclamation had been issued at Paul's Cross in the reign of Edward the Fourth, by Bishop Braybrooke, against barbers shaving on Sundays; forbidding the sale of merchandise in the Cathedral, and among other things, against the playing of ball either within or without the church, which had led to the breaking of the stained-glass windows.

Stow tells us that "time out of mind it hath been a laudable custom on Good Friday in the afternoon" for "some special learned man" to preach a sermon at Paul's Cross dealing with the Passion.

"On the three Easter holidays, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, other learned men should preach in the forenoon at the Spital Cross on the Resurrection, and then on Low Sunday, one other learned man is to make rehearsal on those four former sermons, either commending or reproving them as to him is thought convenient" What would be thought, I wonder, if one cleric to-day was called upon to outdo publicly the sermons of his brother clerics?

The sermons of Archbishop Morton were pointed in the most practical way. In 1487 he delivered a discourse on "Cease to do evil, learn to do good," the moral being, "Vote liberal supplies to the King." In 1489, when he wanted £100,000 for his royal master, he gave out his text, "The eyes of the Lord are over all the righteous"—which was a pleasing way of putting the matter.

During the closing years of the fifteenth century, it became the custom for penances to be performed at Paul's Cross. "Upon Passion Sunday (1497)," relates Fox, "one Hugh Glover bare a fagot before the Procession of Paul's and after with the fagot stood before the preacher all the sermon while at Paul's Cross." The fagot symbolised, of course, the death which the bearer had merited, and escaped only through undergoing the penance.

The story of James Baynham, Lawyer and Martyr, illustrates the fate of those who persisted in heresy. According to Fox, Sir Thomas More took a prominent part in the persecution of this unfortunate man. It is to be hoped that all he alleges against the author of the Utopia is not true; though it is to be feared that, however misinformed he may be in details, there is sufficient circumstantial evidence in other directions to show More's attitude at times to have been hard and intolerant. After suffering torture in the Tower, Baynham abjured at Paul's Cross in the customary manner, but subsequently repented his weakness, and publicly confessed the same. He had stamped himself now as a heretic beyond recall, but, before his death, and in order to "save his soul," the authorities tortured him in various ways, and, failing to break his spirit, burned him at Smithfield.

Another case where penance was followed by death, is that of Elizabeth Barton, "The Holy Maid of Kent." She seems to have been a poor, hysterical creature, whose ravings were utilised by others for sensational purposes. She was brought before the Star Chamber; but although she and her companions abjured at Paul's Cross, they were put to death—"hanged and headed," as Stow puts it.¹

Penance was prescribed for matters other than heretical. In 1506 a priest did penance for having two wives—a double offence. And in the same year we hear that "a man did penance for transgressing Lent, holding two pigs ready drest, whereof one was upon his head, having brought them to sell." How far the man himself was significantly impressed by the ceremony, or the spectators edified, is not related.

¹ More looked upon the whole matter after penance as "a determined hypocrisy," previous to that he had been favourably impressed by the girl's good faith.

Hardy as our ancestors were, even they found these rallies at Paul's Cross no pleasurable matter. Latimer himself says in one of his sermons:

"I do much marvel that London, being so rich a city, hath not a burying place without; for, no doubt, it is an unwholesome thing to bury within the City, especially at such a time when there is great sickness—so that many die together. I think verily that many a man taketh his death in Paul's Churchyard, and thus I speak of experience, for I myself when I have been there in some morning to hear the sermons, have felt such an ill-favoured, unwholesome savour, that I was the worse for it a great while after. And I think no less but it be the occasion of much sickness and disease."

In the earlier years of Elizabeth's reign, however, we look vainly for great preachers. The noblest among the Protestants had perished at the stake: the Catholics were not in authority. The now clergy, as yet ill-educated, are represented as ignorant and riotous. If the clergy of the old Faith had fallen into evil ways, there is not much to be said in favour of these earlier Protestants. The charges against them are too uniform, too constant, to be dismissed as prejudiced, even while making allowances for exaggeration here and there.

The destruction of ancient forms and rites had led to a great deal of irreverence. Some churches were used for stabling horses. Pedlars plied their business during service times, and morris dancers lounged about in costume, "so as to be ready for the frolics which generally followed prayers."

Then again, some of the Catholics attended services only to laugh and talk, and show their contempt generally for the New Religion.

When we come to the time of JEWEL and SANDYS, things are different. Jewel has learning and imagination; Sandys that charm and simplicity often allied with culture and historical knowledge; and no doubt they helped to form the eloquent and lucid style of a greater than themselves—RICHARD HOOKER. Hooker's work has been dealt with elsewhere, and it is sufficient to say here that in addition to his literary power, he was one of the first of the Elizabethan controversialists to show how it is possible to argue with an enemy without being scurrilous and abusive. It is a pity his example was not taken to heart by many of the Pamphleteers.

Hooker addressed himself to the few; another contemporary, Henry Smith, to the many. Smith has something of Latimer's homeliness and humour. Some of the preachers, the pious Bishop Andrewes for instance, yielded too freely to the literary affectations of the day, and an undue affection for far-fetched metaphors and confused conceits obscured the work of such brilliant men of the Andrewes school as John Donne.

But, making allowance for this, there is extraordinary beauty of thought and expression in such men as Donne, that have given their sermons a vitality long outliving their day and generation.

With the deepening seriousness of public life that we meet with in the earlier years of the Caroline period, it is not surprising to encounter a goodly number of great preachers. There are THOMAS TRAHERNE, rich in spiritual intensity and poetic imagery; RICHARD BAXTER, whose Saints' Everlasting Rest has become a classic of its kind, and whose grave and tender piety, and easy clarity, profoundly impressed his contemporaries. HENRY HAMMOND, sometimes called "The Father of English Biblical criticism," and JAMES USSHER, the Irishman; both men of large erudition and democratic sympathy. Of ROBERT SANDERSON, later on one of the Restoration Bishops, one recalls the testimony of Charles I., "I carry my ease to other preachers, but I carry my conscience to hear Dr. Sanderson." It might have been better for the unfortunate monarch had he left his conscience in this resting-place.

WILLIAM CHILLINGWORTH, godson of Laud, excelled in dialects. He has few literary graces; but has the virtues of the greater Puritan spirits of the time: intense moral earnestness, and a tolerant charity. Liberty is his watchword, Liberty and free inquiry. Of his style we may take this illustration: "The difference between a Papist and a Protestant is this, that the one judges his guide to be infallible, the other his way to be manifest." His chief work is his Religion of Protestantism; a safer Way to Salvation; and Chillingworth's safe way is certainly beset by no narrow dogmatic restrictions.

Equally charitable, and cast in a more subdued and peaceful mould, is the gentle recluse, JOHN HALES. Starting as a Calvinist, he forsook the great theologians, and in the even tenor of his thought and the reposeful piety of his spirit had much in common with GEORGE HERBERT. Herbert's verse has received mention elsewhere; scarcely less notable was his prose as exhibited in A Country Parson, of which book Izaak Walton said it was "so full of plain, prudent and useful rules, that that country parson, that can spare twelve pence, and yet wants it, is scarce excusable." For us perhaps the "useful rules" appeal less than the tranquil sweetness of atmosphere and the fragrant charm of a benign personality.

Very different is the great figure of WILLIAM LAUD; one who carried on the policy of the Tudors into an alien age that would ill brook it. Vigorous, keen as a controversialist, he has little personal magic, and many men of lesser note and inferior mental powers are more attractive than he.

Nearing the close of our era is the name of JOHN GAUDEN, a somewhat Machiavellian ecclesiast, with undoubted power as a debater, and a remarkable skill in gliding skilfully over awkward topics. To him is attributed that notable historical work Erkon Basilike, asserted by some to have been written by Charles I. As a skilful ex parte statement of Charles' theory of kingship sentimentalised, it makes an effective document for the Stuart cause. Written in direct and simple language, it produced a powerful impression, and ran through many editions.

Not more interesting than Gauden, as a man, though undoubtedly more gracious and attractive, is JEREMY TAYLOR the last of the Caroline divines. A prolific writer and a great controversialist, he will survive in literature by virtue of his rich, impressive style and stately rhetoric. A man of catholic sympathies and of wide culture, we read him to-day neither for his learning nor for his divinity, but for his happy allusiveness, his mellow temper, and his musical phrasing.

II. PROSE: (b) Art of Criticism (Bacon to Dryden).

(b) THE ART OF CRITICISM (FROM BACON TO DRYDEN)

"It is not good to stay too long in the theatre," observes Bacon dryly, and this remark may serve as a text for his critical work. He has no great respect for literature as such; and although as a maker of literature the author of the Essays and the stylist of the New Atlantis has claims upon all lovers of literature, his contribution to the interpretation of literature is of the slightest.

The Essays furnish us with no hints of any value, and we must turn to the Advancement of Learning for any real consideration of criticism. Here there are some sane judicial comments, as when he accuses the Renaissance writers of hunting "more after words than matter, more after the choiceness of phrase, and the round and clear composition of the sentence, and the sweet falling of the clauses . . . than after the weight of matter, worth of subject, soundness of argument, life of invention, or depth of judgment." But he is unwilling to admit that form or manner is of any particular merit (his own style the whole time giving the lie to his attitude). Science is the be-all of all things.

Poetry is a pleasant solace, a comforting drug, that is the gist of his reflections. Quite clearly, form interests him merely because it makes his favourite philosophy more palatable. That is probably how he would have justified his own style, and his arid imagination puts us in mind of Newton's reference to poetry as "ingenious nonsense."

Undoubtedly the greatest critic of the age before Dryden is Ben Jonson. It were more debateable to question his greatness as a dramatist than his greatness as a critic. Of course, even Jonson was not proof against the spirit of the age, but allowing for this, no writer of the time did more to draw attention to points of form and style. The burden of his exegesis may be found in the Discoveries, which were never published until after the author's death, in 1641. He lauds the art of blotting, and regrets Shakespeare's parsimony in this respect. He criticises Spenser for his linguistic affectations, he "would have him read for his matter," and in his phrase "Language most shows a man," he comes near to Carlyle's epigram, "The style is not the coat but the skin of a man." In the matter of his criticism, Jonson was probably indebted to the ancients and to contemporary Italian critics; but there is no need to slight his work on that account. It was a borrowing age, and a frankly borrowing one; the significance lies not in the absolute originality of this or that remark, but the tact and judgment shown in his selection of what was wise and pertinent, and an additional value is given to these dicta by Jonson's own shrewd brain and clear and apposite style. His own ordered reasonableness of method leads him naturally to come down rather severely on the Essays of Montaigne. His own temperament impelled him naturally, moreover, to see the defects of Montaigne's discursiveness, without appreciating the corresponding good qualities.

Likewise his censure of Marlowe is comprehensive enough; while his tribute to Shakespeare is the more weighty when we realise how entirely opposed he was in theory to his great contemporary's dramatic methods. Bacon, whose literary style is not unlike Jonson's, with its faculty for fine compression and its range of powers, is warmly praised Jonson is the precursor of Dryden and the new age of English prose. He sounds the reaction from Romanticism and prepared the way for Dryden. Between Jonson and Dryden there is little to recount. Milton takes up again Daniel's creed against rhyme, confuting his own arguments, as Daniel did, in his own poetry. Sir William Davenant in his preface to Goudibert—taking the form of a letter to his friend Hobbes—reminds us in substance of Sidney's eloquent defence of Romance. Hobbes, in his reply, narrows down poetry to that which should treat of "the manner of men." No one would quarrel with his dictum against those who "take for poetry whatsoever is writ in verse"; yet when he excludes not only didactic verse, but sonnets and eclogues, obviously, critical ideals were in process of transition, and flattering as Hobbes may be to his friend's work, it is clear that by poetry he means something other than the pleasure-giving music of the Elizabethan age and the Renaissance.

II. PROSE. (c) Miscellaneous Prose Writers (Robert Burton to James Harrington).

(c) MISCELLANEOUS PROSE WRITERS OF THE LATE RENAISSANCE

There are a number of writers in the earlier years of the seventeenth century, who exemplify in their work the transitional influence of the period; some, like the ingenious Robert Burton, retaining the ornate prolixity of the Elizabethan in style, while reflecting often in matter the graver and austere spirit of the succeeding age; others, like Sir Thomas Overbury, presenting a strange medley of the literary affectations of the past, and the concrete "humours" that developed into the character study of the eighteenth-century essayist.

ROBERT BURTON, born at Lindley in Leicestershire in 1577, entered Christ Church, Oxford, as a student in 1599. After taking Orders he became successively vicar of the College living of St Thomas, Oxford, in 1616, and rector of Segrave, Leicestershire, in 1630. His most popular work, The Anatomy of Melancholy, published 1621, in which he appears in the character of Democritus Junior, was the only book, says Johnson, "that ever took me out of bed two hours sooner than I wished to rise." In 1606 he published Philosophaster, a Latin comedy acted in the college hall of Christ Church in 1618.

Though afflicted with depression of spirits throughout his life, he was, when free from this trouble, an amusing companion, "most learned, and full of sterling good sense." He died in 1640.

Burton's great, and only, literary achievement, The Anatomy of Melancholy, is highly characteristic of the time. It is as characteristic indeed as is Lyly's Anatomy of Wit, and Stubbes' Anatomy of Abuses, characteristic of an earlier period. It is essentially a Jacobean inspiration.

Burton in prose is not unlike Donne in verse; elaborate and fantastic conceits give place suddenly to sombre meditation; and no sooner is the serious note struck, than a curious sardonic humour takes its place. The book is a wilderness of varied learning, a masterpiece of ingenious discursiveness; often amazingly involved in style, yet with none of that windy vagueness belonging to many of his predecessors. Burton has full command over his matter; if he will he can be as terse and pithy as Bacon himself; as succinct and lucid as Jonson; or as rhetorical as Sir Thomas Browne.

Here is a passage of The Anatomy dealing with "The Cause of Religious Melancholy":

"What power of Prince, or pernal law, be it never so strict, could enforce men to do that which for conscience sake they will voluntarily undergo? As to fast from all flesh, abstain from marriage, rise to their prayers at midnight, whip themselves, with stupend fasting and penance, abandon the world, wilfull poverty, perform canonical and blind obedience, to prostrate their goods, fortunes, bodies, lives, and offer up themselves at their superior's feet, at his command? What so powerful an engine as superstition? which they right well perceiving, are of no religion at all themselves: Primum enim (as Calvin rightly suspects, the tenor and practice of their life proves) arcanæ illius Theologie, quod apud eos regna, caput est, nullum esse deum, they hold there is no God, as Leo 10 did, Hildebrand the Magician, Alexander 6, Julius 2, meer Atheists, and which the common proverb amongst them approves 'The worst Christians of Italy are the Romans, of the Romans the Priests are wildest, the fewest Priests are preferred to be Cardinals, and the baddest man amongst the Cardinals is chosen to be Pope,'¹ that is an Epicure, as most part the Popes are, Infidels and Lucianists, for so they think and believe; and what is said of Christ to be fables and impostures, of heaven and hell, day of judgment, paradise, immortality of the soul, are all

Dreams, toys, and old wives' tales. Yet as so many whetstones to make other tools cut, but cut not themselves, though they be of no religion at all, they will make others most devout and superstitious, by promises and threats, compel, enforce from, and lead them by the nose like so many bears in a line; When as their end is not to propagate the Church, advance

God's Kingdom, seek his glory or common good, but to enrich themselves, to enlarge their territories, to domineer and compel them to stand in awe, to live in subjection to the See of Rome. For what otherwise care they ! "

JOHN SELDEN, son of a Sussex farmer, was born at Worthing in 1584, educated at Chichester and Oxford, studied law at Clifford's Inn and the Inner Temple, and has been called the "Champion of Human Law." In 1621, for disputing the King's doctrines with regard to the privileges of Parliament, he suffered a short term of imprisonment, and again in 1630 was sent to the Tower for the part he took against the levying of tonnage and poundage. A politician of moderate views, he was elected member for Lancaster, and represented his University in the Long Parliament. For many years Selden was a member of the household of the Earl of Kent, and it was popularly believed that he married the Earl's widow; he, however, died in her house in 1654, and is buried in the Temple Church.

Selden's biggest English work is Tulles of Honour, 1614; his most important, Table Talk, published in 1689. In the History of Tulles (1618), he denied the divine right of kings and incurred the displeasure of both king and clergy.

Selden lives in literature by the Table Talk, collected by his secretaries, and published long after his death. These abound in sharp, somewhat acid-natured aphorisms, exhibiting rough common-sense though little imagination, and foreshadowing the later Essay. Neither his legal learning nor historical and religious dicta appeal greatly to the modern reader; but his gnomic wisdom will always delight.

These for instance :

"We cry down a rotten pear and approve a rotten medlar, and yet I warrant you, the pear thinks as well of it-self as the medlar does."

"Commonly, we say, a judgment falls upon a man for something in him we cannot abide."

"Syllables govern the world."

"Take a straw and throw it up into the air, you may see by that which way the wind is."

"Equity is a roughish thing; for law we have a measure, know what to trust to; equity is according to the conscience of him that is Chancellor, and as that is larger or narrower, so is equity. 'Tis all one as if they should make the standard for the measure we call a foot, a Chancellor's foot, what an uncertain measure would this be! One Chancellor has a long foot, another a short foot, a third an indifferent foot: 'tis the same thing in the Chancellor's conscience."

"That saying, 'Do as you would be done to,' is often misunderstood, for 'tis not thus meant that I, a private man, should do to you, a private man, as I would have you do to me, but do as we have agreed to do one to another by public agreement. If the prisoner should ask the judge whether he would be content to be hanged were he in his case, he would answer 'No.' Then, says the prisoner, 'Do as you would be done to.' Neither of them must do as private men, but the judge must do by him as they have publicly agreed: that is, both judge and prisoner have consented to a law that if either of them steal they shall be hanged!"

Sir THOMAS BROWNE, born in 1605, was the son of a London merchant, and educated at Winchester and Oxford, after which he studied on the Continent, receiving the M.D. of Leyden University in 1633, and of Oxford in 1637. Settling in Norwich, Browne practised there as a physician up to the time of his death in 1682, and is buried in St Peter Mancroft. During the Civil Wars he favoured the King's party and was knighted by Charles II on his visit to Norwich in 1671.

Of his writings, Religio Medici, Pseudodoxia, Urn Burial, and The Garden of Cyrus, have each in its way claims upon the attention of the literary student.

Religio Medici is an excellent prose companion to the metaphysical verse of the age. In each case we have an ardent fancy, a tinge of melancholy, a quaint pietism, and a tangled growth of erudition. The tangle is not so overgrown and bewildering as in Burton's case, being balanced by a sense of practicality; the pietism is more tempered than we find it in Vaughan and Crashaw, by a genial worldliness. In short, Browne mirrors in little most of the characteristics of his time, without developing any to excess. But it is as a stylist of modulated, harmonious English prose that we most esteem him.

Religio Medici, written about 1635, was printed in 1642. It is ostensibly a defence of himself from the charge of irreligion; and in the broadest sense of the word there is no doubt he makes out an excellent case. How far his temper of mind agreed with any well-defined theological position is, however, another matter.

Pseudodoxia, or Vulgar Errors, is less wide in its appeal; its style is less attractive, and its desultory, ambiguous character far more marked. His sceptical habit of mind, decorously veiled before, has here full expression, and nowhere perhaps has his gift of delicate irony more abundant illustration than when dealing with the heterogeneous collection of legends and beliefs, scientific and otherwise, brought together in this discursive medley.

Urn Burial gives us of the meditations melancholy of the man, and is written in a loftier and more poetical style. It is a wonderful prose-fugue on Death and Decay.

The Garden of Cyrus is an antiquarian fantasy, remoter in its appeal than Urn Burial, but is rich in quaint conceits and rhetorical effects.

"In vain do individuals hope for immortality, or any patent from oblivion, in preservations below the moon: men have been deceived even in their flatteries, above the sun, and studied conceits to perpetuate their names in heaven. The various cosmography of that part hath already varied the names of contrived constellations; Nimrod is lost in Orion, and Osiris in the dog-star. While we look for incorruption in the heavens, we find they are but like the earth; durable in their main bodies, alterable in their parts; whereof, beside comets and new stars, perspectives begin to tell tales, and the spots that wander about the sun, with Phaethon's favour, would make clear conviction."

"There is nothing strictly immortal, but immortality. Whatever hath no beginning, may be confident of no end; which is, the peculiar of that necessary essence that cannot destroy itself; and the highest strain of omnipotency, to be so powerfully constituted as not to suffer even from the power of itself. All others have a dependent being and within the reach of destruction. But the sufficiency of Christian immortality frustrates all earthly glory, and the quality of either state after death makes a folly of posthumous memory. God, who can only destroy our souls, and hath assured our resurrection, either of our bodies or names, hath directly promised no duration. Wherein there is so much of chance, that the boldest expectants have found unhappy frustration, and to hold long subsistence, seems but a scape in oblivion. But man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes, and pompous in the grave, solemnizing nativities and deaths with equal lustre, not omitting ceremonies of bravery in the infancy of his nature"¹

Another interesting antiquary was THOMAS FULLER, born in 1638 at Aldwinkle, Northampton (also the birthplace of Dryden), the son of a clergyman and educated at Cambridge. After taking Orders he was successively rector of Broadwindsor, Dorset, Lecturer at the Savoy, and Chaplain to Charles II, and won fame as a preacher. He was an ardent Royalist and refused to subscribe to the Solemn League and Covenant in 1643, in 1644 he was in Basing House siege. In 1648 he was made perpetual curate of Waltham Abbey by the Earl of Carlisle. During the Commonwealth he was deprived of his various preferments, but on the Restoration these were restored. On August 12, 1661 while preaching at the Savoy, he was taken ill, and died four days later.

As a writer of popular Church history, not painfully addicted to accuracy, he obtained a considerable vogue. He had a witty sententiousness of speech that appealed to many, and this quality, indeed, constitutes his best claim upon the modern reader, and is amply illustrated in his most considerable work, The Worthies of England, published in 1662 by his son.

His dry antithetical humour appealed strongly to Coleridge and Lamb, and the peculiarities of his style were indeed thoroughly esteemed by those latter Elizabethan enthusiasts. We can understand the delight of Elia in reading concerning short prayers that "the soldier may at the same time shout out his prayer to God and aim his pistol at the enemy, the one better hitting the mark for the other."

Lacking the splendour of Browne and the opulent variety of Burton, he is, none the less, no inconsiderable ornament to the prose writers of the time.

DRAKE'S VOYAGE

"On the 9th of January following (1579) his ship, having a large wind and a smooth sea, ran aground on a dangerous shoal and struck twice on it, knocking twice at the door of death which no doubt had opened the third time. Here they stuck from eight o'clock at night till four the next afternoon having ground too much, and yet too little to land on, and water too much, and yet too little to sail in. Had God, who as the wise man saith (Prov. xxx. 4) holdeth the winds in his fist, but opened his little finger, and let out the smallest blast, they had undoubtedly been cast away, but there blow not any wind all the while. Then they conceiving aright that the best way to lighten the ship was first to ease it of the burthen of their sins by true repentance, humbled themselves by fasting under the hand of God. Afterwards they received the communion, dining on Christ in the sacrament, expecting no other than to sup with him in heaven. Then they cast out of their ship six great pieces of ordnance, threw overboard as much wealth as would break the heart of a miser to think on it, with much sugar, and pecks of spice, making a cauld of the sea round about. Then they betook themselves to their prayer, the best lever at such a dead lift indeed, and it pleased God that the wind, formally their mortal enemy, became their friend, which, changing from the starboard to the larboard of the ship, and rising by degrees, cleared them off to the sea again, for which they returned unfeigned thanks to Almighty God"¹

ISAAC WALTON was born at Stafford in 1593, of yeoman stock. In early life he migrated to London, where he made a modest fortune in business, from which he retired in 1643. He was twice married, first to Rachel Floud, a descendant of Archbishop Cranmer, his second wife being half-sister to Thomas Ken, Bishop of Bath and Wells.

Sir Henry Wotton having collected material for a life of Donne which he did not live to write, formed the nucleus of the Lives afterwards published by Walton between 1640 and 1678. His most famous work, The Compleat Angler, was published in 1653.

Walton's later years were spent at Winchester, where he died at the age of ninety, in the house of his son-in-law, Prebendary Hawkins, and lies buried in Winchester Cathedral.

His works are slight in bulk but admirable in quality. The Compleat Angler is, in its way, a little masterpiece, while the Lives abound in delightfully happy touches. As with many another writer of the age, the subject matter is of secondary importance. One may love The Compleat Angler without being in any sense a sportsman, and as for the Lives, there is little of real note that he tells us of his men, but the vital and intimate manner in which he pictures Donne, Hooker, Herbert, for us is beyond praise. The sober brevity and simplicity of style to some extent remind us of Bunyan, the Elizabethan arabesque of divers colours is absent here, and the mellow, unobtrusive learning, and pensive Quakerlike atmosphere, exercise a remarkable charm upon the student of letters.

"But turn out of the way a little, good scholar, towards yonder high hedge we will sit whilst this shower falls so gently upon the teeming earth, and gives a sweeter smell to the lovely flowers that adorn the verdant meadows."

"Look, under that broad beech-tree I sat down when I was last this way a-fishing, and the birds in the adjoining grove seemed to have a friendly contention with an echo whose dead voice seemed to live in a hollow cave near to the brow of that primrose hill. There I sat, viewing the silver streams glide silently towards their centre, the tempestuous sea, yet sometimes opposed by rugged roots and pebble stones, which broke their waves and turned them into foam and sometimes viewing the harmless lambs, some leaping securely in the cool shade, whilst others sported themselves in the cheerful sun, and others were craving comfort from the swollen udders of their bleating dams. As thus I sat, these and other sights had so fully possessed my soul that I thought—as the poet has happily expressed it:

"I was for that time lifted above earth;
And possessed joys not promised in my birth."

"As I left this place, and entered into the next field, a second pleasure entertained me; 'twas a handsome milkmaid that had cast away all care, and sung like a nightingale. Her voice was good, and the ditty fitted for it, 'twas that smooth song which was made by Kit Marlow, now at least fifty years ago; and the milkmaid's mother sung an answer to it, which was made by Sir Walter Raleigh in his younger days."²

Along with Walton may be noted Sir THOMAS URQUHART, born in 1611, and educated at King's College, Aberdeen. He fought against the Covenanters in 1639. Had travelled in France, Spain, and Italy, and is said to have died from uncontrollable laughter at the news of the Restoration in 1660. Among his eccentric writings was a genealogy of his family traced to Adam and Eve, with himself as the one hundred and fifty-third in the line of succession, in 1653 he published the first part of his translation of Rabelais, a second portion in conjunction with a Frenchman, Peter Anthony Motteux, appearing in 1693.

An original figure, with a taste for fantasy that outran even Browne's. His translation of Rabelais is written in an elaborately whimsical style that will attract the admirers of Burton, but as Professor Saintsbury has humorously said: "It must be admitted that it was well he left no school."

Finally, there is JAMES HARRINGTON (1611-1677) (not to be confused with Sir John Harrington, godson of Queen Elizabeth, who translated Ariosto) the companion of Charles I in his captivity, and the author of the Utopian picture Oceana (1656). The Oceana is a distinct addition to the literature of ideal republics, and is wrought with much of the quaint whimsicality and fantastic learning of the later Elizabethan writers. But it is something more than this. It is at once a picture and a criticism of Cromwell's England in thin romantic guise. As compared with More's Utopia, and Bacon's New Atlantis, it is greatly inferior in literary power, lacking the grace of More and the lucidity of Bacon. There are also other differences. More is preoccupied with social and ethical considerations, Bacon's mind is teeming with scientific suggestions. Harrington's Oceana is more strictly a study in political theory, and his main thesis is that the form of government should follow the distribution of property. Equality should be the keystone of the situation. "Where there is inequality of estates there must be inequality of power, and where there is inequality of power there can be no commonwealth."

Equality cannot be obtained by means of a solatium to the chief magistracy secured by the suffrage of the people given by the ballot.

Incidentally, Harrington's work contained a vigorous criticism of Hobbes' theory of political absolutism.

II. PROSE;

John Bunyan.

(d) JOHN BUNYAN

IN Puritanism has Milton as its singer, in John Bunyan is found its storyteller.

Born in 1628 at Elstow, near Bedford, the world-famed author of The Pilgrim's Progress came of "low and inconsiderable generation," and assures us that his "father's house" was of that "rank that is meanest and most despised in the land." An elementary education at the village free school was the best he could hope to receive, for at an early age poverty forced him to follow his father's calling, that of a tinker or brazier.

All through his life Bunyan had been peculiarly afflicted by a strange spiritual conflict ever taking place within him; a continual struggle with doubts and temptations, and possessed, moreover, with a sense of sin that to his introspective mind became magnified out of all proportion. As a child he had been subject to the most abject fits of despair, even during his play hours, and the few innocent sports he indulged in were eventually put aside, one by one, in response to an inward call for renunciation.

When sixteen he was called upon to mourn the loss of a beloved mother, and on his father marrying again only two months later, the lad left home and enlisted in the army. For two years he served with the Parliamentarians in the Low Countries. On one occasion being chosen by lot to take part in a siege, he, fortunately both for himself and for posterity, exchanged places with a comrade who was "shot in the head and died."

With characteristic self-abasement he acknowledges to have led a careless life, and to have been "the ungodliest fellow for swearing they ever heard"; whether or no we are to credit him with all the dreadful doings of these youthful days, remains doubtful. However, on his leaving the army a fresh interest came into his life. He fell in love with a young woman whose sole fortune consisted of two pious books given to her by her father, and her companionship was to have a marked influence for the future. Though but nineteen, they married, notwithstanding they were "as poor as poor might be, not having so much as a dish or spoon betwixt them", but this union, that might have been considered so improvident in most cases, was contracted by them in simple faith and trust, and with the happiest domestic results; unfortunately it was only too brief. Bunyan's good help-met died about seven years later, leaving to their father's care two boys and two girls, one of whom was blind.

Three years after his marriage John Bunyan wrote his first work—Sighs from Hell, or the Cries of a Damned Soul—and about the same time was baptized and received into "full Church privileges" by the Baptists of Bedford, his life henceforward to be dedicated to the delivering of his spiritual message, by word of mouth as well as pen.

Forceful and popular as a village preacher, he exercised a tremendous influence upon his hearers; but his fearless denunciation of vice and Puritan doctrines caused considerable friction among the Church people, so that it was not long before those in authority found an opportunity to thrust him into prison. On November 12, 1660, he was committed to prison for three months as "a common upholder of several unlawful meetings," and until 1672 was continually in and out of Bedford Gaol. At first he was treated with much leniency and indulgence by his gaolers, being allowed out secretly to preach and conduct meetings; however, this unusual proceeding coming under the notice of the authorities, he was subject to a more rigid surveillance and forbidden "even to look out at the door."

In 1661, during one of his terms of freedom, finding it expedient for the sake of his motherless children, Bunyan married again, his choice falling on a strong, noble, good-hearted woman, who did all in her power to procure his release when he was again imprisoned. Having petitioned the judges three times without success, she journeyed to London and pleaded his cause before the House of Peers, but much as they sympathized with her, no action was taken in the matter. Indeed, it seemed of little use to give Bunyan his freedom, for immediately he was released, he qualified for prison again.

But during these twelve years of life in Bedford Gaol, Bunyan was by no means idle. His family had to be supported, so he earned a small pittance by making "tagged laces," and unable to preach he began to write. Four of his famous works are assigned to this period—The Holy City, or the New Jerusalem (1665), Grace Abounding (1666), Justification by Jesus Christ (1671), and Defence of the Doctrine of Justification (1672).

In 1671, notwithstanding that Bunyan was still a prisoner, the Baptists of Bedford appointed him as their minister, and on his release in 1672, he received one of the first licences to preach under the new Act of Declaration of Indulgence, that granted liberty of conscience to Roman Catholic and Non-conformist alike—a concession that was withdrawn by the repeal of the Act three years later.

Act or no Act, it was not in the nature of honest John Bunyan to refrain from giving forth his message to the world, and for his temerity in doing so he again suffered. However, if a ban is placed upon his speech, he can still use his pen, and it was during this period that he wrote his most popular work, The Pilgrim's Progress, the first part of which was published in a cheap form in 1678, The Life and Death of Mr. Badman in 1680, The Holy War (1682), and two years later appeared the second part of The Pilgrim's Progress.

Not only did the fame of "the inspired tinker" as an author reach London, but also his fame as a preacher, and "Bishop Bunyan," as he was frequently styled, received many calls to preach his doctrines in the great city. On one of these memorable occasions we are told that, in Southwark, on a cold week-day morning in winter, he preached to twelve hundred people, and on Sundays to a congregation of over three thousand, and to reach the pulpit he was "pulled across the heads of the people."

Ever ready to do his best for all men, his well-known kind-heartedness cost him dear. Asked to intercede in some difference between a father and son, he journeyed to Reading for the purpose, but while passing through London on his return home caught a chill, which resulted in his death after a few days' illness at the house of his friend John Strudwick, at the sign of the Star, Snow Hill, Holborn, on August 31, 1688, and all that is mortal of the great John Bunyan was laid to rest in Bunhill Fields. His wife survived him as did six of his children, and his life's savings amounted to £100.

But his legacy to posterity in his marvellous output of sixty books and tracts cannot be estimated in figures, for surely no man with so few worldly advantages, and in the face of so many difficulties, left so great an influence to be carried down to future generations.

English Puritanism found its first allegorist in Spenser, but the abstractions of Spenser pale into phantasmal figures beside the concrete embodiments of Bunyan. The literary significance of Bunyan's work—The Pilgrim's Progress and The Life and Death of Mr. Badman in particular—lies in his concrete vitality and narrative power. It would be overstating the matter to call him founder of the modern novel; that distinction must be shared by Daniel Defoe. But it is quite true to call him the pioneer of the modern novel. Bunyan had the qualities of the great story-teller; he had insight into character, humour, pathos, and the visualising imagination of the dramatic artist.

Despite all its moralising and theological passion, the greatness of The Pilgrim's Progress is the greatness of every genuine work of art. It was not written primarily to convert the unbeliever, or to express a school of religious experience; it was written to please its author.

"I did not think
To shew to all the world my pen and ink,
... nor did I undertake
Thoreby to please my neighbour; no, not I;
I did it mine own self to gratifie."

Bunyan's chief writings are: Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666), a kind of spiritual autobiography, not unlike the Confessions of St. Augustine; The Pilgrim's Progress from this World to that which is to Come (1678-1679), The Holy War (1682); and The Life and Death of Mr. Badman (1680).

Of these The Pilgrim's Progress is unquestionably the most important. The idea of a Heavenly City inspiring the earthly pilgrim was not peculiar to Bunyan, for another writer, De Guileville, in his Pilgrimage of the Soul, had already pictured it. But there is no need on this account to question Bunyan's originality. Even had he known of this other book, the differences of treatment are wide enough, and, as Dr. Brown says in his estimate of Bunyan, "The looking for a city with eternal foundations was a New Testament idea as accessible to Bunyan as to the Monk of Chalcis; while the house of Grace Dieu and the Palace Beautiful, like the house of Mercy in the Fæerie Queene, may well have been suggested by the old houses of Entertainment prepared for pilgrims and travellers on their way."

The scenic setting of the book is obviously inspired by the country around Bedford.

The influence of the Bible upon Bunyan's style has already been noted. In the Pilgrim's Progress it is seen at its best; the style is terse, simple, vivid, and its appeal is at once to the unlettered and to the cultured. "This is the great merit of the book," said Dr. Johnson, "that the most cultivated man cannot find anything to praise more highly, and the child knows nothing more amusing."

The Holy War is also an allegory; but the characters are far less alive, and there is little of that variety and salt of humanity that give The Pilgrim's Progress its compelling appeal. On the other hand, there is no small measure of descriptive vigour, and the account of the first Siege of Mansoul is in Bunyan's happiest vein.

Mr. Badman is a work of another type, and is second in value and literary significance to the great allegory. It is a realistic novel, a picture of low life, such as Naah had first essayed in English fiction, and Defoe carried to a high level of excellence. As a picture of the shadier side of country life in Stuart times, it has considerable historical interest, especially to the student of the development of English fiction. Christian is converted; Mr. Badman lives and dies in his "City of Destruction," or, in the author's words, he "went to school with the Devil, from his childhood to the end of his life."

Bunyan seems to breathe a different air from that enjoyed by most of the great writers of the Renaissance. Anything less like the Elizabethan spirit of a Spenser, a Shakespeare, a Jonson, we can scarcely imagine than this intensely earnest, unlettered, brooding tinker. Milton's austere Puritanism could not conceal his varied scholarship and love of beauty. But Bunyan seems to belong to another age. Yet Bunyan was, deep down, a child of the Renaissance, and had far more affinity with the poets and dramatists of Elizabeth's day than with the era of satire and good sense that followed it.

His prose is in lineal descent from Jonson and Raleigh, and if in its simple clarity and directness it reminds us rather of the age of Dryden than of Shakespeare, that is really due to the happy accident of Bunyan's limited education. It shows precisely how much the translation of the Bible had done for unlettered folk. Weighted by no scholarship, troubled by no school of style, he derived straight from the English Bible. Had it been for nothing else, his link with the Renaissance and Reformation would be clear enough. But there is something more.

Bunyan's nature was elemental, passionate, swinging violently from one emotional extreme to another. An interesting, vital man, he threw all the energising power, the whole-hearted rapture, that the Elizabethans gave to the world of sense, into the world of religious experience. What beauty was to Spenser, and power to Marlowe, righteousness was to Bunyan. Yet he was no fanatic, no hysterical extremist. A large-boned, sturdily built, red-faced country tinker, he did not suggest the stuff of which the world's great dreamers are made. Nor was his environment such as to inspire the imagination of the religious enthusiast. Nature came to the help of a John Knox, and a Calvin; but the placid meadow-land and lazily winding Ouse, the broad, flat spaces near Elstow, seem more likely to nurse a Jane Austen than a Bunyan. Yet, in this country, lapped round with all the dull, commonplace routine of the country life, he found himself in a hell of spiritual conflict.

Beneath the placid exterior of the man there burned a fierce fire. Violence of imagination had been his from early days; and as he grew older, the fire burned more fiercely, turning to ashes all the amusements of youth, however harmless, torturing him with dreams of his own worldliness, and urging him to find peace for his racked spirit.

Let us regard him, therefore, as a genuine child of the Renaissance, in a Puritan framework. A greater moral contrast with Marlowe it would be hard to imagine, while Pope in his pulpit moments would have seemed a congenial spirit. Yet he had a striking temperamental affinity with Marlowe; and a whole world of feeling and experience divided the author of the Holy War from the author of The Essay on Man.

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

Now, I beheld in my dream that they had not journeyed far, but the river and the way for a time parted, at which they were not a little sorry, yet they durst not go out of the way. Now the way from the river was rough, and their feet tender by reason of their travel; so the souls of the pilgrims were much discouraged because of the way. (Num. xxi. 4) Wherefore, still as they went on, they wished for a better way. Now, a little before them, there was on the left hand of the road a meadow, and a stile to go over into it, and that meadow is called By-path Meadow. Then said Christian to his fellow, If this meadow lieth along by our wayside, let us go over into it. Then he went to the stile to see, and behold a path lay along by the way on the other side of the fence. "Tis according to my wish, said Christian. Here is the easiest going; come, good Hopeful, and let us go over.

Hope. But how if this path should lead us out of the way?

Chr. That is not likely, said the other. Look, doth it not go along by the wayside? So Hopeful, being persuaded by his fellow, went after him over the stile. When they were gone over, and were got into the path, they found it very easy for their feet, and withal they, looking before them, espied a man walking as they did, and his name was Vain-confidence: so they called after him, and asked him whither that way led. He said, To the Celestial Gate. Look, said Christian, did not I tell you so? By this you may see we are right. So they followed, and he went before them. But, behold, the night came on, and it grew very dark; so that they that were behind lost sight of him that went before.

He therefore that went before (Vain-confidence by name), not seeing the way before him, fell into a deep pit (Isa. ix. 16), which was on purpose there made by the prince of those grounds, to catch vain-glorious fools withal, and was dashed to pieces with his fall.

Now Christian and his fellow heard him fall, so they called to know the matter; but there was none to answer, only they heard a groaning. Then said Hopeful, Where are we now? Then was his fellow silent, as mistrusting that he had led him out of the way; and now it began to rain, and thunder, and lighten, in a most dreadful manner, and the water rose again.

Then Hopeful groaned within himself, saying, Oh that I had kept on my way!

Chr. Who could have thought that this path should have led us out of the way?

Hope. I was afraid on't at the very first, and therefore gave you that gentle caution. I would have spoken plainer, but that you are older than I.

Chr. Good brother, be not offended. I am sorry I have brought thee out of the way, and that I have put thee into such imminent danger. Pray, my brother, forgive me; I did not do it of an evil intent.

Hope. Be comforted, my brother, for I forgive thee; and believe, too, that this shall be for our good.

Chr. I am glad I have with me a merciful brother.

But we must not stand here; let us try to go back again.

Hope. But, good brother, let me go before.

Chr. No, if you please, let me go first, that, if there be any danger, I may be first therein; because by my means we are both gone out of the way.

Hope. No, said Hopeful, you shall not go first; for your mind being troubled, may lead you out of the way again—Then for their encouragement they heard the voice of one saying, "Let thine heart be towards the highway, even the way that thou wentest. turn again" (Jer xxxi 21.) But by this time the waters were greatly risen, by reason of which the way of going back was very dangerous. (Then I thought that it is easier going out of the way when we are in, than going in when we are out.) Yet they adventured to go back, but it was so dark, and the flood so high, that in their going back they had like to have been drowned nine or ten times.

Neither could they, with all the skill they had, get again to the stile that night. Wherefore at last, lighting under a little shelter, they sat down those untold day-break, but being weary, they fell asleep. Now there was, not far from the place where they lay, a castle, called Doubting Castle, the owner whereof was Giant Despair; and it was in his grounds they now were sleeping. Wherefore he, getting up in the morning early, and walking up and down in his fields, caught Christian and Hopeful asleep in his grounds. Then with a grim and sultry voice he bid them awake, and asked them whence they were, and what they did in his grounds. They told him they were pilgrims, and that they had lost their way. Then said the giant, You have this night trespassed on me, by trampling in and lying on my grounds, and therefore you must go along with me. So they were forced to go, because he was stronger than they. They also had but little to say, for they knew themselves in a fault. The giant, therefore, drove them before him, and put them in his castle, in a very dark dungeon, nasty and stinking to the spirits of these two men. Here, then, they lay from Wednesday morning till Saturday night, without one bit of bread, or drop of drink or light, or any to ask how they did: they were, therefore, here in evil case, and were far from friends and acquaintance (Ps. lxxviii 8.) Now in this place Christian had double sorrow, because it was through his unadvised counsel that they were brought into this distress.

Now Giant Despair had a wife, and her name was Diffidence: so, when he was gone to bed, he told his wife what he had done, to wit, that he had taken a couple of prisoners, and cast them into his dungeon for trespassing on his grounds. Then he asked her also what he had best do further to them. So she asked him what they wore, whence they came, and whither they were bound, and he told her. Then she counselled him that when he arose in the morning he should beat them without mercy. So when he arose he getteth him a grievous crab tree cudgel, and goes down into the dungeon to thorn, and there first falls to rating of them as if they were dogs, although they never gave him a word of distaste; then he fell upon them and beat them fearfully, in such sort that they were not able to help themselves, or to turn them upon the floor. Thus done he withdraws, and leaves them there to console their misery, and to mourn under their distress. So all that day they spent their time in nothing but sighs and bitter lamentations. The next night she, talking with her husband further about them, and understanding that they were yet alive, did advise him to counsel them to make away with themselves. So, when morning was come, he goes to them in a early manner as before, and perceiving them to be very sore with the stripes that he had given them the day before, he told them that, since they were never like to come out of that place, their only way would be forthwith to make an end of themselves, either with knife, halter, or poison. For why, said he, should you choose life, seeing it is attended with so much bitterness? But they desired him to let them go. With that he looked ugly upon them, and rushing to them, had doubtless made an end of them himself, but that he fell into one of his fits (for he sometimes, in sunshiny weather, fell into fits), and lost for a time the use of his hands. Wherefore he withdrew, and left them, as before, to consider what to do. Then did the prisoners consult between themselves whether it was best to take his counsel or no; and thus they began to discourse:

Chr. Brother, said Christian, what shall we do? The life that we now live is miserable. For my part, I know not whether it is best to live thus or to die out of hand. "My soul chooseth strangling rather than life" (Job vii 15), and the grave is more easy for me than this dungeon! Shall we be ruled by the giant?

Hope. Indeed our present condition is dreadful, and death would be far more welcome to me than thus for ever to abide. But yet, let us consider, the Lord of the country to which we are going hath said, "Thou shalt do no murder,"—no, not to another man's person; much more then are we forbidden to take his counsel to kill ourselves. Besides, he that kills another can but commit murder upon his body; but for one to kill himself, is to kill body and soul at once. And, moreover, my brother, thou talkest of ease in the grave; but hast thou forgotten the hell whither for certain murderers go? for "no murderer hath eternal life," &c. And let us consider, again, that all the law is not in the hand of Giant Despair, others, so far as I can understand, have been taken by him as well as we, and yet have escaped out of his hands. Who knows but that God, who made the world, may cause that Giant Despair may die, or that, at some time or other, he may forget to lock us in; or that he may in a short time have another of his fits before us, and may lose the use of his limbs? And if ever that should come to pass again, for my part, I am resolved to pluck up the heart of a man, and to try my utmost to get from under his hand. I was a fool that I did not try to do it before; but, however, my brother, let us be patient, and endure awhile. The time may come that may give us a happy release; but let us not be our own murderers. With these words Hopeful at present did moderate the mind of his brother; so they continued together in the dark that day, in their sad and doleful condition.

Well, towards evening, the Giant goes down into the dungeon again, to see if his prisoners had taken his counsel; but when he came there, he found them alive. And, truly, alive was all; for now, what for want of bread and water, and by reason of the wounds they received when he beat them, they could do little but breathe. But, I say, he found them alive; at which he fell into a grievous rage, and told them that, seeing they had disobeyed his counsel, it should be worse with them than if they had never been born.

At this they trembled greatly, and I think that Christian fell into a swoon; but coming a little to himself again, they renewed their discourse about the giant's counsel, and whether yet they had best take it or no. Now Christian again seemed for doing it; but Hopeful made his second reply as followeth.

Hope. My brother, said he, rememberest thou not how valiant thou hast been heretofore? Apollyon could not crush thee, nor could all that thou didst hear, or see, or feel in the Valley of the Shadow of Death. What hardship, terror, and amazement hast thou already gone through, and art thou now nothing but fears? Thou seest that I am in the dungeon with thee, a far weaker man by nature than thou art; also this giant has wounded me as well as thee, and hath also cut off the bread and water from my mouth; and with thee I mourn without the light. But let us exercise a little more patience: remember how thou playedst the man at Vanity Fair, and wast neither afraid of the chains nor cage, nor yet of bloody death. Wherefore let us (at least to avoid the shame that becomes not a Christian to be found in) bear up with patience as well as we can.

Now, night being come again, and the giant and his wife being in bed, she asked him concerning the prisoners, and if they had taken his counsel. To which he replied, They are sturdy rogues; they choose rather to bear all hardships than to make away with themselves. Then, said she, Take them into the castle-yard to-morrow, and show them the bones and skulls of those that thou hast already dispatched, and make them believe, ere a week comes to an end, thou also wilt tear them in pieces, as thou hast done their fellows before them.

So when the morning was come, the giant goes to them again, and takes them into the castle-yard, and shows them as his wife had hidden him. These, said he, were pilgrims, as you are, once, and they trespassed on my grounds, as you have done; and when I thought fit, I tore them in pieces; and so within ten days I will do you. Get you down to your den again: and with that he beat them all the way thither. They lay, therefore, all day on Saturday in a lamentable case, as before. Now, when night was come, and when Mrs. Diffidence and her husband the giant were got to bed, they began to renew their discourse of the prisoners: and, withal, the old giant wondered that he could neither by his blows nor counsel bring them to an end. And with that his wife replied,—I fear, said she, that they live in hopes that some will come to relieve them, or that they have picklocks about them, by the means of which they hope to escape. And sayest thou so, my dear? said the giant; I will therefore search them in the morning.

Well, on Saturday, about midnight, they began to pray, and continued in prayer till almost break of day.

Now, a little before it was day, good Christian, as one half amazed, brake out into this passionate speech:—What a fool, quoth he, am I, thus to lie in a stinking dungeon, when I may as well walk at liberty! I have a key in my bosom, called Promise, that will, I am persuaded, open any lock in Doubting Castle. Then said Hopeful, That's good news, good brother; pluck it out of thy bosom and try.

Then Christian pulled it out of his bosom, and began to try at the dungeon-door, whose bolt, as he turned the key, gave back, and the door flew open with ease, and Christian and Hopeful both came out. Then he went to the outward door that leads into the castle-yard, and with his key opened that door also. After that, he went to the iron gate, for that must be opened too. But that lock went desperately hard, yet the key did open it. Then they thrust open the gate to make their escape with speed; but that gate as it opened made such a creaking that it waked Giant Despair, who, hastily rising to pursue his prisoners, felt his limbs to fail, for his fits took him again, so that he could by no means go after them. Then they went on, and came to the King's highway again, and so were safe, because they were out of his jurisdiction.

Now, when they were gone over the stile, they began to contrive with themselves what they should do at that stile, to prevent those that should come after from falling into the hands of Giant Despair. So they consented to erect there a pillar, and to engrave upon the side thereof this sentence: "Over this stile is the way to Doubting Castle, which is kept by Giant Despair, who despiseth the King of the Celestial Country, and seeks to destroy his holy pilgrims." Many, therefore, that followed after, read what was written, and escaped the danger. Thus done they sang as follows:

Out of the way we went, and then we found
What 'twas to tread upon forbidden ground:
And let them that come after have a care
Lest heedlessness makes them as we to fare;
Lest they, for trespassing, his prisoners are Whose Castle's Doubting, and whose name's Despair.¹

III. POETRY. (a) John Milton and the Puritan Note.

(a) MILTON AND THE PURITAN NOTE

THE father of MILTON was a man of culture, a classical scholar, and a musician of no mean ability, who, having cast in his lot with the Reformers, was disinherited by an irate parent and compelled to work for his living, choosing the profession of a scrivener, which he practised at the sign of The Spread Eagle in Bread Street, Cheapside, in the City of London, his mother, the daughter of a Welsh gentleman named Caston. Their son John, who was born on December 9, 1608, thus speaks of his childhood:

"My father," he says, "destined me from my infancy to the study of polite literature, which I embraced with such avidity, that from the age of twelve, I hardly ever retired from my books before midnight. This proved the first source of injury to my eyes, whose natural weakness was attended with frequent pains in the head; but as all these disadvantages could not repress my ardour for learning, my father took care to have me instructed by various preceptors, both at home and at school."

Milton's first instructor was Thomas Young, an Essex clergyman, who, when his pupil was fifteen, became a voluntary exile on account of religious persecution. In 1623 he was sent to St. Paul's School, under Alexander Gill, the following year being admitted a pensioner at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he composed most of his Latin poems, and made the acquaintance of Edward King, whose death he laments in Lycidas.

As a youth, Milton was possessed of a singularly pleasing appearance, for which he was nicknamed the "Lady" by his college, in later life he always looked much younger than his years, and his beautiful grey eyes never betrayed their sad secret.

The young Milton, as we have seen, soon showed signs of remarkable literary promise. It seems fitting that one who became such a master of sonorous rhythm should have shaped well as an organist, but his whole-hearted allegiance was given to literature. Proud and austere even at college, he conceived as lofty a view of the poet's calling as did Wordsworth two centuries later, and, like Wordsworth, felt himself to be a consecrated spirit. Nor was this a mere idle boast. In an age of considerable licence and loose manners, Milton set a fine example by his sobriety of life. It was said of him by a contemporary, that when travelling abroad he offended the Italians by his strict morality and outspoken attacks on Popery.

In 1638 he lodged at a tailor's house in St. Bride's Churchyard, which he changed later on for a "pretty garden house" in Aldersgate Street, at that time a quiet neighbourhood. With him lived two young nephews, who found in their uncle a kindly though Spartan mentor.

In 1640 the Long Parliament met, and Episcopal government was violently attacked. Milton's religious sympathies were at once aroused, and with all alacrity he plunges into the fray.

Three pamphlets issued from his pen: Of Reformation touching Church Discipline in England

(May-June 1641), Prelatical Episcopacy (June-July), Animadversion upon the Remonstrance Defence. In the last he attacks Joseph Hall, the champion of the Episcopal cause. These pamphlets were not signed, though no mystery was made of their authorship. Also, in 1641 Milton wrote under his own name a pamphlet, The Reason of Church Government urged against Prelacy.

In 1641 Milton married Mary Powell, the seventeen-year-old daughter of a Cavalier gentleman residing in Oxfordshire. This marriage was not a happy one from the first; the change from a life of youthful gaiety to that of the companionship of an austere Puritan student so many years her senior was not congenial to this young girl, and on visiting her father's house shortly after their marriage she refused to rejoin her husband. Milton, urging "unfitness and contrariety of mind," thought of suing for a divorce; however, in 1645 a reconciliation took place, and seven years later his wife died, leaving him with three small daughters. In 1656 he married Katharine Woodcock, who died the following year. His third wife, Elizabeth Minshull, chosen for him by his friend Dr Paget, was but twenty-five when she linked her life with that of the blind poet in 1663, and lived for fifty-three years after his death.

In 1645 Milton found a more spacious dwelling in Barbican, which two years later he leaves for a small house in High Holborn, near Lincoln's Inn Fields. During the whole of the period from 1639 to 1649 he devoted himself almost entirely to politics, and what he believed to be the call of duty to his country. Then, in 1649, came the offer of the Latin Secretaryship. Hitherto he had been a political free lance, now he was offered an official post in a government, many of whose leaders—Hutchinson, Fairfax, Cromwell—had long stirred his enthusiasm and admiration.

It was an important step for a student to take, for it brought him for the first time into the very thick of the fight. It gave him an insight into the actualities of the day, which otherwise he would not have got. His worldly experiences are not turned to much poetical use, but there is certainly a reminiscence of Whitehall in the celestial description in Paradise Lost. His chief duty was to translate foreign despatches into "dignified Latin." At first he had rooms in Whitehall, but subsequently moved to another "pretty garden house" in Westminster. This house became No 19 York Street, and is associated also with the names of Bentham, James Mill, and Hazlitt. It no longer exists, having been demolished in 1877.

Blindness made his duties difficult, and rendered assistance imperative. Among those who helped him in the discharge of his duties was Andrew Marvell.

Milton served through the Protectorate. The persecution of the Vaudous, which he had officially to protest against on behalf of his country, called forth from the poet one of his finest sonnets.

At the Restoration he was arrested, but subsequently released on "paying his fees." He lived quietly and frugally at Artillery Walk, Bunhill Fields—blind, infirm, and weary, but unchanged in resolution formed years before. The resolution found expression in Paradise Lost, begun in 1638, finished in 1664, and published three years later. Milton was offered by his publisher the munificent sum of "five pounds down, five pounds more upon the sale of each of the first three editions." Ten pounds in all came into the poet's hands in 1669. After his death the copyright was sold by his widow for about eight pounds more. This agreement is now in the British Museum, to which it was given by Samuel Rogers, the banker-poet.

The Epic was published in "Little Britain," the booksellers' quarter, which stretched from Botolph Church, Aldersgate, to Bartholomew's Hospital, and for a while lay unnoticed on the bookstalls. The story goes that the Earl of Dorset was in Little Britain, boating about for books to his taste. There was Paradise Lost. He was surprised by some passages he struck upon, dipping here and there, and bought it. The bookseller begged him to speak in its favour if he liked it, for that they lay on his hands as waste paper. My lord took it home, read it and sent it to Dryden, who in a short time returned it, with the comment, "This man cuts us all out, and the Ancients too."

Perhaps the poem in which the man, if not the poet, found fullest utterance is Samson Agonistes, 1671; Paradise Regained was published also the same year. Among his many other works may be mentioned those relating to The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, 1643, The Four Chief Places of Scripture which treat of Marriage, 1645; in 1644, his great prose work, A Speech for the Liberty of Uncensored Printing, previous to this, while living at Horton, near Windsor, he wrote L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, 1632, Arcades, 1633; Comus, 1634; and Lycidas, 1637.

In addition to his blindness he was a sufferer from chronic gout. After months of ill-health, "the gout struck in." He died on November 8, 1674, and lies buried in St Giles', Cripplegate, beside his father.

HIS WORK

In his literary parentage Milton owes somewhat to both Donne and Spenser, and in a slight degree to Ben Jonson. But his debts were slight as compared with the rich legacy he gave to English poetry; and it has been justly said that he represented the fourth great influence in English prosody. Chaucer had transformed Middle English into a robust force; and Spenser and Shakespeare gave—the one to narrative, the other to dramatic poetry—a sweetness and variety impossible to overrate. Then there came a period largely of imitation and elaboration, rather than of any great originality. English poetry between the time of Shakespeare and Milton has many gifts and graces, but the quality of greatness is denied it, and it was left for Milton to restore this quality to our poetry. He is the last word in the English Renaissance. Gradually but surely its splendour had been fading away, but in Milton it flames up into a glorious sunset, and, like the sunset, is touched by a grave and pensive beauty peculiarly its own.

The serious and meditative spirit infused by Puritanism into the poetry of the time turned Milton's thoughts from such subjects as the Arthurian Legend (once considered by him), and his epic genius found perfect expression in the Biblical story of the Fall of Man. Nothing is more characteristic of the poet than the arduous mental development he deliberately set before himself in order to grapple with his task. The earlier years of his life were spent in hard study and preparation; then for a while he plunged into fierce political controversy in the cause of civil and religious liberty; finally, in the last years of his life he gave us, as the fruit of his mature genius, Paradise Lost, Paradise Regained, and Samson Agonistes.

Sense of Beauty.—Possessing a sense of beauty, as keen though less unrestrained than that possessed by the Elizabethans, Milton's devotion to form and coherence separates him from the great Romantics, and gives to the beauty of his verse a delicacy and gravity all its own. Like Jonson, he favoured the classical conventions rather than the happy-go-lucky methods of romanticism; but unlike Jonson he never allowed his scholarship to chill his creative imagination. Nowhere is this quality of beauty better displayed than in the early poems, in Allegro, Penseroso, Comus, and Lycidas. They have all the freshness and charm of youth, and exhibit the lighter and more fanciful side of Milton's genius.

As an illustration, take the image in his address to Melancholy:

"Come, pensive nun, devout and pure."

A Statelyness of Manner.—With this sense of beauty is combined a stateliness of manner which gives a high dignity to Milton's poetry, that has never been surpassed, and rarely equalled in our literature.

The dramatic possibilities of blank verse had been developed to a wonderful degree by Marlowe and Shakespeare, but in their successors it had to some extent deteriorated. Jonson's classical severity was not combined with any considerable beauty or distinction; and the increasing looseness of texture in the plays favoured a slovenly tendency in the blank verse of the day. In the lighter form of verse, and in the lyric, there was no such falling off, but the more ambitious and elaborate forms of non-dramatic poetry stood in need of some influence at once chastening and inspiring. In his great epic, Milton is extraordinarily fertile in the methods he adopts to avoid monotony. He strengthens blank verse without cramping it; he gives it grace without making it rapid, and rounds off with finished care the single line without ever sacrificing the organic unity of the entire poem. He is like a great organist who, while never losing sight of the original melody, adorns it with every conceivable variation which serves to exhibit, in place of obscuring, the freshness and sweetness of the simple theme.

The decadence of the drama was in itself a sufficient testimony to the disintegrating forces of the day. Austerity was needed by any man of letters who would raise our literature again to a noble level. And none used this quality with more unflinching purpose than Milton. No doubt it made him unpopular. Perhaps no great poet was ever accounted so little by his own generation as Milton. But his greatness was not for long undiscovered.

The modern reader may regard with but languid interest the celestial pageant that Milton unrolls before him in his lengthy epics, but the merits of Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained do not depend upon the reader's taste in theology, but upon the stark grandeur of many descriptive passages, and the passionate love of Nature which glows throughout the poet's work. It meets us first in the fresh sweetness of L'Allegro and Il Penseroso:

"Russet leaves and fallows grey,
Where the nibbling flocks do stray
Mountains on whose barren breast
The labouring clouds do often rest
Meadows trim with daisies pied,
Shallow brooks and rivers wide";

gains strength and dignity in Lycidas:

"While the still morn went out with sandals grey";

and thrills us with sublime splendour in Paradise Lost and Samson Agonistes:

"... airs, vernal airs
Breathing the smell of field and grove, attune
The trembling leaves while Universal Pan,
Knut with the Graces and the Hours in dance,
Led on the Eternal Spring."

Of Milton's prose writings it may be said that uncompromising directness and passionate vehemence characterise all these documents. His avowed object had been, he says, "to write plainly and roundly," for he had resolved "to vindicate the spotless truth from an ignominious bondage whose native worth is now become of such low esteem that she is like to find small credit with us for what she can say . . ."

The last pamphlet differs from those preceding, for in place of dealing with the question historically he approaches it from a philosophic standpoint. His method is discursive and speculative, and he certainly adopts a larger point of view than before.

What interests us here is the extraordinary display in the pamphlets of Milton's passion for Independence. He feels far too strongly to write and reason temperately: fierce and bitter denunciation, tempestuous personalities are hurled against his opponents. That acute sense of the righteousness of his own cause, which has always characterised the Puritan, and made of him so merciless an opponent, animates Milton's political writings.

And these tracts are the more remarkable when we recall the fact that they came from a quarter where Puritanism was seldom found. The scholar of the time, saturated with academic traditions, sensitive to the romantic appeal of Shakespeare and his school, had more in common with the Cavaliers than with the party of the Roundheads. Yet this admirer of Shakespeare, this writer of masques, this precise scholar, chooses to side with the party which frowned on amusements and despised profane letters. And although the literary student will miss in his prose nearly all those qualities which give desirability and distinction to his poetry, the pamphlets indicate the man even more fully than the epics. One is not accustomed to think of Milton as one thinks of Sir Thomas More and Shelley, and yet there is as much of the Utopian dreamer about him. "I did but prompt the age to quit their clogs," he said. And assuredly, it was the aspiration for a cleaner, juster, sweeter world that fed the fire of his passion for liberty. Behind the violent, scurrilous pamphleteer was the idealist. Always is he on the side of liberty, whether it be religious or civil, and although I could quite imagine Charles Stuart would have proved a more congenial companion for Milton than Cromwell, yet he approves the fate of the King and welcomes Cromwell warmly.

The least ephemeral of the tracts, and the best known, is the Areopagitica—a speech for the liberty of unlicensed Printing. This was published in 1644, and was cast in the form of a speech addressed to the Parliament. After complimenting them, he declares so highly does he esteem their wisdom that he will pay them the "supreme compliment" of questioning one of their ordinances. Forthwith he quotes the Printing Ordinance, June 14, 1643, enacting that no book, pamphlet, or paper should henceforth be printed unless it had previously been approved and licensed by the official censors or one of them.

Books, he says, were things of which a Commonwealth ought to take no less vigilant charge than of their living subjects. "For books do contain a potency of life in them, to be as active as that soul whose progeny they are. . . . As good almost kill a man as kill a good book; who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image, but he who destroys a good book kills reason itself. . . . A good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life." What if the principle of State licensing were carried out? he asks. "Shall the State regulate singing, dancing, looking out at windows, standing on balconies, eating, drinking, dressing, love-making?" Even, he argues, if the end were honestly the suppression of bad books, and that were practicable, all would depend on the qualification of the licensers. As to these gentlemen, Milton expresses himself with his usual frankness.

Milton sympathised as little with the Presbyterian party as he did with the Episcopal, which indeed logically he could scarce help doing. And there is a passage where he shows clearly how comical a notion the idea of an official "minister of religion" has become. He calls it "being religious by deputy . . . or the use of a Popular London Clergyman." It is certainly extremely interesting from the light it throws on the psychology of the Puritan, and in its mocking humour will remind the modern reader of certain passages in For's Clavigera. Here is an extract:

"A wealthy man, addicted to his pleasure and profits, finds Religion to be a traffic so entangled, and of so many peddling accounts, that of all mysteries he cannot skill to keep a stock going on that trade. What should he do? Fain would he have the name to be religious; fain would he bear up with his neighbours in that. What does he therefore but resolves to give over toiling and to find himself out some factor to whose care and credit he may commit the whole managing of his religious affairs. To him he adheres; resigns the whole warehouse of his religion, with all the locks and keys, into his study, and indeed makes the very person of that man his religion, esteeming his associating with him a sufficient evidence and commendation of his own piety. So that a man may say his Religion is now no more within himself but . . . goes and comes near him according as that good man frequents the house. He entertains him . . . lodges him . . . and after the Malmsey or some well-spiced beverage, and better breakfasted than He whose appetite would have gladly fed on green figs between Bethany and Jerusalem, his Religion walks abroad at eight, and leaves his kind entertainer in the shop, trading all day without his religion."

It is quite true that in the theory of toleration advocated by the Areopagitica, Milton is not inclined to go so far as some of his contemporaries, but here, as in many other cases, the principle advocated carries its exponent far beyond that of which he wots in its advocacy.

And nothing could be fuller or more explicit than his demand—"Give me the liberty to know and to argue freely according to my conscience, above all liberties."

The Influence of Milton—Variety, flexibility, lyric passion, those are qualities for which we may search Milton in vain, and in these matters Shakespeare is supremely great. But in loftiness of thought, splendid dignity of expression, and rhythmic felicities, Milton has few peers, no superior. Wordsworth owed much, Landor and Tennyson something, to his prosodic genius. The matter of his work is necessarily limited in its interest and significance, but there has been no finer exponent of the "grand manner," and it is impossible to exaggerate the influence of his wonderful diction upon the history of poetry from his own day down to the day of William Watson.

IL PENSEROSO

Thus night oft see me in thy pale career,
Till civil-suited Morn appear,
Not trick'd and frownc'd as she was wont
With the Attic boy to hunt,
But kerchief'd in a comely cloud,
While rocking winds are piping loud,
Or usher'd with a shower still,
When the gust hath blown his fill,
Ending on the rustling leaves,
With minute drops from off the eaves,
And when the sun begins to fling
His flaming beams, nie, Goddess, bring
To arch'd walks of twilight groves,
And shadows brown that Sylvan loves
Of pine, or monumental oak,
Where the rude axe with heav'd stroke
Was never heard the Nymphs to daunt,
Or fright them from their hallow'd haunt.
There in close covert by some brook,
Where no profaner eye may look,
Hide me from day's garish eye,
While the bee with honied thigh,
That at her flow'ry work doth sing,
And the waters murmuring
With such consort as they keep,
Entice the dewy-feather'd sleep;
And let some strange mysterious dream
Wave at his wings in airy stream
Of lively portraiture display'd,
Softly on my eyelids laid.
And as I wake, sweet music breathe
Above, about, or underneath,
Sent by some Spirit to mortals good,
Or the unseen Genius of the wood.

But let my due feet never fail
To walk the studious cloisters pale,
And love the high embowed roof,
With antio pillars massy proof,
And storied windows richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light.
There let the pealing organ blow,
To the full voiced quire below,
In service high, and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all heav'n before mine eyes.
And may at last my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage,
The hairy gown and mossy cell,
Where I may sit and rightly spell
Of every star that heav'n doth show,
And every herb that sips the dew;
Till old experience do attain
To something like prophetic strain.
These pleasures Melancholy give,
And I with thee will choose to live.

SAMSON ACONITES

... But chief of all,
O loss of sight, of thee I most complain!
Blind among enemies! O worse than chains,
Dungeons or beggary, or decrepit age!
Light, the prime work of God, to me is extinct,
And all her various objects of delight
Annulled, which might in part my grief have eased.
Inferior to the vilest now become
Of man or worm, the vilest here excel me.
They creep, yet see; I, dark in light, exposed
To daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong,
Withiut doors or without, still as a fool,
In power of others, never in my own—
Scarce half I seem to live, dead more than half.
O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,
Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse
Without all hope of day!
O first-created beam, and thou great Word,
Let there be light, and light was over all,
Why am I thus bereaved thy prime decree?
The Sun to me is dark
And silent as the Moon,
When she deserts the night,
Hid in her vacant interlunar oave.
Since light so necessary is to life,

And almost life itself: if it be true
That light is in the soul,
She all in every part, why was the sight
To such a tender ball as the eye confined,
So obvious and so easy to be quenched,
And not, as feeling, through all parts diffused.
That she might look at will through every pore?
Then had I not been thus exiled from light;
As in the land of darkness, yet in light
To live a life half dead, a living death,
And buried, but, O yet more miserable!
Myself my sepulchre, a moving grave;
Buried, yet not exempt
By privilege of death and burial
From worst of other evils, pains, and wrongs
But made herohy obnoxious more
To all the miseries of life,
Life in captivity
Among human foes.

SABBINA rises, attended by WATER-NYMPHS, and sings.

By the rushy-fringed bank,
Where grows the willow and the osier dank,
My sliding chariot stays;
Thuck set with agate, and the azure sheen
Of turkis blue, and emerald green
That in the channel strays;
Whilst from oft the waters fleet,
Thus I set my printless feet
O'er the cowslip's velvet head,
That bands not as I tread,
Gentle swan, at thy request I am here.¹

ON HIS BLINDNESS

When I consider how my light is spent,
Ere half my days, in this dark world and wide,
And that one talent which is death to hide,
Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent
To serve therewith my Maker, and present
My true account, lest he returning chide—
"Doth God exact day-labour, light denied?"
I fondly ask: But Patience, to prevent
That murmur, soon replies, "God doth not need
Either man's work, or his own gifts; who best
Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best: his state
Is kingly; thousands at his bidding speed,
And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
They also serve who only stand and wait."

(b) JACOBEOAN POETRY

(i) THE SCHOOL OF SPENSER—ALLEGORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE

SPENSER's immediate influence is shown in the work of Giles and Phineas Fletcher and William Browne.

GILES FLETCHER was vicar of Alderton in Suffolk, 1623, and is the author of a poem in four cantos entitled Christ's Victory and Triumph. The allegorical vein of Spenser is adopted, and some measure of his faculty for rich imagery is displayed, for instance, "White and red roses for her face were placed, and for her treasures marigolds were spilt."

PHINEAS FLETCHER, a clergyman in East Anglia, also favoured the allegory, but his most considerable work The Purple Island, though picturesque at times, is less happy in its imagery, on the whole, than the work of Giles.

The third follower, WILLIAM BROWNE, was a man of more generous literary sympathies than the two Fletchers. He was a student of Chaucer, and on friendly personal terms with, as well as an admirer of, Drayton, Jonson, and Chapman. A native of Devon, he was educated at Oxford, and probably did scholastic work there for a number of years. His first work, Britannia's Pastorals, was published in 1613, a pleasantly discursive narrative poem, written in couplets and interspersed, according to the convention of the time, with lyrics. He is not a good story-teller, but his fluent style, and gift of scenic painting, impart an agreeable quality to his work. After this poem came The Shepherd's Pipe, and here something of Chaucer's ease as well as Spenser's sweetness may be traced. Though a follower on the whole of Spenser, he was a follower by temperament rather than by literary imitativeness, as the Fletchers are for the most part, and if not a great creative power, is a poet of considerable originality, technical skill, and genuine charm.

HENRY MORE and JOSEPH BEAUMONT are less well known than the foregoing, not without good reason. Spenser's spaciousness is carried by them to a mercurial extent. In an age when long-winded romances were accepted without demur, their philosophical poems The Song of the Soul and Psychologia may have found appreciative readers with a genius for patience. But they are the least favourable specimens of their school.

(II) THE SCHOOL OF DONNE—METAPHYSICAL AND LYRIC

JOHN DONNE,¹ son of a wealthy merchant, a descendant of John Heywood of epigrammatic fame, and also of Sir Thomas More, was born in London 1537, and educated at home till he was eleven, then sent to Oxford, and at fourteen to Cambridge. Of a Roman Catholic family who were unwilling that he should subscribe to the oath required, he did not take a degree at either university though a most diligent student and eventually a learned theologian. While studying law at Lincoln's Inn, he abjured the old religion for the doctrines of the Reformers, and travelled in Spain and Italy. On his return to England he was appointed secretary to the Earl of Ellesmere, but a secret marriage with the Countess' niece procured his ignominious dismissal—with reluctance, it must be admitted, on the part of the Earl, who regrets losing "a friend, and such a secretary as was fitter to serve a king than a subject." For his clandestine marriage he was imprisoned, and on writing to his wife subscribed his letter "John Donne, Anne Donne, Un-done!"

After a career of many vicissitudes the couple were eventually forgiven by Sir George More, who presented his daughter with a belated though welcome marriage portion of £800.

The Pseudo Martyr (1610) being brought to the notice of James I., is highly approved by that monarch as a contribution to anti-Catholic controversy, and it is suggested that Donne shall be ordained. Reluctant at first, considering himself unworthy, he however applies himself to further studies in Greek and Hebrew, and eventually consenting, is at once appointed Chaplain to the King, and divinity lecturer in Lincoln's Inn, with rapid preferment to livings in Huntingdonshire and Kent; subsequently he was sent on a diplomatic mission to Germany with Lord Doncaster in 1619.

In 1621, on the removal of Dr. Carey, then Dean of St. Paul's, to the see of Exeter, Donne is commanded to attend on the King at dinner, the King explaining why he is thus honoured:

"Dr. Donne, I have invited you to dinner: and though you sit not down with me, yet I will carve to you of a dish that I know you love well: for, knowing you love London, I do therefore make you Dean of St. Paul's; and, when I have dined, then do you take your beloved dish home to your study, say grace there to yourself, and much good may it do you."

Soon after his appointment to the deanery the advowson of St. Dunstan-in-the-West fell to him; which enabled him to show much charity to the poor and generosity towards his friends. "Always preaching to himself," as his biographer, Isaac Walton, says, "as if in a cloud, but in none."

Eloquent and popular, he was appointed by the King to preach many sermons, and also chosen Prolocutor to the Convocation in Parliament.

Busybodies were to the fore, no doubt through jealousy, who endeavoured to poison the King's mind against the Dean by insinuating that Donne in one of his sermons had accused the King of a leaning towards Popery, and of a dislike to his method of government. His Majesty took offence at this, and it almost proved the severance of their friendship. The Dean was, however, able to set matters right, and the King "was right glad he rested no longer under suspicion."

A few years later Donne fell into ill-health, and in 1631 died of a fever at his daughter's house in Essex, and is buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Beside the Pseudo-Martyr his best known works are The Progress of the Soul, 1601; An Anatomy of the World, an elegy, 1611; and Epihalamium, 1613.

His Work

In many ways it is not unfair to summarise Donne's remarkable genius by saying that he was an Elizabethan Browning, and placed beside Spenser, the two poets shine somewhat in the same fashion as Tennyson and Browning did in the Victorian age. His metrical roughness, his obscurities of method, his bewildering allusiveness, his ardent imagination, his taste for metaphysics, and his unexpected divergence into sweet and delightful music, all these things may remind the modern reader of the author of Sordello, and Men and Women. Nor is this comparison without foundation in fact, for Browning was an emphatic admirer of Donne's work, put the Mandrake Song to music, and was influenced by him to no inconsiderable extent. He has a far keener wit than Browning, though in the excessive voluptuousness of his early work there is no parallel with the virile though reticent passion of the Victorian. One of the most interesting things about him is his emphatic revolt from the smooth sweetness of most Elizabethan verse; and although he had the power to utter dulcet and harmonious sounds, he seems to have deliberately adopted a harsh and often staccato method in order to break away from contemporary tradition. It is not surprising to find that while an admirer of Jonson, he is more interested in Shakespeare and the song writers generally. His great originality precluded any pronounced literary formative influences; but of the two countries that influenced English literary methods at the time, Italy and Spain, he certainly owed far more to Spain. His work was pretty widely circulated in literary circles, and exercised a great and not very happy influence; for imitators found it far easier to assume his harshness and obscurity, than to display the thought and imagination that render these things tolerable. Jonson, who admired him heartily and not uncritically, predicted he would perish from not being understood.

His poetry falls naturally into three divisions: (1) Amorous, (2) Metaphysical, (3) Satirical. The amorous work includes his earliest work, and the mingling at times of sensuality and cynical wit reminds one of Byron. His metaphysical and satirical work bulks the most largely, and towards the end of his life he wrote little verse, devoting his powers entirely to homiletical literature. An illustration of the metaphysical may be found in his curious poems The Progress of the Soul and Metempsychosis, in which he pursues the vital spark through various transmigrations, including those of a bird and a fish. As an illustration of his satires may be instanced his fourth satire detailing the character of a Bore. These were framed in rhyming couplets on the Latin model, and influenced both Dryden and Pope.

His faults as a writer are the defects of his virtues, and characteristic of the time, the graceful and subtle fancies are worked occasionally to death, and like Browning he has no respect for the reader who cannot follow his keen and incisive thought, while his poetry is the more difficult to construe because of its careless versification and excessive terseness.

It will be seen by the foregoing that Donne, unlike most of his contemporaries, excelled in reflective imagination. The Elizabethan imagination was on the whole a richly observant one; there were scores of writers overflowing with a wealth of perceptive life; but, save in Shakespeare, there is singularly little metaphysical power in the men of the age.

With Donne it may be said Elizabethan poetry closes, and the Caroline poetry begins. With certain marked characteristics in common, the poetry of the late Renaissance differs from that preceding it by its more philosophic tone. To say that it is more serious would be inaccurate. There is a great sobriety about the bigger minds such as Donne (save in his early years) and Milton; but the prevalent note is less that of sobriety than of meditation, varying from the quietly pensive to the inquisitively fantastic. The note of meditation marks even the song writers of the time. The influence of Shakespeare and of Spenser is clear enough in certain directions, but it is less powerful than that of Jonson and Donne.

THE MESSAGE

Send home my long-strayed Eyes to me !
Which, O, too long have dwelt on thee.
Yet since there they have learnt such ill,
Such forced fashions
And false Passions,
That they be
Made by thee
Fit for no good sight : keep them still !

Send home my harmless Heart again !
Which no unworthy thought could stain.
But if it be taught by thine
To make jestings
Of protestings,
And break both
Word and oath ;
Keep it ! For then, 'tis none of mine !

Yet send me back my Heart and Eyes !
That I may know and see thy lies ;
And may laugh and joy, when thou
Art in anguish ;
And doth languish
For some one,
That will none !
Or prove as false as thou art now !

THE FUNERAL

Whoever comes to shroud me ; do not harm,
Nor question much,
That subtle wreath of hair which crowns my arm !
The mystery, tho' sign, you must not touch !
For 'tis my outward Soul !
Viceroy to that which, unto Heaven being gone,
Will leave this to control
And keep these limbs, her provinces, from dissolution.
For if the snowy thread, my brain lets fall
Through every part,
Can tie those parts, and make me one of all,
The hairs, which upward grew, and strength and Art
Have from a better brain,
Can better do't ! except She meant that I
By this, should know my pain,
As prisoners then are manacled, then they're Condemned to die.
Whate'er She meant by't ; bury it with me !
For since I am
Love's Martyr, it might breed idolatry,
If into other hands these relics came !
As 'twas humility
To afford to it, all that a soul can do ;
So 'tis some bravery,
That, since you would have none of me, I bury some of you !

She, whose fair body no such prison was
But that a soul might well be pleased to pass
An age in her ; she, whose rich beauty lent
Mintage to other beauties, for they went
But for so much as they were like to her ;
She, in whose body (if we dare prefer
This low world to so high a mark as she),
The western treasure, eastern spicery,
Europe and Afric, and the unknown rest
Were easily found, or what in discovery
And when we've made this large discovery
Of all, in her some one part then will be,
Twenty such parts, whose plenty and riches is Enough to make twenty such worlds as this ;
She, whom had they known, who did first betroth
The tutel' angels and assigned one both
To nations, cities and to companies,
To functions, offices, and dignities
And to each several man, to him and him,
They would have giv'n her one for every limb ;
She, of whose soul if we may say 'twas gold,
Her body was th' electrum and did hold
Many degrees of that, we understood
Her by her sight ; her pure and eloquent blood
Spoke in her cheeks, and so distinctly wrought
That one might almost say, her body thought ;
She, she thus richly and largely hous'd is gone
And chides us, slow-paced enails who crawl upon
Our prison's prison earth, nor think us well
Longer than whilst we bear our brittle shell.

Dear love, for nothing less than thee
Would I have broke this happy dream.
It was a theme
For reason, much too strong for fantasy :
Therefore thou wak'dest me wisely, yet
My dream thou brok'st not, but continued'st it ;
Thou art so true, that thoughts of thee suffice
To make dreams true, and fables histories ;
Enter these arms, for since thou thought'st it best
Not to dream all my dream, let's not the rest.

As lightning or a taper's light
Thine eyes, and not thy nose, wak'd me ;
Yet I thought thee
(For thou lov'st truth) an angel at first sight,
But when I saw thou saw'st my heart
And knew'st my thoughts beyond an angel's art,
When thou knew'st what I dreamt, then thou knew'st
when
Excess of joy would wake me, and cam'st then ;
I must confess, it would not choose but be Profane to think thee anything but thee.

Coming and staying show'd thee thee,
But rising makes me doubt that now
Thou art not thou.

That love is weak where fears are strong as he ,
'Tis not all spirit, pure and brave,
If mixture it of fear, shame, honour, have.
Perchance as torches which must ready be
Men light, and put out, so thou deal'st with me
Thou can'st to kindle, goest to come , then I
Will dream that hope again, or else would die.

Of his more remarkable followers may be mentioned, Robert Herrick, Thomas Carew, Crashaw, Henry Vaughan, George Herbert, and Lord Herbert of Chorbury.

ROBERT HERRICK (1591-1674) also supported the Royalist cause. After serving an apprenticeship as a goldsmith he went to Cambridge, took Orders, and in 1629 became Rector of Dean Prior in Devonshire. This living being in the gift of the King, Herrick was ejected in 1647, and after living a more or less free life supported by the charity of wealthy Royalists, was reinstated at Dean Prior in 1662. His principal poems are collected in the volumes Hesperides and Wit's Recreation.

His work, like that of Donne, falls into three divisions: the amatory, the religious verse, and a number of epigrams. The epigrams are negligible; Herrick was no wit, and his inventive fancy found no suitable medium in this form of literature. The religious poems show a lively if not deep piety, more remarkable perhaps for awe and fear in presence of the inscrutable than for trust and hope.

The happiest expression of Herrick's powers may be found in the love poems, abounding in quaint and charming fancies, set in a lively west-country atmosphere. He is certainly more at home in celebrating the great God Pan, than any other deity.

Many of the numbers in the Hesperides have found their way, and deservedly, into the best anthologies of our verse, such as the well-known lines To Anthea, and the delightful Corinna Maying. He has much in common with the Elizabethan song-writers, but there is about even his exquisite trifling, a touch of pensive fantasy, and in his religious verse a meditative flavour, that makes for his inclusion in the school of Donne.

TO DAFFODILS

Fair Daffodils, we weep to see
You haste away so soon :
As yet the early-rising Sun
Has not attain'd his noon
Stay, stay,
Until the hasting day
Has run
But to the even-song ;
And, having pray'd together, we
Will go with you along.

We have short time to stay, as you,
We have as short a Spring ;
As quick a growth to meet decay
As you, or any thing.
We die,
As your hours do, and dry
Away
Like to the Summer's rain ;
Or as the pearls of morning's dew,
Ne'er to be found again.

More strongly influenced by Donne, however, was Herrick's contemporary THOMAS CAREW. He also belonged to the West of England.

Born at West Wickham about 1594, Thomas was the son of Sir Matthew Carew, of Cornish blood. After a tour in Italy with his kinsman Sir Dudley Carleton, he accompanied Lord Herbert of Cherbury to France in 1619, and on his return received an appointment in the Royal Household, where he lived the careless life of the courtiers at that time, and died in 1639.

As a lyric writer he is among the finest of his age, and if lacking the spontaneity and freshness of Herrick, is his superior in fine workmanship. His amatory verse is less fanciful and more fiercely sensual than the languorous eroticism of Herrick, and his best work is less considerable in bulk. His indebtedness to Donne lies in the flexibility of his style and in a certain strength, but he was a wise disciple who eschewed his master's infirmities, and he is never obscure nor uncouth.

A good idea of his metrical ability may be gained from the study of his Persuasions to Love, a clever piece of rhythmic cadence, artfully devised, and happily successful. He is far from being the mere "elegant Court trifler" that the brilliant and capricious Hazlitt dubs him.

MEDIOCRITY IN LOVE REJECTED

Give me more love, or more disdain !
The Torrid, or the Frozen, Zone
Bring equal ease unto my pain ;
The Temperate affords me none !
Either extreme of love, or hate,
Is sweeter than a calm estate !
Give me a storm ! If it be love ;
Like Danae, in that golden shower,
I'll swim in pleasure ! If it prove Disdain ; that torrent will devour
My vulture hopes ! and he's possessed
Of Heaven, that's but from Hell released !
Then crown my joys ; or cure my pain !
Give me more love, or more disdain !

Coming to Crashaw, we approach a writer of quite another temperament from those preceding. Herrick had religious sensibilities, without being really religious. Carew was an accomplished courtier with a fine taste for the more serious problems of life, but to Crashaw religion meant everything. He has less intellectual breadth than Carew, less imaginative by-play than Herrick, but his work, though extremely uneven, rises at times to heights of rare excellence.

RICHARD CRASHAW (1613-1649), an eloquent Puritan divine, was educated at Charterhouse and Cambridge, but for refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant was expelled from his Fellowship, went to Paris and joined the Roman Catholic Church. He fell into great poverty, but through the influence of the Queen, Henrietta Maria, received the appointment of Secretary to Cardinal Palotta. He died a sub-canon of the Roman Church in 1649.

His secular poems were called Delights of the Muse; his sacred, Steps to the Temple, though the latter title was apparently the choice of his editors.

He is at his best in religious verse; his best work lies undoubtedly in The Flaming Heart, though some of his lighter things have a pleasant grace about them, notably, Wishes, to his Unknown Mistress.

WISHES FOR THE SUPPOSED MISTRESS

Whoe'er she be,
That not impossible She
That shall command my heart and me;

Where'er she lie,
Lock'd up from mortal eye
In shady leaves of destiny;

Till that ripe birth
Of studied Fate stand forth,
And teach her fair steps to our earth;

Till that divine
Idea take a shrine
Of crystal flesh, through which to shine:

—Meet you her, my Wishes,
Bespeak her to my blisses,
And be ye call'd, my absent kisses.

I wish her beauty
That owes not all its duty
To gaudy tire, or glist'ring shoe-tie;

Something more than Taffata or tissue can,
Or rampant feather, or rich fan.

A face that's best
By its own beauty drest,
And can alone command the rest.

A face made up
Out of no other ehop
Than what Nature's white hand sets ope.

Sydneian showers
Of sweet discourse, whose powers
Can crown old Winter's head with flowers.

Whate'er delight
Can make day's forehead bright
Or give down to the wings of night.

Soft silken hours,
Open suns, shady bowers;
'Bove all, nothing within that lowers.

Days, that need borrow
No part of their good morrow
From a fore-spent night of sorrow:

Days, that in spite
Of darkness, by the light
Of a clear mind are day all night.

Life, that dares send
A challenge to his end,
And when it comes, say, "Welcome, friend."

I wish her store
Of worth may leave her poor
Of wishes; and I wish—no more.

—Now, if Time knows
That Her, whose radiant brows
Weave them a garland of my vows;

Her that dares be
What these lines wish to see:
I seek no further, it is She.

'Tis She, and here
Lo! I uncliothe and clear
My wishes' cloudy character.

Such worth as this is
Shall fix my flying wishes,
And determine them to kisses.

Let her full glory,
My fancies, fly before ye;
Be ye my fictions—but her story.

HENRY VAUGHAN, a Welshman, who styled himself "Silurist," was born in 1622, educated at Oxford, studied law, and finally became a physician, practising in his native Wales. A staunch Royalist, he, with his twin brother Thomas, suffered imprisonment. A serious illness in 1651 led to deep religious fervour, which thereafter appeared in his poems. His first work, Poems, with the Tenth Satire of Juvenal Englished, appeared in 1649, and a collection of poems and translations published anonymously in 1651. Silex Scintillans (Sparks from the Flint) is his best known work and contains The Retreat, and Beyond the Veil. He died in 1695.

Vaughan, like Crashaw, was at heart a mystic, but more at home in sacred than in secular verse. His work never rises to the heights reached by Crashaw, but he had a considerable gift of fantasy and used it to decorate his serious muse, rather than to weave garlands for his pagan love. He was a man of good intellectual power, and some originality. As compared with Crashaw, he is like a gentle stream beside an impetuous waterfall. Lacking the force and vigour of his contemporary, he has a more uniform clarity and the waters are less remarkable to contemplate, but they are never muddy as is the fiercer torrent, while their tranquil windings bear with them a crystalline charm of their own.

THE RETREAT

Happy those early days, when I
Shined in my Angel-infancy
Before I understood this place
Appointed for my second race,
Or taught my soul to fancy aught
But a white, celestial thought.
When yet I had not walk'd above
A mile or two from my first love,

And looking back, at that short space
Could see a glimpse of his bright face;
When on some gilded cloud or flower
My gazing soul would dwell an hour,
And in those weaker glories spy
Some shadows of eternity;
Before I taught my tongue to wound
My conscience with a sinful sound,
Or had the black art to dispense.
A several sin to every sense,
But felt through all this fleshly dress
Bright shoots of everlastingness.

O how I long to travel back
And tread again that ancient track!
That I might once more reach that plain,
Where first I left my glorious train.
From whence th' enlighten'd spirit sees
That shady City of Palm trees!
But ah! my soul with too much stay
Is drunk, and staggers in the way.—
Some men a forward motion love,
But I by backward steps would move.
And when this dust falls to the urn,
In that state I came, return.

"The model of a man, a gentleman, and a clergyman." Such was the encomium passed by Coleridge on GEORGE HERBERT, brother of Lord Herbert of Cherbury. Educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was public orator 1619-27. A Court favourite during the reign of James I, he eventually became acquainted with Nicholas Ferrar of Little Gidding, took Orders in 1626, was prebend of Leighton Bromswold, and in 1630 Rector of Bemerton, near Salisbury, where he died at the early age of forty. Before his death he sent all his manuscripts to Nicholas Ferrar to publish or destroy as he thought fit.

Herbert's chief claim upon us lies in his volume The Temple, which has always held the popular imagination. Of all the school of Donne he is the most widely read, by reason of his clearness of presentment and his happy knack for using conceits sufficiently obvious to most people. His treatment of religious themes has the simple, unstudied earnestness of Longfellow; for devout as he is, it is the devotion rather of the gentle moralist than of the genuine mystic. Along with this delicate didactic vein, he shows a quaintness and daintiness characteristic of the time. The discerning reader will note also a welcome salt of humour in his work that preserved him from the extravagance into which so many of his contemporaries fell. His earlier work was bright and witty. Later on, his art served as handmaid to his piety. His brother, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, is inferior in sweetness and power, as a verse writer, and is best remembered as the author of an autobiography, and as a poet who first used the metre, long after made famous by Tennyson in In Memoriam.

THE WORLD

Love built a stately House : where Fortune came,
And spinning fancies, she was heard to say,
"That her fine cobwebs did support the frame!"
Whereas they were supported by the same
But Wisdom quickly swept them all away
Then Pleasure came - who (liking not the fashion)
Began to make balconies, terraces,
Till she had weakened all by alteration;
But rev'rend Laws, and many a Proclamation,
Reformed all, at length, with menaces.
Then entered Sin : and with that sycamore (Whose leaves first sheltered Man from drought and dew),
Working, and winding slyly, evermore,
The inward walls and summers cleft and tore :
But grace shored these and cut that, as it grew.
Then Sin combined with Death in a firm hand,
To raze the building to the very floor :
Which they effected. None could them withstand !
But Love and Grace took Glory by the hand,
And built a braver Palace than before.

HENRY KING, born 1592, a son of the Bishop of London, was also a Westminster boy. Taking his degree at Oxford, he was ordained in 1616, and received rapid preferment; was Dean of Rochester in 1639, and Bishop of Chichester in 1642. He wrote many elegies in Latin and English on Royal persons, and was the friend of Ben Jonson, Donne, and Izaak Walton. He died in 1669.

As a poet he has no slight share of Donne's subtlety, though little of his strength. He wrote several exquisite love-songs, among them Tell me no more how Fair She is, was very popular in his day, and certainly deserved and has achieved what many popular stars did not, anthological fame.

Some Reflections on the School of Donne—It may be gathered from these brief comments on a small but interesting group of writers, that they stand somewhat apart from the crowd of song writers that fellow hard upon Elizabethan times, extending into the light-hearted transports of the Restoration writers. The spiritual fervour that gave its un-pelling power to Puritanism, and vitality to the Catholic reaction, is traceable in nearly all its adherents, though necessarily in varying intensity. The frank eroticism of the Elizabethan, however, in many cases still persists, but coexists with super-sensual rapture. The love of a man for a maid, that fans the fire of most lyricism, is blended here with an acute perception of the mutability of life and the transient character of pleasure. Some, like Herrick and Carow, are stirred by these premonitions to dwell with even greater intensity on the physical joys and raptures of existence. Let us make the best of them while they are here, is their burden, Gather ye Rosebuds while ye may; others, like Crashaw and Herbert, seek more permanent comfort in the delights of spiritual experience. We have now to consider a contemporary group, differing remarkably in temperament and spirit from these, though akin to them in lyric grace.

(11) OTHER JACOBAN AND CAROLINE LYRISTS

Despite the glowing eulogy of Charles Lamb, it is hard to believe that George Wither will be remembered save for a few short pieces of verse. He was a writer of great fertility and variety, but unlike Drayton, did not excel in many directions. His satires are laboured, his religious musings dull and flat, and it is chiefly when he writes love songs that the lamp of his muse burns brightly and steadily. Chiefly, I say, because here and there he shows a gift of description—as in Phylarete—and Spenserian sweetness.

Born in 1588, near Alton, Hampshire, GEORGE WITHER was a student of law. In 1613 he was imprisoned for his satire Abuses Stript and Whipt, during which time he wrote a large number of poems, which he collected and published in 1622 as Juvenilia. In 1639 he took arms against the Scots, but during the Civil War turned his coat and raised a troop of horse for the Parliamentarians and was taken prisoner by the Royalists. He died in 1667, the last years of his life being full of trouble.

As a writer of amatory lyrics, he has little of that fantastic vein and sudden moods of pensive reflection peculiar to the little band recently considered. He is frank and fervent, and surprisingly respectable for his age, in his amatory enthusiasms, while his famous song Shall I, wasting in Despair, is an excellent example of his lyrical power.

THE MANLY HEART

Shall I, wasting in despair,
Die because a woman's fair?
Or my cheeks make pale with care
'Cause another's rosy are?

Be she fairer than the day
Or the flowery meads in May—
If she be not so to me,
What care I how fair she be ?

Shall my foolish heart be pined
'Cause I see a woman kind ;
Or a well disposed nature
Joined with a lovely feature ?
Be she meeker, kinder, than Turtle-dove or Pelican,
If she be not so to me,
What care I how kind she be ?

Shall a woman's virtues move
Me to perish for her love ?
Or her merit's value known
Make me quite forget mine own ?
Be she with that goodness blest
Which may gain her name of Best :
If she seem not such to me,
What care I how good she be ?

'Cause her fortune seems too high,
Shall I play the fool and die ?
Those that bear a noble mind
Where they want of riches find,
Think what with them they would do
Who without them dare to woo ;
And unless that mind I see,
What care I though great she be ?

Great or good, or kind or fair,
I will ne'er the more despair ;
If she love me, this believe,
I will die ere she shall grieve ;
If she slight me when I woo,
I can scorn and let her go ;
For if she be not for me,
What care I for whom she be ?

EDMUND WALLER led a most adventurous life ; born 1605 at Colehill, Bucks, he was admitted at Lincoln's Inn in 1622, and in 1647 was one of the commission who sat at Oxford to meet the King, and nearly lost his life for complicity in a plot to hold London for King Charles. Exiled in 1644, and fined £10,000, the sentence of banishment was revoked in 1651, and four years later he received a political appointment.

A contemporary says " he was the delight of the house ; and even at eighty he said the liveliest things of any amongst them " He died in 1687.

His reputation, as in so many cases, rests upon his songs ; though he showed skill in the couplet afterwards used with such power by Dryden. He is graceful and accomplished always, on occasion fervent ; and once at any rate, in his later years, highly imaginative, as in this fine image :

"The soul's dark cottage, battered and decayed,
Lets in new light thro' chinks that time hath made "

Among his lyric verses, such pretty pieces as Go, Lovely Rose, and On a Girdle may be instanced. Opportunistic as a man, his opportunism is equally clear in the readiness with which he adopts every new literary fashion. Sincerity and single-heartedness are jewels he has no wish to wear. One recalls his reply to Charles II, who considered his loyal compliments less remarkable than those he had so readily bestowed on Cromwell : " Poets, sir," replied Waller, with greater wit than integrity, " succeed better in fiction than in truth."

ON A GIRDLE

That which her slender waist confined
Shall now my joyful temples bind :
No monarch but would give his crown
His arms might do what this has done.

It was my Heaven's extremest sphere,
The pale which held that lovely deer :
My joy, my grief, my hope, my love
Did all within this circle move.

A narrow compass ! and yet there
Dwelt all that's good, and all that's fair ;
Give me but what this ribband bound,
Take all the rest the Sun goes round.

GO, LOVELY ROSE !

Go, lovely Rose !
Tell her, that wastes her time and me,
That now she knows,
When I resemble her to thee,
How sweet and fair she seems to be.

Tell her that's young
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That hadst thou sprung
In deserts, where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired ;
Did her come forth,
Suffer herself to be desired,
And not blush so to be admired.

Then die ! that she
The common fate of all things rare
May read in thee :
How small a part of time they share
That are so wondrous sweet and fair !

ABRAHAM COWLEY is more interesting qua pioneer than qua poet. He stands midway between the metaphysical verse writers and the common-sense school of Dryden. His prose, more remarkable on the whole than his verse, will be considered elsewhere.

The son of a London tradesman, Cowley was born in 1618, educated at Westminster School and Cambridge, and during the Civil War was expelled for his championship of the Royal cause. Fearing to remain in London, he crossed over to Paris in 1646, and gave all the assistance he could to the Queen in exile, by acting as the medium of correspondence between her and the King. Returning to England in 1656, he brought out a collected edition of his poems, was arrested as a spy and placed under bail. At the Restoration, not receiving the Mastership of the Savoy as he had hoped, and receiving a grant of land from the Crown, he retired to Chertsey, where he died of a fever in 1667, and is buried near Spenser in Westminster Abbey.

His couplet pieces are ingenious and clever, foreshadowing the eighteenth-century methods, but are not inspiring reading. His lyrics are often sweet and graceful, but here, as in most of his work, a curious irresolution of attitude chills the reader. He is neither wholly with the song writers, nor with the clear and vigorous satirists of the new age. But as the harbinger of Dryden and Pope, his work has an historical importance that must not be overlooked.

A SUPPLICATION

Awake, awake, my Lyre !
 And tell thy silent master's humble tale
 In sounds that may prevail ;
 Sounds that gentle thoughts inspire ;
 Though so exalted she
 And I so lowly be
 Tell her such different notes make all thy harmony.

Hark ! how the strings awake :
 And, though the moving hand approach not near,
 Themse'ves with awful fear
 A kind of numerous trembling make.
 Now all thy forces try ;
 Now all thy charms apply ;
 Revenge upon her ear the conquest of her eye

Weak Lyre ! thy virtue sure
 Is useless here, since thou art only found
 To cure, but not to wound,
 And she to wound, but not to cure
 Too weak too wilt thou prove My passion to remove ;
 Physic to other ills, thou'rt nourishment to love.

Sleep, sleep again, my Lyre !
 For thou can'st never tell my humble tale
 In sounds that will prevail,
 Nor gentle thoughts in her inspire ;
 All thy vain mirth lay by,
 Did thy strings silent lie,
 Sleep, sleep again, my Lyre, and let thy master die

Lovelace and Suckling are inseparably connected in popular imagination, by reason of their common misfortunes as men, and of their equal charm as Caroline lyrists

JOHN SUCKLING (1609-1642) was educated at Cambridge. On inheriting a large fortune from his father in 1629, he travelled abroad. Witty and generous, he was a great favourite at the Court of Charles the First, but plotting to rescue Strafford from the Tower obliged him to seek safety out of England, and he died in Paris, it is thought by his own hand

Suckling has a pretty wit, and there are few situations in life in which he cannot find food for laughter. Nor is the laughter coarse and cynical as with many of his successors, it is a pleasant, mercenary quality, that disarms the most captious

Take such an agreeable illustration as

" Out upon it ! I have loved."

Or the more widely known

" Why so pale and wan, fond lover ? "

" Out upon it ! I have loved
 Three whole days together !
 And am like to love three more,
 If it prove fair weather.

Time shall moulder away his wings,
 Ere it shall discover
 In the whole wide world again
 Such a constant lover !

But the spite on't is, No praise
 Is due at all to me !
 Love with me had made no stays,
 Had it any been hut She !

Had it any been but She,
 And that very face,
 There had been, at least, ere this,
 A dozen in her place ! "

ENCOURAGEMENT TO A LOVER

Why so pale and wan, fond lover ?

Prithee, why so pale ?

Will, if looking well can't move her,

Looking ill prevail ?

Prithee, why so pale ?

Why so dull and mute, young sinner ?

Prithee, why so mute ?

Will, when speaking well can't win her,

Saying nothing do't ?

Prithee, why so mute ?

Quit, quit, for shame ! this will not move,

This cannot take her ;

If of herself she will not love,

Nothing can make her ;

The D——I take her !

RICHARD LOVELACE, " the most amiable and beautiful person that ever was beheld," was born in 1618, and educated at Oxford. In his enthusiasm for the Royalist cause he impoverished himself and twice suffered imprisonment, during which he wrote Lucasta and some of his most famous lyrics, and at the age of forty died in poverty

Lovelace strikes a more serious note, as witness the poignant lyrics especially associated with him. To Althea from Prison, and On Going to the Wars. His work is less sustained in merit than that of Suckling, but if only for the verses above quoted, he would deserve immortality.

TO ALTHEA FROM PRISON

When Love with unconfined wings

Hovers within my gates,

And my divine Althea brings

To whisper at the grates,

When I lie tangled in her hair

And fetter'd to her eye,

The birds that wanton in the air

Know no such liberty

When flowing cups run swiftly round

With no alleying Thames,

Our careless heads with roses crown'd

Our hearts with loyal flames,

When thirsty grief in wine we steep,

When healths and draughts go free—

Fishes that tinkle in the deep

Know no such liberty

When, linnet-like, confined, I

With shriller throat shall sing

The sweetness, mercy, majesty

And glories of my king ;

When I shall voice aloud how good

He is, how great should be,

Enlarg'd winds, that curl the flood,

Know no such liberty

Stone walls do not a prison make,

Nor iron bars a cage ;

Minds innocent and quiet take

That for an hermitage ;

If I have freedom in my love

And in my soul am free,

Angels alone, that soar above,

Enjoy such liberty

TO LUCASTA

If to be absent were to be

Away from thee ;

Or that when I am gone

You or I were alone ;

Then, my Lucasta, might I crave

Pity from blustering wind, or swallowing wave.

Though seas and land betwixt us both,

Our faith and troth,

Like separated souls,
 All time and space controls;
 Above the highest sphere we meet
 Unseen, unknown, and greet as Angels greet.
 So then we do anticipate
 Our after-fate,
 And are alive 'till the skies,
 If thus our lips and eyes
 Can speak like spirits unconfined
 In Heaven, their earthy bodies left behind.

Another lyric writer of fine power is ANDREW MARVELL, son of a Yorkshire clergyman. Born in 1621, educated at Cambridge, he became tutor to the daughter of Lord Fairfax, and afterwards acted in the same capacity to the nephew of Cromwell. Notwithstanding a strong republican tendency he was a great favourite of Charles II, who offered him an appointment at Court which was refused. In 1657 he became Latin secretary to Milton, and Member of Parliament for Hull three years later, retaining his seat until his death in 1681. The town of Hull wished to perpetuate his memory by the erection of a monument which, however, was forbidden by the Court. After the Restoration he wrote a contemptuous work on the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England (1677). A collection of his poems appeared in 1680-1, and a second collection on Affairs of State in 1689.

Puritanism is at once the source of his best and worst inspiration. It gives power and sustenance to his early work, and generated into scurrilous violence in his latest. In technique he was admirable, and while displaying no small measure of the charm and grace of the Cavalier lyrics, he unites with them a sobriety and restraint that are rarely found outside of Milton. Perhaps his finest poem is the noble Horatian Ode to Cromwell; while such verses as The Nymph, regretting the loss of her Faun, show him no less favourably in a lighter mood.

THOUGHTS IN A GARDEN

How vainly men themselves amaze
 To win the palm, the oak, or bays,
 And their incessant labours see
 Crown'd from some single herb or tree,
 Whose short and narrow-vorged shade
 Does prudently their toils upbraid;
 While all the flowers and trees do close
 To weave the garlands of Repose.
 Fair Quiet, have I found thee here,
 And Innocence thy sister dear?
 Mistaken long, I sought you then
 In busy companies of men.
 Your sacred plants, if here below,
 Only among the plants will grow:
 Society is all but rude
 To this delicious solitude.
 No white nor red was ever seen
 So amorous as this lovely green.
 Fond lovers, cruel as their flame,
 Cut in these trees their mistresses' name;
 Little, alas, they know or heed
 How far these beauties her exceed!
 Fair trees! where'er your barks I wound,
 No name shall but your own be found.
 When we have run our passion's heat
 Love hither makes his best retreat.
 The gods who mortal beauty chase
 Still in a tree did end their race:
 Apollo hunted Daphne so
 Only that she might laurel grow:

And Pan did after Syrinx speed
 Not as a nymph, but for a reed.

What wondrous life is thus I lead;
 Ripe apples drop about my head;
 The luscious clusters of the vine
 Upon my mouth do crush their wine;
 The nectarine and curious peach
 Into my hands themselves do reach;
 Stumbling on melons, as I pass,
 Ensnared with flowers, I fall on grass.

Meanwhile the mind, from pleasure less
 Withdraws into its happiness,
 The mind that ocean where each kind
 Does straight its own resemblance find:
 Yet it creates, transcending these,
 Far other worlds, and other seas,
 Annihilating all that's made
 To a green thought in a green shade.

Here at the fountain's sliding foot
 Or at some fruit-tree's mossy root,
 Casting the body's vest aside
 My soul into the boughs does glide;
 There, like a bird, it sits and sings,
 Then whets and claps its silver wings,
 And, till prepared for longer flight,
 Waves in its plumage the various light.

Such was that happy Garden-state
 While man there walk'd without a mate:
 After a place so pure and sweet,
 What other help could yet be meet?
 But 'twas beyond a mortal's share
 To wander solitary there:
 Two paradises are in one,
 To live in Paradise alone.

How well the skilful gardener drew
 Of flowers and herbs this dial new!
 Where, from above, the milder sun
 Does through a fragrant zodiac run;
 And, as it works, th' industrious bee
 Computes its time as well as we.
 How could such sweet and wholesome hours
 Be reckon'd, but with herbs and flowers!

FRANCIS QUARLES was certainly one of the most prolific versifiers of the time. A Kentish man, born in 1592, he studied at Cambridge and later at Lincoln's Inn. He was appointed cup-bearer to Elizabeth of Bohemia in 1613, and on returning to England became secretary to Archbishop Ussher of Ireland. Ten years later he is Chronologer to the City of London.

He supported the Royalists during the Civil War, and grief at the loss of his library, which contained some rare manuscripts stolen by the Parliamentarians, brought about his death in 1664.

His most popular work, Emblems, was published in 1635, before which he had written A Feast for Worms, 1620; Hadassa, 1621; and Sion's Elegies, 1625.

He had a fatal facility for verse making that has given his commentators some trouble in sifting from his work the precious ore.

THE WORLD'S EMPTINESS¹

She's empty: hark, she sounds: there's nothing there
 But noise to fill thy ear
 Thy vain enquiry can at length but find
 A blast of murmuring wind,
 It is a cask that seems as full as fair
 But merely tunned with air.

Fond youth, go build thy hopes on better grounds ;
 The soul that vainly founds
 Her joys upon this world but feeds on empty sounds
 She's empty hark, she sounds ; there's nothing in't
 The spark-ignending flint
 Shall sooner melt, and hardest raunce shall first
 Dissolve and quench thy thirst
 Ere this false world shall still thy stormy breast
 With smooth-faced calms of rest
 Thou mayst as well expect meridian light
 From shades of black-mouthed night
 As in this empty world to find a full delight
 She's empty : hark, she sounds ; 'tis void and vast.
 What if some flattering blast
 Of flatuous honour should perchance be there
 And whisper in thine ear,
 It is but wind, and blows but where it list,
 And vanishes like a mist,
 Poor honour earth can give What generous mind
 Would be so base to bind
 Her heaven-bred soul a slave to serve a blast of wind ?
 She's empty : hark, she sounds , 'tis but a ball
 For fools to play withal
 The painted film but of a stronger bubble,
 That's lined with silken trouble
 It is a world whose work and recreation
 Is vanity and vexation
 A hag repaired with vice-complexion, paint,
 A quest-house of complaint
 It is a saint, a fiend—worse fiend when most a saint.
 She's empty : hark, she sounds ; 'tis vain and void.
 What's here to be enjoyed
 But grief and sickness, and large bills of sorrow,
 Drawn now and crossed to-morrow ?
 Or what are men but puffs of dying breath
 Revived with living death ?
 Fond lad ! O build thy hopes on surer grounds
 Than what dull flesh propounds Trust not this hollow world ; she's empty , hark, she sounds.

WILLIAM DAVENANT, the son of an innkeeper, succeeded Jonson as Laureate, and was a playhouse manager during early Stuart times. Falling foul of the Puritan party he was cast into prison, and was saved from peril by no less a man than Milton. This kindness he repayed later on by helping Milton at a critical period. Report associates him with the three greatest men of the age. In his youth he seems to have some connection with Shakespeare, later on he was on cordial terms with Milton, and late in life enjoyed the friendship of Dryden. Unlike most of the poets of the time, Davenant favoured descriptive romance, that however bore little resemblance to the allegorical romances of Spenser. At this period French influences were beginning to affect our literature, and the spell of Spain and the lure of Italy were on the wane. Sir William, together with William Chamberlayne, based their weighty poems Gondibert and Pharonnida on the Gallic form of romance. It was a distinct departure, much fresher and more interesting than the ordinary Spenserian imitation, more popular than the classical epic, and a change from the inexhaustible fount of lyric verse. Gondibert is laid in Lombardy, and deals with those indispensable ingredients of romance, fighting and love making. Pharonnida has for its setting the near East, and if inferior in narrative interest to Gondibert, is more than its equal in poetic beauty.

DAYBREAK

The lark now leaves his watery nest,
 And, climbing, shakes his dewy wings ;
 He takes this window for the East,
 And to implore your light, he sings.
 Awake ! awake ! the morn will never rise
 Till she can dress your beauty at her eyes.
 The merchant bows unto the seaman's star ;
 The ploughman from the sun his season takes ,
 But still the lover wonders what they are
 Who looks for day before his mistress wakes.
 Awake ! awake ! break through your veil of lawn ;
 Then draw your curtains and begin the dawn !

PART III

THE AGE OF DRYDEN AND POPE

Introductory—New Literary Ideals—Decline of Romanticism—Social Aspects of the Age—The Plague
The Fire—The Coffee-house and its Influence—Rise of Journalism.

INTRODUCTION

" You that delight in wit and mirth
And love to hear such news
As comes from all parts of the earth,
Dutch, Danes, and Turks and Jews ;
I'll send ye to a rendezvous
Where it is smoking new :
Go, hear it at a Coffee House,
It cannot but be true "

THOMAS JORDAN (1675).

ABOUT the middle of the seventeenth century a change began to come over the spirit of English literature. This change is due to no mere fluctuation of literary fashion, but is deeply rooted in the life of the time. The age of the Renaissance was an age of spiritual and material expansion. Englishmen realised for the first time their solidarity as a nation, and released suddenly from Continental struggles, especially from the dread of Spanish supremacy, they found an outlet for their excited emotions in drama and song. Loyalty to Elizabeth became an article of faith, pride and delight in their country's past a religious creed. This spirit is reflected in the Faerie Queene, and in the historical plays of Marlowe and Shakespeare.

But the emotional fervour was too high-pitched to last. Already in the early years of the seventeenth century its splendid exuberance had degenerated into extravagance and violence. The lofty idealism that had steadied the venturesome bark of Elizabethan poesy was growing attenuated, and the great minds in the closing years of the age, like Bacon and Milton, reflect in their writings the dawn of fresh interests. The purification of civic and political life emerges more and more into the forefront. Shakespeare and Ben Jonson stand aloof from the political problems of the hour. Bacon and Milton are active politicians no less than great writers; but until the Restoration the full significance of this change is not realised. It meets us first of all in the later poems of Abraham Cowley, and in the polished verse of Edmund Waller and Sir John Denham, it frankly and unmistakably proclaims itself a new note in our literature with the coming of Dryden.

Increasingly during the seventeenth century were men's thoughts directed to problems of civic and national life. The wild speculative interests and imaginative fervour of the Renaissance, gave place to a practical application of these ideals to actual existence; and naturally enough literature itself became involved with the problems of practical politics. France no less than England shared in this reaction from Romanticism, this enthusiasm for affairs rather than ideas, and at this juncture political conditions connected with the Restoration brought the influence of France into special contact with English life and letters.

One may speak therefore of three features in the literature of the new age. The triumph of the classical ideal was, after all, a natural result of the Renaissance. The Romantic spirit had been aroused among other things by a study of Greek and Roman classics, and while it was the substance that excited men at first, when the early exhilaration had worn off, the methods of the old writers attracted more and more attention. It was seen even in Elizabeth's day that the weaknesses of Romanticism lay in its lack of form, its variability, its proneness to extravagance and turgidity.

None saw this more clearly than Jonson, and his influence was, as we have noted, thrown entirely on the classical side.

This classicism was fostered and encouraged by the political needs of the age; but even then the change might have been more gradual, less decisive, had it not been for the fact that a brilliant set of writers had arisen in France, actuated by classical methods, who excited a profound influence upon the literature of Europe. The influence upon England was especially marked, for Court reasons. Much of Charles' exile had been spent in France; he had been attracted towards its literature, and did his best to enforce the ideals he saw there, actuating English literature. Psychologically, the new spirit involved the substitution of the critical for the imaginative spirit.

Such a change is inevitable when literature is made the vehicle of attacking the political life of the day. The creative imagination moves on the plane of primal human qualities; it is concerned with the interpretation of human nature, and although passing movements may give "a local habitation and a name" to some of its dioramic pictures, the main object is not to criticise the life of the day, but to interpret it.

The new spirit, however, is above all critical and analytic, not creative and sympathetic; it brings the intellect rather than the poetic imagination into play. And the merits of the new school are to be found in its intellectual force and actuality, just as its demerits lie in its lack of deep imagination and tendency to deal with manners and superficialities, rather than with elemental things and the larger issues of life.

Obviously then, this change was better adapted for a kind of literature which aimed especially at clearness, conciseness, and concentrated force. The less attractive aspect of this ideal is seen in the verse of the day, the finer and more valuable aspects in its prose.

The object of the leading writers of the time was to avoid extravagance and emotionalism. This in many cases they did so successfully as to suppress altogether the emotional and basic qualities of great poetry, though their method found congenial expression in the satire.

Poetry, starved of emotional sustenance, had to fall back on epigram, but the "good sense" ideal formulated in 1673 by Boileau was an admirable one for prose that had suffered from Romantic extravagances. For if we examine the aims of the prose writers of the day, we shall find that their supreme object is to be simple in style and natural in manner.

"The Royal Society," declared the Bishop of Rochester, "have exacted from all their members a close, marked, natural way of speaking, positive expressions, clear sense, a native easiness, bringing all things as near the mathematical plainness as they can, and preferring the language of artisans, countrymen, and merchants, before that of wits and scholars."

This is unequivocal enough, and as we shall see, when we consider the prose of the age, the ideal here enunciated was triumphantly put into practice. In the drama alone, which had come to be a courtier's game, is artificiality of prose upheld. There, for the sake of amusement, lucidity and directness are made subsidiary to brilliance of wit and stylistic graces.

Summing up, therefore, the aspects of the change, we may say: There was (1) the academic aspect—the substitution of Classicism for Romanticism; (2) the political aspect, due (a) to the general influence of France at this time, and (b) the particular influence through the medium of the King and his Court, (3) the psychological aspect that underlay these, signifying surely more than a change of fashion, a change of attitude. While influencing all of them was the general drift of the age, towards matters of civil and national interest.

Before noting how far this literary revolution is expressed in the literature of the time, it may be well to review the external changes that took place in the life of the new age.

The horrors of the Plague that darkened the careless gaiety of Restoration London, and the Great Fire that led to the transformation of its architecture under Wren, are reflected in the literature of the time. The Plague was no new scourge. From mediæval times it had exacted its grim toll ever and anon. The Black Death of 1349, the Sweating Sickness of 1507, were not soon forgotten. Worst of all was the Plague that broke out first in Tudor times, with repeated visits during the seventeenth century.

The peculiar virulence of the visitation in 1665 has been commented upon by more than one writer. Pepys touched upon it lightly, and Thomas Vincent, in his God's Terrible Voice in the City (1667), pictured its horrors in impressive language.

"Most of the rich," said the Rev. Thomas Vincent, "are now gone and the middle sort will not stay behind; but the poor are forced through poverty to stay and abide the storm. The very sinking fears they have had of the Plague hath brought the plague and death upon many souls, by the sight of a coffin in the streets have fallen into a shivering, and immediately the disease has assailed them; and the Sergeant Death hath arrested them, and clapt to the doors of their houses upon them, from whence they have come forth no more till they have been brought to their graves."

"People fall as thick as the leaves in Autumn when they are shaken by a mighty wind."

Dr. Hodges' Locmologia (translated in 1720) deals graphically with it, but its sinister terrors find best expression in Daniel Defoe's masterly History of the Plague (1722).

After the Plague—the Fire!

Perhaps the horrors of the Great Plague had numbed the public imagination. Certainly, London folk could have been forgiven for believing that they could be freed from either of their dread visitants for a while. Be that as it may, the disaster of 1666 came unheralded. There was not even a lightning flash of warning to prelude the fiery storm. Note how Pepys introduces the episode:

"September 2 (Lords day)—Some of our maids sitting up late last night to get things ready against our feast to-day, Jane called us up about three in the morning to tell us of a great fire they saw in the City. So I rose and slipped on my night-gown and went to the window, and thought it to be on the back-side of Marke-lane at the farthest, but being unused to such fires as followed, I thought it far enough off, and so went to bed again and to sleep."

To bed again and to sleep!

By morning, the Diarist was able to gain a clearer idea of the immensity of the fire. But still he seems to have had no idea of a visitation which was to entail the destruction of five sixths of the City within the walls, as well as a great space beyond. His first guess as to the place of origin had been fairly accurate. The fire began at the house of the King's baker, who had a shop in Pudding Lane, close by Fish Street Hill. Wren's Monument, of course, marks the spot to-day.

The first district devastated was Lower Thames Street, where the houses happened to be chiefly composed of timber, lath, and plaster. The fire had reached this spot when the irrepressible Jane finally persuaded Pepys that it would be worth while strolling towards the City in order to see what was happening.

"So I made myself ready presently and walked to the Tower, and there got up upon one of the high places."

Once in the neighbourhood of the conflagration, even the easy-going Samuel was impressed. He took note of the men who flung their household goods into the lighters upon the river; of the poor folk who stayed by hearth and home until the very fire touched them and drove them to the boats; even of "the poor pigeons" who were "loth to leave their houses but hovered about the windows and balconys, until they burned their wings and fell down."

If Pepys was slow to realise the disastrous nature of the fire, many other Londoners were even slower. No organised effort was made to stay the burning, everyone being fully occupied in removing their goods first to a neighbouring house and then farther on and farther on still, until in most cases the all-embracing flames had their way at last. It was not until after Pepys had taken boat for White Hall and reported to the King and the Duke of York, that the Diarist's obviously sensible suggestion—to pull down the houses before the fire—was adopted. However, probably nothing would have been of real avail. The houses were too "full of matter for burning, as pitch and tar, in Thames Street; and warehouses of oyle, and wines and brandy and other things."

By this time it was twelve o'clock and dinner time. Directly the meal was over, Pepys and his friend Moone walked into the City, to find the streets packed with horses and cartladen with goods "ready to run over one another and removing goods from one burned house to another. They now removing out of Canning Street (which received goods in the morning) into Lombard Street and further."

From that time, the disaster increased in immensity. When Pepys, his wife and a few friends met in St. James's Park in the afternoon and went on to the river, it was easy enough to see why so little could be done to stop the progress of the fire. "All over the Thames, with one's faces in the wind, you were almost burned with a shower of fire drops." By night-fide the thing had become "a most horrid, malicious, bloody flame."

"We staid till, it being darkish, we saw the fire as only one entire arch of fire from this to the other side of the bridge, and in a bow up the hill for an arch of above a mile long. It made me weep to see it. The churches, houses and all on fire, and flaming at once; and a horrid noise the flames made, and the creaking of the houses at their ruine. So home with a sad heart."

"September 3—About four o'clock in the morning my Lady Batten sent me a cart to carry away all my money and plate and best things to Sir W. Rider's at Bednallgreene."

During the whole of the 4th of September the fire blazed on. "Now begins the practice of blowing up houses in Tower Street, those next the Tower, which at first did frighten people more than anything." On the 5th, the destruction had reached Barking Church, "which is the bottom of our lane." So Pepys collected his £2350 worth of gold-pieces; and carried his good dame away to Woolwich. As it turned out, the precaution was unnecessary, for at the porch of Barking Church the flames were stayed.

So much for East London.

Unfortunately, the City and the district reaching towards Westminster were faring even worse. The Exchange was in ruins, Cheapside and Newgate Market all hurned. Throughout the day and night of the 6th of September, the same tale of utter desolation was being told everywhere. On the 7th the progress of the fire had been stayed, and Pepys ventured to explore as far as the Strand.

"A miserable sight of Paul's Church, with all the roofs fallen, and the body of the quire fallen into St. Fayth's."

Paul's School also, Ludgate and Fleet-street. My father's house, and the church and a good part of the Temple, all in ruins."

The Great Fire of London had entailed a loss of upwards of ten millions sterling. Four City gates, eighty-nine churches, four hundred streets, and thirteen thousand two hundred houses were destroyed. There was nothing for it but to rebuild the town upon the hot ashes.

The opportunity made the man—CHRISTOPHER WREN.

The task which Wren set himself was to endow the Gothic pile with the vesture of its old-time sanctity. Before any headway could be made towards carrying out the recommendations contained in the elaborate report, however, the Great Plague overtook London. Wren chose to leave England and live in Paris, until the earlier conditions in his own country were restored. He was still known as "The Astronomy Professor," but during the visits to the French capital the essential features of Wren's architectural style were developed.

A letter from Christopher Wren to his friend Dr. Bateman, proves clearly what a great part the Palace of the Louvre must have played in this respect.

"I have busied myself," he writes, "in surveying the most esteemed Fabricks of Paris and the Country round, the Louvre for a while was my daily object, where no less than a thousand Hands are constantly employed in the Works, some in laying mighty Foundations, some in raising the Stones, Columns, Entablements, &c., with vast Stones by great and useful Engines; others in Carving, Inlaying of Marbles, Plastering, Painting, Gilding, &c., which altogether make a School of Architecture the best, probably of this day in Europe."

It was with the memory of Perrault's great building ever before him that Wren came to the task of rebuilding the Cathedral Church of St Paul after the Great Fire.

It is, however, typical of the philosophic breadth of vision of Wren that he was by no means content to merely suggest the building of a new St Paul's. Both Evelyn and Wren set to work upon plans for the rebuilding of a new London directly the extent of the damage was realised. Evelyn mentions that Wren was the quicker in placing a scheme before Charles II.

Unfortunately, Wren's scheme for the rebuilding of London upon a definite plan fared less well than his refashioned cathedral. Lack of sufficient funds, the innate conservatism of the citizens of London, and the anxiety to "get something done," proved obstacles which even Wren's level-headed enthusiasm could not overcome. Nevertheless, by means of his wonderful series of City churches, the architect of St Paul's left almost as definite an impression upon London as if he had, in truth, designed the whole.

Imagine London without the steeples of St. Bride's, Fleet Street; of St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside; and the spire of St. Margaret Pattens—to mention only three of the fifty churches which Wren rebuilt after the Fire. Seventeen have since been taken down, but the rest form as enduring a monument to the memory of Christopher Wren as St. Paul's itself

Wren died on February 25, 1723. It had been his custom to drive to the Cathedral once a year, and sit for a while within the great pile. After one of these visits he returned to his home at Hampton Court. A short while after he was found by his servant dead in his chair. He had passed away in his sleep. The body was laid in the crypt of St. Paul's.

"Si monumentum requiris, circumspice."

The characteristics of an age are more faithfully reflected in its imaginative literature than in its formal histories and chronicles. Pope reflects the hard brilliance, the somewhat facile optimism of his generation in much the same way as Tennyson mirrors in his work the religious perplexities and social ideals of the Victorian England, and Addison is the Thackeray of his age, in his pictures of the tastes, the fashions, and the follies of the "Town."

We are approaching now the existence in London of a definite literary class. The poet, the dramatist of the ages preceding, depended for his livelihood upon a patron.

Patronage still exists, and Pope made his fortune by what has been called "a kind of joint-stock patronage," where the aristocratic patron found it convenient to induce his friend to subscribe towards the maintenance of the poet. But the older system was dying out.

At first the poet or the pamphleteer attaches himself to some influential Minister, using his pen on behalf of this gentleman's cause. Afterwards, when the Minister found he could get his work done more cheaply than by hiring men of taste, the literary man was thrown upon the suffrages of a public then rising into existence.

The coffee-house, and later the clubs, were centres around which radiated the thoughtful and intelligent. What Addison did to systematise the fluctuating sentiments and opinions of these will be seen hereafter. It is sufficient to note here that politicians, lawyers, clergymen, literary men, met at these places and discussed the problems of the hour. Thus the author and his public were forced into intimate proximity. If you admired a man's writings, you hastened to his coffee-house, where you might hear him holding forth to his own special friends. Perhaps you brought with you a companion. And thus the circle of discipleship grew.

What of the coffee-house, which plays so important a share in the life of the day?

It arose in this fashion.

The coffee-house was the lineal descendant of the barbers' shops (monastic or lay), the university dining and debating halls, and the taverns of the Middle Ages. Here had been the home of the idea; the "baiting-place of wit," the forge where the rough thought was welded into policy. Here the political philosopher could hob-nob with the demagogue—as in the days when Jack Cade and his rebel crew took possession of the "Whyt Harte, in Whyt Harte-yard," Southwark, on July 1, 1450. The inn boasted the largest sign-board in London except the "Castle," in Fleet Street, so Cade's followers found their leader readily enough. The natural disinclination on the part of the citizen of the town to welcome the firebrand explains Cade's speech to his rebel friends:

"Will you needs be hanged with your pardons about your necks? Hath my sword therefore broke through London Gates, that you should leave me at the 'Whyt Harte' in Southwark?"

It will be remembered that two days of experience of Jack Cade and his ways were sufficient to prove to the citizens of London that they would have been wiser to have left the rebel on the south side of London Bridge.

Nor was this all. In earlier times, not a few notable taverns had been well-known marrying houses. The "Cock" and the "Hand and Pen," near old Fleet Bridge, were two inns provided with chapels and chaplains ready to solemnise a marriage at any time of the day or night.

Coffee was introduced into London in 1657 by a Turkish merchant who set up his coffee-house in Lombard Street, with a portrait of himself as a sign over the door. "That excellent, and by all physicians approved, China drink . . . Tea" was to be had, as well as "Cophee," but the former was a very expensive luxury as yet, and was regarded, much as tobacco was on its introduction, as a medicine. Tea, or Tee, was pronounced as Tay. Pope refers to:

" . . . Gentle Anna, whom three realms obey,
Does sometimes counsel take, and sometimes Tea "

Coffee-houses now multiplied rapidly, and soon each house had its distinctive clientèle—lawyers favouring one, politicians another, and so forth. The famous "Wills" in Covent Garden (the west corner of Bow Street) was patronised by Pepys and Dryden. This place was termed the "Wits' Coffee-house." It was a home for scandal and lampoons. Dryden was an agreeable, good-natured, somewhat self-opinionated man. He enjoyed a great reputation as a conversationalist, in much the same way as did Addison who succeeded him.

The host of the coffee-house hears all the town gossip, and to him naturally the visitor turns upon his entrance: "What news have you, master?"

Here is a contemporary picture of West End life (1722):

"We rise at nine, and those that frequent great men's levées found entertainment at them till eleven; or, as in Holland, go to tea tables. About twelve the beau monde assembles in several coffee- or chocolate-houses, the best of which are the 'Cocoa Tree' and 'White's' Chocolate-House, St. James', 'The Smyrna,' . . . Coffee-houses, and all these so near to one another that in less than an hour you see the company of them all. We are carried to these places in chairs, which are here very cheap, a guinea a week, or one shilling per hour, and your chairman serves you as porter to run on errands. . . . If it is fine weather we take a turn in the park till two, when we go to dinner. . . . The general way here is to make a party at the Coffee-house to go to dine at the Tavern, where we sit till six, when we go to the play, unless you are invited to the table of some great man."

Swift also came to "Buttons," and one evening, Addison and his friends being present, "the mad Doctor," as he was called, accosted a countryman who had just come in.

"Excuse me, sir, have you ever seen such good weather in this world?"

"Yes, sir," was the wondering reply. "Thank God, I have seen many good days."

"That is more than I can say," retorted Swift, "I cannot remember any weather which was neither too hot, too wet, nor too dry: but God Almighty manages to arrange it so that it all comes to the same thing at the end of the year."

Politicians met here, but they had little circles or clubs of their own, and these met often in taverns. The Tory "October Club" met in a tavern at Westminster; the Whig "Kitcat Club" in a Strand tavern.¹

Theologians and scientists did not disdain the coffee-house. Sir Isaac Newton repaired of an evening to the "Grecian"; and Laurence Sterne preached lay sermons there—probably more interesting than his formal discourses. On one occasion, it is said, he gave out as his text: "It is better to go into the house of mourning than into the house of feasting," and continued: "I dispute that!" Which we may well believe.

Here is a handbill which extolled the virtue of coffee:

"A simple, innocent thing, and makes the heart light-some; it is good against sore eyes, and the better if you hold your head over it and take in the steam that way. It is good for a cough. It is excellent to prevent and cure the dropsy, gout, and scurvy. . . . It keeps the skin white and clear."

The satirists of the day did not spare coffee. One of them "calls on Ben Jonson's manly ghost, and the noble phantoms of Beaumont and Fletcher, who drank pure nectar, with 'rich canary ennobled,' while these coffee men, these 'sons of nought,' gave up the pure blood of the grape for a filthy drink—'syrup of soot, essence of old shoes'."

A good number objected to the smell of this new beverage. In December 1657 some of the burghers complain of a barber, Farr, who sold coffee and offended them by the "stink" while it was being manufactured. But the popularity of the drink grew apace, despite these objections.

The influence of the coffee-house as a centre for politics is well illustrated by the attempt of Charles to suppress them in 1675, "because the multitude of coffee-houses lately set up and kept within this kingdom, and the great resort of the idle and dissipated persons in them, have produced very evil and dangerous effects, whilst they especially tended to spread disunion, and to tempt tradespeople to neglect their business, and that this idle waste of time and money was becoming an injury to the commonwealth." But the regulation was not enforced, so strong was the feeling against it.

The coffee-house of the time was, as we see, the school of wit and dialectic. What the tavern had been to the sixteenth century, the coffee-house was to the seventeenth and eighteenth. It reached the height of its popularity in the eighteenth, but before its close had passed into practical oblivion.

At one time, it is said, there were no less than three thousand coffee-houses in London; and these resorts were for all sorts and conditions of men.

¹ The "Cat and Fiddle," the shop of a pastry-cook named Christopher Kat.

Each profession, almost each business, had its particular rendezvous. In the better class smoking was allowed; but conversation was compulsory. You paid your twopence for a cup of coffee or tea, and then chatted to a neighbour.

The well-known writers of the day congregated at these places and talked to their friends—not unfrequently at them. It was at a coffee-house that Pope found Dryden; and here it was that Addison discoursed to a select circle; and Johnson delivered many of his sententious periods.

Defoe declared that:

"The best company (after the play) generally go to 'Tom's' or 'Will's' Coffee-houses, near adjoining, where there is playing at piquet and the best of conversation till midnight. According to a contemporary, a man is sooner asked about his Coffee house than about his Lodgings. . . . They smoke Tobacco, game, and read papers of intelligence; here they treat of matters of state, make Leagues with Foreign Princes, break them again, and transact affairs of the last consequence to the whole world."

Snuff-taking was a favourite practice at this time. It came in towards the end of the sixteenth century, and enjoyed a great vogue during the eighteenth. Women took snuff freely; and the modish lady of the day never travelled without her box. Women of the poorer classes, whom one may see nowadays with a clay pipe, refreshed themselves with snuff. It was an age of snuff: tobacco took a second place.

The Tatler recommended everyone to prepare himself before entering the coffee-house, with "three dishes of bohea"; and two pinches of snuff completed the prescription—thus to "purge his brains."

Here is the Spectator discussing among the coffee-house politicians his own treatment of political questions:

"I was yesterday in a Coffee-house not far from the Royal Exchange, where I observed three Persons in close Conference over a Pipe of Tobacco; upon which, having filled one for my own use, I lighted it at a little Wax-Candle that stood before them; and after having thrown in two or three whiffs amongst them, sat down and made one of the Company. I need not tell my Readers that lighting a Man's Pipe at the same Candle is looked upon among Brother smokers as an Overture to Conversation and Friendship. As we here laid our Heads together in a very amicable manner, being intrenched under a Cloud of our own raising, I took up the last Spectator, and casting an Eye over it, the Spectator, says I, is very witty to-day, upon which a lusty lethargick old gentleman, who sat at the Upper-end of the table, having gradually blown out of his Mouth a great deal of Smoke, which he had been collecting for some time before, Ay, says he, more witty than wise, I am afraid. His Neighbour, who sat at his right Hand, immediately coloured, and being an angry Politician, laid down his Pipe with so much Wrath that he broke it in the Middle, and by that Means furnished me with a Tobacco stopper. I took it up very sedately, and looking him full in the face, made use of it from time to time all the while he was speaking. This Fellow, says he, can't for his Life keep out of Politics. Do you see how he abuses four great Men here? I fixed my eye very attentively on the Paper, and asked him if he meant those who were represented by Asterisks. Asterisks, says he, do you call them? they are all of them Stars. He might as well have put Garters to 'em. Then pray do not mind the two or three next Lines: Ch rob and P-dd-ng in the same Sentence! Our Clergy are very much beholden to him. Upon this the third Gentleman, who was of a mild Disposition, and, as I found, a Whig at Heart, desired him not to be too severe upon the Spectator neither. For, says he, you find he is very cautious of giving Offence, and has therefore put two Dashes into his Pudding. A Fig for his Dash, says the angry Politician. In his next Sentence he gives a plain Insuendo, that our Posterity will be in a sweet Pickle. What does the Fool mean by his Pickle? Why does he not write it at length, if he means honestly? I have read over the whole Sentence, says I, but I look upon the Parenthesis in the Belly of it to be the most dangerous part, and as full of Insinuations as it can hold.

"At my leaving the Coffee-house, I could not forbear reflecting with myself upon that gross Tribe of Fools who may be termed the Over-wise, and upon the Difficulty of writing anything in this censorious Age, which a weak Head may not construe into private Satire and personal Reflexion."

So opinions were formed and circulated. But potent as were the semi-public meetings in the tavern and the coffee-house for the distribution of news and opinions, they were insufficient for the general needs. A debating agency of an even more public sort was required. During the seventeenth century London folk came slowly to understand that none was more promising than the newspaper, "an open Forum where all mortals vent their opinions, state their grievance; a Forum free to every citizen who has three fingers and a smattering of grammar," as Carlyle put it in an oft-quoted passage.

The earliest London "newspapers" were the "Corantos," which were mainly concerned with foreign affairs. Indeed, as Mr. J. R. Williams points out in his History of English Journalism, the first newspaper circulating in London was in reality a news book. It was the Mercurius Gallobelgicus, a bound book, written in Latin and printed at Cologne. It was concerned with the story of the German Wars. The first number, a thick quarto octavo of 625 pages, was published in March 1594, and contained a chronicle of events from 1588. It was the Mercurius Gallobelgicus, by the way, which suggested the title of many later London periodicals.

In 1622 came a weekly pamphlet—translated from the Dutch, and issued by two London booksellers, Thomas Archer and Nicholas Bourne. Its purpose is sufficiently indicated by the general title of the second number, which runs:

"The 23 of May. Weekly Newes from Italy, manie, Hungaria, Bohemia, the Palatinate, France, and the Low Countries, &c."

The Weekly Newes was the precursor of similar pamphlets. These "Corantos" were followed by a series of sheets concerned with the dissemination of news, dictated for the most part by the needs of one or other of the great political parties. When it is added that the first advertisement appeared in the Mercurius Britannicus coranto on February 1, 1625, it will be seen that the modern newspaper was already in a fair way towards establishment. It is interesting to note that the first traders to realise the advantage of the new method of selling their goods were the booksellers.

Still the slow evolution went on. The years of the Long Parliament saw the coming and going of many news sheets, Mercury and Diurnal being the titles generally preferred.

Unfortunately the reputation of the writers of the various pamphlets did not progress so rapidly as the popularity of the institution they were seeking to found. "Liar" was the term ordinarily applied to the newspaper writer. When a critic permitted himself a little more latitude, the results were startling. Here is the view of a Royalist upon the press of the day:

"They call him a Mercury, but he becomes the Epithet like a little negro mounted on the elephant, just such another blet rampant. He defames a good title as much as most of our modern noblemen, those Wens of greatness, the body politics most peccant humours blistered into Lords. To call him an historian is to knight a mandrake, 'tis to view him through a perspective, and by that glass hyperbole to give the reputation of an engineer to a maker of mouse-traps."

The purloining of newspaper titles being no longer customary, the identification of a particular sheet with a definite political or social philosophy was possible.

I. POETRY. (from Dryden to Prior)

JOHN DRYDEN

"EVERY age has a kind of universal Genus,"¹ and perhaps in no poet are his own words more truly verified than are these of John Dryden.

Born in 1631, in the little village of Aldwinkle in Northamptonshire, John was the son of its rector, the Rev. Erasmus Dryden, and Mary Pickering, his wife, both of whom belonged to old county families with strong Puritan tendencies. There is scant record of his boyhood; his early schooling appears to have been more solid than that usually imparted in country villages, for in writing to a friend a few years before his death he speaks of the pleasure with which he had read an English translation of the works of the Greek historian Polybius "before he was ten years of age," and that "even then he had some dark notions of the prudence with which he conducted his design." On proceeding to Westminster School, then under the famous headmastership of Dr. Busby, the boy was thus able to appreciate and benefit by the excellent classical education he there received, which is continually in evidence throughout his literary work. At Westminster he made his first attempt at verse-making in an elegy to the memory of a schoolfellow, Lord Hastings, and translated the third satire of Perseus as a school task.

Trinity College, Cambridge, has the honour of being his Alma Mater, which he entered in 1650, but two years later came into conflict with the Vice-Master for "disobedience and contumacy in taking his punishment"—of the form of punishment we are left in ignorance. At Cambridge he also wrote some not very memorable verse.

On leaving Cambridge in 1657, he came to London as secretary to Sir Gilbert Pickering, a kinsman of his mother's and chamberlain to Oliver Cromwell, and we may imagine the young man was glad of the opportunity of adding somewhat to the small income of £40 a year which came to him on the death of his father three years before. His marriage in 1664 to Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the Earl of Berkshire, brought another £100 a year to the family exchequer, but not a corresponding amount of happiness, the Lady Elizabeth lacking that strong and purposeful character so characteristic of her husband.

Up to this time Dryden had done little to establish the great reputation that was subsequently to be his. He had written some purely official verses in 1659, on the death of the Protector, which contrast oddly with his eulogy of Charles the Second on his coronation, in Astræa Redux, the following year. His best efforts are shown unmistakably in his early verses addressed to Dr. Charlton in 1663.

From 1663-1681 Dryden courted the dramatic muse, he knew his genius was not towards the drama, but it was the most lucrative branch of the literary profession at that time, and he essayed it, not always with success, it must be told. "I confess," he said, "my chief endeavours are to delight the age in which I live . . . I know I am not so fitted by nature to write comedy . . . Reputation in them is the last thing in which I shall pretend."

His first effort, The Wild Gallant (1663), was a failure; Pepys said it was "so poor a thing as I never saw in my life almost." Dryden himself confessed that having made the town his judges, "the greater part condemned it."

The Rival Ladies (1664) was more successful; but The Indian Emperor in 1667 established his reputation as a playwright. About twenty plays came from his pen, all more or less coarse, one according to Pepys being "very smutty", and even that not over particular playgoer said, "I was troubled at it . . . nothing so good as The Maiden Queen or The Indian Emperor."

The Oedipus (1679), written in collaboration with Nathaniel Lee, gave rise some years later to one of Dryden's trenchant remarks to a cynical acquaintance who said that it was "easy enough to write like a madman." "No," remarked Dryden, "it is hard enough to write like a madman, but easy enough to write like a fool."

In 1665, while the Great Plague was raging, Dryden thought well to give London a wide berth, and retired to his father-in-law's house at Charlton with his wife. Here he wrote his first great poem, Annus Mirabilis (1667), which he chose to write, as he explained to Sir Robert Howard, "in quatrains or stanzas of four in alternate rhyme, because I have ever judged them more noble and of greater dignity, both for sound and number, than any other verse in use amongst us." This poem, dealing with the Great Fire and the war with Holland, was dedicated to the City of London, and contains one of those pithy sentences which fell so easily from his pen: "I have heard, indeed, of some virtuous persons who have ended unfortunately, but never of any virtuous nation; Providence is engaged too deeply when the cause becomes so general."

Two years later appeared the critical Essay on

Dramatic Poesy, a prose work written in the form of a dialogue, and in 1670 the first political recognition of his work came to him when he was asked to accept the appointments of Poet Laureate and Historiographer Royal, with their accompanying pensions of £200 a year. This placed Dryden in affluent circumstances; good profits were coming in from his literary work, and he had also no inconsiderable share in the King's playhouse.

Jealousy soon sprang up among the literary men of the day at the public notice taken of Dryden and his work, and the following year George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, in company with Samuel Butler, Sprat, and others, produced The Rehearsal, that celebrated satire on the heroics of the existing drama, making a special point of ridiculing Dryden. However, the poet could afford to wait, so he took no notice of this insult at the time; he could see the trend of political affairs, and wisely waited his opportunity. Later, when the Earl of Shaftesbury was scheming to secure the succession of the Duke of Monmouth, Dryden took advantage of the political struggle between Shaftesbury and the Crown to write his brilliant satire Absalom and Achitophel, in which the King, Shaftesbury, Monmouth, and Buckingham are all attacked, and in the notice taken of this masterpiece of brilliant characterization, Dryden considered himself amply avenged.

The acquittal of Shaftesbury on the charge of high treason preferred against him, was made the occasion of issuing a medal to commemorate the event. Dryden also commemorated it by another Medal (1682), a brilliant piece of satirical work.

The jealousy of his literary rivals took the form of violent abuse and caricatures of Dryden's works. Elkanah Settle wrote an amusing parody, Absalom and Achitophel Transposed, which was of no moment compared to the brutal and repulsive attack made in The Medal of John Bayes, written by Shadwell, who was the principal poet of the Whig party. This naturally provoked bitter enmity between the rival poets, and Dryden fully revenged himself by the publication of MacFlecknoe in October 1682 (the model for Pope's Dunciad), that gave Dryden's enemies an unenviable reputation for some considerable time. However, these jealousies of literary men are not pleasant reading, so we will pass on.

In 1686 Dryden announced his allegiance to the Church of Rome, whether from conscientious conviction or time serving instincts it is difficult to say; but the change in his religion inspired his next work, The Hind and the Panther, a Defence of the Roman Church (1687), which, if it accorded the poet some fame, it is certain he received no pecuniary gain from its publication.

The following year, when William and Mary came to the throne, and Protestantism was in the ascendant, Dryden fell on evil days; the pensions accompanying his public appointments were withdrawn, and worst of all he had the chagrin of seeing Shadwell appointed to the Laureateship that had been his for eighteen years.

A feeling that arose about this time for the study of classical literature in translations inspired him to undertake several from the Latin of Juvenal and Persius, and his Virgil, published in 1697, opened up a new source of income which he did not live long to enjoy.

Of the Ode to St. Cecilia's Day, written three years before his death, there is given by a contemporary a striking instance of the vitality of the man. Lord Bolingbroke, a great admirer of the poet, was paying him a morning visit, and finding him unusually agitated, inquired the cause: "I have been up all night," replied Dryden; "my musical friends made me promise to write them an ode for the feast of St. Cecilia; I have been so struck with the subject which occurred to me, that I could not leave it till I had completed it; here it is, finished at one sitting."

The Fables, his last work, consisting of a collection adapted from the works of Chaucer and Boccaccio, were published the year he died, in 1700.

In appearance, Dryden is said to have been handsome, and of a manly bearing in his youth; in old age, ruddy-faced and portly, and according to Pope "not very conversable"—but he was the idol of the young literary men who frequented Wills' coffee-house, where they always accorded him the warmest seat by the fire in winter and the shadiest corner of the balcony in summer.

"Time-server" he has been called; perhaps he was in youth; it is to his credit, however, that in old age he remained steadfast to his principles, and even when "struggling with want," as he tells us, and "oppressed with sickness," was "not dispirited" by his adversities. Could a more fitting resting-place be found for him than at the feet of Chaucer, where he lies in Westminster Abbey?

HIS WRITINGS

Dryden's literary significance is threefold, and is expressed in his prose, his dramas, and his verse. In this section we are dealing exclusively with Dryden the poet.

The early verse of Dryden scarcely calls for attention. It was unoriginal and uninspired. He did not start movements; but he had a singular power of taking advantage of a movement, and of stamping his vigorous and keen intellect upon experimental forms that lesser and more courageous men had initiated.

The change from the romantic to the classical manner was already in evidence before Dryden was born. Dryden saw which way the literary wind was blowing, and set his craft cheerfully in the same direction. Waller, already, had done creditable things with the couplet. Dryden gauged its possibilities and did brilliant things. He saw what kind of verse the people of his day wanted, and made it his business to give it them. It is quite clear from a study of his plays, how surely he was developing the qualities of ease, flexibility, and lucidity that he brought into English verse, particularly the satire.

Then, at the age of fifty, after a prosperous career as a serious poet, and a dramatist, he suddenly became famous in the direction where, after all, lies his especial claim on future generations—the field of satire.

His four remarkable satires were fired off in rapid succession. The first part of Absalom and Achitophel, directed against Shaftesbury, in 1681; The Medal, dealing also with Shaftesbury, in 1682; Mac-Flecknoe, aimed at the Whig poet Shadwell, later in 1682; and some weeks later still, the second part of Absalom and Achitophel. Of these the finest is the Absalom (Monmouth) and Achitophel (Shaftesbury) satire, Part I.

English poetical life is pictured in a vigorous and keen manner, very little disguised by its slight Hebrew setting. The Whig leaders of the day are satirised freely and trenchantly, Monmouth alone (for Court reasons) being treated in friendly fashion. Some of the portraits are etched in with admirable precision and point. Never before had the heroic couplet been used with such telling effect.

In The Medal, we miss the tart flavour of the personalities that give piquancy to the earlier work, and despite Dr. Johnson's encomium, it is certainly inferior in interest, though in workmanship it is no whit less able, and in one passage at any rate, that sarcastically comments on the instability of public opinion, it can hold its own with his best work.

The religious controversies of the time, the disputes between the Catholics and Anglicans, and the fierce dissensions of the Nonconformists, are depicted in Religio Laici (1683), an argumentative poem coloured by Catholic sympathies; and The Hind and the Panther (1687), a clever and curious piece of work, with a very elaborate allegorical framework—the Panther being the English Church and the Hind the Church of Rome. The Presbyterian fared the worst in the poem, described as a wolf with "belly gaunt, and famished face."

Dryden's sympathies, as has been said, were Catholic, but his attitude was remote enough for the mystics. Man must have some authority, he contended in the Religio Laici, and the only infallible authority is the Ancient Church of Christendom. Better, he argues, leave other matters alone:

"For points obscure are of small use to learn,
But common quiet is the world's concern."

With the coming of the Revolution of 1688—one of the smoothest revolutions ever accomplished, though none the less effectual on that account—the taste for classical literature became even more pronounced than heretofore. Dryden, with his watchful fingers on the public pulse, fell in with the fashion, and did a great deal of translation work, from the Latin and Greek poets. The most remarkable of these was his translation of Virgil, that occupied three years, being published in 1697.

The grace and finish of the original were qualities Dryden was not competent to impart, but his splendid force and vigour give power and colour to many passages.

Already he had written an Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, and once again that festival inspired him to another ingenious effort—Alexander's Feast, on the power of music (1697). It is hard to find a more suitable description of these poems than is conveyed by the term "ingenious." Clever and skilful they certainly were, yet the attempt made to wed music and poetry in the lines cannot be called successful. It demanded the lyric faculty of a Shelley or a Swinburne. Perhaps Swinburne alone of all our poets has had the power to make one art the medium of conveying the æsthetic content of another.

As a lyric writer, he is judged better by the songs with which his plays are interspersed, and a number of hymns that are attributed to him. As compared with the great lyric writers of the previous age, Dryden must occupy a modest place in the second rank.

Significance and Trend of His Poetic Work.—At the end of his life, Dryden described himself as one "who had done his best to improve the language, and especially the poetry," of his country. To a considerable extent he was justified in saying this: for even putting aside his really great activities in English prose, he had clarified and freshened English verse, brushing away much of the picturesque yet confusing tangle of ornamental undergrowth, and giving it point and actuality.

His dramatic verse at its best is eloquent and spirited; his non-dramatic verse extraordinarily varied. If not achieving special excellence in his lyrics or his narrative verse, he is rarely banal, always easy and dexterous, whilst in didactic verse he is a master. He raised it from an indifferent form of workmanship into the front rank, and whether in long flights as in Absalom and Achitophel, or in the shorter flights, illustrated in his Prologues, Epilogues, and Fables, he is amazingly alive and original. The term "original" as applied to Dryden needs this qualification. In the sense in which it is applied to the creative shapings of high imagination, Dryden was not original. In other words, originality of conception is not his. But in the matter of treatment he is uniformly original. He invented nothing, but the crude inventions of other men he perfected, and what he said of his countrymen might well be applied to himself, "The genius of our countrymen [is] rather to improve an invention than to invent themselves."

ABSALOM AND ACBITOPHEL

Great wits are sure to madness near allied,
And thin partitions do their bounds divide;
Else, why should he, with wealth and honour blest,
Refuse his age the needful hours of rest?
Punish a body which he could not please,
Bankrupt of life, yet prodigal of ease?
And all to leave what with his toil he won
To that unfeathered two-legged thing, a son,
Got, while his soul did huddled notions try,
And born a shapeless lump, like anarchy,
In friendship false, implacable in hate,
Resolved to ruin or to rule the state;
To compass this the triple bond he broke,
The pillars of the public safety shook,
And fitted Israel for a foreign yoke;
Then, seized with fear, yet still affecting fame,
Usurped a patriot's all-atoning name.
So easy still it proves in factious times
With public zeal to cancel private crimes,
How safe is treason and how sacred ill,
Where none can sin against the people's will,
Where crowds can wink and no offence be known,
Since in another's guilt they find their own!
Yet fame deserved no enemy can grudge;
The statesman we abhor, but praise the judge.
In Israel's courts ne'er sat an Abbebdin
With more discerning eyes or hands more clean,
Unbribed, unsought, the wretched to redress,
Swift of despatch and easy of access.
Oh! had he been content to serve the crown
With virtues only proper to the gown,

Or had the rankness of the soil been freed
From cockle that oppressed the noble seed,
David for him his tuneful harp had strung,
And Heaven had wanted one immortal song.
But wild ambition loves to slide, not stand,
And fortune's ice prefers to virtue's land.
Achitophel, grown weary to possess
A lawful fame and lazy happiness,
Disdained the golden fruit to gather free
And lent the crowd his arm to shake the tree.
Now, manifest of crimes contrived long since,
He stood at bold defiance with his Prince,
Held up the buckler of the people's cause
Against the crown, and skulked behind the laws.
The wished occasion of the Plot he takes;
Some circumstances find, but more he makes.
By buzzing emissaries fill the ears
Of listening crowds with jealousies and fears
Of arbitrary counsels brought to light,
And proves the King himself a Jebusite.
Weak arguments! which yet he knew full well
Were strong with people easy to rebel.
For governed by the moon, the giddy Jews
Tread the same track when she the prime renews;
And once in twenty years their scribes record,
By natural instinct they change their lord.
Achitophel still wants a chief, and none
Was found so fit as warlike Absalom.
Not that he wished his greatness to create,
For politicians neither love nor hate;
But, for he knew his title not allowed
Would keep him still depending on the crowd,
That kingly power, thus ebbing out, might be Drawn to the dregs of a democracy
Him he attempts with studied arts to please
And sheds his venom in such words as these.

ODE TO ST CECILIA'S DAY

From harmony, from heavenly harmony
Thus universal frame began;
When Nature underneath a heap
Of jarring atoms lay,
And could not heave her head,
The tuneful voice was heard from high,
Arise, ye more than dead.

Then cold and hot and moist and dry
In order to their stations leap,
And Music's power obey
From harmony, from heavenly harmony
Thus universal frame began:
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man

What passion cannot Music raise and quell?
When Jubal struck the clorded shell,
His listening brethren stood around,
And, wondering, on their faces fell
To worship that celestial sound:
Less than a god they thought there could not dwell
Within the hollow of that shell,
That spoke so sweetly and so well
What passion cannot Music raise and quell?

The trumpet's loud clangor
Excites us to arms
With shrill notes of anger
And mortal alarms.
The double double double beat
Of the thundering drum
Cries, hark! the foes come;
Charge, charge, 'tis too late to retreat.

The soft complaining flute
In dying notes discovers
The woes of hopeless lovers,
Whose dirge is whispered by the warbling lute.

Sharp violins proclaim
Their jealous pangs and desperation,
Fury, frantic indignation,
Depth of pains and height of passion,
For the fair, disdainful dame.

But oh ! what art can teach,
What human voice can reach

- The sacred organ's praise ?
- Notes inspiring holy love,
- Notes that wing their heavenly ways
- To mend the choirs above

Orpheus could lead the savage race,
And trees uprooted left their place,
Sequacious of the lyre ;
But bright Cecilia raised the wonder higher :
When to her organ vocal breath was given,
And angel heard, and straight appeared,
Mistaking the earth for heaven

Grand Chorus

As from the power of sacred lays
The spheres began to move,
And sung the great Creator's praise
To all the blessed above
So when the last and dreadful hour
This crumbling pageant shall devour,
The trumpet shall be heard on high,
The dead shall live, the living die,
And Muse shall untune the sky.

Contemporary with Dryden was SAMUEL BUTLER, his senior by twenty years, and he died just twenty years before him. The son of a Worcestershire farmer, Butler was born at Strensham in 1612 and educated at Worcester Cathedral School. After acting as secretary to Mr. Jefferies at Earl's Croome, he was appointed in 1628 a page to the Countess of Kent, at Wrest in Bedfordshire, where he was also the companion of John Selden. On the Restoration, as secretary to the Lord President of Wales, he was appointed Steward of Ludlow Castle (1660), and about this time married Mrs. Herbert, a widow who was possessed of a small fortune. During these years he had made the acquaintance of all the prominent men of his day, most of whom he satirised in his famous Hudibras, the first part of which was published in 1663, the second in 1664, and the third in 1678. This work was immensely popular, though Pepys, after paying two shillings and sixpence for it, said : " When I came to read it, it is so silly an abuse of the Presbyterian knight going to the wars, that I am ashamed of it, and by and by meeting a Mr. Townsend at dinner, I sold it to him for 18d."

Notwithstanding his popularity and influential friends, Butler died in poverty in 1680.

- " While Butler, needy wretch, was yet alive,
No generous patron would a dinner give
See him, when starv'd to death and turn'd to dust,
Presented with a monumental bust,
The poet's fate is here in emblem shown.
He ask'd for bread, and he receiv'd a stone." ¹

Butler was by temperament a lover of sober common-sense and the sworn foe of enthusiasm. Equally with Dryden is he an expression of the new mood that had seized the nation as a whole. Inferior to Dryden in craftsmanship and versatility, he is richer in sarcastic humour, indeed there is more than a touch of savagery in it, but it is a mistake to regard it as merely spiteful fun indulged in for personal reasons. Less splendid in his scorn than Swift, inferior to Pope in polish, his humour has undeniable breadth and power.

His most important work was a long octosyllabic poem, which we know as Hudibras; and indeed it is as the author of Hudibras that Butler is for the most part known. It was a long, savage attack upon the Parliamentary party and pleased the fancy of the time; though some, who loved not the Puritan, like Pepys, were repelled by its sustained note of scorn.

Hudibras is in lineal descent from the comic doggerel of Skelton, who, indeed, paved the way for the Restoration satirists. None before, and few after, ever used this particular metre with such happy effect as Butler.

It is probable that he modelled his style very largely upon his contemporary Scarron, who satirised his own day in his travesty of Virgil; Scarron's methods and Skelton's spirit contributed much towards the making of Hudibras.

The name "Hudibras" comes from the Faerie Queene. In Butler's poem he is a blustering, ignorant, repulsive-looking Presbyterian knight, with a squire in keeping with his master. They set out in pseudo-romantic fashion, and are soon engaging in an anti-bear-baiting crusade. Bear-baiting, of course, was a popular pastime, and Butler more than amplifies Macaulay's well-known jibe on the Puritan objection to it, from the artistic point of view the poem certainly fails in the unqualified contemptibility of the objects of its attack.

The poem, however, with its echoes of Rabelais and Cervantes, and its wild burlesque and preposterous buffoonery, is rich in genuine flashes of comic insight.

For instance :

" He that complains against his will
Is of his own opinion still."

The Presbyterians who

" Compound for sins they are inclined to
By damning those they have no mind to ;"

and by their unloveliness in disposition, are

" Still so perverse and opposite
As if they worshipped God for spite "

Such absurd comparisons as :

" And like a lobster boiled, the Morn
From black to red began to turn."

And the consolations of Hudibras :

" Who
Cheered himself with the ends of verse
And sayings of Philosophers."

Such felicitously ridiculous rhymes as " duty " for " shoe-tie," give effect and variety to the monotony of the metre ; and in this respect Byron and Calverley, in our own day, owe no small debt to him.

Limited in his gifts and certainly not squeamish in his methods, Butler is a remarkable figure in the poetic development of his time ; and is one of our best exponents of satirical verse.

HUDIBRAS

Friend Ralph, thou hast
Outrun the constable at last.

Some force whole regions, in despite
 O' geography, to change their site;
 Make former times shake hands with latter,
 And that which was before, come after;
 But those who write in rhyme still make
 The one verse for the other's sake;
 For one for sense, and one for rhyme,
 I think's sufficient at one time.

Doubtless the pleasure is as great
 Of being cheated, as to cheat.

With crosses, relics, crucifixes,
 Beads, pictures, rosaries and pices -
 The tools of working out Salvation
 By mere mechanic operation.

The social condition of Restoration life, its artificial gaiety, the growing importance of London as a pleasure resort for the courtier poet, the increasing vogue of the coffee-house and park, to which reference has been made in our introductory sketch, the growth of the political pamphlet and the journal, all these things favoured the development of satirical verse.

To the social conditions may be added also the classical taste of the day, favouring a type of literature which should be clear, concise, and topical above all things. Denham dealt with the politics of the hour in his four Instructions to a Puritan. Andrew Marvell, a much greater literary figure and a lyricist of sweetness and power, fell in with the fashion, and was astonishingly successful in his Last Instructions to a Puritan; Advice to a Puritan; and Britannia and Raleigh.

JOHN OLDHAM, a more powerful satirist than either of the others, wrote an ironical poem—Satire against Virtue—and was even more successful in his Satire upon a Woman who by her falsehood and scorn was the death of my friend. His last work was his Satire upon the Jesuits, perhaps the richest and most telling of his poems.

Oldham is less of the pamphleteer in verse than Marvell or Denham; he takes his subject far more seriously, as a literary artist. But he has neither Dryden's masterly technique, nor Butler's ingenious humour. He writes persistently with the loud pedal on; and some of his work is like a prolonged hoarse scream. On the other hand he had the merits of these defects; plenty of native force, and an exuberance of imagination, expressing itself for his time in some striking, vital phrase, as when he speaks of Charles IX, in connection with St. Bartholomew's Day, saying:

" . . . he scorned retail
 I' th' trade of Death."

and of the victims:

" . . . so quick their fate
 Their very prayers and wishes came too late "

The ballad was a popular vehicle for satire; and was in great request in town and country taverns, while literary art is at its lowest here. The humour is rough and ready, and scurrility seems to be the great thing aimed at. To these ballads were fitted well-known tunes that had already caught the public ear in opera and play. Among these tunes the litany was a favourite, with its three lines of verse and "Libera nos Domine" refrain. Another tune boasted the catch phrase, "Hey boys, up go we," which occurred about the end of the eighth line. Among the known ballad composers of the time (many ballads were anonymous for obvious reasons), Purcell was the most famous. In general popularity Thomas D'Urfey, courtier and playwright, with his Now the Fight's done, Sammy will never be my Love again, was no doubt his superior. But Purcell's Lilli burlero achieved a fame accorded to no similar effusion. It conferred distinction on Thomas, Lord Wharton's doggerel stuff, and was used afterwards again and again, for even still worse matter.

With the coming of Pope a new school of satire arose, lighter than the older one, and if less sincere in some respects, certainly far more agreeable. Of this something will be said in a later chapter.

THE COURT POETS OF THE RESTORATION

The drama when it recovered from the crushing blow dealt it by Puritanism, used all its resources to lampoon its late enemy. Similarly in the Court poetry of the Restoration we may trace the violent Puritan reaction of the time.

Satire, as we shall see, usurped the place once taken by the descriptive verse of Spenser and his school; the political squib displaced the amorous sonnet and although the lyric could still claim votaries, it shared in the general change of atmosphere. Wit was esteemed above fervency, salacity above fantasy, for the song writer was no longer, save rarely, a man of adventurous life, with a deep vein of seriousness in his nature, but a gay, irresponsible, and flippant courtier. "Every Fop wrote songs," said Sedley, one of the most brilliant of the verse writers, the fop element was certainly very obvious in the lyric making, for no longer did the poet rely on masculine virtues, and woo his lady with hints of prowess. He wooed as Graftmont did, with "pocket looking-glass . . . essences and other small wares of love."

Love, indeed, is scarcely the word for the amorous ditties of the time, the witty, gay, licentious verse of the Restoration could boast no sincerity of feeling, no tinge of passion. It was a game for courtiers; a game skilfully and amusingly conducted by a few, but at its best a clever pose, with none of those flashes of deep feeling and charming fancy that illumine the hot, full-blooded music of the Elizabethans.

Among these triflers in song, the names of Rochester, Buckhurst, and Sedley are conspicuous; but unlike many of their fellows, they were men of action as well as men of letters, with deeds of daring to their credit.

ROCHESTER is the most interesting personality of this band; born in 1648 near Woodstock, he had a good education and proved an exceedingly apt scholar. After the usual travels, he returned to Court an accomplished personage, with abundant personal charm, still more abundant impudence. His histrionic sense was strongly developed, and to figure as the hero of some strange out-of-the-way adventure is what he loved above everything. One of his most diverting rôles was that of a foreign astrologer, and as such he set up in Tower Street and scattered abroad wild promises of cures for all manner of diseases. Perhaps his most popular cry was his recipe for youth and beauty.

Middle-aged women had best submit to his treatment and they should look like young girls. So well did he play his part that none penetrated his disguise for a long while. Often as Charles quarrelled with him because of his boundless insolence, he speedily made it up; for wit Charles esteemed highly, and none were wittier than Rochester.

The nearest approach to genuine feeling in this little coterie is made by the writer in some of his lyrics; as for instance, "I cannot change as others do"; but the mood of mockery somehow suits him better, and many will prefer such songs as Love and Life, with its delightful finish:

"Then talk not of inconstancy,
False hearts and broken vows,
If I by miracle can be,
This livelong minute true to thee
'Twas all that Heav'n allows."

Scarcely inferior to him in wit and accomplishment, though less versatile as a personality, is Sir CHARLES SEDLEY. When James II took his daughter for a mistress and made her Countess of Dorchester, he observed, "I hate ingratitude; the King has made my daughter a Countess, I can do no less than try to make his daughter a Queen."

Although he essays various forms of poetry, he is essentially a song writer. Less careful than Rochester in his art, he had a happy knack of agreeable song, as is proved by the well-known Phyllis is my only joy.

LORD BUCKHURST (Earl of Dorset) was largely esteemed by his contemporaries, but to us to-day he seems on a decidedly lower level than either Rochester or Sedley—as surely as his character ranks above theirs.

His most attractive song is the familiar ditty, To all you Ladies now on Land, written at sea, in the first Dutch War, says the poet gravely. The specific statement may be valued in the same way as we value Defoe's Memoirs of a Cavalier.

Less distinguished writers are: the Earl of Mulgrave, fluent, facile, and commonplace for the most part; and the Earl of Roscommon, a somewhat austere gentleman for those times, with but one weakness—gambling. He was a decent scholar and critic, and won occasional success in epigrammatic lines. But he was too earnestly desirous of writing good sense, to achieve good poetry.

ALEXANDER POPE

The influence of the French literature of the day, considerable in Dryden's time, became even more marked in the age of his successor—Pope. This meant that increasing attention would be given to lucidity of expression and elegance of form. Freshness of utterance was of less moment than perfection of manner; or as Pope himself said:

"True wit is Nature to advantage dressed,
What oft was thought but ne'er so well ex-

Literature had now become quite frankly a literature of the Town; we can tell, even more accurately than in Shakespeare's age, the manners of the day, for in Pope's own verse the social life of the time is reflected as in a camera obscura. We wander in the pleasure gardens where "quality" caroused and flirted: we note the frivolous ritual of the boudoir, hear the tapping of the inevitable snuff-box, from gallants resplendent in lace ruffles; we learn the drab story of Grub Street and its denizens; the jealousies and bickerings of authors, and throughout it all there sounds the smug, complacent Deism which was as much a fashion of the time as the fluttering fan of the ladies.

At the house of a linen-draper in Lombard Street was born, in 1688, a sickly and delicate child—ALEXANDER POPE. His talent was of the precocious order; fashioned for a life of study, he knew no other pleasure than that which comes from the poring over books. Epics and tragedy he knocks off readily while in his early teens, and throughout his youth he reads, reads, reads—Homer, Tasso, Ariosto, Virgil, Ovid—classical and modern writers, poetry, criticism, drama, either in the original or in translation, until almost he dies of overmuch study.

His great search is not the search of Paracelsus for Truth; it is for style. Wycherley, now in his old age, acts as mentor to the ambitious young man, Pope smarts under his frank criticism, and finally breaks with him.

But his promise has attracted Dryden—and when yet on the threshold of manhood he completed his Essay on Criticism, the reading public felt that a new star had arrived. What kind of radiance the star would shed was another matter.

In appearance he was singularly unimpressive.

A body of miserable weakness was a heritage from birth—headaches from his mother and a crooked figure from his father. In a moment of bitter insight, Pope once spoke of "that long disease, my life," while Swift said of him that "two bites and a sup more than your stint will cost you more than others pay for a regular debauch."

By middle life, Pope's physical weakness was so constant that he could not dress without aid. Cold affected him so greatly that he was compelled to wear a fur doublet under his coarse linen shirt.

When he rose," writes Johnson, "he was invested in bodices made of stiff canvas, being scarcely able to hold himself erect till they were laced, and he then put on a flannel waistcoat. One side was contracted. His legs were so slender that he enlarged their bulk with three pairs of stockings, which were drawn on and off by the maid."

Nor did disabilities end here. He came of Papist stock in days when English Catholics were condemned to pay double taxation. His father was no more than a minor London merchant. The boy's education was of the most miscellaneous description. "Small Latin and less Greek" seems an odd description to apply to so famous a translator of Homer—yet it was true.

What fate did not deny to the man, Alexander Pope, was an all-dominating love for the craft of poetry. According to the light which was given him, Pope was never content with less than the polished best.

Pope came of a Roman Catholic family, and during his early years there was no Faith that stood more in the way of a man's worldly advancement than that. His education was fragmentary and superficial, and all of it that mattered he imbibed for himself, not from the seminary near Winchester, whither for a time he had gone. Thrown on his resources, sickly in body and lonely in spirit, he found his only delight in books; and these he read, as he tells us, "like a boy gathering flowers in the fields just as they fell his way." He was extremely precocious, and "lisp'd in numbers from an early age." His earliest work, a set of Pastorals, was quite in the fashion of the day, with the usual conventional Strephons and Daphnes, and orthodox Pagan deities in an English religious setting of the most artificial type. The verse is uninspired but carefully modulated. There was never anything slipshod about Pope's work, and the book attracted favourable notice. In his next publication, the Essay on Criticism, he found himself, his public, and fame. This was followed in 1712 by The Rape of the Lock. The artificial tone of the age, the frivolous aspect of femininity, is nowhere more exquisitely pictured than in this poem. It is the epic of triflings, a page torn from the petty, pleasure-seeking life of a fashionable beauty; the mise-en-scène the toilet chamber and the card table. In short, the veritable apotheosis in literary guise of scent, patches, and powder.

From The Rape of the Lock to Windsor Forest, is from Pope at his happiest to Pope at his worst. Pope's rhapsody on scenic charm is a melancholy thing. Far more interesting is his translation of the Iliad of Homer.

Quite apart from its literary merits, this translation, the fruit of ten years' arduous labour, is a remarkable achievement for one of Pope's delicate health and limited knowledge of Greek. Bentley's caustic criticism of it as "a very pretty poem, Mr Pope, but not Homer," is one hard to traverse, for the Homeric breadth and vigour was ill-suited to the fastidious niceties of Pope's muse, but it has never militated against its popular success. For "a pretty poem" it certainly is; rich in felicities of the eighteenth-century pattern.

The Iliad was published in six volumes, for which Lintot, the publisher, paid £200 a volume, in addition to furnishing a large number of free copies for the subscribers. These numbered five hundred and seventy-five, and they took six hundred and fifty-four sets at a guinea a volume. The Odyssey brought Pope in £3500, after considerable sums had been paid to assistants. So that rather more than £9000 was netted by the author alone. In addition, Lintot made a fortune.

By the year 1718 Pope was in a position of independence, and was able to take the house at Twickenham which is always so closely associated with his memory. The spot had much to recommend it. Both by road and river it was within easy reach of London. The poet's friends could readily come down for a chat. The plot of land around the house was large enough to secure absolute peace.

Within a few years the ideal of graceful symmetry, which is so characteristic alike of Pope and his age, pervaded every part of the garden. Some well-known lines by Pope himself suggest a lively picture of the place where half of the witty wisdom of the early eighteenth century was born.

"His garden next your admiration all
On every side you look, behold the wall.
No pleasing intricacies intervene,
No artful wildness to perplex the scene;
Grove nests at grove, each alley has a brother,
And half the platform just reflects the other."

If a less ordered picture is preferred, there is a little sketch by Horace Walpole which may be quoted:

"Pope had twisted and twirled and harmonised this, till it appeared two or three sweet little lawns, opening and opening one beyond another, and the whole surrounded with impenetrable woods."

Here Swift, Bolingbroke, Congreve, and Gay were wont to exchange wit and wisdom and, perchance, to forge the weapons which were to be used in the war with the Dunces—the war which was waged on behalf of a single valueless Truth:

"Out with it, Dunciad: let the secret pass,
That secret to each fool—that lie's an ass."

Here strange schemes were proposed and discussed for the launching of these literary shafts upon the wandering world. The early spurious editions of the Dunciad, for instance; the simultaneous publication in Dublin and London, and the like. Here it was that Bolingbroke sketched the first rough philosophical propositions eventually polished into the Essay on Man. And here it was that Pope, with only the silence for company, wove the tiny slips of paper upon which he was wont to jot his disjointed ideas into an harmonious whole.

"Now backs of letters, though design'd
For those who more will need 'em,
Are fill'd with hunts and interlin'd
Himself will scarcely read 'em
Each atom by some other struck
All turns and motions tries,
Till in a lump together stuck
Behold a poem rise."

Lastly, it was at Twickenham, on May 30, 1744, that the restless spirit of the poet finally quitted the world which it had never loved. The bruised body was buried in Twickenham church. The better part of the man—his work—is with us still in the form of the pithy couplets in which Alexander Pope embodied the crystal-hard wisdom of his age and The Rape of the Lock.

HIS WORK INFLUENCE AND SIGNIFICANCE IN LITERATURE

The three poems in which Pope is emphatically the spokesman of his age are The Rape of the Lock, picturing its frivolities; the Dunciad, unveiling its squalor; the Essay on Man, echoing its philosophy. His own attitude towards literature is nicely expressed in the Essay on Criticism, where the merits and limitations of the eighteenth-century school of poetry are clearly exhibited. What they admire, what they dislike, is patent to the most casual reader. The neatness of his rapier wit is happily shown in the passing allusion to the churlish old critic JOHN DENNIS (1657-1734), author of a tragedy, Appius and Virginia :

"But Appius reddens at each word you speak."

Of his work as a whole it may be said that he was a master of literary mosaic. There is nothing of the easy breadth and vigour of Dryden in his satirical verse; on the other hand, he excelled his predecessor in exquisite finish and in detailed touches. His poems have no solidarity or homogeneity, with the exception, perhaps, of The Rape of the Lock. Rather may they be likened to polished fragments, cunningly fitted in to form a whole, and remarkable for workmanship rather than integral beauty.

Using the Drydenian couplet, he imparted to it a gossamerlike delicacy of touch, that more than compensated for the lack of strength. If at times the glitter and sparkle fade into dullness, the occasions are comparatively rare, and the amazing thing is that he sustained his mercurial smartness and aptness for so long. There are few graces of style beyond crispness and lightness. The beauties, though abundant, are of the obvious kind. No one can dress up a commonplace sentiment or humdrum thought in finer clothes than he; but there is no hint in his work of high imagination, of subtle fancy, no sense of mystery, no romance, no depth of feeling, no greatness of impulse. In the era that followed, the deficiencies of Pope in this respect were so glaring as to call down on him undeserved contempt. With Jane Austen, we must grant him the "two inches of ivory," and within these limitations there is no more skilful artist. If he is not to be reckoned with the master-spirits of English literature, he was at any rate an incomparable craftsman and a delightful wit. And that is no small matter.

"Avoid extremes, and shun the fault of such
Who still are pleased too little or too much.
At every trifle scorn to take offence,
That always shows great pride, or little sense.
Those heads, as stomachs, are not sure the best,
Which nauseate all, and nothing can digest.
Yet let not each gay turn thy rapture move;
For fools admire, but men of sense approve.
As things seem large which we through mists descry,
Dullness is ever apt to magnify
Some foreign writers, some our own despise,
The ancients only, or the moderns prize.
Thus wit, like faith, by each man is applied
To one small sect, and all are damned beside.
Meanly they seek the blessing to confine,
And force that sun but on a part to shine,
Which not alone the southern wit sublimed,
But ripens spirits in cold northern climes;
Which from the first has shone on ages past,
Enlightens the present, and shall warm the last;
Though each may feel increases and decays,
And see now clearer and now darker days.
Regard not, then, if wit be old or new,
But blame the false, and value still the true." ¹

¹ Eye Nature's walks, shoot folly as it flies,
And catch the manners living as they rise,
Laugh where we must, be candid where we can,
But vindicate the ways of God to man."

"Hope springs eternal in the human breast;
Man never is, but always to be blest.
The soul, uneasy and confin'd from home,
Rests and expatiates in a life to come.

Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutored mind
Sees God in clouds, and hears Him in the wind." ¹

"Pretty! in amber to observe the forms
Of hairs, or straws, or dirt, or grubs, or worms!
The things we know, are neither rich nor rare,
But wonder how the devil they got there."

"Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And without sneering teach the rest to sneer;
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike."

"Eternal smiles his emptiness betray,
As shallow streams run dimpling all the way."

"While pensive poets painful vigils keep, Sleepless themselves to give their readers sleep."

"And gentle Dullness ever loves a joke."

"The right divine of kings to govern wrong." ²

Among minor verse writers of the age are the sturdy Whig, SAMUEL GARTH (1661-1719), the physician whose Dispensary (1699) is an amusing description of a doctor's quarrel, written in the versification of Dryden, with a fair amount of the master's skill, unfortunate Sir RICHARD BLACKMORE, also a physician, with a taste for rhetoric which brought him continual ridicule from the wits of the time. His piety and Whiggery pleased Addison, and one of his poems, Creation, is a respectable piece of work - but his talents were not such as to procure the approbation of his fellows, and they were insufficient to please those who came after. Congreve was a song writer of the Restoration type, and could hold his own with craftsmen like Sedley and Dorset. AMBROSE PHILIPS, rejoicing in the nickname of "Nanby Pamby," sufficiently indicates thereby the character of his muse. TICKELL, an Oxford man, and, like Philips, a friend of Addison, wrote two good elegies on his friend, and had the gift of sonorous verse. JOHN BYROM, a North of England physician, was a vigorous and dexterous versifier, though perhaps posterity will more gratefully acclaim him as the first teacher of a good system of shorthand.

From these men we may turn to two of greater weight and power—Matthew Prior, the father of English "light verse," and John Gay, a whimsical and delightful versifier of Town and its ways.

MATTHEW PRIOR, "beloved by every Muse," was a Dorset man, born near Wimborne in 1664, who by the generosity of an uncle was educated at Westminster School, and at St John's College, Cambridge, under the patronage of the Earl of Dorset. During this period he collaborated with Charles Montagu, in The Town Mouse and the Country Mouse, a burlesque on The Hind and the Panther of Dryden. On leaving Cambridge several diplomatic appointments were conferred upon him, including that of Secretary of State in Ireland (1697), and Under-Secretary of State in England (1699). Two years later he was elected member for East Grinstead, at this time changing his political coat from Whig to Tory. The Tories made him Commissioner of Customs (1711-14), during which time he took some part in formulating the Peace of Utrecht, and was Queen Anne's ambassador at Paris until her death. In 1715 he was impeached and for two years imprisoned.

Having made £4000 by the publication of a folio edition of his works in 1719, Lord Harley added a similar sum in order to make some provision for Prior's old age; unfortunately, Prior only lived two years to enjoy his good fortune, dying in 1721.

Prior wrote two long poems: Solomon on the Vanity of the World, and Alma, or the Progress of the Mind.

Alma is Hudibrastic in method, but is far from successful, and gives little impression of the real strength of the writer as a maker of verse.

Solomon follows Dryden in its use of the heroic couplet: it is agreeable in parts, but the subject is not in reality congenial with the pleasant, superficial, whimsical attitude most characteristic of Prior.

Prior's reputation rests almost entirely upon his slighter efforts. He is an expert in the making of literary soufflé, and no one better than he could fling off some audacious trifle, or dainty sentimentality. The airy deftness of his touch is delicious, and deludes the reader at times into rating him as merely a light-hearted jester. But he is more than a professional jester, he is a true humorist, with a sense of tears as well as of laughter, as witness the "Lines written in the beginning of Mezeray's History of France," and throughout all his bright and tender whimsicalities there runs a cheerful, tolerant outlook on life.

SOLOMON, OR THE VANITY OF HUMAN WISDOMS

If the great master will descend to hear
The humble series of his handmaid's care;
O! while she tells it, let him not put on
The look that awes the nations from the throne!
O! let not death severe in glory be
In the king's frown and terror of his eye!
Mine to obey, thy part is to ordain;
And, though to mention be to suffer pain,
If the king smile whilst I my woe recite,
If weeping, I find favour in his sight
Flow fast my tears, full rising his delight,
O! witness earth beneath, and heaven above!
For can I hide it? I am sick of love;
If madness may the name of passion bear,
Or love be called what is indeed despair
Thou Sovereign Power, whose secret will controls
The inward bent and motion of our souls!
Why hast thou placed such infinite degrees
Between the cause and cure of my disease?
The mighty object of that raging fire
In which unpitied, Abra must expire.

TO CHLOE

What I speak, my fair Chloe, and what I write, shows
The difference there is betwixt Nature and Art,
I court others in verse, but I love thee in prose;
And they have my whimsies, hut thou hast my heart.
The god of us verse-men—you know, Child—the Sun,
How after his journeys he set up his rest;
If at morning o'er earth 'tis his fancy to run,
At night he reclines on his Thetis's breast.
So when I am weary with wandering all day,
To thee, my delight, in the evening I come;
No matter what beauties I saw in my way,
They were but my visits, but thou art my home.

JOHN GAY was born in 1685 at Barnstable in Devon, and lost both his parents when ten years old. Coming of an impoverished family, he tried his fortune as apprentice to a London silk mercer, and later on drifted (by one of those lucky tides that carried him, despite his lazy self, into comfortable harbours) into a secretaryship to the Duchess of Monmouth. He had a rich gift for vivid description—a rural scene or the delights of the town, it mattered not to Gay; he could do either equally well.

Lacking the originality of Prior, he had a goodly share of humour, considerable technical skill, whether in turning out the favourite couplet of the time, or evolving a lyric. In fact, his good, all-round power and attractive manner compensated for his singular ineptitude in turning his fortune to better account. Among his best works may be noted Rural Sports; Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London; the famous Black-Eyed Susan; the equally agreeable if less well-known lyrics—Phyllida, and 'Twas when the Seas were Roaring; and some capital Fables.

"A soft and civil companion," said Johnson of him, truly enough. Easy good humour marks both Prior and Gay. They are typical products of their age, genuine artists in their way, and modest as that way might be, rarely dull save when they tried to be serious, taking life in the spirit of Horace's carpe diem philosophy.

THE STRAND

Thro' the long Strand together let us stray.
With thee conversing I forget the way
Behold that narrow street which steep descends,
Whose building to the slumy shore extends,
Here Arundel's fam'd structure rear'd its fame,
The street alone retains an empty name;
Where Titian's glowing paint the canvas warm'd,
And Raphael's fair design, with judgment, charm'd,
Now hangs the bellman's song, and pasted here
The colour'd prints of Overton appear.
Where statues breath'd, the works of Phidias's hands,
A wooden pump, or lonely watch-house stands.
There Essex's stately pile adorn'd the shore,
There Cecil's, Bedford's, Villiers's, now no more.
Yet Burlington's fair palace still remains,
Beauty within, without proportion reigns.
Beneath his eye declining art revives,
The wall with animated picture lives;
There Handel strikes the strings, the melting strain
Transports the soul, and thrills thro' every vein;
There oft I enter (but with cleaner shoes),
For Burlington's belov'd by ev'ry Muse.

ST. CLEMENT'S

Where the fair columns of St. Clement stand,
Whose straiten'd bounds encroach upon the Strand,
Where the low penthouse bows the walker's head,
And the rough pavement wounds the yielding tread
Where not a post protects the narrow space,
And strung in twines, combs dangle in thy face;
Summon at once thy courage, rouse thy care,
Stand firm, look back, be resolute, beware
Forth issuing from steep lanes, the collier's steeds
Drag the black load; another cart succeeds,
Team follows team, crowds heap'd on crowds appear
And wait impatient till the road grow clear
Now all the pavement sounds with tramping feet,
And the mixt hurry barricades the street.
Entangled here, the waggon's lengthen'd team
Cracks the tough harness; here a pond'rous beam
Lies overturn'd athwart, for slaughter fed
Here lowing bullocks raise their horned head.

Now oaths grow loud, with coaches coaches jar,
And the smart blow provokes the sturdy war;
From the high box they whirl the throng around,
And with the twining lash their shins resound:
Their rage ferments, more dangerous wounds they try,
And the blood gushes down their painful eye.
And now on foot the frowning warriors light,
And with their pond'rous fists renew the fight;
Blow answers blow, their cheeks are smear'd with blood,
Till down they fell, and grappling roll in mud.

' 'Tis woman that seduces all mankind.
By her we first were taught the wheedling arts "

" If the heart of a man is depress'd with cares,
The must is dispoil'd when a woman appears."

' The fly that sips treacle is lost in the sweets " 1

' When yet was ever found a mother
Who'd give her booby for another ? " 2

With Prior to reflect the careless urbanities and semi-cynical moods of the day, Gay to mirror its manners and outward show, we have two excellent guides, after Pope, to the life of eighteenth-century London.

Three poets of the time stand apart from their fellows, as marking the transitional spirit between the school of Dryden and Pope and the Romantic movement in verse that started with Thomson's Seasons. Edward Young, Thomas Parnell, and Lady Winchelsea stood to some extent for the new spirit; in their treatment of external nature they belonged more to the Romantic than to the Critical movement. Lady Winchelsea, for instance, was singled out for commendation by Wordsworth because of her Nocturnal Reverie. Parnell made a notable break away from the eternal couplet of the time, and Young, for all his pretentiousness, showed a gloomy gravity quite different from the easy-going sententiousness of Pope and his school.

It is probable, however, that none of these were conscious of any innovating tendencies. The difference in tone is due rather to temperamental peculiarities than to any deliberate change of literary attitude. Young, in his Universal Passion (1725-8), proved almost as skilful a satirist as Pope himself. His most characteristic work is the Night Thoughts, a lengthy poem of sententious reflection, showing considerable technical skill in his management of blank verse, but is handicapped by a stilted, theatrical phraseology.

Parnell, like Young, suffered vicissitudes and disappointments, that are found reflected in his verse. More varied than Young, he achieved some excellent translations, and showed freshness and observation as well as metrical power, in The Night-piece on Death and Hymn to Contentment.

Lady Winchelsea (1660-1725) was closely in touch with the literary wits of the age—indeed she is Pope's Ardelia—and presents a curious and sometimes piquant mixture of the old and the new in her methods. While not sufficiently original to break away from the literary conventions of her time, she none the less had a more genuine feeling for nature, and was far truer and more sincere in her pictures of natural scenery than any of her contemporaries. In some respects The Nocturnal Reverie is better entitled to be regarded as the pioneer of the Nature poetry of the new age than even Thomson's Seasons; it is less rhapsodical, less convoluted in its phraseology. If we give Thomson the preference, it is because of a greater ambition in his effort, a more conscious effort to leave the methods of the day.

It is quite evident that we have come to the parting of the ways. Before leaving it, let us recall the solid merits of the school that were undervalued and slighted rather unfairly by the brilliant critics of the Romantic period; these in particular, the finished art of its satire, the creation of a delightful type of butterfly poetry in the vers de société; above all, the clarity and succinctness introduced into English verse.

II. PROSE: (a) The Pioneers of the Essay. (b) The Great Essayists (Addison—Steele—Defoe—Swift). (c) Lesser Prose Writers.

(a) THE PIONEERS OF THE ENGLISH ESSAY

AMONG the great Elizabethan writers there are suggestions here and there of a plainer, simpler, more straightforward prose. Bacon in his Essays, and Jonson in his Discoveries, diverge certainly at times from the elaborate Elizabethan pattern, wrought to such cunning perfection by men like Browne, and Burton, and Sir Walter Raleigh.

None the less, the prose as a whole is the prose of an age of poetry, and even in the plainer writers, rhetoric is never far away, but the prose of the new age is far better adapted to an age richer in political and philosophic speculation than to poetry; in the art of critical exposition and journalistic realism than in work of creative imagination.

Cowley may be regarded as the initial pioneer of the new movement. He is a pioneer by no means certain of his medium, nor even constant to it; yet, both in his essays and his Discourse concerning the Government of Oliver Cromwell (1661), the change of literary attitude is clearly apparent.

² The Mother, the Nurse, and the Pavy.

'There is no saying shocks me so much as that which I hear very often, that a man does not know how to pass his time.' It would have been but ill spoken by Methuselah in the nine hundred and sixty-ninth year of his life, so far it is from us, who have not time enough to attain to the utmost perfection of any part of any science, to have cause to complain that we are forced to be idle for want of work. But this, you will say, is working for the learned: others are not capable either of the employment or diversions that arrive from letters. I know they are not: and therefore cannot much recommend solitude to a man totally illiterate. But, if any man be so unlearned as to want entertainment of the little intervals of accidental solitude which frequently occur in almost all conditions (except the very meanest of the people, who have business enough in the necessary provisions of life), it is truly a great shame both to his parents and himself; for a very small portion of any ingenious art will stop up all those gaps of our time: either music, or painting, or designing, or chemistry, or history, or gardening, or twenty other things. will do it usefully and pleasantly; and if he happen to set his affections upon poetry (which I do not advise him too immoderately) that will over-do it—no wood will be thick enough to hide him from the importunities of company or business, which would abstract him from his beloved.”¹

Dryden's importance in the domain of prose is even more remarkable than in that of verse, and thus for reasons which will be quite obvious to all students of his work. His peculiar gifts—his ease, his force, his clearness, his intellectual vigour—are qualities more serviceable in prose, and especially serviceable at this stage in the history of our literature, when prose had suffered from over-riotous living.

His well known Essay on Dramatic Poesy was begun about 1685, and quite apart from its brilliant analysis of dramatic principles, it is ‘a model of the new prose,’ without which we should fail to appreciate those qualities that went to build up the English Essay of the eighteenth century.

Of this Essay there are three editions, all clearly showing the pains taken by the critic in the direction of clarity and correctness.

In his early prose Cornéille probably was the dominant formative influence—some critics have seen in his later work the influence of Montaigne. However this may be, the essay model of Montaigne seems persistent, and he certainly did much to rouse general interest in the Essay as a form of literary production.

Dryden's prose is nearly always strong, flexible, and delightfully straightforward. The epithet ‘Glorious’—so long attached to him—may seem to some as somewhat curious, for great as his powers were, they lacked that touch of high imagination which would reconcile us to the term. But in granting the phrase in terms of breadth rather than depth, we may assuredly say ‘Amen’ to it. If he does not range from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven, his terrestrial range is one of extraordinary variety.

‘I will not excuse, but justify myself for one pretended crime for which I am liable to be charged by false critics, not only in this translation, but in many of my original poems, that I Latinise too much. It is true that when I find an English word significant and sounding I neither borrow from the Latin or any other language. but when I want at home I must seek abroad. If sounding words are not of our growth and manufacture, who shall hinder me to import them from a foreign country? I carry not out the treasure of the nation which is never to return; but what I bring from Italy I spend in England; here it remains, and here it circulates; for if the coin be good, it will pass from one hand to another. I trade both with the living and the dead for the enrichment of our native language. We have enough in England to supply our necessity but if we will have things of magnificence and splendour, we must get them by commerce. . . . But every man cannot distinguish betwixt pedantry and poetry; every man, therefore, is not fit to innovate.”²

Sir WILLIAM TEMPLE, son of Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls in Ireland, was born in 1628, educated at Cambridge, and became a member of the Irish Parliament in 1660. He travelled considerably on the Continent and was British Ambassador at the Hague for many years, during which he negotiated the marriage of William of Orange and the Princess Mary. On his return to England in 1679, Charles II took him into his confidence in diplomatic arrangements, but Temple, not feeling that he could agree on all points with his Sovereign, thought it wiser to retire to his house at Sheen, and afterwards to Moor Park, with Swift as his secretary, and occupy his leisure in essay writing and gardening. His wife, the famous Dorothy Osborne, that most delightful and natural of letter writers, predeceased him. Sir William died in 1699.

His Essays on various subjects—Health, Gout, Gardening, and Poetry—are written in a clear, agreeable, unaffected style, rising at times to a rhythmic beauty, as in the Essay on Poetry. They certainly show that the ease and intimacy of the new school need not be divorced from dignity and charm.

OF POETRY

I know very well that many who pretend to be wise by the forms of being grave are apt to despise both poetry and music as toys and trifles too light for the use or entertainment of serious men; but whoever find themselves wholly insensible to these charms, would, I think, do well to keep their own counsel, for fear of reproaching their own temper, and bringing the goodness of their natures, if not of their understandings into question; it may be thought at least an ill sign, if not an ill constitution, since some of the fathers went so far as to esteem the love of music a sign of predestination; as a thing divine and reserved for the felicities of heaven itself. While this world lasts, I doubt not but the pleasures and requests of these two entertainments will do so too, and happy those that content themselves with these, and any other so easy and innocent, and do not trouble the world, or other men, because they cannot be quite themselves, though nobody hurts them! When all is done, human life is at the greatest and the best but like a forward child that must be played with and humoured a little to keep it quiet till it falls asleep and then the care is over.

Temple's contemporary, Lord HALIFAX (George Savile), was a Yorkshireman, born at Thornhill in 1633. For his share in the Restoration he was created Baron Savile and Viscount Halifax in 1668, and was the chief dissenter to the bill for excluding the Duke of York from the succession. Twice made Lord Privy Seal, he was forced to resign in 1690, and died in 1695.

Halifax was a political force as well as a man of letters—achieved fame with his pamphlet The Character of a Trimmer, which indicates accurately his own political attitude; became famous as a parliamentary speaker; and in a volume of Miscellanies (c. 1688), which contained essays on various subjects and a few notable pamphlets, showed grace, lucidity, and terseness. He writes more like the man of the world than Temple, and his aphorisms have a pleasant, satirical flavour, as that on An Empty Woman: “Such an one is seldom serious but with her tailor;” or this, “You may love your children without living in the nursery.”

In all these writers the influence of Montaigne is very marked, none more so perhaps than in Halifax, who had no small measure of Montaigne's happy faculty for metaphor.

Of other famous contemporaries, forerunners of the great prose age, Tillotson and Bunyan, I speak elsewhere. Bunyan really stands by himself—there are no traces of foreign models and classical influences in him. He is the child of Puritanism, and the Bible and his own native genius are the only outstanding factors. That is why he was treated in the last phase of the Renaissance, rather than in the first phase of the classical reaction.

(b) THE GREAT ESSAYISTS

JOSEPH ADDISON (1672-1719)

Speaking of the statue set up to Addison in Westminster Abbey, Macaulay has said :

"Such a mark of national respect was due to the unsullied statesman, to the accomplished scholar, to the man of pure English eloquence, to the consummate painter of life and manners. It was due, above all, to the great satirist who alone knew how to use ridicule without abusing it, who, without inflicting a wound, effected a great social reform, and who reconciled wit with virtue after a long and disastrous separation, during which wit had been led astray by profligacy and virtue by fanaticism."

The eulogy is remarkable, but few would deny its essential justice.

Long after feudalism had perished as a political force, it lingered on as a social and literary influence. Intensely individualistic as was the spirit of the Renaissance, it left untouched by its anti-feudal tendencies, many old customs. Sentiment at the Restoration favoured the continuance and vitality of these survivals—ancient habits of thought and life. So looking at the life of the period, we can detect two contrary currents of opinion, the one fed by puritanism, the other by feudalism. At a later period, the trends of thought which we designate Liberalism and Conservatism arose from these. But there have always existed, ever since mediæval times, the two camps. Neither has conquered its enemy. Each has modified the other. And the greatest masters of our literature have been those who have wrung from both their measure of fruitfulness. The best instincts of the nation had recoiled alike from the narrow rigidity of the Puritan ideal and the shallow self-indulgence of the Restoration hedonists. In religious matters they had found a via media; they now sought one in their social and political life. In this work of reconciliation it is hard to overestimate the influence of JOSEPH ADDISON.

Born May 1, 1672, he went to school at the Charterhouse, leaving that in 1687 for Queen's College, Oxford. Later on he was associated with Magdalen College; and the picturesque walk by the Cherwell, with its formal line of elm-trees and air of serene repose, remains as a reminder of the quiet, studious scholar. His scholastic reputation became considerable, and Johnson warmly praised his Latin poem

The star of Congreve was rising, that of Dryden declining, at this time, and Congreve, it is said, introduced Addison to Montague Chancellor of the Exchequer. Addison wrote a poem to the King in 1695, and dedicated a Latin poem on the Peace of Ryswick (1697) to Montague himself. This was pleasantly acknowledged by a pension of £300 obtained for the youthful poet by Montague. This enabled him to travel abroad and enrich his education. From the account of his wanderings through France and Italy, it is clear that he is more interested in classic associations than in scenic beauties, and that he views Catholic practices with an impatience and austerity almost Miltonic. Clearly this cultured loyalist has something of the Puritan in his constitution. On his return to England, he remained for a considerable time without employment, but when the Whigs came into favour, Addison's lot became happier. Then came a period of preferments and of official poetry which need not concern us here. His poetry was never great at any time, though graceful, scholarly, and facile. He had the gift of friendship, and by his social qualities attracted towards himself many illustrious men, very divergent in temperament. Among them were Steele and Swift. Of Swift he thought very highly, and to him dedicated a copy of his Italian Travels :

"To the most agreeable companion, the truest friend, and the greatest genius of his age."

Pope has declared that Addison spent much of his time at coffee-houses with his friends, a habit which Pope himself found injurious to health. It is probable that Addison's social proclivities led him into habits of intemperance, which probably shortened his life. But there is no doubt that "Canary wine and Barbadoes water" frequently unlocked a flood of rich eloquence and fine suggestion. One recalls the witty saying of Coleridge, that "some men are like musical glasses; you only get the finest tones from them when they are wet."

He was an excellent talker; scarcely an effective conversationalist. He belonged to the genus of Coleridge and Carlyle rather than that of Hazlitt and Macaulay.

Steele and Addison were educated at the same school, and were friends at Oxford. But while Addison shaped as the "good little boy," Steele's career suggested a collegiate Harry Sandford. Throughout life he reminds one rather of Thomas Nash or Robert Greene, those famous Elizabethan Bohemians, for, like them, "sunning and repenting," he spent most of his days. But he is a shade less impetuous than those worthies, and the puritan element which showed up unexpectedly in Greene was very clearly discernible in Steele's work. A fine portrait is given of him in Esmond.

In April 1709 Steele started the Tatler. Addison contributed a few papers to the earlier numbers, but not till the eighty-first number did he become a frequent contributor.

Of Addison's help, Steele remarked: "When I had once called him in I could not subsist without dependence on him."

The Tatler started by detailing news mingled with essays and stories and dramatic criticism. It was through the influence of Addison that the essay became the most important constituent.

January 2, 1711, saw the death of the Tatler, and the following March 1, the birth of the Spectator. It ran for 555 numbers, continuing until December 6, 1712. The essay, which had proved so great a success in the Tatler, became the one ingredient of the Spectator. The sobriety and moderation displayed by the writers, the humour, the genial moralising, these qualities made for the stupendous success of the journal. It has been well said that "the Spectator made a mark in English literature, and fixed a form which was adopted with servile fidelity by many periodicals till the end of the century."

In his supreme characterisation—the mellow Sir Roger de Coverley—all that is finest in the old feudalism finds expression.

Steele sketches him in the second Spectator; but he is most richly embroidered in the fifteen Spectators by Addison, where Sir Roger is introduced in his own country house.

After journalism came playwriting. Cato was produced at Drury Lane, and despite its dramatic tameness, scored a great success. Pope had written an elegant prologue for it, and Swift, it is said, attended one of the rehearsals.

Then came another period of essay writing, this time for the Guardian, the successor to the Spectator. In August 1716 he married the Countess of Warwick. The marriage was not a happy one, and, according to Johnson, resembled the marriage in which a Sultan gives his daughter a man to be her slave; and it has been said, "Holland House, although a large house, could not contain Addison, the Countess of Warwick, and one guest—Peace."

In 1718 his health began to break, and he retired on a good pension, with literary work on hand (though apparently of no great interest) which he never completed. A quarrel with his old friend Steele—largely due to the fact that another had supplanted him in Addison's estimation—embittered his remaining months. The quarrel was never made up.

In June 1719 asthma, which had plagued him all his life, returned; then dropsy supervened. He died on the 17th, at Holland House, at the age of forty-seven.

HIS WORK

The character and genius of Addison are best exemplified in the pages of the Spectator. It is hard to better the comment of his latest biographer, Mr. Courthope, that he "may be said to have almost created and wholly perfected English prose as an instrument for the expression of social thought." If we compare Addison's prose with the prose of Milton or Hooker or Bacon, we shall realise the delightful plasticity, the delightful nuances of mood and fancy for which Addison finds expression. The earlier stylists were rich in eloquence, and in the gift of noble declamation; but they speak in full dress from, as it were, a rostrum. In the Tatler and Spectator, we have the beginning of that genial intimacy of the writer with the reader, which was to find so rare a following at a later time in Elia, in Hazlitt, and in Thackeray. Indebted to the great writers who preceded him, Addison, none the less, has a manner quite his own; and it is obvious how deep are the obligations of the modern generation of essayists, in whom the personal note is predominant.

With all this flexibility and ease there is no slipshod writing. So fastidious is his workmanship, that, according to Warton, he would stop the press, on occasion, to alter a preposition or conjunction. Thus for the manner. For the matter, the happy blend of the Puritan spirit and the Renaissance spirit proved greatly to the taste of his countrymen. There had been moralists before in plenty: the stately moralist in Hooker, the quaint moralist in Sir Francis Bacon; the fiery moralist in Milton. Addison exemplified the happy moralist. "I have," he said truly enough, "brought philosophy out of closet and libraries, schools and colleges, to dwell at clubs and assemblies, at tea-tables and in coffee-houses."

Nowhere is Addison more delightful than in illustrating the contrast between the country and town life; the clash of rural feudalism with urban manners. An excellent commentary on the London life of the day is furnished by Sir Roger's opinions on matters theatrical, on Westminster Abbey, on town fashions, where this fine old fellow leaves the country house where he is seen to such advantage among his friends and retainers. He wishes to see the Prince "Eugenio," as he persists in calling Prince Eugene, and he accompanies the Spectator on the water to Spring Gardens, or to the theatre to see The Distressed Mother played.

The Spectator was probably a picture of Addison himself. He is a gentleman who, after studying soberly and well at the University, betakes himself to London, and there notes all the phases of life to be observed; he listens to the wits at Willa's; smokes with "the philosopher of the Grecian," maybe with the politician at the "St. James's," and with the merchants in the "Exchange."

Here in its picture of the town and country are all the materials for the modern novel of social life.

Small wonder that, at a time when Richardson was quietly performing his work as compositor, and Fielding indulging in schoolboy exploits; when Smollett and Goldsmith and Sterne were yet unborn, a public should be found for this picture of contemporary life and manners.

Even Pope, his bitter rival, said of him: "His conversation had something in it more charming than I have found in any other man."

The "Spectator" and its Social and Literary Importance

The trend of the essays in the Spectator is thus characterised by their author: "The great and only end of these speculations is to banish vice and ignorance out of the territories of Great Britain."

It is the first attempt made by journalism to give form and consistency to public opinion; the first serious effort made, in fact, to organise public opinion by clarifying and systematising the infinite discussions that went on at the clubs and coffee-houses.

From the outset Addison's face is set against the shameless licence and shallowness of Restoration manners; he attacks the fashionable youths and cynical men about town who are "knight-errants" of vice. To him they are "a sort of vermin." When he wishes he can smite hard; but his favourite mood is a mood of delicate and playful satire, and here he is at his happiest. Swift is his superior at the sledge-hammer work.

"The toilet," he writes, "is their great scene of business, and the right enjoyment of their hair the principal employment of their lives. The sorting of a suit of ribbands is reckoned a very good morning's work; and if they make an excursion to a mercer's or a toy shop, so great a fatigue makes them unfit for anything else all the day after. Their more serious occupations are sewing and embroidering, and their greatest drudgery the preparation of jellies and sweetmeats. This, I say, is the state of ordinary woman though I know there are multitudes of those of a more elevated life and conversation that move in an exalted sphere of knowledge and virtue, that join all the beauties of mind to the ornaments of dress, and inspire a kind of awe and respect, as well as of love into their male beholders. I hope to increase the number of these by publishing this daily paper . . . and divert the minds of my female readers from greater trifles."

Of Addison's verse there is less to say. There is little here that has survived the exacting criticism of posterity. The Latin poems are brilliant exercises—nothing more; while of the others, the hymns alone impress the reader as work out of the ordinary. Lacking the delicate charm of a Herbert, and the fine fervour of a Wesley, they have a graciousness, a distinction, a sober beauty of their own singularly pleasing. His plays have no lasting quality about them. Neither he nor Steele had the dramatic gift. Sentiment and humour there is—especially in the opera of Rosamond (1707); but his faculty of characterisation, so happily displayed in the essays, finds no congenial outlook in terms of the theatre. Cato, so famous in his day, is one of the dullest plays ever written by a great writer.

RICHARD STEELE (1672-1729)

Genial, impulsive, good-natured, improvident "Dick" Steele was the son of a Dublin attorney who died when his son was five years old. Educated at the Charterhouse with Addison, he proceeded to Christ Church, and afterwards to Merton College, Oxford, which he left without taking a degree.

Without counting the oost, Steele always did that which appealed most strongly to his own inclinations. The Battle of the Boyne was in the air, and the fever of war fired his blood; failing to obtain a commission in the army, he enlisted as a private in the Coldstream Guards, to the disgust of his uncle, who disinherited him. He, however, soon rose from the ranks and became the favourite and secretary of his colonel, Lord Cutts, to whom he dedicated The Procession (1695), some elegiac verses written on the death of Queen Mary.

In 1701 he wrote The Christian Hero, "to fix upon my own mind a strong impression of virtue and religion in opposition to a stronger propensity towards unwarrantable pleasure." The following year, as a counterblast to his sermon, appeared The Funeral, in 1704 The Lying Lover, which Steele said was "damned for its piety"; The Tender Husband in 1705, and after a lapse of seventeen years, The Conscious Lovers, in which Mrs. Oldfield and Colley Cibber took parts.

Steele was twice married, his first wife died shortly after their marriage, and left him an estate in the West Indies. His second wife, his "dear, dear Prue," appears to have been "gey ill to live with," but as her brilliant husband was incorrigibly extravagant and hopelessly erratic in his domestic movements, she had perhaps some cause for her irritable and peevish nature.

In 1707 Steele was appointed editor to the official organ of the Government, the London Gazette. In 1709 he started, as we have seen, the Tatler, and later the Spectator and the Guardian, all of which added to his fame as an essayist.

Steele also took an active part in the politics of the day, and was twice chosen Member of Parliament; an ardent supporter of the Hanoverian succession, he was knighted in 1716, the year in which he received the patent for Drury Lane.

The last five years of his life were spent in retirement on the borders of Wales. He had played various parts on the stage of life, and had suffered many vicissitudes, but he was hopeful and brave to the end, and when paralysis seized him, although unable to speak, we are told that "he retained his cheerful sweetness of temper to the last; and would often be carried out in a summer's evening, when the country lads and lasses were assembled at their rural sports, and with his pencil, give an order on his agent, the mercer, for a new gown for the best dancer." Thus he died at Carmarthen on September 1, 1720, and by his own wish was buried in St. Peter's church.

Steele's journalistic work on the Tatler and Spectator has been discussed already, when dealing with Addison. He was too conscientious a moralist in his writing to be a good playwright, and his attempt to redeem the drama from the grossness and licence of the Restoration drama, led him into many sentimental ineptitudes. There is more vitality in his plays than in those of Addison, but he has no sense of construction, and as with Addison, it is to his Essays we must look for the rich expression of his genius.

Addison and Steele were admirably suited as co-craftsmen, for each could give what the other lacked. Steele brought to his work a wide experience of life, generous sympathies, and a sunny humour; Addison brought a wide experience of literature, a polished style, and just a pleasant tang of acidity in his humour. Both were moralists at heart, with much the same outlook on the society of their day. Yet there were sufficient differences in temperament and in gifts to be of real service, in giving breadth and diversity to the work they accomplished.

THE TATLER

I went to visit Flormel, the vainest thing in town, where I knew would drop in Colonel Picket, just come from the camp, her professed admirer. He is of that order of men who have much honour and merit, but withal a coxcomb; the other of that set of females, who has innocence and wit, but the first of coquetry. It is easy to believe these must be admirers of each other. She says the colonel rides the best of any man in England, the colonel says she talks the best of any woman. At the same time, he understands wit just as she does horsemanship. You are to know, these extraordinary persons see each other daily; and they themselves, as well as the town, think it will be a match but it can never happen that they can come to the point; for, instead of addressing each other, they spend their whole time in the reports of themselves he is satisfied if he can convince her he is a fine gentleman, and a man of consequence; and she in appearing to him an accomplished lady and a wit, without further design. Thus he tells her of his manner of posting his men at such a pass, with the numbers he commanded on that detachment: she tells him how she was dressed on such a day at court, and what offers were made her the week following. She seems to hear the repetition of his men's names with admiration, and waits only to answer him with as false a muster of lovers. They talk to each other, not to be informed, but approved. Thus they are so like that they are to be ever distant, and the parallel lines may run together for ever, but never meet.

DANIEL DEFOE (c. 1660-1—1731)

To many people Defoe is chiefly known as the author of Robinson Crusoe (1719), and a few other tales dealing with low life. And yet, fiction was merely an incident in Defoe's astoundingly varied career. He was fifty-eight when he wrote Robinson Crusoe, and before that time he had been a merchant, a manufacturer, a satirist, a public official, and an editor.

Defoe was born in London at St. Giles', Cripplegate (c. 1660-1). His father was a butcher, his grandfather a Northamptonshire yeoman. Intended for the ministry, like many another literary man, he spent five years in a training academy, and then found himself unsuited for it, deciding characteristically it was not for him—"being neither honourable, agreeable, nor profitable." So, apprenticed to a hose factor, he took to writing political tracts instead, against the King, Charles II. He, however, was careful not to sign them, and was astute enough to keep in the background whenever prudence suggested it, for although he took part (he tells us) in Monmouth's rising, none knew anything about it till years after, when it was safe to mention the fact.

He started a hosiery business in Cornhill, but greatly disliked being referred to as a "shop-keeper," in later years explaining that he had merely been a "trader in hosiery." In connection with his business he travelled to Spain, and varied these trips abroad by escaping from his creditors to some other part of England.

Defoe uses his business experiences in The Complete English Tradesman for the Instruction of Young Beginners; and advises the young tradesman to stick to his work and not fancy himself a politician or a man of letters, by running off to the coffee-house. He is not to go too fast, but to "keep wagging and always go on," like the carrier's waggon.

His first known pamphlet was written in verse, and published during the Revolution of 1688, and was exuberantly loyal. Here he declares he had never written before, and would never write again unless his pamphlet took effect. Either this is a rhetorical exuberance, or else he justified early the reputation he was afterwards to gain, of being the most practised liar of his age.

Everything that Defoe says about himself must be taken with reservation, and when possible, substantiated elsewhere for from his earliest years he seemed constitutionally unable to tell the truth, and even his name is an experiment in fiction, his father's name being Foe.

In 1692, rumour has it that he fled to Bristol for the same reasons that drove Dick Swiveller to indirect methods of reaching his house, and was known there as the "Sunday Gentleman"—because he appeared on that day and that day only, remaining indoors for the rest of the week through fear of the bailiffs.

But this did not greatly worry him. Like another of Dickens' famous experimentalists in life, he remained cheerful, waiting for something else to turn up, he was sure it would, and it usually did.

Certainly Defoe was wise in remaining in England, for he made himself useful to the Government—a quality not unrecognised by them. We are told that from 1694 until the end of the reign of William III, was the most prosperous and honourable period of Defoe's life.

When affluence arrived, it should always be remembered that he paid many of his debtors in full, ignoring the arrangement for a composition. Probably he would have paid all, but another business—a pantile factory—proving a failure, checked his laudable intent.

He served William in good stead by his pamphlet in defence of a standing army and by some ungenerous lines on The True Born Englishman. These verses, coming at a time when popular feeling was against the King and his Dutch followers, are a tribute, moreover, to Defoe's courage. He rounded Englishmen that when they boasted of their descent, they forgot those creative elements that had contributed to their making.

' A true born Englishman's a contradiction,
In speech an irony, in fact a fiction "

With William's death in 1702, Defoe's era of prosperity closed. Under Anne the High Church party became dominant, and bitterness towards Dissenters was the order of the day. This evoked one of the most remarkable of Defoe's pamphlets, and one that established him beyond doubt as an artist in fiction. In 1702 appeared anonymously The Shortest Way with Dissenters, in which, with ironic skill, he reduced to absurdity the High Church position. If these Dissenters are so bad, such is the drift of the pamphlet, the best way is to kill them. Unhappily, the irony was too subtle to be appreciated, and both Churchmen and Dissenters were furious. To use his own words, "The world flew at him like a dog with a broom at his tail."

As a matter of fact, he had merely put plainly and forcibly the sentiments of an extreme High Tory Churchman. Suppress Dissent with the hangman's rope. Fines are useless "Crucify the thieves."

As he urged later, this he intended as an exposure of the cant of the non-jurors and he looked to the Dissenters to applaud his humour. But they failed to see the joke; so did the Churchmen. To one churchman, however, the brutal extremity of the plea appealed like a message from above, and he solemnly ranked Defoe's jeu d'esprit "as next to the Bible." All the same he was tried, found guilty of seditious libel, fined, and subjected to the pillory.

He stood before the Royal Exchange in Cornhill, on the three last days of July, 1703; but had no bad time of it, for admirers clustered round and threw flowers in place of garbage, since he was a popular favourite.

A HYMN TO THE PILLORY

The first Intent of Laws
Was to correct the Effect, and check the Cause :
And all the Ends of Punishment,
Were only future mischiefs to prevent.

But justice is inverted when
Those Engines of the Law,
Instead of pinching vicious men,
Keep honest ones in awe ;
Thy business is, as all men know,
To punish villains, not to make men so.

Whenever then, thou art prepared
To prompt that vice, thou should'st reward,
And by the terrors of thy grisly Face
Make men turn rogues to shun disgrace ;
The End of thy Creation is destroyed ,
Justice expires of course, and Law's made void.

What are thy terrors ? that, for fear of thee,
Mankind should dare to sink their honesty ?
He's bold to impudence that dare turn knave,
The scandal of thy company to save
He that will crimes he never knew confess,
Does more than if he know those crimes, transgress :
And he that fears thee, more than to be base
May want a heart, but does not want a face.

Thou, like the Devil, dost appear,
Blacker than really thou art, by far .
A wild chimeric notion of Reproach ;
Too little for a crime, for none too much.
Let none th' indignity resent ;
For Crime is all the shame of Punishment
Thou Bugbear of the Law stand up and speak,
Thy long misconstrued silence break,
Tell us, who 'tis, upon thy Ridge stands there,
So full of fault and yet so void of fear ,
And from the Paper in his hat,
Let all mankind be told for what

Tell them it was because he was too bold,
And told those truths which should not have been told.
Extol the justice of the land,
Who punish what they will not understand
Tell them he stands exalted there
For speaking what we would not hear :
And yet he might have been secure,
Had he said less, or would he have said more.
Tell them that this is his reward
And worse is yet for him prepared,
Because his foolish virtue was so nice,
As not to sell his friends, according to his friends' advice.

And thus he's an example made,
To make men of their honesty afraid ;
That for the Time to come, they may
More willingly, their friends betray ;
Tell them, the men that placed him here,
Are so(anda)ls to the Times,
Are at a loss to find his guilt,
And can't commit his crimes.

While in prison at Newgate, he was treated with leniency, but had to consort with the usual Newgate company. This did not disturb him, for he saw a way of turning his imprisonment into a profitable adventure.

In 1704 there emanated from Newgate the first number of a Review written by Defoe. It was a political newspaper, and he showed in this "weekly history of Nonsense, Impertinence, Vice, and Debauchery," of domestic and foreign politics, that power of arresting attention, while using an apparently matter-of-fact, circumstantial manner, that was to stand him in good stead when he essayed the novel.

In this paper he showed, moreover, some of the qualities of Cobbett : intonation and independence, and a command of vigorous, flexible English. When rebuked for his sharply-expressed opinions, and asked what business it was of his to meddle in public affairs, he says :

"I saw a parcel of people caballing together to ruin property, corrupt the laws, invade the Government . . . and in short, enslave and embroil the Nation, and I cried - 'Fire,' or rather I cried 'Water' - for the fire was begun already. I see all the nation running into confusions and directly flying in the face of one another and cried out, 'Peace.' . . . And what had I to do with this ? Why yes, gentlemen, I had the same right as every man that has a footing in his country, or that has a posterity to possess liberty and claim right, must have, to preserve the laws, liberty and government of that country to which he belongs ; and he that charges me with meddling in what does not concern me, meddles himself with what 'tis plain he does not understand."

But he was not really an independent critic. He could not afford to be. The Government, he knew, would pounce down on him at the first attack on them. So on some matters he was "reticent" as he afterwards explained, distinguishing between reticence and falsehood.

In July 1706 appeared The True Relation of the Apparition of one Mrs. Veal, that gave further proof of his power to create that illusion of truth which is the very life force of fiction.

When Godolphin was dismissed, and Harley came back to office, the Review changed politics. This is one of the evils of "patronage." Defoe was not squeamish ; neither better nor worse than the majority of his day. In his heart Defoe was Whig, and when he could do so safely, he served the Whigs with his pen.

About 1718 politics became more humdrum, and Defoe, after another visit to prison (for libel), looked for fresh worlds to conquer.

On April 25, 1719, appeared the first volume of Robinson Crusoe, founded on the four years' residence of Alexander Selkirk in the Island of Juan Fernandez. Captain Roger, who released Selkirk, had told the story, so also had Steele in the Englishman.

Defoe sold his book to William Taylor, a publisher, who made a fortune by it. Owing to its enormous success, a second volume was written, and a book of Crusoe's Serious Reflections followed.

Then came Captain Singleton (1720), Moll Flanders (1721), Colonel Jack (1721), Journal of the Plague Year (1722), Roxana (1724), A Tour through Great Britain (1724-8), A New Voyage round the World (1725), The Complete English Tradesman, (1725-7), The Political History of the Devil (1726), System of Magic (1726), and the Essay on the Reality of Apparitions (1727).

During his later years, Defoe lived at Stoke Newington, with stables and pleasure grounds, and kept a coach. We have a picture of him by a contemporary, referring to his gardening hobbies and his profitable exertions, who also mentions that he "met usually at the tea table, his (Defoe's) three lovely daughters, who were admired for their beauty, their education, and their prudent conduct."

Thus contemporary—Mr Baker, a naturalist—subsequently took more interest in the daughters than in the father, settled his mind on one and, doubtless inspired by her prudence, started a businesslike discussion with the father for her hand. In short, he wanted Sophia Defoe and a dowry, nor would he conclude matters till the dowry was arranged according to his satisfaction.

The last few years of Defoe's life are enveloped in some mystery. He was writing a book—The Complete English Gentleman—when he broke it off in September 1729, and fled. Why, is not clear. He wrote incoherently about it, accusing his son of infamous conduct. The son had certainly behaved badly to his mother and sister, but not so badly as the letter implies. He, however, never returned home, but died at a lodging in 1731, in Moorfields; possibly the avoidance of his creditors in the interest of his family was the reason for his disappearance, anyhow he did not die in distress; and his affection for his daughters is shown to the last.

CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS WORK

(a) The Realistic Imagination—"Lies are not worth a farthing if not calculated for the effectual deceiving of the people they are designed to deceive."

Defoe's imagination was realistic in the sense that it imparted to the reader the illusion of reality, that the storyteller hitherto had despised—"Fact . . . I can assure you"—he is always whispering to the reader.

Everybody likes the air of verisimilitude. The novel reader asks to be "taken in," and he likes it to be done well. Defoe managed it in style. If he could amuse the public and at the same time induce them to think his stories were founded on fact, as indeed to an extent some were, so much the better. He always identified himself thoroughly with his subject, asking himself what he should have done in his character's place, and Crusoe is an idealised portrait of himself. The contingency of shipwreck was no unlikely one for him, and he always had a horror of the sea and its ways.

The elaborate Diary, the reflections of Crusoe, are highly typical of the eighteenth-century Englishman. Here we see his practical genius asserting itself. These things were bound to appeal to the English mind, so his readers were spellbound by his air of veracity and rosy inventions, and not willing to cavil at occasional inconsistencies, as when the Spaniards gave Friday's father an agreement, although they had neither paper nor ink, or when the hero stuffed his pockets with biscuits, although he had flung off his clothes before swimming to the wreck.

In short, Defoe proved himself an accomplished liar; and since all good story-telling is the art of lying brilliantly, his success as a novelist is quite comprehensible.

Let us look, for instance, at the Mrs. Veal story.

Defoe gives circumstantial evidence in favour of the apparition. He does not try to hide the flaws; he dwells on them. This is effective.

Mrs. Veal appears the day after her death in a dress of scoured silk. Why scoured silk? When Mrs. Bargrave is telling Mrs. Watson of this she says, "Scoured silk!"—Mrs. Veal and I alone knew that I helped her to make it up!"

How does she talk? She talks of trivial things; jewels, annuity, of her own looks.

(b) His Power of Detail—The entire fascination of Robinson Crusoe lies in its details. Children love details. They want to know how many biscuits he ate, and how often the parrot spoke. That all this is wildly unessential does not matter. Defoe knew its effectiveness and told them.

The detail is lucidly given; it is not flung in an undigested heap at the reader, it is not oppressively technical. It is clear, orderly, and sufficient. The style of Defoe is admirably suited to this method. No one could make an inventory or catalogue more appetising than he, and his instinct for reality usually kept him reticent at the right moment. He never overdoes his detail, or exceeds his power.

For instance in Roxana, he stops short in his narrative and observes artfully, she "fell into well-deserved misery," without further specification.

Nowhere is the power of detail better used than in the History of the Plague Year. At the time of the Plague, Defoe was only six years old, it is obvious, therefore, that beyond a few childish impressions he could not draw upon personal experience for his detailed and vivid account. But he had heard, no doubt from friends and relations, about the visitation, and in any case there were many books dealing with the event in his library upon which he could draw. For the rest, there was the literary genius of the man—a genius that achieved its effects by the apparent simplicity of its means.

"A Journal of the Plague Year: being observations or memorials of the most remarkable occurrences as well public as private, which happened in London during the last visitation in 1665, written by a Citizen who continued all the while in London, never made public before."

Here, at the outset, is struck the note of matter-of-fact realism, and never throughout the work is the illusion removed that you are reading the strictly veracious account of an eye-witness; as for instance, the ghastly scene in Tokenhouse Yard, Lothbury, where a woman looking out of window "gave three frightful screeches, and then cried, 'Oh! death, death, death!'" in a most inimitable tone, and which struck me with horror and a chilliness in my very blood."

(c) His Interest in Contemporary Life—Defoe had a thorough knowledge of men and women, not of the noblest souls perhaps, but of good average humanity. He knew the infirmities of our nature, realising that there was something of a rogue in most men, and no little of the rake in most women, and that even the most virtuous and straitlaced like to read about the shady side of life.

So he gave his public—prates and pickpockets, and loose women, and even threw in a few backslidings in the case of Crusoe; and the public read, enjoyed, and thanked Heaven they were not as these creatures were.

Defoe might have treated the flotsam and jetsam of life very differently. He might have shed a humanitarian glow around them as Dickens would: he might have shocked us by painting in real colours all the depravity, and hopelessness, and animism, as Gorky would. He might have taken them with the tolerant humour and easy good-nature of Thomas Nash; but he was not built like that, and though no doubt he could have made them much more alive than he did, he had to suit his public. We must not be too hard on him for that.

His interest in contemporary life made him realise exactly what the Englishman is; what his likes and dislikes are; and he reproduces these in Crusoe. He meets a savage and preaches at him with true missionary zeal. He carries his prejudices into other countries. They must give way to him, for he is an Englishman. But if he has the limitations of the Saxon, he has also his finer qualities, a sense of justice, and a dislike of humbug.

What does this mean?

It means that he eschewed the sentimental appeal, he let the facts of his story carry with them their own implication.

To the general reader this is somewhat of a disadvantage, especially when we recall Defoe's avowedly moral aim. Dotted the i's, crossing the t's are not always necessary to drive home a point of view; but it established a kind of personal sympathy with the reader, and precludes mis-understanding. On the other hand, English writers are so prone to excess of sentimentalism, and to so much underlining, that the restraint and bald impersonality of Defoe are not without compensation; and in his pamphlets he can be as unequivocal and as ad captandum, as his famous predecessor in the art of pamphleteering—Milton.

In The Poor Man's Plea (c. 1698) he had attacked, with uncompromising directness, the injustice of the laws against immorality, of the distinction between the law for the rich and the poor. Mr Blatchford himself could not have written with greater force and ardour. It made him many enemies, but Defoe loved a fight (boxing was an early delight), and he had all Cobbett's intense indignation with anything that smacked of social injustice. He was an accomplished journalist par excellence; but a journalist with a mission. It was the kind of journalism we may find to-day in such papers as Justice and the Clarion; and class criticism in those days was a far different matter. To-day it involves little discomfort beyond reduced advertisement. It meant, then, often imprisonment and punishment.

As a writer he helped to kill the high-falutin romance, so long a favourite and while his lack of imaginative depth and tenderness gave pronounced limitations to his work, and his didacticism is often oppressive, yet with obvious failings he combines considerable and often underrated merits. He was fair-minded and good-hearted, no small matter in those days—a good fighter, who fought honestly in the open, and if his ideals were not very inspiring, he never pretended they were: in short, a sincere, just, kindly, unaffected man.

JONATHAN SWIFT (1667–1745)

Of English parentage, Jonathan Swift was born in Dublin November 30, 1667. After a brief school career at Kilkenny, he went to Trinity College, Dublin, and despite conflict with the college authorities, and no very studious turn of mind, he took his degree in 1686. From his earliest days he grumbled at his position, and abused his uncle who had given him a good education. The maligned relative died in 1688, and Swift was left to rely on his own exertions. Coming to England, he became secretary to Sir William Temple, then living in retirement near Farnham. Lady Temple had been related by kindred to Swift's mother, Abigail Enock, and Temple took a kind and indulgent interest in his young protégé. Swift's supersensitive nature rebelled against the dependency of his position. He considered he was "treated as a schoolboy," and took no account of the disparity between his age and that of Temple, only too ready to construe every passing humour of his patron as a deep slight.

Temple seems to have done all he could for the young man, but was unable to secure him any definite position, beyond obtaining for him, through Lord Capel, the prebend of Kilroot, near Belfast in Ireland, shortly after he had taken priest's orders in 1694. There he stayed for two years, returning to Temple in 1696.

At Kilroot we hear of Swift's first love affair with Miss Waring, an heiress, known to us as "Varina," to whom he proposed by letter in 1696, a definite answer to which was left in abeyance by the lady. He, however, corresponded with her till 1700, when a final letter of Swift's, by no means to his credit, ended the matter between them.

Greatly as Swift had grumbled at his position, he seems to have preferred secretarial work for his patron in England to immolation in Ireland. He was certainly of service to Temple, and in turn had opportunity of studying both men and books that served him in excellent stead at a later period. During this time he acted as tutor to Esther Johnson, a humble dependant of Temple's, a child when Swift first met her, who grew up to be a beautiful woman, destined as "Stella" to play a big part in Swift's emotional life.

Sir William Temple died in 1699, and made Swift his literary executor. Up to this time Swift had published nothing of his own work, but had "writ and burnt," as he wrote to a brother cleric, "and writ again upon all manner of subjects, more than perhaps any man in England." The Battle of the Books was written in 1697, but did not appear till it was published with The Tale of A Tub in 1704.

The year following Temple's death, Swift returned to Ireland with Lord Berkeley, then Deputy, as his secretary and chaplain, in addition to this he was also appointed to a group of small livings near Dublin that brought him an income of £200 a year. Lady Berkeley had "a pious love of sermons," and Swift was called upon to read Boyle's Discourses to her. The chaplain, beginning to find Boyle rather wearisome, wrote his famous Meditation on a Broomstick, imposed it on the credulous lady as genuine Boyle, and had the gratification of hearing her praise it to her visitors. Another practical joke perpetrated by him was the well-known one on Partridge the astrologer, who also took it seriously.

Returning to England with Lord Berkeley in 1701, Swift was soon in the midst of a political crisis, throwing all his energies into the cause of the Whigs, and writing on their behalf his pamphlet On the Dissensions in Athens and Rome, notwithstanding that, as a churchman, his sympathies were on the whole more in accordance with the policy of the Tories. Neither party, however, realising his hopes, he threw up politics for the time being, and in disgust returned to Ireland in 1709.

All Swift's ambitions were for the Church, he was never a self-seeking man, and his change of politics and final adherence to the Tories arose from their eventually allowing his claim for "First Fruits," after which he aided their cause to the utmost of his power with pen and personal influence. His Tory pamphlet, The Conduct of the Allies, appeared on November 27, 1711; a few days later a second edition was printed and sold out in a few hours, and 11,000 were in circulation by the end of January.

While he was in the hey-day of his triumphs in political circles and, as Dr. Johnson has said, "predominating over his companions with very high ascendancy, and probably would bear none over whom he could not predominate," there was another side of the man shown to us in his Journal to Stella, a series of letters written to Esther Johnson, whom he had known intimately as a child.

On April 23, 1713, Swift was appointed Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, this was the first personal recognition of his political work, but as it involved a payment of £1000 for house and fees, was perhaps not so great a reward as it appeared.

Swift seems to have felt acutely the change from the rush of politics and congenial companionship to the loneliness and comparative obscurity of his life in Dublin. "The best and greatest part of my life I spent in England," he wrote about this time; "there I made my friendships and there I left my desires." However this may be, Ireland was in the throes of famine and crime consequent upon the passing of an Act in 1696 restricting trade with the Colonies, and prohibiting the export of woollen manufactures. Swift's sense of justice rebelled at this, and in 1720 he wrote the Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufactures, wherein he begs every man and woman to make an earnest resolution "never to appear with one single shred that comes from England." Four years later appeared the famous Drapier Letters, which were published anonymously; on their author's identity being disclosed, Swift became the idol of the poor in Ireland, and so greatly did they believe in him that a crowd, having assembled to witness an eclipse, dispersed immediately when some wag said that it had been postponed by order of the Dean.

In 1708 Swift had made the acquaintance of "Vanessa"—Hester Vanhomrigh—an intellectual and accomplished woman whose love for him was the tragedy of her life; his rage at a letter she had written to "Stella" brought their friendship of fifteen years to an abrupt conclusion, and caused her death from grief and jealousy, in 1723. Leaving directions in her will that Swift's poems and letters to her should be published, the poems appeared in 1726 under the title of Cadenus and Vanessa, but the letters were not published till after his death.

Gulliver's Travels was published in 1726. Two years later (1728) Swift's beloved "Stella" died—"the truest, most virtuous, and valuable friend that I, or any other person, was ever blessed with."

The loss of his friend Sheridan in 1738, and the gradual passing away of all those great intellects with whom he had fraternised, combined with the shadow of insanity that was overclouding his brain, made his last years more and more lonely and helpless, and at length he lost all means of communication with the world. Death came and released him on October 19, 1745, and he lies buried with "Stella" in his own cathedral of St. Patrick's, Dublin.

HIS WORK

"Swift was a wild beast who worried and baited all mankind almost, because his intolerable arrogance, vanity, pride, and ambition were disappointed." Thus Horace Walpole. Here is another verdict in a very different key: "By far the greatest man of that time, I think, was Jonathan Swift. . . . He saw himself in a world of confusion and falsehood, no eyes were clearer to see it than his." Such are the words of Thomas Carlyle.

In these varying tributes we may read the judgment of the eighteenth century and the judgment of the Victorian age, on this great prose satirist.

Each errs on the side of exaggeration; Walpole's coolly clever and languidly brilliant gifts, his easy-going nature and dilettante cast of mind, were so remote from Swift's powers in quality and character, as to make appreciation a mental impossibility. Carlyle's intense earnestness and his eye for forceful personality, certainly gave him far greater insight into Swift's character and genius, but made him unduly tolerant of those faults and weaknesses, that assuredly must be considered if we wish to deal fairly with the man in relation to his age.

Some clue may be found, perhaps, if we consider what the special quality was of Swift's satire.

In certain respects Swift resembles Defoe. There is direct vigour and matter-of-factness about his satire, and like Defoe, he uses irony to drive home a point. Less wide in his range than Defoe, and more savage in his methods, he sounds profounder depths, and exhibits a more cosmic humour than his contemporary. The humour is often as bitter as gall, but its power and appositeness are beyond question. Tragedy is written across Swift's life. His intellectual audacity stood in his own pathway. There could be no preferment for the churchman who so mercilessly ridiculed theology in The Tale of a Tub; no happiness for a lover so capricious and uncalculable as he; no content for a man who, in an age when the emotional life was kept so sternly subjected, looked out upon life with such fierce and passionate intensity of feeling. He is like a man born out of due time; and though he stands alone among the men of his age, unable to endure the easy cynicism of men like Gay, who held life to be a jest, or to follow the genial humanity of Steele and the graceful urbanities of Addison, yet he was not great enough to rise above them. On the critical side he is supremely great; none could despise the world and mankind with such brilliant fury. But he had no alternative; nothing to put in the place of material ambition. He is at heart as worldly as Defoe; and it is part of his tragedy that he recognises the fact.

The interest of The Battle of the Books—Swift's first important work—for the literary student to-day lies entirely in the flashes of satiric fancy with which he lights up his subject. The academic controversy of modern vernus ancient which excited so many of Swift's contemporaries seems to us both foolish and futile. Yet, however indifferent we may be to the controversial merits of the essay, it is worth reading for its amusing apologue of the bee and the spider. The inconclusive finish to the battle is a good touch. Literary combatants are never slain.

To an extent also the musty flavour of ancient controversies hangs over The Tale of a Tub, but the work stands on a much higher level. There is no fiercer satire in the language than this attack on the churches. Written from the point of view of an Anglican who wished to show up the folly and wickednesses of other religious communions, Swift practically riddles his own church with the shot intended only for the enemy—and the end of the onslaught sees all theologies in ruin. As an ironic exposure of human infirmities, The Tale of a Tub is a masterpiece, though its unrelieved cynicism makes it oppressive reading. Beside Swift's philosophy of life, even Schopenhauer's seems comparatively cheerful. There is a far deeper pessimism in Swift's description of happiness as a perpetual possession of being well deceived than the German thinker's definition of it being a condition of negative pain: After all, why not be well deceived, says Swift in effect: even the madman has his advantages, and illusions are essential to our well-being in life. So let us be fools among knaves, if we would have any regard for our comfort. Less elaborate, though very little inferior in intellectual power, is Swift's brilliant argument to prove that the abolishing of Christian England may, as things now stand, be attended with some inconvenience. Swift's profound contempt for the average man is tremendous. Beside the cold fury of his sarcasm, Carlyle's dictum, "Thirty millions—mostly fools," reads like a mere flash of petulance. Swift disbelieved absolutely in freedom of discussion and joined issue with the Deists who held that Religion, being based on reason, would be strengthened by free inquiry. "Free inquiry!" sneered the Dean, "why, the bulk of the people are 'as well qualified for flying as for thinking.'" Free thought must inevitably lead to anarchy and immorality. This is the rationale of Swift's religious standpoint. We need religion as the one security for social order.

But Swift is not always using heavy artillery, and there are some agreeable specimens of his fancy shooting in the Rules to Servants, and his burlesque,

Petition of Frances Harris: better still in his Lines on the Death of Dr. Swift, which are not disfigured by the foulness that besmirches so much of his satire:

"See, how the dean begins to break!
Poor gentleman! he droops apace!
You plainly find it in his face.
That old vertigo in his head
Will never leave him till he's dead.
Besides his memory decays:
He recollects not what he says;
He cannot call his friends to mind;
Forgets the place where last he dined;
Pleases you with stories o'er and o'er—
He told them fifty times before.
How does he fancy we can sit
To hear his out-of-fashion wit?
But he takes up with younger folks,
Who for his wine will bear his jokes.
Faith, he must make his stories shorter,
Or change his comrade, once a quarter:
In half the time he tells them round,
There must another not be found.

For poetry he's past his prime,
He takes an hour to find a rhyme:
His fire is out, his wit decayed,
His fancy sunk, his Muse a jade.
I'd have him thrice away his pen—
But there's no talking to some men.

And then their tenderness appears
By adding largely to my years:
'He's older than he would be reckoned,
And well remembers Charles the Second.
He hardly drinks a pint of wine.'
And that, I doubt, is no good sign
His stomach, too, begins to fail.
Last year we thought him strong and hale;
But now he's quite another thing;
I wish he may hold out till spring.
They hug themselves and reason thus:
'It is not yet so bad with us.'

In such a case they talk in tropes,
And by their fears express their hopes.
Some great misfortune to portend
No enemy can match a friend
With all the kindness they profess,
The merit of a lucky guess
(When daily How-d'ye's come of course,
And servants answer, 'Worse and worse!')
Would please them better than to tell,
That, 'God be praised! the dean is well.'
Then he who prophesied the best,
Approves his foresight to the rest:
'You know I always feared the worst,
And often told you so at first.'
He'd rather choose that I should die,
Than his prediction prove a lie.
Not one foretells I shall recover.
But all agree to give me over.

My good companions, never fear;
For, though you may mistake a year,
Though your prognostics run too fast,
They must be verified at last.

Behold the fatal day arrive!
How is the dean? 'He's just alive.'
Now the departing prayer is read;
'He hardly breathes'—'The dean is dead.'

Before the passing-bell begun,
The news through half the town is run;
'Oh! may we all for death prepare!
What has he left? and who's his heir?'
'I know no more than what the news is.'
'Tis all bequeathed to public uses.'
'To public uses! there's a whurr!
What had the public done for him?

More envy, avarice and pride :
He gave it all—but first he died.
And had the dean in all the nation
No worthy friend, no poor relation ?
So ready to do strangers good,
Forgetting his own flesh and blood ! . . .

Now Curll his shop from rubbish drains :
Three genuine tomes of Swift's Remains !
And then to make them pass the gibber,
Revised by Tibbalds, Moore, and Cibber.
He'll treat me as he does my betters,
Publish my will, my life, my letters ;
Revive the libels born to die,
Which Pope must bear, as well as I.

Here shift the scene, to represent
How those I love my death lament.
Poor Pope will grieve a month, and Gay
A week, and Arbuthnot a day
St John himself will scarce forbear
To bite his pen, and drop a tear.
The rest will give a shrug, and cry :
' I'm sorry—but we all must die !' . . .

One year is past ; a different scene !
No further mention of the dean,
Who now, alas ! no more is missed,
Than if he never did exist.
Where's now the favourite of Apollo ?
Departed, and his works must follow ;
Must undergo the common fate,
His kind of wit is out of date

Some country squire to Lintot¹ goes,
Inquires for Swift in verse and prose
Says Lintot. ' I have heard the name ;
He died a year ago ' ' The same.'
He searches all the shop in vain
' Sir, you may find them in Duck-lane.
I sent them, with a load of books,
Last Monday to the pastry-cook's.'

No understanding of Swift's undoubted fascination for women is possible, however, without studying his Journal to Stella and the verses to Vanessa. The first is especially important, for it reveals beneath the harsh violence of the man, a vein of curious tenderness and whimsicality. The Journal is written in a kind of sentimental shorthand, the writer using queer abbreviations for his caressing endearments :

" And now let us come and see what this saucy dear letter of M D (my dear) says. Come out letter, come out from between the sheets, here it is underneath and it will not come out. Come out again, I say . . . Here it is. . . . Hold up your head then like a good letter. . . . Farewell M D. M D. M D."

Of all Swift's books, Gulliver's Travels (1726-7) has proved the most popular. The reason is not hard to seek, for the earlier portions appeal both to the child and to the grown-up, and the parable he tells is thrown into the form of a pseudo-realistic narrative, whose secret he had learned from Defoe. There is playfulness of fancy, a lightness of touch about the early books, a simplicity of treatment, that gives it a readier access of appeal. The later books are clouded by the insanity of Swift's last days, and the pleasant fantasy degenerates into nauseous bitterness. Yet, while allowing the superior attractiveness of Gulliver, the greater originality and intellectual power of The Tale of a Tub is equally incontestable. That work exhibits best, Swift's genius as a satirist.

As a force in letters, Swift has impressed our own time more than he did his own. No ironist save Defoe, or Fielding in Jonathan Wild, proved as clear and unequivocal as he ; and Swift's irony, unlike theirs, glows with consuming intensity of feeling. The words are like molten lead. Like other great stylists of the time—Pope and Addison—he achieves a triumphant clarity ; but unlike Pope he is never epigrammatic, unlike Addison he has little plasticity of form. He is plainly and forcefully clear, with a greater strength than theirs ; all the more striking and cogent for his lack of ornament. There is no contemporary who impresses one more by his marked sincerity and concentrated passion.

Swift's great value as a writer lies in his challenge to an easy, complacent optimism, and yet even here the man is greater than his work. He remains a tragic and sombre figure, reviling his age and crushed by it ; an Ajax defying the lightning and smitten with blindness. Yet we realise his underlying greatness of genius the more clearly as we place him beside other writers of the time—Pope, Addison, Steele—and see how they dwindle in importance. For the issues he touched upon and the imagination he brought to bear upon them, vastly transcended theirs. No finer thing has been said of his tragic life than was said by Thackeray : " To think of him is like thinking of the ruin of a great Empire."

PREFACE TO "THE TALE OF A TUB"

But to return. I am sufficiently instructed in the principal duty of a preface, if my genius were capable of arriving at it. Three have I forced my imagination to make the tour of my invention, and thence it has returned empty, the latter having been wholly drained by the following treatise. Not so my more successful brethren the moderns, who will by no means let slip a preface or dedication, without some notable distinguishing stroke to surprise the reader at the entry, and kindle a wonderful expectation of what is to ensue. Such was that of a most ingenious poet, who, soliciting his brain for something new, compared himself to the hangman, and his patron to the patient : this was insigne, recens, indictum ore alto. When I went through that necessary and noble course of study, I had the happiness to observe many such egregious touches, which I shall not injure the authors by transplanting : because I have remarked, that nothing is so very tender as a modern piece of wit, and which is apt to suffer so much in the carriage. Some things are extremely witty to-day, or fasting, or in this place, or at eight o'clock, or over a bottle, or spoke by Mr What'd'y'call'm, or in a summer's morning any of the which, by the smallest transposal or misapplication, is utterly annihilate. Thus wit has its walks and parades, out of which it may not stray the breadth of a hair, upon peril of being lost. The moderns have artfully fixed this mercury, and reduced it to the circumstances of time, place, and person. Such a jest there is, that will not pass out of Covent Garden ; and such a one that is nowhere intelligible but at Hyde Park Corner. Now, though it sometimes tenderly affects me to consider, that all the towardly passages I shall deliver in the following treatise, will grow quite out of date and relish with the first shifting of the present scene, yet I must needs subscribe to the justice of this proceeding : because, I cannot imagine why we should be at the expense to furnish wit for succeeding ages, when the former have made no sort of provision for ours ; whereas I speak the sentiment of the very newest, and consequently the most orthodox refiners, as well as my own. However, being extremely solicitous that every accomplished person, who has got into the taste of wit calculated for the present month of August, 1697, should descend to the very bottom of all the sublime, throughout this treatise ; I hold fit to lay down this general maxim : whatever reader desires to have a thorough comprehension of an author's thoughts, cannot take a better method than by putting himself into the circumstances and postures of life, that the writer was in upon every important passage, as it flowed from his pen : for this will introduce a parity, and strict correspondence of ideas, between the reader and the author. Now, to assist the diligent reader in so delicate an affair, as far as brevity will permit, I have recollected, that the shrewdest pieces of this treatise were conceived in bed in a garret ; at other times, for a reason best known to myself, I thought fit to sharpen my invention with hunger ; and, in general, the whole work was begun, continued, and ended, under a long course of physic, and a great want of money. Now, I do affirm, it will be absolutely impossible for the candid peruser to go along with me in a great many bright passages, unless, upon the several difficulties emergent, he will please to capacitate and prepare himself by these directions. And thus I lay down as my principal postulatum.

Because I have professed to be a most devoted servant of all modern forms, I apprehend some curious wit may object against me, for proceeding thus far in a preface, without declaiming, according to the custom, against the multitude of writers, whereof the whole multitude of writers most reasonably complain. I am just come from perusing some hundred^s of prefaces wherein the authors do, at the very beginning, address the gentle reader concerning this enormous grievance. Of these I have preserved a few examples, and shall set them down as near as my memory has been able to retain them.

One begins thus :—For a man to set up for a writer, when the press swarms with, &c.

Another—The tax upon paper does not lessen the number of scribblers, who daily pester, &c.

Another—“When every little would-be wit takes pen in hand, 'tis in vain to enter the lists, &c.

Another :—To observe what trash the press swarms with, &c.

Another :—Sir, It is merely in obedience to your commands that I venture into the public, for who upon a less consideration would be of a party with such a rabble of scribblers, &c.

Now, I have two words in my own defence against this objection. First, I am far from granting the number of writers a nuisance to our nation, having strenuously maintained the contrary, in several parts of the following discourse. Secondly, I do not well understand the justice of this proceeding ; because I observe many of these polite professors to be not only from the same hand, but from those who are most voluminous in their several productions. Upon which I shall tell the reader a short tale.

A mountebank, in Leicester Fields, had drawn a huge assembly about him. Among the rest, a fat unwieldy fellow, half stifled in the press, would be very fit crying out, “Lord ! what a filthy crowd is here ! pray, good people, give way a little. Bless me ! what a devil has raked this rabble together ! z—ds ! what squeezing is this ! honest friend, remove your elbow.” At last a weaver, that stood next him, could hold no longer. “A plague confound you (said he) for an overgrown sloven, and who, in the devil's name, I wonder, helps to make up the crowd half so much as yourself ! Don't you consider, with a pox, that you take up more room with that carcass than any five here ! Is not the place as free for us as for you ? Bring your own guts to a reasonable compass, and be d—n'd, and then I'll engage we shall have room enough for us all.”

There are certain common privileges of a writer, the benefit whereof, I hope, there will be no reason to doubt, particularly, that where I am not understood, it shall be concluded, that something very useful and profound is couched underneath. And again, that whatever word or sentence is printed in a different character, shall be judged to contain something extraordinary either of wit or sublime.

As for the liberty I have thought to take of praising myself, upon some occasions or none, I am sure it will need no excuse, if a multitude of great examples be allowed sufficient authority : for it is here to be noted, that praise was originally a pension paid by the world, but the moderns, finding the trouble and charge too great in collecting it, have lately bought out the fee-simple, since which time the right of presentation is wholly in ourselves. For this reason it is, that when an author makes his own eulogy, he uses a certain form to declare and insist upon his title, which is commonly in these or the like words, “I speak without vanity ;” which I think plainly shows it to be a matter of right and justice. Now I do here once for all declare, that in every encounter of this nature through the following treatise, the form aforesaid is implied ; which I mention, to save the trouble of repeating it on so many occasions.

It is a great ease to my conscience, that I have written so elaborate and useful a discourse, without one grain of satire intermixed ; which is the sole point wherein I have taken leave to dissent from the famous originals of our age and country. I have observed some satirists to use the public much at the rate that the pedants do a naughty boy, ready horsed for discipline : first, expostulate the case, then plead the necessity of the rod from great provocations, and conclude every period with a lash. Now, if I know anything of mankind, these gentlemen might very well spare their reproof and correction : for there is not, through all nature, another so callous and insensible a member as the world's posteriors, whether you apply to it the toe or the birch. Besides, most of our late satirists seem to be under a sort of mistake, that because nettles have the prerogative to sting, therefore all other weeds must do so too. I make not this comparison out of the least design to detract from these worthy writers ; for it is well known among mythologists, that weeds have the pre-eminence over all other vegetables, and therefore the first monarch of this island, whose taste and judgment were so acute and refined, did very wisely root out the roses from the collar of the order, and plant the thistles in their stead, as the nobler flower of the two. For which reason it is conjectured by profounder antiquaries, that the satirical itch, so prevalent in this part of our island, was first brought among us from beyond the Tweed. Here may it long flourish and abound ; may it survive and neglect the scorn of the world, with as much ease and contempt as the world is insensible to the lashes of it. May their own dullness, or that of their party, be no discouragement for the authors to proceed, but let them remember, it is with wits as with razors, which are never so apt to cut those they are employed on as when they have lost their edge. Besides, those whose teeth are too rotten to bite, are best of all others, qualified to revenge that defect with their breath.

PREFACE TO “THE BATTLE OF THE BOOKS”

Satire is a sort of glass wherein beholders do generally discover everybody's face but their own ; which is the chief reason for that kind reception it meets with in the world, and that so very few are offended with it. But, if it should happen otherwise, the danger is not great, and I have learned from long experience never to apprehend mischief from those understandings I have been able to provoke : for anger and fury, though they add strength to the sinews of the body, yet are found to relax those of the mind, and to render all its efforts feeble and impotent.

There is a brain that will endure but one scumming, let the owner gather it with discretion, and manage his little stock with husbandry ; but, of all things, let him beware of bringing it under the lash of his betters, because that will make it all bubble up into impertinence, and he will find no new supply. Wit without knowledge being a sort of cream, which gathers in a night to the top, and by a skilful hand may be soon whipped into froth ; but once scummed away, what appears underneath will be fit for nothing but to be thrown to the hogs.

ON GENTLE AND INGENIOUS CONVERSATION

Perhaps the critics may accuse me of a defect in my following system of polite conversation; but there is one great ornament of discourse, whereof I have not produced a single example; which indeed I purposely omitted, for some reasons that I shall immediately offer, and, if those reasons will not satisfy the male part of my gentle readers, the defect may be applied in some manner by an appendix to the second edition, which appendix shall be printed by itself, and sold for six-pence, stitched, and with a marble cover, that my readers may have no occasion to complain of being defrauded.

The defect I mean is, my not having inserted into the body of my book all the oaths now most in fashion for embellishing discourse, especially since it could give no offence to the clergy, who are seldom or never admitted to these polite assemblies. And it must be allowed, that oaths well chosen are not only very useful expletives to matter, but great ornaments of style.

What I shall offer here in my own defence upon this important article, will, I hope, be some extenuation of my fault.

First, I reasoned with myself, that a just collection of oaths, repeated as often as the fashion requires, must have enlarged this volume at least to double the bulk, whereby it would not only double the charge, but likewise make the volume less commodious for pocket carriage.

Secondly, I have been assured by some judicious friends, that themselves have known certain ladies to take offence (whether seriously or not) at too great a profusion of cursing and swearing, even when that kind of ornament was not improperly introduced, which, I confess, did startle me not a little, having never observed the like in the compass of my own several acquaintance, at least for twenty years past. However, I was forced to submit to wiser judgments than my own.

Thirdly, as this most useful treatise is calculated for all future times, I consider, in this maturity of my age, how great a variety of oaths I have heard since I began to study the world, and to know men and manners. And here I found it to be true, what I have read in an ancient poet:

"For, now-a-days, men change their oaths
As often as they change their clothes."

In short, oaths are the children of fashion; they are in some sense almost annuals, like what I observed before of cant words; and I myself can remember about forty different sets. The old stock oaths, I am confident, do not amount to above forty-five, or fifty at most; but the way of mingling and compounding them is almost as various as that of the alphabet.

(c) LESSER PROSE WRITERS

Among the lesser prose writers of the time is Dr JOHN ARBUTHNOT, the great-hearted friend of Swift, of whom Swift said: "If the world had but a dozen Arbuthnotes in it, I would burn my travels."

Born in 1667, a student at Aberdeen and Oxford, Arbuthnot graduated M.D. at the Scotch university of St. Andrews. Called upon to attend

Prince George during a sudden attack of illness while at Epsom, he speedily became a favourite with the royal family, and in 1705 was appointed physician to Queen Anne. At her death came reverses which he bore with equanimity, and after twelve years of ill-health, died in 1735. He was a noted physician, a ripe scholar, a wit who could hold his own with the best of his contemporaries, a collaborator with Pope and the friend of John Gay.

As a writer he lacked the originality of the great prose men; followed frankly the literary methods of Swift, avoiding the bitterness, and did much to popularise his master by drawing attention to his genius.

Arbuthnot's most characteristic work is his History of John Bull (1712). It gives an amusing picture of the social history of the age, somewhat in the vein of Swift. The political and religious trolery of the times, the disloyalty of the Whigs, and the methods of the various Church parties, are dealt with in a spirit of railery, that held abundant good sense in solution. More easily followed to-day by the modern reader, is the amusing jeu d'esprit, The Art of Political Lying.

Of his medical writings, his Essay concerning the Nature of Aliments (1731), pioneers the literature of dietetics, so popular at the present time, and his Essay concerning the Effect of Air on the Human Body showed how advanced he was for his times in scientific research.

Literary criticism, stimulated by such French models as Boileau, had become a thing of vital influence in the hands of Dryden. Thomas Rymer, to whom Dryden refers, was a writer of vigour and ability, but with little of Dryden's insight and sane judgment. "Dryden's criticism," as Johnson said, has "the majesty of a queen; Rymer's has the ferocity of a tyrant."

Neither Rymer nor his successor, John Dennis, another critic of the truculent school, showed any real appreciation of the greatness of Shakespeare. He applied the moral standard to literature with a narrow rigour that sounds strange in modern ears.

"Every tragedy ought to be a very solemn lecture, inculcating a particular providence, and showing it plainly protecting the good, and chastising the bad, or at least the violent!" After this it is not surprising to find that he preferred the Œdipus to Julius Caesar, since "the Œdipus is very religious and Julius Caesar is irreligious."

More agreeable and informing than Dennis' lucubrations, is Colley Cibber's Apology for the Life of Mr. Colley Cibber, Comedian (1740); for with all his excessive vanity and sentimentalism, Cibber was a lively writer and no mean critic of the drama.

II. PROSE: (d) DIARISTS AND LETTER WRITERS (Pepys and Evelyn, &c.).

(d) DIARISTS AND LETTER WRITERS

AN important department of English prose in this period is furnished by the Diarists and Letter Writers. Their influence—especially that of the supreme diarist Pepys—was considerable, both upon the development of style and the broadening of subject matter. They gave colloquial ease and familiarity to the manner, actuality to the matter; and helped to prepare the way for the rich blossoming of fiction that took place during the later years of the era.

Of diarists there were many; we may note the political diary of Narcissus Luttrell (Brief Historical Relation of State Affairs 1678-1714); the Lives of Roger North—memoirs of himself and his brothers, of little historical importance, but naïvely amusing in style; the more historical and less amusing Diary of John Evelyn; the Memoires de la Vie du Comte de Gramont, a remarkable piece of French literature, praised by Voltaire for its admirable style, yet obviously enough written by an Englishman, Anthony Hamilton, with the Court of Charles II as its chief subject matter. Then there is the Diary of Henry Sidney, a diplomat at The Hague, dealing with some important negotiations of William III, and including some letters of considerable interest from Sir William Temple and others.

The Diary of the Countess of Warwick (1666-1677), the only part of which is now extant, exhibits a writer with a well-marked note of reflective piety in her work. Finally, we have the buoyant, lucid, and high-spirited Memoirs of Lady Fanshawe; the tranquil, high-toned Letters of Rachel, Lady Russell, the widow of the unfortunate Lord Russell; and the pathetic Memoirs of Queen Mary II.

Even among these, only two are of special literary importance, the Countess of Warwick and Lady Fanshawe. North's interest lies in his audacious use of slang, while Evelyn's importance is almost entirely historical.

But the master diarist is SAMUEL PEPYS

To his contemporaries Samuel Pepys was little more than a Government official—connected with the Navy Office; to us he is the author of the most fascinating Diary in the language. Born in London, February 23, 1633, son of John Pepys, tailor, Samuel spent his early childhood in Kingsland and Hackney—"Thence to King'sland, by my nurse's house, Goody Lawrence, where my brother Tom and I were kept when young." He went to school at Huntingdon, moving afterwards to St Paul's. At this time he was Cromwellian in his sympathies, and he records in his Diary how alarmed he was (December 1660), lest an old school friend should recollect a saying of his on the day of Charles' execution:

"Here dined with us . . . Mr Christmas, my old schoolfellow, with whom I had much talk. He did remember that I was a Roundhead when I was a boy, and I was much afraid that he would have remembered the words that I said tho day the King was beheaded (that, were I to preach upon him my text would be, 'The memory of the wicked shall rot')." "

Perhaps this "deadly drinker" (as Pepys terms him) did not think the exuberance of a Huntingdon schoolboy of special moment.

From St Paul's to Cambridge (1651), where he was oft "scandalously overserved with drink," among other matters of a more dignified and academic order. After that we know nothing of his doings until his marriage in 1655 to the pretty and penniless fifteen-year-old daughter of an exiled Huguenot. As he had no money of his own at this time, things would have gone ill had it not been for Sir Edward Montague (afterwards Lord Sandwich), who took the young couple into his own house and looked after them.

A small clerkship to one of the Exchequer Tellers seemed to Pepys quite a notable affair after this. The salary was £50, but the amount seemed princely to Pepys, who writes in exultant strain about his "private condition" being "very handsome," and revels in the sense of luxury afforded by the house in Axe Yard, Westminster, and a maid-servant of their own; after the small room in his kinsman's house, no doubt it seemed quite palatial. And from this time forward his financial fortunes, faithfully recorded, rise steadily. The Diary was started in 1660, and in the same year he obtains a position on the Navy Board worth to him about £250, exclusive of extras. He soon showed considerable ability in the discharge of his duties, which were certainly not light at that critical period. Axe Yard is exchanged for Seething Lane, and here lived man and wife for the whole time during which the Diary was written—that is to say, for nine years.

His ambition was to become the historian of the Navy, but although he held such a task "sorts mightily with my genius," he published nothing but some dry Memoirs, though he made a great array of material, as the Pepysian Collection shows.

During the time of the Plague, he and his clerks lodged at Greenwich, though he went up to town for the meetings at the Navy Office; his wife he had sent to Woolwich. His pluck in sticking to his work during the Plague, and his demeanour during the Great Fire, reflect great credit upon him.

The Navy Board had a bad time in 1667, for the famous insult of De Ruyter in the Medway had angered the Parliament, and when peace was concluded Pepys and his colleagues were called to account. It fell upon him to prepare the defence, which he did with many misgivings, but fortified by mulled sack and neat brandy, "whereby he did find himself in better order as to courage truly," he acquits himself well before a crowded House, and gleefully records with amusing vanity the pleasant things said to him: "All the world that was within hearing did congratulate me, and cry up my speech as the best thing they ever heard."

At any rate we feel that he is honestly entitled to the inevitable dinner party and theatre at the close of the day.

In the autumn of 1669 his wife died of a fever, shortly after returning from a tour in France and Holland. Before this sad event in his life his own bad health, chiefly failing eyesight, compelled him to close his unique Diary.

In 1673 he is appointed Secretary for the Affairs of the Navy, and in the same year his Parliamentary longings saw fruition. In 1676 he became Master of the Trinity House, and in the following year of the Clothworkers' Company, to whom he gave a silver cup, still preserved. He sat in the Short Parliament of 1679 as Member for Harwich, and the same year got involved in the Popish Plot. Though committed to the Tower, he was subsequently discharged (1680). Evelyn firmly believed in his innocence, and has recorded his opinion in his Diary.

After his retirement in 1690 he lived chiefly at Clapham with his clerk, William Hewer, where he kept up a friendly correspondence with most of the notable men of the day, including his old comrades Evelyn, Sir Isaac Newton, and Sir Christopher Wren. It is said that Dryden imitated Chaucer's "Good Person" at his request.

He died on May 26, 1703, after months of failing health due to kidney disease, and was buried at St Olave's, Hart Street, in the same vault as his wife and brother.

His Diary remained in the library of Magdalen College, Cambridge, until 1825, when it was printed in part by Lord Braybrooke. Various editions followed, more or less translated; the final and most complete being published in 1893 by Mr. Henry Wheatley, F.S.A.

It is not easy to read Pepys' character aright. On the one hand we have the panegyric of his worthy, serious-minded friend Evelyn, who speaks of his "great integrity," and refers to him as "universally beloved, hospitable, generous, learned in many things, skilled in music, a very great cherisher of learned men." Then there is the frank and ingenuous picture, presented by the Diarist himself, of a man, inquisitive, childish, clear-headed, vain, ambitious, quarrelsome, one who worked faithfully at his post, yet could abandon himself with zest to the pleasure of the moment. Brave in many respects, cowardly in others. In short, a strange mingling of good and indifferent qualities; sometimes contemptible, never entirely odious. But the zest for life, or rather for living, is his most remarkable characteristic. There is scarcely anything which does not interest him in the varied life of the time. It is not the main thoroughfares of life, but the side-issues and curious byways that onchain him. London is to him as a box of toys, and he is for ever examining her assorted treasures with the gleefulness of a child. Out-of-the-way taverns, new fashions in wearing apparel, the mechanism of a watch, the problems of physiology, cake feasts, shipbuilding, a new dish, an old book, a pretty face—one and all never fail to attract him, and one and all he treats with the same childish inquisitiveness and naive delight.

He reminds the reader sometimes of Hazlitt, sometimes of George Borrow, in the gusto and exuberant garrulity with which he writes. Yet it is not as a work of art, but as a human document that his Diary must make its appeal.

One can see by a glance at the portrait of Pepys that we are dealing with a pleasure loving, contented, good-hearted man of the world. What the portrait does not suggest is the mental versatility of the man; the complexity of his interests. He was no mere bon viveur. Fond of music always, he could play four instruments and compose songs. If a supper party awakens in him the anticipation of a "glut of pleasure," he records the "great pleasure" with which he listens to the nightingale. All his delights are violent ones: his emotional sensibility knows no repose, it is always tremulous with some pleasure, whether it be the "infinite delight" of Boyle's Hydrostatics, or the "warming" comfort of mulled wine. Even the naval stores are to him a great delight, and the sight of a pretty face provides matter for cheerful recollection during the remainder of the day. He is always respectable, as the average Londoner is respectable in his vices, and in his virtues. Late supper parties and other "alarums and excursions" are duly expiated for by rigid church attendances. One cannot imagine him listening with comfort to the eloquence of Bunyan at Southwark. Mr. Gifford is more to his taste, who shows, "like a wise man, that righteousness is a surer moral way of being rich than sin and villainy." Yet there is no trace of hypocrisy about Pepys, and he is genuinely touched by simple piety, as in his account of Aunt James—"a poor, religious, well-meaning, good soul, talking of nothing but God Almighty, and that with so much innocence that mightily pleased me."

Somewhat circumspect when he starts his Diary, and with a conscience sensitive even to wandering thoughts about other women than his wife, it is manifest that in the circle where he moved, and the tone of the time being what it was, he should soon adopt the loose living of the day, until suddenly he awakes to the bitter upbraidings of his wife, to find himself plunged into an acrimonious domestic scandal.

It is hard to sum up Pepys more compendiously and happily than in the phrase of Coleridge—"a pollard man without the top . . . but on this account more broadly branching out from the upper trunk."

Pepys as an Historian

If Pepys may be taken as a good specimen of the intelligent playgoer, Shakespeare was in no great favour at this time. Pepys has little to say, except by way of disparagement, for any of his plays. He admired greatly Betterton the actor, and notices the attempts made to improve the character of the scenery. Plays at Court took place at night, but afternoon performances were still in vogue for the general public. Some of the new theatres, e.g. the Drury Lane Theatre, had skylights, but these were of scant value, as witness this entry (1664, June 1):

"Before the play was done it fell such a storm of hail, that we in the middle of the pit were fain to rise, and all the house in a disorder."

Messenger boys were not yet invented to retain a place in a queue, but they had their equivalent:

"To the Duke of York's playhouse at a little past twelve, to get a good place in the pit, and there setting a poor man to keep my place, I out and spent an hour at Martin's my book-seller's, and so back again, when I found the house quite full. But I had my place."

The witty, salacious comedies of the day were nearly always, in Pepys' view, "mightily pleasant," but for the more romantic order of play he has little to say.

"1662—To the King's Theatre, where we saw Midsummer Night's Dream, which I had never seen before, nor shall ever again, for it is the most insipid, ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life."

The following gives us an insight into the pit manners of the day:

"1666-67—To the King's House to The Maid's Tragedy, but vexed all the while with two talking ladies and Sir Charles Sedley,¹ yet pleased to hear the discourse, he being a stranger. And one of the ladies would and did sit with her mask on all through the play, and being exceedingly witty as ever I heard a woman, did talk most pleasantly with him; but was, I believe, a virtuous woman and of quality. . . . He was mighty witty, and she also making sport with him mighty inoffensively, that more pleasant rencontre I never heard. By that means lost the pleasure of the play wholly, to which both now and then Sir Charles Sedley's exceptions against both words and pronouncing were very pretty."

JOHN EVELYN, the lifelong friend of Pepys, was a man of quite another temperament. He was learned, pedantically careful about his work; scrupulously methodical in his arrangements, an excellent type of the best sort of country gentleman; shrewd and capable in public affairs; large-hearted and loyal as a friend; ready, as Bishop Burnet says, "to contribute everything in his power to perfect other men's endeavours."

Yet despite his learning and his love of the arts, he is a somewhat colourless writer, when compared with Pepys, his prose, though simple and clear, is easily excelled by other notable prosemen of the time.

Born in 1620, at Wotton, of an old Surrey family, John Evelyn received his education at Lewes and Oxford, his antecedents had always been strong supporters of King and Constitution, so on leaving the university in 1642, he joined the King's party at Edgehill as a volunteer, and later in the year he crossed over to Holland, where he stayed for three months. He has been spoken of as "a patriot who kept his loyalty in the most dangerous times, and a Christian who preserved his integrity in the most immoral"—and "a philosopher who viewed every object with a desire to extract from it all the beauty and goodness it contained."

When the Civil War broke out in England, Evelyn took advantage of the opportunity to travel extensively on the Continent, and his famous Diary, which he kept from 1642 up to the year 1706, owes much to this period in the many rich and graphic descriptions of the public and private collections that he visited. In 1652 he settled down at Sayes Court, near Deptford, and took such an intense interest in his gardens that they were brought almost to the point of perfection, he wrote Sylva, a treatise on arboriculture, in 1664, and Sculptura two years earlier, on architecture and the prevention of smoke in London. When the Royal Society took definite form in 1660 he was one of its first members, and for some time acted as secretary.

From 1685-87 Evelyn was Commissioner of the Privy Seal, and Treasurer of Greenwich Hospital from 1695-1703.

Not so boisterous, perhaps, in his outlook upon life as his friend Pepys, he was none the less happy: "For my part," he wrote on one occasion, "I profess that I delight in a cheerful gaiety; affect and cultivate variety; the universe itself were not beautiful without it."

After spending forty-two years among the sylvan beauties of Sayes Court, he returned to his birth-place at Wotton, where he died in 1706.

Here is an example of his work:

"June 8, 1667.—To London, alarmed by the Dutch, who were fallen on our fleet at Chatham, by a most audacious enterprise, entering the very river with part of their fleet, doing us not only disgrace, but incredible mischief in burning several of our best men-of-war lying at anchor and moored there, and all this through our most unaccountable negligence in not setting out our fleet in due time. This alarm caused me, fearing the enemy might venture up the Thames even to London (which they might have done with ease, and fired all the vessels in the river, too), to send away my best goods, plate, &c. from my house to another place. The alarm was so great that it put both country and city into fear, a panic and consternation such as I hope I shall never see more, everybody was flying, none knew why or whither."

Although known to most as the Diarist, he was a voluminous and varied writer; gardening, architecture, engraving, painting, navigation, one and all he discoursed upon in his grave and erudite way. He was never a man of the town, as was Pepys.

He was as much interested in the making of cider as Pepys was in drinking it. The Arundel Marbles moved him to the same admiration as a pretty face in the street did his more susceptible friend, and he found the heresy of the Jesuits a more exciting topic than the behaviour of Lady Betty at the playhouse.

Yet we must not regard Evelyn and Pepys as Restoration editions of the young gentlemen in Sandford and Merton. Evelyn was by no means a prig, nor, what is equally repellent, a dull dog. Pepys bears testimony to that. Without Pepys' tribute, we might perhaps have had our fears about the social charms of Mr. Evelyn. But when Pepys records the mirthfulness of Evelyn at a party at Greenwich, and how much he contributed to the brightness of the company, we feel assured.

III. THE DRAMA (from Davenant to Sheridan).

THE DRAMA

IN September 1642, Puritan sentiment, that had opposed the drama from the time of Roger Ascham and William Stubbes, persistently though without avail, at last triumphed. The triumph lay rather in the lowered vitality of the drama than in the strength of its opponents, for during early Caroline times, less and less had it come to voice the spirit of the nation, more and more had it become an entertainment to pander to the dissolute few. Puritanism, now in the political ascendant, put forth its power to crush the obnoxious theatre, and the Ordinance of September 2 commanded the closing of the theatres and the complete suppression of stage plays. Some attempt was made to defy this mandate, and met with the prompt reprisal of imprisonment for the actors concerned. Now and again indeed, during the Commonwealth, a blind eye was turned to private performances "in noblemen's houses," or amid the multifarious festivities of a fair, but the actor's business became too perilous a one to pursue, for all save a few intrepid, adventurous souls.

With the exception therefore of farcical entertainments of the most popular and boisterous character, known as "droll humours;" and the performance of semi-dramatic pieces with a strong didactic motive to appease the sentiment of the hour, during the later days of the Commonwealth when the embargo was somewhat relaxed, there is nothing in the shape of drama until the Restoration.

Sir William Davenant and James Shirley, survivors from the palmy days of the theatre, saw to the wants of the Court in the early days of its Renaissance. Even in their work, we can trace clearly the vicissitudes the theatre had suffered. Bound up as it had been with the vicissitudes of Royalty, and suffering, like Royalty, from puritan anathemas, it had become a Court function, and was violently anti-puritan in feeling.

The influence of France, dominant in the literary ideals of the new age, is clearly discernible in the drama. Comedy became the fashion, and although there are tragedies in this era, they are very different in calibre from the Elizabethan tragedy, and far inferior in literary and dramatic value. It is essentially the age of comedy, and a comedy that owed much to Gallic inspiration. Davenant, Dryden, Shadwell, Wycherley, Vanbrugh, were indebted to the French comedy of the day for both matter of plot and witty dialogue, and without the great names of Molière, Racine, and Corneille, little would be left of account in the Restoration drama. As in comedy, so in opera, that now became popular in England, French influence is also paramount—witness Dryden's work in this direction.

Passing from general consideration to the consideration of individual names, DRYDEN's is the first to note. His early attempts at playwriting were made in his thirtieth year, although he never achieved any first-rate work in this direction, his productivity was extraordinarily fertile, about thirty plays being placed to his credit. These plays were written, of course, at a time when the first object of the dramatist was to please the King, and to cater for those French tastes that had now become so prominent.

Starting in The Wild Gallant (1663) with a comedy of humour, Jonsonian in pattern, he essayed higher flights in The Maiden Queen (1667), Marriage à la Mode (1672), and Amphitryon (1691). His comedy scenes are better than his tragic efforts, but his wit was not deft enough, nor his humour sufficiently based on first-hand observation of character, to succeed in the theatre. A notable, even remarkable humorist along his own lines, he was not of the quality to tell on the stage.

More successful was his contemporary, "gentle" GEORGE ETHEREGE, the companion of Buckhurst. Three plays of merit bear his signature, of these, the first, The Comical Revenge, or Love in a Tub (1664), is the least interesting, but it has the merit of being amusing without descending to those obscenities too rife in the drama of the time. The second, She Would if She Could (1667), is a bright and ingenious play of manners; and the third, Sir Fopling Flutter (1676)—decidedly the best—written on similar lines, has something of that dexterous wit carried to so superlative an excellence by Congreve.

THOMAS SHADWELL (1640), a man of good family and an out-and-out Whig, succeeded Dryden in the Laureateship and enjoyed a fine vogue as a witty talker as well as an amusing writer. He wrote nearly twenty plays, and unlike Etherege was the reverse of squeamish in his treatment. His merits as a dramatist lie less in his wit, which is never better than Etherege's, often inferior, than in his local colour. With small gift of characterisation, with clumsy technique, he is surprisingly alive in his mise-en-scène.

His Squire of Alsatia (1669), Epsom Wells (1676), and Bury Fair (1686), are vigorously vital pictures of well-known seventeenth-century localities. He is at once one of the worst and one of the best of contemporary writers for the stage.

WILLIAM WYCHERLEY, born in 1640, came of good Shropshire stock, and his residence in France, as a young man, stood him in good stead when he began to write.

His first play, Love in a Wood (1672) attracted the attention of the Duchesse of Cleveland.

A man of agreeable parts, he impressed his personality upon his contemporaries, and his plays enjoyed considerable popularity. In his old age he made the acquaintance of Pope, and died in 1716.

Love in a Wood and The Gentleman Dancing Master (1673) are scarcely above the average reached by many undistinguished writers of the time; but The Country Wife (1675) and The Plain Dealer (1677), obviously inspired by Molière's La Misanthrope, are, with all their coarseness and occasional prolixities, extremely witty, while the latter play, Wycherley's finest achievement, has the satirical power of Jonson at his best. With much of Shadwell's pictorial skill, he is infinitely superior to him, Etherege, or Dryden, in the bright and vivacious quality of his dialogue.

WILLIAM CONGREVE, born 1670, came of a good Staffordshire family and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. His first play, The Old Bachelor, written to amuse himself, had the good fortune to be highly praised by Dryden, and was acted in 1693. Love for Love followed in 1695, The Mourning Bride in 1697, and The Way of the World ushered in the new century. The last, perhaps the most highly esteemed of his plays to-day, was unsuccessful at the time, and smarting with disappointment Congreve abruptly gave up his dramatic writing, if we except an occasional masque produced during the last few months of his life. He died in 1729.

Of his plays, The Double Dealer, Love for Love, and The Way of the World are masterpieces within the limits of the brilliant artificial comedy of the time. Skilful and apt in intrigue, lively and arresting in characterisation, brilliant in verbal felicities, they reveal at once the weakness and strength of their school.

In The Way of the World there are touches, moreover, of emotional power; and The Mourning Bride reveals, amid much fustian, some measure of tragic force. But Congreve is, of course, above all things a master of comedy.

In construction and grasp of character, Congreve steadily improved with each succeeding play. But from the very first he exhibited himself as a master of light and witty dialogue. Therein lay his great strength. He has the easy gaiety of Etherege and the satirical force of Wyndham, and speedily he showed how well he could excel these dramatists on their own lines.

The construction of The Double Dealer is greatly superior to The Old Bachelor, and the dialogue is rich in happy conceits, but the characterisation is of small account. It is merely a peg for the author's wit.

Love for Love is on a higher plane. Here, within well-defined limits, many of the characters have vitality and distinctiveness. The surly-tempered Sir Samson Legend, the fine-natured youthful Valentine, the pretentious impostor, astrologer, and palmist, Foresight, are acutely observed and admirably portrayed. There is a farcical strain in the story less happy in invention, but the play as a whole deserves much of the tremendous praise poured upon it by Dryden.

In The Way of the World we have Congreve at his happiest. Construction, characterisation, dialogue are alike brilliant. The story scarcely matters. There is never much resemblance to real life in the plots and machinations of the Restoration drama. This play is no exception in this respect. But such scenes as those where reputations are murdered by gossip, such characters as Mrs. Millamant and Mirabell, such flashes of wit in the talk between Mrs. Marwood and Mrs. Millamant—or for the matter of that any scene where Mrs. Millamant is to the fore—reveal the Restoration drama at its highest point.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD

Scene. A Chocolate House.

MIRABELL and FAINALL rising from cards,
BETTY waiting.

Mr. You are a fortunate man, Mr. Fainall!

Fain. Have we done?

Mr. What you please. I'll play on to entertain you.

Fain. No, I'll give you your revenge another time, when you are not so indifferent, you are thinking of something else now, and play too negligently, the coldness of a losing gamester lessens the pleasure of the winner. I'd no more play with a man that slighted his ill fortune than I'd make love to a woman who undervalued the loss of her reputation.

Mr. You have a taste extremely delicate, and are for refining on your pleasures.

Fain. Prithce why so reserved? Something has put you out of humour.

Mr. Not at all. I happen to be grave to-day, and you are gay, that's all.

Fain. Confess, Millamant and you quarrelled last night after I left you, my fair cousin has some humours that would tempt the patience of a Stoic. What, some coxcomb came in, and was well received by her, while you were by?

Mr. Witwood and Petulant; and what was worse, her aunt, your wife's mother, my evil genius, or to sum up all in her own name, my old Lady Wishfort came in.

Fain. O there it is then! She has a lasting passion for you, and with reason—What, then my wife was there?

Mr. Yes, and Mrs. Marwood, and three or four more, whom I never saw before. Seeing me, they all put on their grave faces, whispered one another, then complained aloud of the vapours, and after fell into a profound silence.

Fain. They had a mind to be rid of you.

Mr. For which reason I resolved not to stir. At last the good old lady broke through her painful taciturnity with an invective against long visits. I would not have understood her, but Millamant joining in the argument, I rose, and, with a constrained smile, told her, I thought nothing was so easy as to know when a visit began to be troublesome. She reddened, and I withdrew, without expecting her reply.

Fain. You were to blame to resent what she spoke only in compliance with her aunt.

Mr. She is more mistress of herself than to be under the necessity of such a resignation.

Fain. What! though half her fortune depends upon her marrying with my lady's approbation?

Mr. I was then in such a humour, that I should have been better pleased if she had been less discreet.

Fain. Now, I remember, I wonder not they were weary of you, last night was one of their cabal nights, they have them three times a-week, and meet by turns at one another's apartments, where they come together like the coroner's inquest, to sit upon the murdered reputations of the week. You and I are excluded; and it was once proposed that all the male sex should be excepted, but somebody moved that, to avoid scandal, there might be one man of the community, upon which motion Witwood and Petulant were enrolled members.

Mr. And who may have been the foundress of this sect? My Lady Wishfort, I warrant, who publishes her detestation of mankind, and full of the vigour of fifty-five, declares for a friend and ratafia; and let posterity shift for itself, she'll breed no more.

Fain. The discovery of your sham addresses to her, to conceal your love to her niece, has provoked this separation, had you dissembled better, things might have continued in the state of nature.

Mr. I did as much as man could, with any reasonable conscience, I proceeded to the very last act of flattery with her, and was guilty of a song in her commendation. Nay, I got a friend to put her into a lampoon, and compliment her with the imputation of an affair with a young fellow, which I carried so far, that I told her the malicious town took notice that she was grown fat of a sudden, and when she lay in of a dropsy, persuaded her she was reported to be in labour. The devil's in't, if an old woman is to be flattered further, unless a man should endeavour personally to debauch her, and that my virtue forbade me. But for the discovery of this amour I am indebted to your friend, or your wife's friend, Mrs. Marwood.

Fain. What should provoke her to be your enemy, unless she has made you advances which you have slighted? Women do not easily forgive omissions of that nature.

Mr. She was always civil to me till of late—I confess I am not one of those coxcombs who are apt to interpret a woman's good manners to her prejudice, and think that she who does not refuse 'em everything, can refuse 'em nothing.

Fain. You are a gallant man, Mirabell, and though you may have cruelty enough not to satisfy a lady's longing, you have too much generosity not to be tender of her honour. Yet you speak with an indifference which seems to be affected, and confesses you are conscious of a negligence.

Mr. You pursue an argument with a distrust that seems to be unaffected, and confesses you are conscious of a concern for which the lady is more indebted to you than is your wife.

Fain. Fy, fy, friend! if you grow censorious I must leave you. I'll look upon the gamesters in the next room.

Mr. Who are they?

Fain. Petulant and Witwood. (To Betty.) Bring me some chocolate. [Exit]

Mr. Betty, what says your clock?

Betty. Turned of the last canonical hour, sir. [Exit.]

Mr. How pertinently the jade answers me! (Looking on his watch.)—Ha! almost one o'clock!—O, y'are come!

Enter FOOTMAN

Well, is the grand affair over? You have been something tedious.

Foot. Sir, there's such coupling at Pancras, that they stand behind one another, as 'twere in a country dance. Ours was the last couple to lead up; and no hopes appearing of despatch, besides the parson growing hoarse, we were afraid his lungs would have failed before it came to our turn, so we drove round to Duke's-place; and there they were rivetted in a trice.

Mr. So, so, you are sure they are married.

Foot. Married and bedded, sir, I am witness.

Mr. Have you the certificate?

Foot. Here it is, sir.

Mr. Has the tailor brought Waitwell's clothes home, and the new liveries?

Foot. Yes, sir.

Mr. That's well. Do you go home again, d'y'e hear, and adjourn the consummation till further orders. Bid Waitwell shake his ears, and Dame Partlet rustle up her feathers, and meet me at one o'clock by Rosamond's Pond,¹ that I may see her before she returns to her lady; and as you tender your ears be secret. [Exeunt.]

Sir JOHN VANBRUGH was born about 1668, and had a varied career, being in turn soldier, herald, and architect. His first play, The Relapse, was performed in 1697. This was followed in the next year by The Provoked Wife, while The Confederacy was not produced until 1735. With the exception of these three plays, there are no writings of any note to his credit. In character he was forceful, energetic, and rugged; a contrast to the less solid if more brilliantly equipped Congreve. He was knighted in 1734, and died twelve years later.

In Vanbrugh's first two plays, we have all the familiar puppets of Restoration comedy, the fops and the fools being treated with more naturalness if less wit than by Congreve, and with far less coarseness. The Relapse is remarkable in being the sequel to another man's play (Colley Cibber's), with a slight reshuffling of the characters. In The Confederacy, the dramatist breaks fresh ground, and we have a hark back in subject matter to the middle-class plays of Shakespeare's age. There is no better all-round play in this period than The Confederacy, in construction, characterisation, and dialogue, it is admirable; never once does the action halt.

In sheer intellectual force, Vanbrugh's work is on a lower plane than Congreve's; but by way of compensation he has a more genial humour, and a genius for farcical development denied to Congreve, who excelled in satire. This gift is most agreeably displayed in The Relapse.

Most interesting point of all perhaps, to the modern reader, his plays show a freer handling of the life of the day than we find usually in the Restoration drama, and the eighteenth-century novelists are certainly indebted to him in their characterisation.

THE CONFEDERACY

Enter BRASS, solus

Brass. Well, surely thro' the world's wide extent, there never appear'd so unpudent a fellow as my school-fellow Dick, pass himself upon the town for a gentleman, drop into all the best company with an easy air, as if his natural element were in the sphere of quality; when the rogue had a kettle-drum to his father, who was hang'd for robbing a church, and has a pedlar to his mother, who carried her shop under her arm. But here he comes.

Enter DICK.

Dick. Well, Brass, what news? Hast thou given my letter to Flippanta?

Brass. I'm but just come; I haven't knock'd at the door yet. But I have a damn'd piece of news for you.

Dick. As how?

Brass. We must quit this country.

Dick. We'll be hang'd first.

Brass. So you will if you stay.

Dick. Why, what's the matter?

Brass. There's a storm coming.

Dick. From whence?

Brass. From the worst point in the compass, the law.

Dick. The law! Why, what have I to do with the law?

Brass. Nothing; and therefore it has something to do with you.

Dick. Explain.

Brass. You know you cheated a young fellow at poquet t'other day, of the money he had to raise his company.

Dick. Well, what then?

Brass. Why, he's sorry he lost it.

Dick. Who doubts that?

Brass. Ay, but that's not all; he's such a fool to think of complaining on't.

Dick. Then I must be so wise to stop his mouth.

Brass. How?

Dick. Give him a little back; if that won't do, strangle him.

Brass. You are very quick in your methods.

Dick. Men must be so that will dispatch business.

Brass. Hark you, colonel, your father d'v'd in's bed?

Dick. He might have done, if he had not been a fool.

Brass. Why, he robb'd a church.

Dick. Ay, but he forgot to make sure of the sexton.

Brass. Are not you a great rogue?

Dick. Or I should wear worse clothes.

Brass. Hark you, I would advise you to change your life.

Dick. And turn ballad-singer.

Brass. Not so neither.

Dick. What then?

Brass. Why, if you can get this young wench, reform, and live honest.

Dick. That's the way to be starv'd.

Brass. No, she has money enough to buy you a good place, and pay me into the bargain for helping her to so good a match. You have but this throw left to save you, for you are not ignorant, youngster, that your morals begin to be pretty well known about town; have a care your noble birth and your honourable relations are not discover'd too: there needs but that to have you toss'd in a blanket, for the entertainment of the first company of ladies you intrude into, and then like a dutiful son, you may dabble about with your mother, and sell paint. She's old and weak, and wants somebody to carry her goods after her. How like a dog will you look, with a pair of plod shoes, your hair crop'd up to your ears, and a band-box under your arm!

Dick. Why faith, Brass, I think thou art in the right on't. I must fix my affairs quickly, or Madame Fortune will be playing some of her hitch-tricks with me. Therefore I'll tell thee what we'll do, we'll pursue this old rogue's daughter heartily, we'll cheat his family to purpose, and they shall atone for the rest of mankind.

Brass. Have at her then; I'll about your business presently.

Dick. One kiss—and success attend thee.

[Exit DICK.]

Brass. A great rogue. Well, I say nothing. But when I have got the thing into a good posture, he shall sign and seal, or I'll have him tumbled out of the house, like a cheese. Now for Flippanta. [He knocks.]

Enter FLIPPANTA.

Flip. Who's that? Brass!

Brass. Flippanta!

¹ Rosamond's Pond, St James's Park, "long consecrated to disastrous love," was filled up in 1770.

² The Way of the World, Act 1. sc. 1.

Flip What want you, rogue's-face ?

Brass Is your mistress dress'd ?

Flip What, already ? Is the fellow drunk ?

Brass Why, with respect to her looking-glass, it's almost two.

Flip What then, fool ?

Brass Why then, it's time for the mistress of the house to come down, and look after her family

Flip Pr'ythee don't be an owl. Those that go to bed at night may rise in the morning, we that go to bed in the morning rise in the afternoon

Brass When does she make her visits, then ?

Flip By candle-light ; it helps off a muddy complexion ; we women hate inquisitive sunshine. But do you know that my lady is going to turn good housewife ?

Brass What, is she going to die ?

Flip Dio !

Brass Why, that's the only way to save money for her family

Flip No ; but she has thought of a project to save chair-hire.

Brass As how ?

Flip Why, all the company she us'd to keep abroad she now intends shall meet at her own house. Your master has advis'd her to set up a basset-table.

Brass Nay, if he advis'd her to it, it's right ; but has she acquainted her husband with it yet ?

Flip What to do ? When the company meet, he'll see them.

Brass Nay, that's true ; as you say, he'll know it soon enough

Flip Well, I must be gone, have you any business with my lady ?

Brass Yes, as ambassador from Araminta, I have a letter from her.

Flip Give it me.

Brass Hold—and as first minister of state to the colonel, I have an affair to communicate to thee.

Flip What is't ? Quick

Brass Why—he's in love

Flip With what ?

Brass A woman—and her money together.

Flip Who is she ?

Brass Cornelia

Flip What would he be at ?

Brass At her—if she's at leisure.

Flip Which way ?

Brass Honourably—he has ordered me to demand her of thee in marriage

Flip Of me ?

Brass Why, when a man of quality has a mind to a City-fortune, would'st have him apply to her father and mother ?

Flip No

Brass No, so I think. Men of our end of the town are better bred than to use ceremony. With a long perwig we strike the lady, with a you-know-what we soften the maid, and when the parson has done his job, we open the affair to the family. Will you slip this letter into her prayer-book, my little quon ? It's a very passionate one—it's seal'd with a heart and a dagger you may see by that what he intends to do with himself

Flip Are there any verses in it ? If not, I won't touch it

Brass Not one word in prose, it's dated in rhyme.

Flip Well, but have you brought nothing else ?

Brass Gad forgive me, I'm the forgetfullest dog—I have a letter for you too—here—'tis in a purse, but it's in prose, you won't touch it

Flip Yes, hang it, it is not good to be too dainty.

Brass How useful a virtue is humility ! Well, child, we shall have an answer to-morrow, shan't we ?

Flip I can't promise you that, for our young gentlewoman is not so often in my way as she would be. Her father (who is a citizen from the foot to the forehead of him) lets her seldom converse with her mother-in-law and me, for fear she should learn the arts of a woman of quality. But I'll take the first occasion : See, there's my lady ; go in, and deliver your letter to her.

[Exeunt.¹

GEORGE FARQUHAR was born at Londonderry in 1678. Like Congreve he went to Trinity College, Dublin, and afterwards tried "the boards" himself, subsequently joining the army. In personality he is the most volatile and inconsequential of the three later dramatists, as is shown in amorous intrigue, or military adventure, loving the good things of life, yet meeting misfortune with an excellent front. He died in 1707.

His plays are Love and a Bottle, amusing but thin, The Constant Couple, and Sir Harry Wildair, two plays in sequence, in the fashion of Cibber and Vanbrugh, where Pog Woffington had a part that suited her admirably as cheeky Sir Harry. The Inconstant (1703), and The Way to Win Him, have admirably devised scenes ; while in The Recruiting Officer (1706) and The Beaux' Stratagem (1707) he reached his highest point as a dramatist. The last play especially is unflagging in its humour, and there is an open-air atmosphere about his work (as well as an open-bottle one) that gives it a distinctive place in the Restoration drama.

Vanbrugh broke away to some extent from the pure comedy of manners, wrought to such perfection by Congreve, broadening its boundaries, and sweetening its humours. With Farquhar, the rupture is more thoroughgoing. The artificial note lingers in the earlier plays, but in the later ones he leaves the gallant to his ways, dealing with humbler folk and a more diversified life.

From 1700 a change began to be discernible in stage productions. It was felt perhaps that the appeal was too restricted, and with the spread of coffee-houses, the more general interest in political and social problems, and a change in the manners of the Court, it seemed necessary to strike a more human note.

The drama was soon to feel the rivalry of the Novel and the Newspaper.

To attract the general public, especially the steadily growing middle class, some modification was required in the nature of the drama. COLLEY CIBBER (1671), actor, playwright, Laureate, and Manager of Drury Lane, to some extent met this demand, though of his sixteen surviving plays there is little to be said from the point of view of wit and insight, lively and agreeable as they are in part, for instance The Careless Husband and The Non-Juror. More interesting work may be found in the budget of SUSANNAH CENTLIVRE (c. 1667-1723), more especially The Busybody (1709) ; and A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

STEELE essayed to sentimentalise the drama, with no enduring success. LILLO, pursuing the didactic methods of Steele, achieved some popularity with the "lesson to apprentices"—George Barnwell, a melodramatic morality (recently reproduced by the picture palaces). HENRY FIELDING, before he found his métier in the novel, burlesqued tragedy amusingly in Tom Thumb.

GEORGE COLMAN (1732-1794), Manager of Covent Garden, wrote one play at least that has been acted in the present generation—The Clandestine Marriage. Farce and comic opera flourished, and some of the best illustrations of this kind of work survive in Mrs. COWLEY'S (1743–1809) Belle's Stratagem, MACKLIN'S Man of the World (1784), SAMUEL FOOTE'S Minor (1760); TOWNLEY'S High Life below Stairs (1759); GAY'S Beggar's Opera (1727); while the sentimental drama persisted in CUMBERLAND'S West Indian (1771); and HOLCROFT'S Road to Ruin (1792).

Then towards the end of the century two great names again stand out in relation to the drama, those of Oliver Goldsmith and Richard Brinsley Sheridan.

GOLDSMITH'S Good Natured Man (1768) is excellent in parts; She Stoops to Conquer (1773) excellent throughout, with a bright, whimsical humour and fresh charm of dialogue not attained since the days of Congreve. Less witty than the great Restoration dramatists, Goldsmith is greatly superior in his humanity and taste.

SHERIDAN, born in Dublin 1751, was the grandson of a witty and brilliant cleric, Dr Sheridan, the friend of Swift. In 1773 young Sheridan eloped from Bath with the beautiful, accomplished, and short-lived Elizabeth Linley; and his Rivals, produced when he was under four-and-twenty, scored an immediate success. Entering Parliament in 1780, he made a reputation on the Whig side as a brilliant speaker, and his speeches against Warren Hastings attracted special attention. He married a second time in 1795, dying in 1816, with bailiffs in the house.

In the first two of his three great plays—The Rivals and The School for Scandal—he combines the comedy of manners with a sentimental admixture only partially successful. Constructively, both plays are remarkably skilful pieces of work, and of their wit it need only be said that they may challenge equality with Congreve and Vanbrugh, with little of their coarseness.

The Critic is written on more broadly farcical lines, but within its limitations it is a rarely delightful piece of extravaganzas, displaying a gift of burlesque of the highest order.

With Sheridan, the great age of artificial comedy closes.

THE CRITIC

Scene • Tilbury Fort.

Two SENTINELS discovered asleep.

Dang Tilbury Fort!—very fine indeed!

Puff Now, what do you think I open with?

Sneer Faith, I can't guess . . .

Puff A clock—Hark!—(Clock strikes) I open with a clock striking, to begot an awful attention in the audience. It also marks the time, which is four o'clock in the morning, and saves a description of the rising sun, and a great deal about gilding the eastern hemisphere.

Dang But pray, are the sentinels to be asleep?

Puff Fast as watchmen.

Sneer Isn't that odd though at such an alarming crisis?

Puff To be sure it is,—but smaller things must give way to a striking scene at the opening—that's a rule. And the case is, that two great men are coming to this very spot to begin the piece. Now, it is not to be supposed they would open their lips, if those fellows were watching them; so, egad, I must either have sent them off their posts, or set them asleep.

Sneer. Oh, that accounts for it.—But tell us, who are those coming?

Puff These are they—Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir Christopher Hatton. You'll know Sir Christopher by his turning out his toes—famous, you know, for his dancing. I like to preserve all the little traits of character—Now attend.

Enter SIR WALTER RALEIGH and SIR CHRISTOPHER HATTON

"Sir Christ. Truc, gallant Raleigh!"

Dang. What, they have been talking before?

Puff. Oh yes, all the way as they came along—(To the ACTORS.) I beg pardon, gentlemen, but these are particular friends of mine, whose remarks may be of great service to us—(To SNEER and DANGLE.) Don't mind interrupting them whenever anything strikes you.

"Sir Christ. Truc, gallant Raleigh!"

But oh, thou champion of thy country's fame,

There is a question which I yet must ask

A question which I never asked before—

What mean these mighty armaments?

This general muster? and this throng of chiefs?"

Sneer Pray, Mr Puff, how came Sir Christopher Hatton never to ask that question before?

Puff. What, before the play began?—how the plague could he?

Dang That's true, I' faith!

Puff But you will hear what he thinks of the matter

"Sir Christ. Alas! my noble friend, when I behold

You tented plains in martial symmetry

Arrayed, when I count o'er yon glittering lines

Of crested warriors, where the proud steed's neigh,

And valour-breathing trumpets' shrill appeal,

Responsive vibrate on my listening ear,

When virgin majesty herself I view,

Like her protecting Pallas, veiled in steel,

With graceful confidence exhort to arms!

When, briefly, all I hear or see bear stamp

Of martial vigilance and stern defence,

I cannot but surmise—forgive, my friend,

If the conjecture's rash—I cannot but Surmise the state some danger apprehends!"

Sneer A very cautious conjecture that!

Puff Yes, that's his character, not to give an opinion but to secure grounds—Now then

"Sir Walt. O most accomplished Christopher!"

Puff He calls him by his Christian name, to show that they are on the most familiar terms

"Sir Walt. O most accomplished Christopher! I find

Thy staunch sagacity still tracks the future

In the fresh print of the o'ertaken past"

Puff Figurative!

"Sir Walt. Thy fears are just

Sir Christ. But where? whence? when? and what

The danger is,—methinks I fain would learn

Sir Walt. You know, my friend, scarce two revolving suns,

And three revolving moons, have closed their course,

Since haughty Philip, in despite of peace,

With hostile hand hath struck at England's trade

Sir Christ. I know it well

Sir Walt. Philip, you know, is proud Iberia's king!

Sir Christ. He is.

Sir Walt. His subjects in base bigotry

And Catholic oppression hold—while we,

You know, the Protestant persuasion hold

Sir Christ. We do

Sir Walt. You know, beside, his boast of armament,

The famed Armada, by the Pope baptized,

With purpose to invade these realms . . .

Sir Christ. Is sailed,

Our last advices so report.

Sir Walt. While the Iberian admiral's chief hope,

His darling son

Sir Christ. Ferolo Whiskerandos might . . .

Sir Walt. The same—by chance a prisoner hath been taken,

And in this fort of Tilbury . . .

Sir Christ. Is now

*Confin'd—'tis true, and oft from yon tall turret's top
I've mark'd the youthful Spaniard's haughty mien—Unconquer'd though in chains.*

Sir Walt. You also know . . . "

Dang. Mr Puff, as he knows all this, why does Sir Walter go on telling him?

Puff. But the audience are not supposed to know anything of the matter, are they?

Sneer. True, but I think you manage ill: for there certainly appears no reason why Sir Walter should be so communicative.

Puff. 'Fore Gad, now, that is one of the most ungrateful observations I ever heard!—for the less inducement he has to tell all this, the more, I think, you ought to be obliged to him, for I am sure you'd know nothing of the matter without it.

Dang. That's very true, upon my word.

Puff. But you will find he was not going.

"Sir Christ. Enough, enough—'tis plain—and I no more Am in amazement lost!"

Puff. Here, now, you see, Sir Christopher did not in fact ask any one question for his own information.

Sneer. No, indeed. He has been a most disinterested curiosity!

Dang. Really, I find, we are very much obliged to them both.

Puff. To be sure you are. Now then for the commander-in-chief, the Earl of Leicester, who, you know, was no favourite but of the Queen's—We left off . . . in amazement lost.

In concluding this sketch of the drama during the era of Dryden and Pope, we may look at the tragic writings of the time. These, though far inferior both in literary and dramatic importance, are by no means negligible.

DRYDEN, for instance, proved more happily suited in his "heroic" moods than in his comedy exploits, and The Maiden Queen (1687), Tyrannic Love (1669), and The Conquest of Granada (1670) contain fine passages of rhetoric and impressive scenes. "Jolly JOHN CROWNE," as Rochester dubbed him, enjoyed a vogue for his tragic play—Caligula (1698)—less well founded than Dryden's. THOMAS OTWAY, a scholar of no mean repute, wrote several indifferent plays, and two plays—The Orphan (1680) and Venice Preserved (1682)—that, if not precisely great, are remarkably rich in effective declamation. "NAT" LEE, sometimes collaborator with Dryden, and a Cambridge man, was an actor first and playwright after, dying in 1692 in a drunken brawl. Most of his work was very unequal in execution, but among his contributions to the stage—Mithridates, Cæsar Borgia, Edipus, and The Duke of Guise (jointly with Dryden), and Constantine the Great—are passages of pathos, and scenes of genuine if undisciplined power. Certainly he had good poetic feeling, as for instance in the lines:

'Oh pity that so fair a star should be
The child of Night."

The chief tragic writer of Queen Anne's reign is THOMAS SOUTHERNE, an accomplished man with a good eye to the main chance. He was well liked by the literary men of his time, and died at an advanced age in 1746. But he is less remarkable for his dramatic power than either Otway or Lee, though superior to his contemporary Nicholas Rowe. He wrote The Fatal Marriage (1694) and Oroonoko (1696).

NICHOLAS ROWE, born 1674, a Devonshire man, was trained for a lawyer, but was drawn towards playwriting, and having independent means was able to indulge his hobby. He was an agreeable and polished writer, but none of his serious plays, from The Ambitious Stepmother down to Jane Shore, show any real tragic power. Probably owing to his facility for making smooth verses, he was made Poet Laureate, on the accession of George I, and later on did better still (financially) with Government appointments. He died in 1718.

There are no tragedies of any importance during the eighteenth century. Young's Revenge has its admirers, and Johnson's Irene is certainly not without literary value. But of the others who essayed the tragic muse, Thomson and Mason, for instance, the less said the better.

The reason for this marked decadence of the tragic drama is not hard to find. The whole spirit of the century, the entire trend of literary expression, was against the tragic muse. With its essentially artificial style of poetry, its love of smooth versification, and its hatred of emotionalism in verse (emotionalism in prose was another matter), it was impossible for tragedy to make any headway.

Sensibility and passion can never be wholly repressed, whatever be the literary conventions, and some outlet was found for these in the Novel. There, however, it ran to sentimentality rather than tragedy, a direction far more in accordance with English tastes.

PART IV

THE AGE OF JOHNSON AND FIELDING

Such jostling and bustling"

SHELLEY.

IF certain aspects of social life in the eighteenth century are reflected in the writings of Addison, Steele, and Pope, we must consider men like Johnson, Fielding, and Hogarth if we would learn something of the sterner matter of the times. For there was another world outside the leisurely and urbane visitation of the Spectator; a dark underworld of want and misery, of fierce primal passions and desperate resolves. Fielding and Smollett had tarried there for a while; the tragic figure of Richard Savage never emerges from the gloom; one recalls the gaunt wretchedness of scribblers like Boyes and Derrick, whom Johnson befriended, the hack work to which Defoe's genius had perforce to stoop, in order that he might live; of those political journalists about whom Pendennis has much to say. Finally, for we might multiply instances galore, there is that quaint, delightful, impecunious Irishman, Oliver Goldsmith. But the great, uncouth, burly, lovable figure of Johnson will serve our purpose. He survived where many fell by the way: like the pilgrim in the Allegory, he struggled through the Valley into the sunlight beyond, with deep thankfulness. But no one knew the underworld better than Johnson, or sympathised more practically with its dwellers. "He has nothing in him of the bear but the skin," as Goldsmith gratefully and truly said—and his views of authorship were expressed in Dryden's translation of the Entrance to Hell described by Virgil:

"Just in the Gate and in the jaws of Hell
Revengeful cares and sullen sorrows dwell—
And pale diseases and repining age,
Want, fear and famine unresisting rage:
Here toils Death and Death's half brother Sleep—Forms terrible to view, their sentry keep"

"All these apply exactly to an author," was the Doctor's comment. Humour and Tragedy are inseparable bedfellows in the life of Grub Street, and the story is told of an impoverished author, Floyd by name, who in his weary night wanderings came across a brother unfortunate sleeping soundly by the wayside. When Floyd roused him, this gentleman, with a manner suggesting the immortal Dick Swiveller, exclaimed, "My dear Floyd, I am sorry to see you in this destitute state, will you go home with me to my lodgings?" Perhaps the tattered and impecunious scribbler alone could perambulate safely through the City at these times.

Johnson's neighbourhood of Covent Garden was especially rife in thieves and disreputables. He discovered that the best guard against a street robber was a stout cudgel. It may be doubted whether there were more or as many criminals in London as to-day, but the inefficient police system made detection and punishment a much more difficult matter.

Henry Fielding in his Enquiry into the Causes of the late Increase of Robbers, &c., with some proposals for remedying the Growing Evil, gives a clear picture of the plague of dangerous ne'er-do-wells. After a concise picture of evils arising from gambling and drunk, especially from that "new kind of drunkenness . . . by that poison called gin," and matters which lead into crime in every age, he lights upon the peculiar weakness of his time—the corruption of justice. Bribery was everywhere, in politics it was, of course, the recognised thing, and when the watchmen and constables were bribed, and the magistrate was too often incapable, it was small wonder that roguery should be so great a curse, and as is always the case, the Government, being inefficient, made up for its weakness by grotesque cruelties when by chance anyone was found out.

The London of Johnson was a noisy, turbulent, high-spirited London. But the old gait, the picturesque festivals of the City before Puritanism had frowned over its pleasures, were no longer to be seen. Maypoles had disappeared, and with them the genuine music and poetry of the open-air life had also gone. Domesticity and the tavern, rivals in one way, yet conspired together to give a blow to the old social life of the streets. The festivals that survived—like Guy Fawkes Day—were less occasions of innocent merriment at first than expressions of the national hatred of Catholicism.

Violence indeed is the key-note of the social life.

It permeates every grade of society, and people become, as might be expected, rougher and grimmer as we descend in the social scale. With such an example as was set by the boisterous spirits of certain notorious clubs, and with the system of jurisdiction so grossly inefficient, it is no wonder that the eighteenth century is a century of mob rioting, culminating in the appalling Gordon Riots of 1780. In these riots—the last popular expression of religious fanaticism, for political feeling takes its place in the next century—the whole city was paralysed for two days by the behaviour of a huge clamorous mob. Prisons were broken open, churches and houses burned and looted, and there was no safety for the peaceful citizen until the military came upon the scene.

Grub Street had existed before Johnson's time, there was a Grub Street in the time of Robert Greono, sinner and moralist, and of happy-go-lucky Nash; ever since the age of Marlowe the literary vagabonds of the age had foregathered at the tavern, and the author of The Jew of Malta was not the only one to perish in a drunken brawl. During the Civil Wars, when the pamphleteer sprang into being, Grub Street numbered its devotees. Want and Necessity, those hungry wolves which have followed the poor artist in every age, claimed among their victims the sweet singer Edmund Spenser, and the brilliant Otway. Spenser, flying from a dismantled home in Ireland, had perished miserably in Westminster, forsaken and an outcast, Otway, it is said, "languished in adversity unpitied, and dy'd in an alehouse unlamented."

As a rule, the man who enters the monastery of letters, takes of necessity the Vow of Poverty. Popularity carried with it for many a generation no respite here. True, there were exceptions—Shakespeare, for example. But Shakespeare was a pauper beside men like Whittington and Crosby. And although patronage approved the lot of men such as Ben Jonson and Dryden, of Congreve, Addison, and Pope, these were few indeed to set beside the vast army to whom comfort was an alien, and prosperity an unknown god.

However, it must be admitted that the lot of the writer was improving during the century. When one remembers the few pounds that came from Paradise Lost, seven hundred pounds for Tom Jones seems quite an impressive sum.

The impecuniosity of men of letters was not due entirely to public indifference. Extravagance and improvidence played their share in the tale of mean streets. Samuel Boyse, whose clothes had been got out of pawn owing to the generous exertions of Johnson, would spend his last few shillings to buy truffles and mushrooms for his bit of meat; then, when all his money was spent he would take to his bed, cover himself with a blanket, and through holes made in this covering, he would cheerfully continue to write.

Johnson never forgot those who helped him in his days of hardship. When as a young married man he was desperately striving to eke out a living on a meagre purse, there was one Henry Hervey, a considerable rogue, even on Johnson's showing;

but he had helped Johnson, so the grateful Dr. said of him—"You call a dog, Hervey, I shall call him."

One of the most remarkable of Johnson's companions was Richard Savage, poet and vagabond. Johnson describes him as "of middle stature, of a thin habit of body, of long coarse features, and melancholy aspect." He made his acquaintance in 1737, and they would often roam the streets together, on one occasion they walked up and down St. James's Square for several hours, denouncing Sir Robert Walpole and making resolutions to "stand by their country."

Savage, far inferior to Johnson both in character and intellect, had acquired, through knocking about the world, a goodish knowledge of men and things, which naturally impressed the young, responsive Johnson.

It is typical of Johnson that he should try so desperately hard to paint an attractive picture of his old companion, the best thing to be recorded of Savage is his friendliness for Johnson. Many men had befriended Savage, including Steele, but he ill repaid his friends, and few could have lamented when he died at last in a debtor's prison.

Garrick did much to raise the tone of the drama, and a noticeable feature of the age was the increasing interest in the theatre by the middle classes. The Shakespearean revivals brought forward a number of notable actresses. Then, as now, the young exquisite and lady of fashion went as much to be seen as to see. Roderick Random declared that he "rose and sat down, covered and uncovered" his head "twenty times between the acts," affected to take snuff, wiped his nose with a perfumed handkerchief, dangled his cane, and adjusted his sword-knot "in order to attract attention."

The play started later than formerly—at five in the afternoon. Quite late enough for a dark and dangerous London, when home-going would be almost as risky as in Pepys' day.

If audiences were less noisy than they had been in Elizabethan and Stuart times, there was still much room for improvement. Between 1697 and 1737 the practice prevailed of giving footmen free access to the gallery. This originated in the desire to free the lobbies of these quarrelsome and noisy fellows, but it only signified a transference of the noise to a more objectionable quarter. The managers put an end to it at last, but not without much rioting and protest.

Garrick endeavoured to clear the stage of all except the actors. He also much improved the lighting effects by introducing footlights in place of the circular chandelier hitherto suspended over the stage.

The glorious pageant of the Lord Mayor's Show had become a paltry business, but was as popular as ever, though it was as different from that of Whittington's day as was Cinderella's gorgeous coach from the pumpkin.

A notable addition to the serious recreation of Londoners was the British Museum. The British Museum was once situated in a "noble suburb" Bloomsbury had at this time very fine houses and large gardens, flanked by country lanes and pretty cottages. It was then Montague House and the repository of Sir Hans Sloane's famous collection. This was in 1753.

It is curious to recall the fact that we owe the British Museum, the centre of modern London's intellectual life, to a lottery. What is more, no less a triumvirate than the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Speaker of the House of Commons consented to act as managers and trustees of the lottery. It came about in this manner.

The library and collection which Sir Hans Sloane, the well-known doctor, had got together was offered to the country for a nominal £20,000. The Treasury at the time did not care to advance the money, and the House of Commons chose to order the issue of a State Lottery (26 Geo II, c. 22). 100,000 tickets at £3 each were issued, £200,000 being spent in prizes, varying from £10,000 to £10. The remaining £100,000 was placed to the credit of the British Museum Purchase Fund. Not only was the Sloane Collection bought, but the Harleian and Cotton manuscripts were acquired. Moreover, Montague House was purchased, so that the Museum was thrown open to the public in 1759.

The purchase of the Harleian MSS., the gift by George IV of a library of nearly 30,000 volumes, and the acquisition (early in the late century) of the Elgin Marbles, increased the importance of the Museum in national estimation.

The new buildings were begun about the same time, and among the early rules was the following gem:

"The visitors must be conducted in regular order, and the whole inspection is not to last more than three hours."

For the less seriously inclined there was the sorry sport of cock-fighting, which was as popular in Johnson's day as in FitzStephen's. It occupied the same place in popular estimation as horse-racing does to-day. And it had the advantage of being in season all the year round. As a set-off to the excitement of the cockpit there was the Sunday concert, where Dr Blow's anthems were given, and poems recited by the Poet Laureate "in praise of religion and virtue."

There was a decided change for the worse in the manners of the early eighteenth century; the polish of the Restoration period had worn off, and now manners and morals were fairly well balanced. The early Georges, with their boorish tastes, set no grand standard of courtesy and refinement; and Ministers like Walpole harmonised uncommonly well with the general atmosphere of the Court. Walpole, indeed, was like a foul-mouthed country squire, and he and George II vied with one another in coarse invective.

Then came a swing in the other direction with the advent of Chesterfield, his Turveydrop notions of deportment, and his amazing involution of speech. It is said that according to him, "One should say, in condoling with a friend, not 'I am sorry for your loss,' but 'I hope, sir, you will do me the justice to be persuaded that I am not insensible of your unhappiness, that I take part in your distress, and shall ever be affected when you are so.'"

What Chesterfield was in speech, Horace Walpole was in dress.

Masquerades, an extremely popular and riotous relaxation, were first held at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket, and the "quality" assembled in Ranelagh Gardens, Chelsea, or in Vauxhall. Horace Walpole pronounced in favour of Vauxhall, for "the garden is pleasanter and one goes by water."

We have seen something of the estimate of womenkind by men like Addison and Pope. In the earlier years of the century woman is regarded, when not as a plaything, at any rate as little better than a housekeeper. But about the year 1760 a change took place in the status of women.

Mrs. Montague, a friend of the Duchess of Portland, attempted a reform of manners by inaugurating parties "where cards could not be thought of," but "where the fair sex might participate in conversation with literary and ingenious men."

Benjamin Stallingfleet appeared there in morning dress, wearing grey worsted stockings in place of the conventional black silk, and the term "blue stocking," flung by Admiral Boscawen at these gatherings, had a very literal significance.

The ladies regarded the term with complacency, averring that no gathering was complete without Stallingfleet's blue stockings. Other ladies had their special groups, and in this way the literary women of the day met and fraternised together—Hannah More, Mrs Thrale, Hannah Cowley (author of The Belle's Stratagem), and Frances Burney. The latter had no relish for the bookishness of certain circles, and many of the women were far happier in circles where Johnson and Burke declaimed to their admirers.

Breakfast parties sprang into vogue during the eighteenth century, and were somewhat formidable affairs. In the earlier years of the nineteenth century many famous literary gatherings took place at these, as we may learn from Crabb Robinson's Diary.

It has been estimated that between 1196 and 1753 fifty thousand people were executed at Tyburn. It was only when the Tyburn district commenced to become a fashionable quarter that an agitation against the publicity of executions, and the equally public processions before execution, was started. An old Tory like Dr Johnson thundered against the proposal—"The age is running after innovation; all the business of the world is to be done in a new way. Tyburn itself is not safe from the fury of innovation! No, sir! It is not an improvement; they object that the old method drew together a number of spectators. Sir, executions are intended to draw the spectators."

Strange that the kindly Doctor could not realise the degrading and brutalising effect of these shows upon the popular mind. Perhaps nothing marks the transition from eighteenth to nineteenth and twentieth century London more clearly than the realisation of this coarse brutality. The darker side of Hogarthian and Johnsonian London is painfully apparent; we must, however, beware of exaggerating the blackness. The real difference may lie in the fact that our ancestors did not fear to display everything. To-day there are many things we prefer to hide.

There is less brutality in modern London. But there are worse things than physical violence. After all, is there less vice and hardship in the life of to-day? I wonder.

I. POETRY (from James Thomson to the coming of Burns).

FROM JAMES THOMSON TO THE COMING OF BURNS

THE eighteenth century is an age of great prose, and until its close, of second-rate poetry. In the closing years, a change took place in the character of its verse, that gradually became more and more pronounced, and finally led to the splendid outburst of Romantic poetry in the dawn of the new century.

The change is manifest so far back as Thomson's Winter in 1726, and although many verse writers of the time elected to follow the school of Pope, and continued to eschew passion and naturalism in verse, from Thomson onwards there is a steady output of verse that reflects a more intimate relation with Nature.

JAMES THOMSON was born in 1700, at Ednam in Roxburghshire, and went at the age of fifteen to Edinburgh University, with the idea of becoming a minister like his father. The idea never took practical shape, and in 1725 he came to London and became tutor in Lord Binning's family. His poem cycle, The Seasons, begun in 1726, was finished in 1730, with Autumn. These poems met with considerable appraisement, and despite his indifferent success in other directions, he had made a sufficient number of influential friends to line his nest for the rest of his days. He was a kindly and agreeable man, with poor initiation, so it is fortunate for him that he was looked after in the way of appointments and pensions. He died in 1748.

As a writer he signalled the departure from the town to the country, chose the Sponsonian stanza and blank verse as his medium, and eschewed the stopped couplet that was ubiquitous in the realm of poetry at the time. Although a copious producer, his best work lies in Winter, Spring, Summer, and Autumn (The Seasons), and in The Castle of Indolence. His long poem on Liberty is flat and uninspired, and his plays, though fairly successful, are insignificant from the literary point of view. In his masque Alfred, written in conjunction with Mallet, the lyric of Rule Britannia occurs, afterwards republished with Thomson's initials; its vigorous swashbuckling note scarcely suggests the fat and indolent poet.

He was undoubtedly a man of vivid imagination, and his early life, amid the romantic scenery of Roxburghshire, had proved a happy source of inspiration. Although the conventional phraseology of the age proved irresistible from time to time, and gives a stilted air to much of his work, yet there are many fine descriptive passages, where he is content to rely on his own feelings and observations, eschewing the set terms of the imitator.

There is greater ease, and a more plastic imagination, in The Castle of Indolence (1748), a fantastic poem that reproduces happily an atmosphere of dreamy melancholy, enlivened now and again by mirthful passages.

THE CASTLE OF INDOLENCE

Joined in the prattle of the purling rills
Were heard the lowing herds along the vale,
And flocks loud bleating from the distant hills,
And vacant shepherds piping in the dale
And, now and then, sweet Philomel would wail,
Or stock-doves plain amid the forest deep,
That drowsy rustled to the sighing gale,
And still a coil the grasshopper did keep;
Yet all these sounds, y blent, inclined all to sleep.

Full in the passage of the vale, above,
A sable, silent, solemn forest stood;
Where nought but shadowy forms was seen to move,
As Idlesse fancied in her dreaming mood;
And up the hills, on either side, a wood
Of Blackening pines, ay waving to and fro,
Sent forth a sleepy horror through the blood
And where this valley winded out, below,
The murmuring main was heard, and scarcely heard, to flow

A pleasing land of drowsy-hed it was,
Of dreams that wane before the half-shut eye;
And of gay castles in the clouds that pass,
Forever flushing round a summer-sky
There eke the soft delights, that wittingly
Instil a wanton sweetness through the breast,
And the calm pleasures always hovered nigh;
But whate'er smacked of noyance, or unrest,
Was far, far off expelled from this delicious nest

One has but to compare, say, Pope's Windsor Forest, with a passage from The Seasons, to appreciate the fresh, open-air atmosphere that Thomson brought into his verse.

Here is Pope, with his stock phrases, trying hard to be impressive in a subject ill suited to his town muso:

"There, interspers'd in lawns and op'ning glades,
Thin trees arise that shun each other's shades,
Here in full light the russet plains extend:
There wrapt in clouds the bluish hills ascend
Ev'n the wild heath displays her purple dyes,
And midst the desert fruitful hills arise,
That crowned with tufted trees and springing corn,
Like verdant isles the sable waste adorn."¹

And here is Thomson:

"For now the day
O'er heaven and earth diffused, grows warm and high,
Infinite splendour ' wide investing all
How still the breeze! save what the filmy threads
Of dew evaporate brushes from the plain.
How clear the cloudless sky, how deeply tinged
With a peculiar blue! The ethereal arch
How swelled immense, amid whose azure throned
The radiant sun how gay—how calm below
The gilded earth!"²

Thomson, as I have said, is not guiltless of stock phrases, he does not spare us such terms as "the gilded earth," but how different the spirit that informs his lines. In his own line supreme and delightful, Pope is no cheery companion when he steps beyond his gate at Twickenham, or leaves Belinda's boudoir. The lover of polished formalities was scarcely likely to take kindly to the wild extravagances of Nature. Thomson loved Nature, and his verse gives expression to what he called the "recollected love." Pope was frankly bored by it. Compared with his successors, Thomson's love may seem chilly and perfunctory, but the chill is due to lack of power to express, rather than to any real indifference. Certainly, English Nature poetry owes a substantial debt to "our old-time, amiable, open, and truest-hearted Thomson."

² The Seasons.

Among Thomson's disciples may be mentioned JOHN ARMSTRONG (1709-1779), also a Roxburghshire man, and the political versifier, RICHARD GLOVER (1712-1785).

Armstrong was a physician, and made strenuous attempts to treat dietetics and hygiene from the poet's standpoint, in his Art of Preserving Health (1744). The prolixity and latinistic tendencies of Thomson are exaggerated in his follower, some of whose verses remind one of Oliver Wendell Holmes' amusing absurdity, Lines by a Latin Tutor. He was certainly never blessed with a sense of humour, or he would not have spoken of a cold bath as "a gelid cistern." In his favour it may be said that his blank verse is agreeable, and sometimes impressive, and even his medical stanzas—like those added to The Castle of Indolence—have some felicities of diction.

If Armstrong is prolix, Glover's fatal fluency is overwhelming. It would be interesting to know how many modern readers have waded through the thirty books of The Athenaid (1787), or even the comparative trifle, Leonidas (1737), (in nine books).

His best claim to remembrance lies in his breezy and effective ballad, Admiral Hosier's Ghost.

JOHN DYER, painter and cleric (c. 1688-1750), is remembered for his Grongar Hill and Country Walk, poems faulty in technique but fresh and observant in character.

ROBERT BLAIR (1699-1746), with The Grave, is akin to Young in his portentous gravity; and MATTHEW GREEN (1698-1733), a custom-house clerk, follows in the wake of Swift, though The Spleen is certainly more genial in its satire than that of the sardonic creator of Gulliver.

WILLIAM SHENSTONE calls for more detailed notice. Born in Worcestershire (1714-1763), he spent most of his life in his native country, trying to improve his estate. A shy, delicate man tolerably well off, he mixed with many notabilities of his time. An agreeable prose writer with some critical faculty, and a dexterous and fluent maker of verse, he deserves notice here as a characteristic man of the transitional period, breaking away in certain directions from eighteenth-century poetic conventions; yet with insufficient force to strike out a really original line. But he is quite inoffensive, and sometimes reminds the reader of the sentimental side of Goldsmith.

Passing to WILLIAM COLLINS (1721-1759), we find another step in the transitional movement has been gained. The departure made by Thomson has been echoed rather than improved upon by his followers, and Shenstone carries us no further in the direction of naturalism.

It is otherwise with Collins. Born at Chichester, he was educated at Westminster and Oxford, then coming to London at the age of twenty-five, he published a few Odes (1746-1747) that failed to attract attention, despite their very rich merit. His friendship with the kindly Thomson was a pleasant interlude for his sensitive, ill-balanced temperament, and on Thomson's death, Collins wrote one of his best Odes in praise of his friend. An opportune legacy enabled him to retreat to Chichester, but his health gradually grew worse, and in 1754 the young poet's mind gave way altogether. His death, therefore, in 1759 came as a merciful release.

His slender output of verse contrasts oddly with the voluminousness of his contemporaries; but the quality is high, especially in the briefer Odes. Here, as in the case of Thomson, we have to note the combination of an often artificial and pedantic style with a delicate and intimate poetic vision. In such pieces as How Sleep the Brave, he exhibits a gift of rhythmic music refreshing to meet after so much merely clever verse, while in the Ode to Evening there is a power of portraying landscape in a simple, direct fashion, that shows a more delicate art if no greater imagination than we find in Thomson.

The real power portrayed in his work makes his mental collapse the more melancholy, and it is to be regretted that two of his latest Odes have not been preserved.

AN ODE

How sleep the brave who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than fancy's feet have ever trod
By fairy hands their knell is rung;
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There honour comes a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And freedom shall awhile repair,
To dwell, a weeping hermit, there!¹

POPULAR SUPERSTITIONS

Unbounded is thy range; with varied style
Thy muse may, like those feathery tribes which spring
From their rude rocks, extend her skirting wing
Round the moist marge of each cold Hebridean le,
To that hoar pile, which still its ruin shows,
In whose small vaults a pigmy-folk is found,
Whose bones the delver with his spade upthrows,
And culls them, wondering, from the hallowed ground!
Or thither, where, beneath the showery west,
The mighty kings of three fair realms are laid;
Once foes, perhaps, together now they rest,
No slaves revere them and no wars invade,
Yet frequent now, at midnight's solemn hour,
The rifted mounds their yawning cells unfold
And forth the monarch stalks with sovereign power,
In pageant robes, and wreathed with sleeny gold,
And on their twilight tombs aerial council hold

In THOMAS GRAY (1716-1771) we have a poet who presents many superficial similarities with

Collins. Like Collins, he was a scholar, and a careful literary artist; like Collins, moreover, his output is slender, and there is something of the same pensive charm and feeling for nature about his work. But in creative faculty, Collins is certainly his superior, though Gray's position, his longer life, his intellectual vigour, have given him a more prominent place in the history of our literature.

A Cookney by birth, he was sent to Eton and Cambridge, where he made friends with Horace Walpole. After some years of wide and careful reading he travelled abroad, and finally (1741) settled at Cambridge. Refusing the Laureateship in 1757, he obtained the Professorship of History (after one rebuff) in 1768; but died in 1771, without having given a lecture.

The majority of his poems were written early in life, both the Eton Ode and the famous Elegy being written in 1747, though the latter was not printed until 1750. Beside his verse, he wrote some thoughtful and scholarly essays, planned a History of English Poetry, and proved an accomplished and imaginative letter-writer. Gray is the most accomplished craftsman of the transition period, and there is a steady progress in his work from the sometimes colourless and often conventional Odes of his youth, e.g. On Spring, and On Adversity, to the striking folioities of the famous Elegy, and the brilliant manipulation of the later Pindaric poems. His last efforts, resulting from his study of Icelandic and Celtic verse, exhibit him as a true pioneer of Romanticism.

Gray's special contribution to poetry lies in the fastidious accuracy of his natural descriptions. Collins is as observant, Thomson as warm in his regard for nature, and both these poets are in their best moments less unstudied, more spontaneous than Gray. But for fastidiousness in detail that depends not merely on imaginative observation but on a nice and delicate feeling for the right word, Gray certainly surpasses them.

It is interesting to place side by side some descriptive passage in prose from his letters and one of his poems in verse.

"The bosom of the mountains spreading here into a broad basin, discovers in the midst Grassmere-Water, its margin is hollowed into small bays with bold eminences, some of them rocks, some of them turf, that half conceal and vary the figure of the little lake they command. From the shore a low promontory pushes itself far into the water, and on it stands a white village with the parish church rising in the midst of it, hanging enclosures, corn-fields, and meadows green as an emerald, with their trees, hedges, and cattle, fill up the whole space from the edge of the water. Just opposite to you is a large farm-house at the bottom of a steep, smooth lawn, embosomed in old woods, which climb half-way up the mountain side, and discover above them a broken line of crags, that crown the scene."¹

ODE ON THE PLEASURES ARISING FROM VICISSITUDE

Now the golden Morn aloft
Waves her dew-beespangled wing,
With vermeil cheek and whisper soft
She woos the tardy Spring
Till April starts, and calls around
The sleeping fragrance from the ground,

And lightly o'er the living scene
Scatters his freshest, tenderest green.

Newborn flocks, in rustic dance,
Frisking ply their feeble feet;
Forgetful of their wintry trance
The birds his presence greet.
But chief, the sky-lark warbles high
His trembling thrilling ecstasy;
And lessening from the dazzled sight,
Melts into air and liquid light.

See the wretch that long has tost
On the thorny bed of pain,
At length repair his vigour lost
And breathe and walk again:
The meanest floweret of the vale,
The simplest note that swells the gale,
The common sun, the air, the skies,
To him are opening Paradise.

It is quite true that this sensitive groping after words gives a studied art to some of his work, robbing it of spontaneity and flexibility. But where so many contemporary versifiers were painfully prolix and wilfully vague and conventional in their poetic locality, it is grateful to turn to the admirable art and fine scholarly imagination of Thomas Gray.

DAVID MALLOCH (who later changed his name to Mallet), was a pleasant writer of light verse and a faithful disciple alternately of his friend Thomson and of Pope.

MARK AKENSIDE (1721-1770), like John Armstrong, was a physician. The son of a butcher, and originally intended for the ministry, he became interested in physic, and his Pleasures of the Imagination appeared about the same time as Armstrong's Art of Preserving Health. He was an ardent Whig, and the Whiggian coloured his writings. In many ways an oddity, he none the less took a high place among the physicians of the day, being accorded reluctant admiration from Johnson, who naturally disliked his principles. In 1770 he died, it is supposed, of typhoid fever.

As a writer, he is neither pronouncedly of the school of Thomson or of Pope, inclining perhaps to that of Dryden. His abilities are only mediocre, but he has been often underestimated as a writer, and if his verse lacks the polish of Pope and the easy force of Dryden, there are touches in his muse, in the Odes and The Epistle to Curio especially, of genuine feeling and sincerity.

WRITERS OF DEVOTIONAL VERSE

Something at this point may be said of a number of writers during the century, who found particular expression in devotional verse.

ISAAC WATTS (1674-1748) has come down to posterity as the author of "Let Dogs Delight" and "The Busy Bee," and these moral songs for children have survived even Watts' considerable contributions to hymnology, and his more considerable but often grotesquely poor contributions to secular poetry. As a maker of secular verse, dull and bombastic as some of it may be, it is to Watts' credit that he broke away from the monotony of the favourite couplet and proved himself at times an able if unequal metrist.

Too early to feel the reaction against the school of Pope, his work is properly looked upon as transitional, and had he been born later, it is far more probable he would by temperament and feeling have belonged to the new school of romantic naturalism.

Greater than Watts in imaginative power, and more advantageously placed in point of time, is CHARLES WESLEY (1708-1788). To find his equal as a writer of sacred song, one has to turn to the religious poetry of the seventeenth century, and not even in Vaughan and Herbert do we find such intensity of personal feeling and experience as meets us in the verse of Wesley. Moreover, there is more lyrical fire in "Jesus, Lover of my Soul" than in all of Watts' hymns, but from the purely poetical point of view Wesley's highest reach is made in the verses on "Wrestling Jacob":

WRESTLING JACOB

Come, O thou traveller unknown,
Whom still I hold, but cannot see;
My company before is gone,
And I am left alone with thee;
With thee all night I mean to stay,
And wrestle till the break of day.

I need not tell thee who I am,
My misery and sin declare;
Thyself hast called me by thy name,
Look on thy hands, and read it there!
But who, I ask thee, who art thou?
Tell me thy name, and tell me now

CHRISTOPHER SMART (1722-1771), the author of a few excellent pieces of light verse, is best remembered now for his Song to David, in which he escapes from the verse conventions of his age, and in a tumult of fervid imagery, pours forth a rhapsody that has no equal for intensity save in Wesley. Smart was only fitfully sane, and this poem, written in a serious, lucid interval (1763), owes something perhaps to the emotional lack of balance in its author. There are quaint touches of natural imagery in the song, for instance:

SONG TO DAVID

For adoration ripening canes
And cocoa's purest milk detains
The western pilgrim's staff;
Where rain in clapping boughs molos'd,
And vines with oranges dispos'd,
Embower the social laugh.

Now labour his reward receives,
For adoration counts his sheaves
To peace, her bounteous prince;
The nectarine his strong tint imbibes,
And apples of ten thousand tribes,
And quick peculiar quince.

For adoration, beyond match,
The scholar bullfinch aims to catch
The soft lute's ivory touch;
And, careless on the hazel spray,
The daring redbreast keeps at bay
The damsel's groody touch

A deserved tribute to Smart's glowing fancy was paid by Browning in his Parleyings with Certain People, and has contributed to the recent revival of interest in this song, neglected in his own day.

Of the man himself, despite his erratic and violent youth that we can well understand in view of his neurosis, it is pleasant to recall the tribute of Johnson, after seeing the unfortunate man in an asylum: "I did not think that he ought to be shut up. His infirmities were not noxious to society. He insisted on people praying with him, and I'd as lief pray with Kit Smart as with anyone else. Another charge was that he did not love clean linen, and I have no passion for it."

Returning to secular poetry, nothing need be said of Gray's friend, WILLIAM MASON, who copied most of Gray's weaknesses, with scarcely a touch of his power, and of WILLIAM FALCONER, who wrote the Shipwreck, except that they broke away from the couplet form, and from the conventional subject-matter of their times. The brothers WATSON, THOMAS and JOSEPH, were more remarkable as critics than as verse writers, for they showed real appreciation of Elizabethan poetry. Thomas was Laureate from 1785 until his death, and his poetry belongs largely to the school of Pope, though not without suggestions of Gray.

His most memorable contributions to literature are his Observations on Spenser (1754), and his valuable History of English Poetry (1777-1781).

CHARLES CHURCHILL, born in 1731, at Westminster, took Orders in 1756, but soon realised his unsuitability for the clerical profession. Reckless in spirit, and dissolute in character, he proved himself a vigorous satirist in the Rosciad, on the actors of the day, and a vitriolic one as well, as his epistle to William Hogarth testifies.

AN EPISTLE TO WILLIAM HOGARTH

Virtue, with due contempt, saw Hogarth stand,
The murderous pencil in his palsied hand;
What was the cause of Liberty to him,
Or what was honour? Let them sink or swim,
So he may gratify, without control,
The mean resentments of his selfish soul

Thy body shrivell'd up, thy dim eyes sunk
Within their sockets deep, thy weak hands shrunk,
The body's weight unable to sustain,
The stream of life scarce trembling thro' the vein,
More than half kill'd by honest truths, which fell,
Thro' thy own fault, from men who wish'd thee well,
Can'st thou, e'en thus, thy thoughts to vengeance give,
And, dead to all things else, to malice live?
Hence, Dotard, to thy closet! Shut thee in,
By deep repentance wash away thy sin,
From haunts of men to shame and sorrow fly,
And, on the verge of death, learn how to die

Hogarth, who was, as a matter of fact, dying at this time, took the lampoon acutely to heart.

In Churchill the fires of the school of Dryden and Butler once again leap up for the last time. His vigour and power are as obvious as his violence and savagery.

JAMES BEATTIE (1735-1803), born in Kincardineshire and educated at Aberdeen, is another illustration of the mediocre writer whose work, though possessing little intrinsic value, interests us as literary students for its genuine attempt to bring emotion back into poetry, to find inspiration in the romantic past, and to eschew the school of epigrammatic cleverness and artifice. Neither The Minstrel nor The Progress of Genius can afford us much æsthetic pleasure. But his work is a step further towards romanticism away from classicism, and shows renewed interest in the Spenserian stanza.

On the same plane are JOHN LANGHORNE and WILLIAM MICKLE. Both men were fair scholars, the first a north countryman, the second a Scot. Langhorne's Country Justice deals with rural life in a way that reminds us of Crabbe rather than of any contemporary. He shows unmistakably the trend of the new movement. Mickle's Songs and Ballads stimulated the taste for the ballad, more strikingly effected in Percy's Reliques. Among these reclothed old songs and modern imitations is the well-known There is nae Luck about the House. His poem Cumnor Hall is a pleasant, sentimental piece that inspired Scott to write Kenilworth.

Last relics of the school of Pope, who succeeded in bringing about its downfall, even more quickly than the pioneers of romanticism, are ERASMUS DARWIN (1731-1802) and WILLIAM HAYLEY (1745-1820). Darwin was a physician who lived at Lichfield. He was an able scientist, and in his Zoonomia (1794) wrote a thoughtful treatise on the laws of organic life, that played no small part probably in influencing his famous descendant. Unhappily he tried to popularise science by putting it into verse form, and in The Botanic Garden and The Economy of Vegetation (a lively title for a poem!) he gave the public a bombastic and absurd piece of work, that in place of making science attractive, made poetry ridiculous.

Hayley had no more imagination, nor as a poet had he Darwin's genuine value as a scientist. His dull artificiality is only equalled by his dismal fluency. These men are said to have brought about the final downfall of the older school of verse. The future was with the Romantics.

In contrast with them stands THOMAS CHATERTON. Born at Bristol in 1752, the son of a schoolmaster and cathedral singer, he had a fitful education and was bound to an attorney in 1764. Brought up in the atmosphere of St Mary Redcliffe, he haunted the building, and soon began to imitate certain mediæval documents he found therein. Thus started the series of forgeries known as the Rowley Poems. Hinting that he had discovered valuable old MSS., he soon found some to believe that the ballads, interludes, and the like that he gave out, belonged to a certain Rowley of Bristol. He attracted the notice of Horace Walpole and came to London, April 1770. For a time he eked out a pittance by his work, but the demand fell off, and, too proud to beg, he poisoned himself with arsenic in his Holborn lodgings in August 1770.

For a while a controversy existed as to the authorship of these poems, though Gray pronounced against them from the first. It is now established beyond question that they were forgeries, and the method of the forgery has been made clear by the labours of Professor Skeat.

He was a skilful metrist, with a clever gift of imitation and touches of real romantic feeling, sometimes expressed with delicate spontaneity, at others in purely conventional language. The inequality of his work, however, is a youthful quality that need not be dwelt upon; the imaginative power displayed in the Rowley Poems is sufficiently remarkable, and his influence upon the poets of the Romantic revival, though exaggerated by some critics, was no doubt considerable. But his youthful tragic circumstances, have created around him an atmosphere of romance that makes us somewhat inclined to overestimate the precise actual value of his work. Its promise is certainly great, its actual accomplishment interesting and remarkable, but more from potentiality than performance. His untimely death was undoubtedly a serious loss to poetry.

Before the death of Johnson, two great poets had appeared, who very definitely ushered in the new era—Cowper and Crabbe. They are best studied as pioneers rather than as representatives of Romanticism, for in each of them the conventions of the eighteenth century lingered, and their work, to an extent, still participates of the character of the transitional period.

WILLIAM COWPER (1731-1800)

There is, perhaps, no more pathetic life-story in the history of our literature, than that of William Cowper.

In November 1731, at the Rectory of Great Berkhamstead, where his father was rector, he started his voyage in the world with every possible material advantage. Was he not the great-nephew of a Lord Chancellor, the grandson of a Judge, the son of a King's Chaplain, his mother akin to the poet Donne, tracing her family back to Henry III?

As a particularly shy and sensitive child, he was the constant companion of a tender and indulgent mother, and after her death in 1737, it was a heart-broken little boy of six years old who arrived at Dr Pittman's boarding school in Market Street, Hertfordshire, to encounter the bullying of a brutal schoolfellow of fifteen, of whom, he says: "I was so afraid that I knew him better by his shoe-buckles than any other part of his dress"—presumably being too nervous to raise his eyes—adding the pious ejaculation "May the Lord pardon him, and may we meet in glory."

Two years later, eye trouble appeared, so he was sent to live in the house of an oculist, and in 1741 to Westminster School, where he seems to have been happy in his surroundings.

"Be it a weakness, it deserves some praise,
We love the play place of our early days,"

he wrote later. "Excellent at cricket, at football" also "an adept in the infernal art of lying"—though the latter lament surely may be ranked with John Bunyan's introspective self-condemnation.

Among his contemporaries at Westminster were Warren Hastings, who became Governor of India; "Great Churchill" the poet, "for he well deserved the name," says Cowper, and Colman; among the masters was Vincent Bourne, the Latin poet who, said Cowper, "was such a sloven, as if he trusted to his genius as a cloak for everything that could disgust you in his person."

A good writer of Latin verse, Cowper gained many "silver pence" for this distinction, and took an all-round interest in literature and literary people.

On leaving Westminster the law was chosen as a profession—possibly by his father, with the Wool-sack in view. He was placed with Mr Chapman for three years, with Thurlow, afterwards Lord Chancellor, as follow-pupil. Much time, however, that should have been spent in legal studies, was used by these young men "in giggling and making riddle" with his cousins, Theodora and Harriet Cowper. Theodora and Cowper fell in love, but their marriage was regarded with so much disfavour by her parents, that they were forced to part; neither of them married, nor did they ever meet again.

Called to the Bar in 1754, he does not seem to have made much headway in the profession, spending his time in literature and making one of a small circle of "Westminsters" who composed the "Nonsense Club."

His father's death in 1756 threw Cowper on his own resources, and the loss of the home at the parsonage was a real grief to him:

"Tis now become a history little known,
That once we call'd the pastoral house our own."

In 1763 a nomination to the post of Clerk of the Journals of the House of Commons was secured, but his nominee's right to appoint being disputed, Cowper was summoned to an examination, but, magnifying this simple ordeal to such an extent—"mortal poison" he called it—so unthumbed his brain that he attempted self-destruction. After this—suffering from religious melancholia that troubled him more or less throughout his life—he resided for eighteen months with Dr Cotton at St Albans.

On leaving St Albans he made the acquaintance of the Rev Morley Unwin, his wife and their son and daughter, and thus, induced to make one of their family party, he gained once more the advantages of home life. The following year, however, Mr Unwin died, but his death made no difference to Cowper, he merely removed with Mrs Unwin and her daughter to Olney on the banks of the Ouse, where his friend John Newton was curate, and here he wrote about seventy of the Olney Hymns.

In 1773 a second period of darkness clouded his life for three years, but again he recovered and began to make poetry the business of his life.

In 1782 he published a volume of poems, and the delightful ballad, John Gilpin, the latter the result of a story told him by the vivacious Lady Austen, also the instigator of his more ambitious work, The Task, published in 1785. From this time Cowper takes his place among our finest English poets.

His library was very small, under two hundred volumes at the time of his death, and most of those were gifts from friends; though he did not spend money on books, he did not think "half a guinea to a guinea too much for a genteelish toothpick-case"—and once wrote to a friend to procure him "a handsome stock buckle" which he thought "for twenty to twenty-five shillings—perhaps a second-hand affair—may be purchased that will make a figure at Olney."

In 1786 his cousin, Lady Hesketh, persuaded him and Mrs. Unwin to remove to Weston. They did so. Cowper was now in easy circumstances by the grant of a pension of £300, and began translating at the rate of "forty lines a day" the Homer he published in 1791. Notwithstanding the relief and distractions found in many directions—his taming three young hares is well known—and the kindness of his friends, another awful night time darkened his life, and from this time, 1794, up to the time of his death on April 25, 1800, very few glimpses of light were vouchsafed him, the poem On the Receipt of my Mother's Picture being written during a lucid interval.

In the technique of his work, Cowper belongs to the old rather than to the new. He shows neither the power nor the wish to break away from old metrical forms. Some of the good qualities of the old school are his clarity, painstaking care of expression, and on the whole an easy tranquillity of atmosphere. We shall find in his work neither the passion nor the strangeness of the Romantic school. Much in his nature disposed to shape him as a poet of Classicism, and with occasional reserves he is far more of a classical poet than a romantic. Yet throughout Cowper's work we feel from time to time a note of something that is certainly not the note of Pope or Dryden, something deeper in feeling than meets us even in Thomson, Collins, or Gray.

There is a tenderness in poems like My Mother's Picture, that not even Goldsmith in his verse can quite equal; while his fresh and intimate nature pictures point to a stage in the development of poetic naturalism, more considerable than we find in Thomson and his immediate successors.

Matters such as these make it impossible to place Cowper as the adherent of any distinct school. He is a blend of the old and the new, with much of the form of the old and something of the spirit of the new.

Turning from comparative criticism, what are the positive qualities in Cowper's work? He excelled in the delineation of the quiet backwaters of life, in investing the commonplace with tenderness and grace, in rendering with fresh unpretentious beauty the familiar scenes of everyday existence. The restraint, the easy lucidity of his best work are undeniable.

"No noise is here, or none that hinders thought,
The redbreast warbles still, but is content
With slender notes, and more than half suppress'd
Pleased with his solitude, and sitting light
From spray to spray, where'er he rests he shakes
From many a twig the pendent drops of ice,
That tinkle in the wither'd leaves below
Stillness, accompanied with sounds so soft,
Charms more than silence."

In its own way, the way of careful observation and sensitive poetic feeling, it would be hard to better such a passage. Certainly in his nature pictures there is a large measure of that healing power, that John Stuart Mill found in Wordsworth. Lacking the vision of Wordsworth and the imaginative height, he is singularly like him in cool, peaceful, unforced magic.

Another side of the man discovers a vein of whimsical humour and pleasant fancy, best shown in the letters and the wholly delicious John Gipsy.

The melancholia that affected his life gave a tinge of sadness, sometimes of terror, to his beautiful hymns, but could not darken the brightness of his human sympathies, and when at times the cloud lifted, there was a joyousness and light-heartedness about the man that found happy expression in his work.

His best poetry in The Task, and The Winter Walk reflects the quiet, deliberate charm of "old haunted meadows" amid which he lived. He seemed to have absorbed into his being the homely charms of these rural parts, and his verse goes on its way with the leisurely rhythm of the slow-moving Ouse, neither grand nor varied, but gently persuasive and soothing.

ON THE RECEIPT OF MY MOTHER'S PICTURE

Oh that those lips had language ! Life has pass'd
With me but roughly since I heard thee last
Those lips are thus—thy own sweet smiles I see,
The same that oft in childhood solaced me ;
Voice only fails, else, how distinct they say,
" Grieve not, my child, chaso all thy fears away ! "
The meek intelligenco of those dear eyes
(Blot it the art that can immortalize,
The art that baffles time's tyrannic claim
To quench it) here shines on me still the same.
Faithful remembrance of one so dear,
Oh welcome guest, though unexpected, here !
Who bidd'st me honour with an artless song,
Affectionate, a mother lost so long,
I will obey, not willingly alone,
But gladly as the precept were her own ;
And, while that face renews my filial grief,
Fancy shall weave a charm for my relief—
Shall steep me in Elysian revuie,
A momentary dream, that thou art she.

THE WINTER WALK AT NOON

The night was winter in his roughest mood ;
The morning sharp and clear But now at noon
Upon the southern side of the slant hills,
And where the woods fence off the northern blast,
The season smiles, renouing all its rage,
And has the warmth of May The vault is blue
Without a cloud, and without a speck
The dazzling splendour of the scene below
Again the harmony comes o'er the vale ,
And through the trees I view th' embattled tow'r
Whence all the music I again perceive
The soothing influence of the wafted strains,
And settle in sweet musings as I tread
The walk, still verdant, under oaks and elms,
Whose outspread branches overarch the glado
The roof, though moveable through all its length
As the wind sways it, has yet well suffic'd,
And, intercepting in their silent fall
The frequent flakes, has kept a path for me

Meditation here

May think down hours to moments Here the heart
May give a useful lesson to the head,
And learning wiser grow without his books.
Knowledge and wisdom, far from being one,

Have oft-times no connection. Knowledge dwells
In heads replete with thoughts of other men ;
Wisdom in minds attentive to their own.
Knowledge, a rude unprofitable mass,
The mere materials with which wisdom builds
Till smooth'd and squar'd and fitted to its place,
Does but encumber whom it seems t' enrich.

REPORT OF AN ADJUDGED CASE

Between Nose and Eyes a strange contest arose,—
The spectacles set them unhappily wrong ,
The point in dispute was, as all the world knows,
To which the said spectacles ought to belong.

So Tongue was the lawyer, and argued the cause
With a great deal of skill, and a wig full of learning ,
While chief baron Ear sat to balance the laws,
So fam'd for his talent in nicely discerning

In behalf of the Nose, it will quickly appear,
And your lordship, he said, will undoubtedly find,
That the Nose has had spectacles always in wear,
Which amounts to possession time out of mind.

Then holding the spectacles up in the court,—
Your lordship observes they are made with a straddle,
As wide as the ridge of the Nose is , in short,
Design'd to sit close to it, just like a saddle

Again, would your lordship a moment suppose,
('Tis a case that has happen'd, and may do again)
That the visage or countenance had not a Nose ?
Pray who would, or who could, wear spectacles then ?

On the whole, it appears—and my argument shows,
With a reasoning the court will never condemn,
That the spectacles plainly were made for the Nose,
And the Nose was as plainly intended for them.

Then, shifting his side, (as a lawyer knows how)
He pleaded again in behalf of the Eyes .

But what were his arguments few people knew,
For the court did not think they were equally wise.

So his lordship decreed, with a grave solemn tone,
Decisive and clear, without one if or but—
That whomever the Nose put his spectacles on,
By day-light or candle-light—Eyes should be shut !

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS

" Your question, at what time your coming to us will be most agreeable, is a knotty one, and such as, had I the wisdom of Solomon, I should be puzzled to answer. I will therefore leave it still a question, and refer the time of your journey Westward entirely to your own election adding this one limitation, however, that I do not wish to see you exactly at present, on account of the unfinished state of my study, the wainscot of which still smells of paint, and which is not yet papered. But to return as I have insinuated, thy pleasant company is the thing which I always wish, and as much at one time as at another. I believe, if I examine myself minutely since I despair of ever having it in the height of summer, which for your sake I should desire most, the depth of the winter is the season which would be most eligible to me. For then it is, that in general I have most need of a cordial, and particularly in the month of January I am sorry, however, that I have departed so far from my first purpose, and am answering a question which I declared myself unable to answer. Choose thy own time, secure of this, that whatever time that be, it will always be to us a welcome one.

" I thank you for your pleasant extract of Miss Fanshaw's letter.

" Her pen drops eloquence as sweet
As any muse's tongue can speak ;
Nor need a scribe, like her, regret
Her want of Latin or of Greek.

" And now, my dear, adieu ! I have done more than I expected, and begin to feel myself exhausted with so much scribbling at the end of four hours' close application to study."¹

"April 5, 1784.

"MY DEAR WILLIAM.—The hat which I desired you to procure for me, I now write to desire that you will not procure. Do not hastily infer that I mean to go about bareheaded, the whole of the matter is, that a readier method of supply has presented itself since I wrote.

"I thanked you in my last for Johnson; I now thank you, with more emphasis, for Beattie, the most agreeable and amiable writer I ever met with, the only author I have seen whose critical and philosophical researches are diversified and embellished by a poetical imagination, that makes even the driest subject, and the leanest, a feast for an epicure in books. He is so much at his ease, too, that his own character appears in every page, and which is very rare, we see not only the writer but the man, and that man so gentle, so well-tempered, so happy in his religion, and so humane in his philosophy, that it is necessary to love him, if one has the least sense of what is lovely. If you have not his poem called The Minstrel, and cannot borrow it, I must beg you to buy it for me, for though I cannot afford to deal largely in so expensive a commodity as books, I must afford to purchase at least the poetical works of Beattie.

"I have read six of Blair's Lectures, and what do I say of Blair? That he is a sensible man, master of his subject, and excepting here and there a Scottishism, a good writer, so far at least as perspicuity of expression, and method, contribute to make one. But oh, the sterility of that man's fancy! if indeed he has any such faculty belonging to him. Perhaps philosophers, or men designed for such, are sometimes born without one, or perhaps it withers for want of exercise. However that may be, Doctor Blair has such a brain as Shakespeare somewhere describes as 'dry as the remainder biscuit after a voyage'."²

GEORGE CRABBE—of whom Thomas Moore, the Irish poet, wrote

"True bard! and simple as the race Of true-born poets ever are"—

was born in 1754, and brought up among the simple fisher-folk of the village of Aldborough in Suffolk, his father, a by no means gentle parent, being a collector of salt dues.

During his apprenticeship to a surgeon, he won a magazine prize for his poem Hope, which turned him towards literature as a profession. Coming to London, he was nearer starvation than fame, when Edmund Burke acted the part of good Samaritan, and succeeded in getting his poem The Library published by Dodsley in 1781, which was favourably noticed. Acting also on Burke's advice, he took Orders in 1783, his first curacy being in his native village; several livings were then offered to the man who was making a name for himself. Eventually he settled at Trowbridge, where he wrote Tales of the Hall (1818-1819) for which Murray the publisher gave him £3000, to include also the unexpired copyrights of his other poems. In 1822 he journeyed to Edinburgh to visit Sir Walter Scott, and shortly after his return he fell into ill-health and died in 1832.

Beloved by the poor wherever he went, it is said that he "would put off a meditated journey rather than leave a poor parsonage who required his services . . . no sympathy was like his."

The Village was published in 1783, The Parish Register in 1803, and The Borough in 1810.

¹ Extract from letter to Lady Hesketh.

² From a letter to Rev. William Unwin.

Horace Smith's well-known epithet concerning Crabbe, "A Pope in worsted stockings," is no bad label; always presuming that dicta of that kind are never more than rough-and-ready criticisms. His frequent excursions with the couplet of Pope, his predilection for the epigrammatic line, in which he sums up neatly a place, character, or person, certainly savours of the Twickenham wit. But with far less polish and dexterity of phrase, he transcends him immeasurably in passion and sincerity.

His own early hardships never embittered him, but they give his pictures of rural life a stern realism, a grim unloveliness, that while they occasionally depress and sometimes fatigued, never lack in interest. Whether in painting English life or English scenery, his method is the same, neither sentimental nor picturesque, but always interesting from its sincerity and minute accuracy. There is no conventional Arcadia of Strephons and Chloes, with their unreal sentimental vagaries, not even the idealised Arcadia of his greater contemporary, Wordsworth; but a kind of Arcadian Underworld, full of sordid tragedies and ugly passions, yet lifted by the moral enthusiasm and humanity of the poet into a moving and arresting tale. There is, moreover, nothing of the pensive sweetness and soothing beauty of Cowper's natural descriptions, but a marked preference for the uncouth side of Nature; just as, when treating human nature, he is more concerned with briars than roses, with weeds than blossoms, with barren waste than fertile meadows, yet investing them with an original force of minute description that compels our admiration.

In an era when poets were hotly in love with Nature, he keeps a cool affection, yet none could describe the outer show of things more truthfully and intimately; and while shrinking from the French Revolution as emphatically as Burke, and as surely as Cowper, no poet has a wider sympathy with his kind than he, or more stuff of humanity in his writings.

GIPSIES

On either side

In level fen, a prospect wild and wide,
With dikes on either hand by ocean's self supplied;
Far on the right the distant sea is seen,
And salt the springs that feed the marsh between;
Beneath an ancient bridge the straitened flood
Rolls through its sloping banks of slummy mud;
Near it a sunken boat resists the tide,
That frets and hurries to th' opposing side,
The rushes sharp, that on the borders grow,
Bend their brown flow'rets to the stream below,
Impure in all its course, in all its progress slow
Here a grave Flora scarcely deigns to bloom,
Nor wears a rosy blush, nor sheds perfume.
The few dull flowers that o'er the place are spread
Partake the nature of their fenny bed
Here on its wry stem, in rigid bloom,
Grows the salt lavender that lacks perfume;
Here the dwarf shallows creep the sepioid harsh,
And the soft slummy mallow of the marsh;
Low on the ear the distant billows sound,
And just in view appears their stony bound;
No hedge nor tree conceals the glowing sun;
Birds, save a wat'ry tribe, the district shun
Nor chirp among the reeds where bitter waters run . . .
Again, the country was enclosed, a wide
And sandy road has banks on either side.

Where, lo ! a hollow on the left appeared,
 And there a gipsy tribe their tent had reared ;
 'Twas open spread, to catch the morning sun,
 And they had now their early meal begun
 When two brown boys just left their grassy seat,
 The early traveller with their prayers to greet :
 While yet Orlando held his pence in hand,
 He saw their sister on her duty stand :
 Some twelve years old, demure, affected, sly,
 Prepared the force of early powers to try .
 Sudden a look of languor he descries,
 And well-feigned apprehension in her eyes ;
 Trained but yet savage, in her speaking face
 He marked the features of her vagrant race
 When a light laugh and roguish leer expressed
 The vice implanted in her youthful breast .
 Forth from the tent her elder brother came,
 Who seemed offended, yet forbore to blame
 The young designer, but could only trace
 The looks of pity in the traveller's face
 Within, the father, who from fences nigh
 Had brought the fuel for the fire's supply,
 Watched now the feeble blazo, and stood dejected by.
 On ragged rug, just borrowed from the bed,
 And by the hand of coarse indulgence fed,
 In dirty patchwork negligently dressed,
 Reclined the wife, an infant at her breast ,
 In her wild face some touch of grace remained,
 Of vigour palmed and of beauty stained ,
 Her bloodshot eyes on her unheeding mate
 Were wrathful turned, and seemed her wants to state.
 Cursing his tardy aid—her mother there
 With gipsy state engrossed the only chair ,
 Solemn and dull her look , with such she stands,
 And reads the milk-maid's fortune in her hands,
 Tracing the lines of life , assumed through years,
 Each feature now the steady falsehood wears
 With hard and savage eye she views the food,
 And grudging pinches their intruding brood .
 Last in the group, the worn-out grandsire sits
 Neglected, lost, and living but by fits
 Useless, despised, his worthless labours done,
 And half protected by the vicious son,
 Who half supports him , he with heavy glance
 Views the young ruffians who around him dance ;
 And, by the sadness in his face, appears
 To trace the progress of their future years ,
 Through what strange course of misery, vice, deceit,
 Must wildly wander each unpractised cheat !

What shame and grief, what punishment and pain,
 Sport of fierce passions, must each child sustain—
 Ere they like him approach their latter end,
 Without a hope, a comfort, or a friend !¹

SKETCHES OF AUTUMN

It was a fair and mild Autumnal sky,
 And earth's ripe treasures met th' admiring eye,
 As a rich beauty, when her bloom is lost,
 Appears with more magnificence and cost .
 The wet and heavy grass, where feet had strayed,
 Not yet erect, the wanderer's way betrayed ,
 Showers of the night had swelled the deepening rill.
 The morning breeze had urged the quickening mill ;
 Assembled rooks had winged their seaward flight,
 By the same passage to return at night,
 While proudly o'er them hung the steady kite,
 Then turned him back, and left the noisy throng,
 Nor deigned to know them as he sailed along
 Long yellow leaves, from osiers, strewed around,
 Choked the small stream, and hushed the feeble sound .
 While the dead foliage dropped from loftier trees ,
 Our squire beheld not with his wonted ease ,
 But to his own reflections made reply,
 And said aloud, " Yes ! doubtless we must die " .
 " We must," said Richard , " and we would not live
 To feel what dotage and decay will give ,
 But we yet taste whatever we behold,
 The morn is lovely, though the air is cold ;
 There is delicious quiet in this scene,
 At once so rich, so varied, so serene ;
 Sounds to delight us—each discordant tone
 Thus mingled please, that fail to please alone ;
 This hollow wind, this rustling of the brook,
 The farm-yard noise, the woodman at yon oak—
 See, the axe falls—now listen to the stroke !
 That gun itself, that murders all this peace,
 Adds to the charm, because it soon must cease " .²

" Cold grew the foggy morn, the day was brief,
 Loose on the cherry hung the crimson leaf,
 The dew dwelt ever on the herb , the wood³
 Roared with strong blasts, with mighty showers the floods .
 All green was vanished, save of pine and yew,
 That still displayed their melancholy hue ,
 Save the green holly with its berries red,
 And the green moss that o'er the gravel spread " .⁴

II. PROSE (a) Dr Johnson and Oliver Goldsmith.

(a) DR. JOHNSON AND OLIVER GOLDSMITH

SAMUEL JOHNSON (1709-1784)

FOR nearly fifty years after the death of Pope, Johnson was the dominant figure in the literary life of the day . In his person he seemed at once an expression and a criticism of current social and ethical ideals . There is scarcely any phase of the life of his times, which he does not touch with his forceful personality

The son of a poor bookseller in Lichfield, he came up to London with twopenno halfpenny in his pocket and a fragment of a play—little to aid him in his literary ambition, but fortunately he brought also an indomitable will and great power of endurance

The Johnson who lives for us to-day in the pages of Boswell is the successful Johnson, the literary dictator upon whose words everybody hung , the man who puts aside the author's craft with unmistakable satisfaction, now that poverty could no more dog his footsteps. But it is hard to read aright the greatness or the weakness of the man unless we recall his early agonies in Grub Street.

Suffering hardens some natures, drying up the fount of pity and compassion . It intensified, in Johnson's case, the man's amazing tenderness of heart and deep-grained humanity , here it is that Johnson so far excels men like Addison and Pope. Addison's nature was sweeter and sounder than his rival's—graciousness, kindness, and urbanity are certainly to be found in him . What one misses is that " divine discontent," that riotous goodness of heart, that prodigal tenderness, which remain in our memories long after the roughnesses of Johnson are forgotten

Dickens could never recall his youthful hardships save with fierce indignation ; indelibly had his early sufferings seared his imagination , and Johnson would burst into tears when reminded of his dark days . One can well understand the meaning of his outburst . " No man but a blockhead ever wrote except for money"; and the intense relief with which he relinquished his pen. Boswell once expressed his wonder that Johnson had not more pleasure in writing than in not writing "Sir," replied the irascible idol, "You may wonder."

Johnson started by writing for the Gentleman's Magazine, essays and reviews and a kind of parliamentary lotter, where he took care "that the Whig dogs should not have the best of it."

What first attracted attention to him was his poem of London, published in 1738, written in the vein of Juvenal. This brought him ten guineas and the commendation of men like Pope, but little change in his general financial condition.

In 1744 appeared the life of his friend Richard Savage, a fine piece of biographical writing, despite of its occasional unreliability. The success of this led to his being commissioned to prepare a Dictionary of the English Language, a work that occupied seven years. Johnson had little philological knowledge, but he had a rich endowment of humour and sententious wisdom, and some of his definitions it would be hard to better from this standpoint. Occasionally his pet prejudices flaunt themselves rather freely, as in the unkind definition of oats as "a grain which in England is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people."

While he was plodding through this formidable task, he sought distraction in other matters. In 1749 appeared the Vanity of Human Wishes, à la Juvenal, while Garrick brought out the tragedy of Irene, which was partly written before he had come up to London.

The play, though not successful, filled his impoverished exchequer by nearly £300.

Having essayed verse, dictionary making, and the drama, Johnson turned to the essay, which was so popular a literary vehicle in his time.

The Rambler started its wanderings in the spring of 1750, and ran for two years. With the exception of a few contributions from Richardson, everything came freshly minted from the Doctor's mind.

The uniformity of style would have mattered less had Johnson not assumed so heavy and pedantic a manner. His later venture, The Idler, certainly drags its wheels less cumbrously, but in neither of these periodicals is Johnson seen at his best.

Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia (1759) proved vastly more to the public taste. Although rarely read to-day, it is a curious and interesting book, tedious at times in Johnson's most elephantine style, but with flashes of happy description, and a good deal of sound moralising on a variety of subjects.

After 1762 Johnson's skies cleared. A pension of £300 relieved him from the constant fear of poverty that had haunted him all these years, and his mind ripened and brightened under this sunnier fortune. The famous "Literary Club" was established in 1704, to which Burke, Goldsmith, Garrick, Gibbon, and Reynolds belonged. Here Johnson reigned as dictator, but glad and relieved as he was to relinquish the pen for the tongue, yet the glamour of Fleet Street and Covent Garden held him, as it held Lamb and Leigh Hunt a generation later, and neither of the latter had the same reason to shrink from their mistress as he had. Yet the worse she ill-treated him the more he loved her. Boswell was soon as orthodox as his master; discipleship was no hard matter with him. "Is not this very fine?" inquired the sage as they promenaded in Greenwich Park. "Yes, sir," replied Boswell, "but not equal to Fleet Street!"—then added unblushingly that a baronet from Rydal (assuredly no progenitor of Wordsworth) had declared the "fragrance of a May evening in the country to be all very well, but that he preferred the smell of a flambeau at the playhouse." On another occasion Boswell praised the cheerfulness of Fleet Street. "Why, sir," said Johnson, "Fleet Street has a very animated appearance, but I think that the full tide of human existence is at Charing Cross." An amusing story then followed of a tallow-chandler who had made a fortune in London, and was foolish enough to retire to the country. He grew so weary of his sylvan retreat that he begged to know the melting days of his successor, that he might be present at the operation.

Johnson's associations with Fleet Street wore many, first living in Fetter Lane, then in Boswell Court, in Gough Square, after that, in the Inner Temple Lane, in Johnson Lane; finally in Bolt Court.

When first he came to town he lodged at the house of Mr Morris, a staymaker in Exeter Street; dining at the "Pine Apple" in New Street, "for eightpence, with very good company." "I had," said Johnson, "a cut of meat for sixpence, and bread for a penny, and gave the waiter a penny." On clean shirt days, remarked his biographer significantly, he went abroad and paid visits.

At twelve o'clock, we are told (this would apply to the prosperous years of literary dictatorship), he received a levée of morning visitors in his bedroom—Goldsmith and others, chiefly men of letters, and to whom he would declaim over a twelve-o'clock dish of tea. He then went to dinner at a tavern, most frequently the Mitre Tavern, where he commonly stayed late, and afterwards drank his tea at a friend's house, over which he loitered a great deal, but seldom took supper. He frequently gave all the silver in his pocket to the poor, who watched him between his house and the tavern where he dined.

Johnson had not eschewed altogether the author's craft, indeed his best work was yet to come; but his literary output at no time ever gave a commensurate idea of the greatness of the man. His Shakespearean criticism reveals more of the author's limitations than the greatness of its subject. The Journey to the Western Isles of Scotland is certainly amusing, though largely as a piece of self-revelation. His most considerable production, The Lives of the Poets (1779-1781), despite its incompleteness and occasionally glaring insensibilities, as in his treatment of Gray and Milton, contains some admirable critical appreciations.

In 1775 he had received his doctor's degree from Oxford, and was at the height of his popularity and influence. But the indifferent health that had dogged him all his life now began to make more encroachments. When, during the last year or so, he was without the society of his friend Mrs. Thrale, his spirits declined and his health grew rapidly worse.

But he had many faithful friends, including Burke and Reynolds, who tried to make his last days easy, and irascible and impatient as Johnson had been during his life, he showed singular endurance and resignation during his fatal illness. On December 13, 1784, he died, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

JAMES BOSWELL (1740-1796), was born at Edinburgh, his father being an able advocate at the Scottish bar and an uncompromising Presbyterian Whig. James we hear was "a fine boy, wore a white cockade, and prayed for King James until his Uncle Cochrane gave him a shilling to pray for King George, which he accordingly did." This accommodating youth studied law for a while, somewhat reluctantly, philosophy and rhetoric perhaps less reluctantly, and the mild Bohemian life of Edinburgh, with no reluctance whatever. Coming up to London in 1780, he found even pleasanter distractions to legal studies than he had done in Scotland, and despite an excursion into verse, The Cuck at Newmarket, showed no marked propensity for either the letters or law. Then, happily both for himself and posterity, "Tom Davies," in Goldsmith's words, "flung him at Johnson in sport," and he found his true vocation. "Who is this Scotch cur at Johnson's heels?" asked someone of Goldsmith. "He is not a cur, he is only a bur," was the happy response. Indeed, had it not been for the "bur," how little we might know of the man Johnson to-day!

The Doctor did not take kindly to his enthusiastic worshipper at first, but very soon they became great friends and remained so for life, despite the natural irascibility of the idol at times. "Sir, you appear to have only two subjects: yourself and me, and I am sick of both."

No man of letters was ever more naïve than Boswell; here he transcends even Pepys, yet his naïveté, his stupidities, drew out the gruff Doctor as no intellectual cunning could have done. And if Boswell stands revealed as a somewhat contemptible and certainly foolish personage in the pages of the biography, yet he cannot be written down as a fool. He had a wonderful memory, and a natural instinct for presenting his material dramatically and vividly. No more fool could have written the Life of Samuel Johnson: he was a fool of genius, for the biography is one of the great biographies of literature.

Johnson's Work and Influence

Johnson never wrote better than when under the influence of some powerful human emotion. When his inspiration is wholly literary, he is apt to grow pompous and pedantic with alarming speed; when, however, some human concern projects itself into his work, then he shakes off his stiffness and writes with force and dignity.

Take, for instance, his notable letter to Lord Chesterfield, in 1755.

MY LORD—I have been lately informed by the proprietor of the World, that two papers, in which my Dictionary is recommended to the public, were written by your lordship. To be so distinguished is an honour, which, being very little accustomed to favours from the great, I know not well how to receive, or in what terms to acknowledge.

When, upon some slight encouragement, I first visited your lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of mankind, by the enchantment of your address, and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre—that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending, but I found my attendance so little encouraged that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your lordship in public, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing which a retired and uncourtly scholar can possess. I had done all that I could, and no man is pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little.

Seven years, my lord, have now passed since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door, during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it at last to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favour. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a patron before.

The shepherd in Virgil grew at last acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks.

Is not a patron, my lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water, and when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind, but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it, till I am solitary, and cannot impart it, till I am known, and do not want it. I hope it is no very cynical asperity not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the public should consider me as owing that to a patron which Providence has enabled me to do for myself.

Having carried on my work thus far with so little obligation to any favour of learning, I shall not be disappointed though I should conclude it if less be possible, with less, for I have been long awakened from that dream of hope in which I once boasted myself with so much exultation, my lord.—Your lordship's most humble, most obedient servant, SAM JOHNSON.

In his Life of Savage, his criticism of Pope and Dryden, his picture of Life in the Happy Valley in Rasselas, Johnson touches on some chord of memory or peculiar mental affinity, that bares him for us at his best and finest.

Johnson, however, lives for most of us in the pages of Boswell, rather than in his own writings; and for this reason. Clearly as some of his characteristics reveal themselves to us in his work, he found the freest self-expression in talk. He had a craggy mind that kept in admirable condition when rubbed against other minds. And no mind was better calculated to educe its sharp and solid qualities of craginess so well as Boswell's. Boswell's pages exhibit the splendid inconsistencies of the man, his elephantine prejudices and conventionalities, and the equally colossal breadth of his moral sympathies; his dense stupidity on some points, such as the value of public executions, and his amazing good sense on others; his mingled melancholy and cheerfulness, his intellectual timidity and unconquerable courage. Give him a pen and he tried to strike a compromise between them, to be judicial, which Nature had taken good care he should never be; hear him talk, and you found the tonic of his fundamental common-sense behind his most monstrous extravagances.

This, however, does not mean that his writings are negligible. It only means that they are of secondary account and are best studied after Boswell. By interpreting him first of all through Boswell's pages, we shall best value the sturdy humour and sagacity that lie embedded in the Dictionary, the flashes of insight that illuminate the prolix Lives of the Poets, and the touches of tenderness and poetry that light up the often dismal moralisings of Rasselas.

"Every man," said Imlac, "may, by examining his own mind, guess what passes in the minds of others: when you feel that your own gaiety is counterfeit, it may justly lead you to suspect that of your companions not to be sincere. Envy is commonly reciprocal. We are long before we are convinced that happiness is never to be found, and each believes it possessed by others, to keep alive the hope of obtaining it for himself. In the assembly, where you passed the last night, there appeared such sprightliness of air, and volatility of fancy, as might have suited beings of a higher order, formed to inhabit serener regions, inaccessible to care or sorrow: yet, believe me, prince, there was not one who did not dread the moment when solitude should deliver him to the tyranny of reflection."

"This," said the prince, "may be true of others since it is true of me, yet, whatever be the general infelicity of man, one condition is more happy than another, and wisdom surely directs us to take the least evil in the choice of life."

"The causes of good and evil," answered Imlac, "are so various and uncertain, so often entangled with each other, so diversified by various relations, and so much subject to accidents which cannot be foreseen, that he who would fix his condition upon incontestable reasons of preference must live and die inquiring and deliberating."

"But surely," said Rasselas, "the wise men, to whom we listen with reverence and wonder, chose that mode of life for themselves which they thought most likely to make them happy."

"Very few," said the poet, "live by choice."¹

"That affluence and power, advantages extrinsic and adventitious, and therefore easily separable from those by whom they are possessed, should very often flatter the mind with expectations of felicity which they cannot give, raises no astonishment, but it seems rational to hope that intellectual greatness should produce better effects, that minds qualified for great attainments should first endeavour their own benefit, and that they who are most able to teach others the way to happiness, should with most certainty follow it themselves."

"But this expectation, however plausible, has been very frequently disappointed. The heroes of literary as well as civil history have been very often no less remarkable for what they have suffered, than for what they have achieved, and volumes have been written only to enumerate the miseries of the learned, and relate their unhappy lives and untimely deaths."²

VANITY OF HUMAN WISHES

Let Observation, with extensive view,
Survey mankind from China to Peru;
Remark each anxious toil, each eager strife,
And watch the busy scenes of crowded life;
Then say, how hope and fear, desire and hate,
O'erspread with snares the clouded maze of fate,
Where wavering man, betray'd by vent'rous pride
To tread the dreary paths without a guide,
As treacherous phantoms in the mist delude,
Shuns fancied ills, or chases airy good;
How rarely reason guides the stubborn choice,
Rules the bold hand, or prompts the suppliant voice;

¹ Rasselas

² The Life of Richard Savage.

How nations sunk, by daring schemes oppress'd,
When Vengeance listens to the fool's request,
Fate wings with every wish th' afflictive dart,
Each gift of nature, and each grace of art,
With fatal heat impetuous courage glows,
With fatal sweetness elocution flows,
Impeachment stops the speaker's powerful breath,
And restless fire precipitates on death.

But, scarce observed, the knowing and the bold
Fall in the general massacre of gold,
Wide wasting pest! that rages unconfin'd,
And crowds with crimes the records of mankind:
For gold his sword the hireling ruffian draws,
For gold the hireling judge distorts the laws,
Wealth heap'd on wealth nor truth nor safety buys,
The dangers gather as the treasures rise.

Let history tell, where rival kings conmaud,
And dubious title shakes the madd'd land,
When statutes glean the refuse of the sword,
How much more safe the vassal than the lord,
Low skulks the hind beneath the rago of power,
And leaves the wealthy traitor in the Tower,
Untouch'd his cottage, and his slumbers sound,
Though Confiscation's vultures hover round.

The needy traveller, serene and gay,
Walks the wild heath, and sings his toil away
Does envy seize thee? crush th' uprading joy:
Increase his riches, and his peace destroy!

Now fears in dire vicissitude invade,
The rustling brake alarms, and quivering shade;
Nor light nor darkness brings his pain relief,
One shows the plunder, and one hides the thief.

Yet still one general cry the skies assails,
And 'gan the grandeur load the tainted gale,
Few know the toiling statesman's fear or care,
Th' insidious rival and the gaping heir.

Once more, Democritus, arise on earth,
With cheerful wisdom and instructive mirth,
See motley life in modern trappings dress'd,
And feed with varied fools th' eternal jest.
Thou who could'st laugh where want enchained caprice,
Toil crush'd conceit, and man was of a piece,
Where wealth, unloved, without a mourner died,
And scarce a sycophant was fed by pride.

Where ne'er was known the foam of mock debate,
Or seen a new made mayor's unwieldy state,
Where change of favourites made no change of laws,
And senates heard before they judg'd a cause,
How wouldst thou shake at Britain's modish tribe,
Dart the quick taunt, and edge the piercing gibe!
Attentive truth and nature to descry,
And pierce each scene with philosophic eye,
To thee were solemn toys, or empty show,
The robes of pleasure and the veils of woe
All aid the farce and all thy mirth maintain,
Whose joys are causeless, and whose griefs are vain.

Such was the scorn that fill'd the sage's mind,
Rous'd at every glance on human kind;
How just that scorn ere yet thy voice declare,
Search every state, and canvass every prayer.

Unnumber'd suppliant's crowd Preferment's gate,
Athrurst for wealth, and burning to be great,
Delusive Fortune hears th' incessant call,
They mount, they shine, evaporate, and fall
On every stage the foes of peace attend,
Hate dogs their flight, and insult mocks their end.
Love ends with hope, the sinking statesman's door
Pours in the morning worshipper no more,
For growing names the weekly scribbler lies,
To growing wealth the dedicat'or flies,
From every room descends the painted face,
That hung the bright palladium of the place;
And, smoked, in kitchens, or in auctions sold,
To better features yields the frame of gold;
For now no more we trace in every line
Heroic worth, benevolence divine;
The form distorted justifies the fall,
And detestation rids th' indignant wall.

But will not Britain hear the last appeal,
Sign her foes' doom, or guard her favourites' zeal?

Through Freedom's sons no more remonstrance rings,
 Degraded nobles and controlling kings,
 Our supple tribes repress their patriot throats,
 And ask no questions but the price of votes;
 With weekly libels and septennial ale,
 Their wish is full to riot and to rail.

In full-blown dignity, see Wolsey stand,
 Law in his voice, and fortune in his hand:
 To him the church, the realm, their powers consign,
 Through him the rays of regal bounty shine,
 Turn'd by his nod the stream of honour flows,
 His smile alone security bestows.
 Still to now heights his restless wishes tower,
 Claim leads to claim, and power advances power
 Till conquest unresisted ceased to please,
 And rights, submitted, left him none to seize
 At length his sovereign frowns—the train of state
 Mark the keen glance, and watch the sign to hate

LIVES OF THE POETS

In acquired knowledge, the superiority must be allowed to Dryden, whose education was more scholastic, and who, before he became an author had been allowed more time for study, with better means of information. His mind has a larger range, and he collects his images and illustrations from a more extensive circumstance of science. Dryden knew more of man in his general nature, and Pope in his local manners. The notions of Dryden were formed by comprehensive speculation; and those of Pope by minute attention. There is more dignity in the knowledge of Dryden, and more certainty in that of Pope.

Poetry was not the sole praise of either; for both excelled likewise in prose; but Pope did not borrow his prose from his predecessor. The style of Dryden is capricious and varied, that of Pope is cautious and uniform. Dryden observes the motions of his own mind; Pope constrains his mind to his own rules of composition. Dryden is sometimes vehement and rapid; Pope is always smooth uniform, and gentle. Dryden's page is a natural field, rising into inequalities, and diversified by the varied exuberance of abundant vegetation; Pope's is a velvet lawn, shaven by the scythe, and levelled by the roller.

Of genius, that power which constitutes a poet, that quality without which judgment is cold, and knowledge is inert, that energy which collects, combines, amplifies, and animates, the superiority must, with some hesitation, be allowed to Dryden. It is not to be understood, that of this poetical vigour Pope had only a little, because Dryden had more, for every other writer since Milton must give place to Pope, and even of Dryden it must be said, that, if he has brighter paragraphs, he has not better poems. Dryden's performances were very hasty, either excited by some external occasion, or extorted by domestic necessity, he composed without consideration, and published without correction. What his mind could supply at call, or gather in one excursion, was all that he sought, and all that he gave. The dilatory caution of Pope enabled him to condense his sentiments, to multiply his images, and to accumulate all that study might produce, or chance might supply. If the flights of Dryden, therefore, are higher, Pope continues longer on the wing. If of Dryden's fire the blaze is brighter, of Pope's the heat is more regular and constant. Dryden often surpasses expectation, and Pope never falls below it. Dryden is read with frequent astonishment, and Pope with perpetual delight.

EXTRACTS FROM MRS THRALE'S COLLECTION OF LETTERS

"Those who have loved longest love best. A sudden blaze of kindness may by a single blast of coldness be extinguished, but that fondness which length of time has connected with many circumstances and occasions, though it may for a while be suppressed by disgust or resentment, with or without a cause, is hourly revived by accidental recollection. To those that have lived long together, every thing heard and every thing seen recalls some pleasure communicated, or some benefit conferred, some petty quarrel, or some slight endearment. Esteem of great powers, or amiable qualities newly discovered, may embroider a day or a week, but a friendship of twenty years is interwoven with the texture of life. A friend may be often found and lost, but an old friend never can be found, and nature has provided that he cannot easily be lost."

"Life, to be worthy of a rational being, must be always in progression; we must always purpose to do more or better than in time past. The mind is enlarged and elevated by mere purposes, though they end as they began, by airy contemplation. We compare and judge though we do not practise."

"Of whatsoever we see we always wish to know; always congratulate ourselves when we know that of which we perceive another to be ignorant. Take therefore all opportunities of learning that offer themselves, however remote the matter may be from common life or common conversation. Look in Hensche's telescope, go into a chemist's laboratory, if you see a manufacturer at work, remark his operations. By this activity of attention you will find in every place diversion and improvement."

OLIVER GOLDSMITH (1728-1774)

Oliver Goldsmith was born in County Longford, Ireland, in 1728, of Saxon stock, his father being a "Curate farmer," the Rev. Charles Goldsmith, and his mother the schoolmaster's daughter. The Rev. Charles received £40 a year, "a fortune which he brought five children into the world to share." A good picture of the father is given in The Citizen of the World.

"My father, the younger son of a good family, was possessed of a small living in the Church. His education was above his fortune, and his generosity greater than his education. Poor as he was, he had his flatterers poorer than himself, for every dinner he gave them they returned equivalent in praise, and this was all he wanted. The same ambition that actuates a monarch at the head of an army, influenced my father at the head of his table. He told the story of the ivy-tree, and that was laughed at, he repeated the jest of the two scholars and the one pair of breeches, and the company laughed at that, but the story of Taffy and the sodan chair was sure to set the table in a roar. Thus his pleasures increased in proportion to the pleasure he gave, he loved all the world, and he fancied all the world loved him. As his fortune was but small, he lived up to the very extent of it. He had no intention of leaving his children money, for that was dross, he resolved they should have learning, for learning, he used to observe, was better than silver and gold. For this purpose he undertook to instruct us himself, and took as much pains to form our morals as to improve our understanding. We were told that universal benevolence was what first cemented society, we were taught to consider all the wants of mankind as our own, to regard 'the human face divine' with affection and esteem. He wound us up to be more machines of pity and rendered us incapable of withstanding the slightest impulse made either by real or fictitious distress. In a word, we were perfectly instructed in the arts of giving away thousands, before we were taught the more necessary qualifications of getting a farthing."

Oliver was the fifth child, a slow, ugly, and ungainly boy. At the village school he learned a good deal about ghosts and fables—little else. Later on (1744), at Trinity College, Dublin, he was still unconcerned with learning, though he just managed to take his degree, and his earlier years may be epitomised in one word—failure.

With light-hearted exuberance he tried the Church, the Bar, Medicine, in rapid succession, and showed brilliant incompetence in each. His only real success, perhaps, was his invention of street ballads at five shillings each, and his most poignant delight at this time, hearing them sung under an oil lamp.

His father had died in 1749, and Oliver was cast on his own resources, which were uncommonly tenuous. He started to emigrate to America with thirty pounds, but never sailed, as he was "at a pleasure party" at the time, where he lost all his money—as well as the boat. Then he essayed the Law, and his uncle encouraged him with £50, a sum that was promptly wasted in a Dublin gaming-house. Afterwards, at Edinburgh, he applied himself for a while to chemistry and natural history, then the vagrant spirit seizing him again, he went abroad with a smattering of medical knowledge, twenty pounds, and a flute.

Borrowing money for his journey, he characteristically spent it at the start on a preposterous gift of tulip bulbs for his kindly uncle, then footed it through Flanders, France, and Switzerland, relying on his flute to provide him with supper and bed. Yet he was never really down-hearted, and observed significantly "that he found people sprightly in proportion to their wants, and the poorer, often the sprightlier."

For to tell the truth, he was a genuine vagabond at heart, with that itch of restlessness in the blood that made him an alien to the comfortable jog-trot conventions of civilised life. He was really predestined for poverty, not merely because he found it so hard to make money, but because even having made it he was quite unable to keep it.

His kindness of heart was as great as his improvidence, and one cold night he was found sleeping in the ticking of the bed because he had given his bedclothes to a destitute woman.

On his return from abroad in 1756, he became an usher, a printer's reader (proof reader to Richardson), a reviewer, and a bookseller's hack; and at the age of thirty was living in miserable rooms at Ludgate Lane, "near Break Neck Steps," writing social sketches, making translations, and trying his hand at a history of England. Unreliable and ignorant as he often was in his miscellaneous hack-writing, he was never dull, and very soon the fine originality of the man and his native grace of style showed itself.

But the grinding sordidness of his position is revealed in the grimly humorous lines he wrote of an old friend:

"Here lies poor Ned Purdon from misery freed,
Who long was a book-seller's hack,
He had such a damnable life in this world
I don't think he'll wish to come back."

He started The Bee, a short-lived paper, with a good deal of excellent essay work in it, and wrote The Citizen of the World. The Traveller appeared in 1764, and at this time he was on intimate terms with Johnson's circle.

When in one of his chronic financial crises, Johnson rescued him with a guinea, finding the sheriff's officer in possession. Naturally, Goldsmith spent the guinea on Madeira. Johnson "put the cork into the bottle, desiring he would be calm," Goldsmith then showed him a manuscript—The Vicar of Wakefield. Johnson was struck by its merits, and according to his own account, sold it to a bookseller for £80. "The Vicar" brought him fame—more important than money, for money was never his for long. Following The Vicar of Wakefield came The Good Natured Man, his first play, The Deserted Village, that showed him as a poet of no mean order; and his best comedy, The Stoops to Conquer. Then in 1774 he died, worn out, of a fever, in material squalor and mental misery, but mourned and beloved by many friends.

HIS WRITINGS

Characteristics

(a) Whimsicality.—In Goldsmith's temperament, melancholy and mirth lay cheek by jowl, antagonistic comrades, one would think, but no unusual ones in the spiritual composition of unmagical men. Melancholy was for ever trying to drag him down, and did succeed in making him tongue-tied often and wistful, but careless, happy-go-lucky gaiety broke through all the barriers from time to time, unexpectedly, disconcertingly, the more wild and ebullient for the repression. Often we are reminded of Elia's extravagant jesting, and suspect the extravagance to be due to the same cause—the physical necessity for ridding himself of the gloomy vapours that threaten to darken the mind. Certainly this absurdity might well have been uttered by Lamb: "Every young fellow should love gravy—a glutton once disinherited his nephew because he disliked gravy."

Indeed, his quaint whimsicality, passing unexpectedly from delicate fancy to elfish merriment, anticipates in many ways the methods of Elia and Leigh Hunt. His prose writing, therefore, is of special interest to the modern student of the Essay. He was a poet of talent, a proseman of genius—a proseman, moreover, of distinctive and original genius. With no scholarly equipment, with little opportunity to indulge his fanciful imagination to the full, working always under heavy disabilities, he has none the less a native instinct for the sweet and gracious things of life, and a clear, lumpid, delicate style for expressing this.

Take, for instance, this passage from one of his early Essays:

"It was a fine saying of Nangfu, the emperor, who, being told that his enemies had raised an insurrection in one of his distant provinces, 'Come, then, my friends,' said he, 'follow me and I promise you that we shall quickly destroy them.' He marched forward and the rebels submitted upon his approach. All now thought that he would take the most signal revenge, but were surprised to see the captives treated with mildness and humanity. 'How,' cried his first minister, 'is this the manner in which you fulfil your promise?' Your royal word was given that your enemies should be destroyed, and, behold! you have pardoned all and even caressed some.' 'I promised,' replied the emperor with a generous air, 'to destroy my enemies. I have fulfilled my word, for see, they are enemies no longer. I have made friends of them.'

"Thus, could it always succeed, were the true method of destroying the enemies of the state. Well it were if rewards and mercy alone could regulate the commonwealth, but since punishments are sometimes necessary, let them at least be rendered terrible by being executed but seldom, and let Justice lift her sword rather to terrify than revenge."

Consider, moreover, those inimitable touches that make of The Vicar of Wakefield—a thin, unsatisfactory story, judged strictly as a piece of fiction—one of the classics. When we think of this book, memory lingers less upon the artless plot, or even the central figure of the genial, kind-hearted Vicar than upon the cousins "even to the fourteenth remove" who came to eat his dinners and borrow his books, of the wife who had made of pickles and preserving a fine art and discourses at dinner on the history of every dish, of Moses disposing of the pony for a gross of groen spectacles. The moral qualities of Primrose attract us far less than do his foibles, his peculiar method of cheering his wife by writing her epitaph and putting it up over the mantelpiece.

How admirable are such descriptive passages as those:

"Our little habitation was situated at the foot of a sloping hill, sheltered with a beautiful underwood behind, and a prattling river before, on one side a meadow, on the other a green. One storey covered with thatch, which gave it an air of great snugness, the walls on the inside were nicely whitewashed. . . though the same room served for parlour and kitchen. . . that only made it the warmer. Besides, as it was kept with the utmost neatness, the dishes, plates and copper, being well scoured, all disposed in bright rows on the shelves, the eye was agreeably relieved, and did not want richer furniture."

(b) His Tenderness—Allied with the whimsicality is a tenderness of heart that found also fine expression in his work. His sentimentality is equal to the best in Richardson and Sterne, and is cleaner and saner. For his sense of humour never allows him to become mawkish.

"I remember," says George Colman, in his Random Records, "when I was a child of five, Goldsmith taking me on his knee to amuse me when I rewarded him with a spiteful blow given with all my force in his face. My father for punishment locked me up in a dark room, where I howled and kicked the door—till it opened, and Goldsmith entered, smiling, with a candle, which showed the mark of the spiteful blow still in his face. Setting the candle down, he took me in his arms and kissed and soothed and fondled me while I sulked and sobbed. When at last the sobs ceased, Goldsmith seized the propitious moment, he went down on all fours, and placing three hats, which happened to be in the room, upon the carpet, and putting a shilling under each, he began to conjure all three under a single hat to my utter amazement. Henceforth, whenever Goldsmith called I rushed to him for a romp, and we became the merriest and most loving play-fellows."

It has been well said of him that Charity was his one luxury. Nor with all the buffetings he suffered from Fate was he ever spiteful—this, too, in an age when bitter things were flung about so readily by the humorist of the day. Did not Sam Rogers say: "I have a very weak voice and if I did not say ill-natured things, no one would hear me."

Yet he was fully alive to the defects of his companions and friends, but when he touches on them, does so lightly, gracefully, tenderly, with no particle of malice. "Dr. Johnson, if you were to make little fishes talk they would talk like whales."

Here is his estimate of Edmund Burke, the famous politician:

"Here lies our good Edmund, whose genius was such,
We scarcely can praise it or blame it too much;
Who, born for the universe, narrowed his mind,
And to party gave up what was meant for mankind.
Though fraught with all learning, still straining his throat
To persuade Tommy Townsend to give him the vote,
Who, too deep for his hearers, still went on refining,
And thought of convincing, while they thought of dining
Though equal to all things, for all things unfit,
Too nice for a statesman, too proud for a wit;
For a patriot too cool, for a drudge disobedient;
A little fond of the night to ruminate the expedient

His tenderness invades his verse, which, if never great, rarely fails in charm and humanity:

"His ready smile a parent's warmth expressed,
Their welfare pleased him and their cares distressed.
To them his heart, his love, his griefs were given,
But all his serious thoughts had rest in heaven;
As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale and midway leaves the storm,
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

Easy-going and good-hearted to a fault as he was, he could be inflexible as steel where principles were concerned.

Parson Scott offered to pay him handsomely if he would write up the Government of the day. Goldsmith refused, he was content to do without, and so, said Scott in a phrase that lit up the grit of the needy "Noll," "I left him in his garret." And this is the man who was the ready dupe of knaves, yet despite their meannesses remained unsoured, unspoiled, wilfully generous to the last.

What Goldsmith did for Literature, whether in prose, verso, or drama, was to sweeten and purify it from its violence, coarseness, and bitter wit. If he has not the great driving force of Swift and Defoe, the exquisite polish of Pope, the dominating personality of Johnson, or the grasp of character and brilliant diversity of some of his great contemporaries of fiction, he has qualities especially his own, a tranquil magic, a tender homeliness, a light indescent humour that will ever endear him to posterity.

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD

The temporal concerns of our family were chiefly committed to my wife's management, as to the spiritual, I took them entirely under my own direction. The profits of my living, which amounted to about thirty-five pounds a year, I made over to the orphans and widows of the clergy of our diocese; for, having a sufficient fortune of my own, I was careless of temporalties, and felt a secret pleasure in doing my duty without reward. I also set a resolution of keeping no curate, and of being acquainted with every man in the parish, exhorting the married men to temperance and the bachelors to matrimony, so that in a few years it was a common saying, that there were three strange wants in Wakefield—a person wanting pride, young men wanting wives, and alehouses wanting customers.

Matrimony was always one of my favourite topics, and I wrote several sermons to prove its happiness; but there was a peculiar tenet which I made a point of supporting: for I maintained, with Whiston, that it was unlawful for a priest of the Church of England, after the death of his first wife, to take a second; or, to express it in one word, I valued myself upon being a strict monogamist.

I was early initiated into this important dispute, on which so many laborious volumes have been written. I published some tracts upon the subject myself, which, as they never sold, I have the consolation of thinking were read only by a happy few. Some of my friends called this my weak side; but, alas! they had not, like me, made it the subject of long contemplation. The more I reflected upon it, the more important it appeared. I even went a step beyond Whiston in displaying my principles as he had engraven upon his wife's tomb that she was the only wife of William Whiston, so I wrote a similar epitaph for my wife, though still living, in which I extolled her prudence, economy, and obedience till death, and, having got it copied fair, with an elegant frame, it was placed over the chimney-piece, where it answered several very useful purposes. It admonished my wife of her duty to me, and my fidelity to her, it inspired her with a passion for fame, and constantly put her in mind of her end.

II. PROSE: (b) THE GREAT NOVELISTS—(1) SAMUEL RICHARDSON.

SAMUEL RICHARDSON (1689-1761)

A FAT, tubby, mild-looking, smooth-cheeked, ruddy-faced, little man, guiltless of any external graces; this is the man who became the idol of his day, during the earlier years of the eighteenth century—one who moved in a little crowd of female worshippers, eager to render him the constant tribute of their tears.

Nor was it merely in the matter of an unexciting exterior; his qualities of disposition were assuredly not those that capture the fancy, a rigid moralist in a day when loose living was the rule rather than the exception; a loyal abstainer in an age when it was considered almost a point of etiquette to round off your dinner on the floor; a vegetarian when dietary reform was looked on as a dangerous form of mental affliction. If we turn from this general view of his personality and recall his history, we shall see how entirely it harmonises with the man as we know him.

Born in 1689, in Derbyshire, the son of a London joiner, he was at first destined for Holy Orders, but not obtaining the necessary advantages of a good education, he was apprenticed at the age of seventeen to an Aldersgate printer, John Wido. Earnest and plodding from his early years, he applied himself to his work like one of the good little boys in his own didactic fictions, and like Hogarth's "Industrious Apprentice" married his master's daughter, becoming a master printer himself in 1719.

The exciting diversion of making indices and writing dedications, varied his professional work. He wrote a few novels, made money, took to himself a "country house" at Fulham, became printer of the Journals of the House of Commons, Master of the Stationers' Company, and Law Printer to the King. Then, in the odour of respectability, he died July 4, 1761, being buried in St Bride's Church, Fleet Street, close to his old shop (no longer existent), No. 11 Salisbury Court.

Such a tranquil, matter-of-fact career is singularly unlike what we should expect from the inaugurator of the sentimental novel, and is in striking contrast with that of his predecessor, Defoe, and from the roving spirits who sowed the seeds of the novel in the days of Elizabeth.

Yet a closer inspection of the man reveals the possession of just those qualities as made his work so amazingly compelling in its appeal.

When a boy at school he was dubbed "Serious and Gravity," and was renowned for his moral stories concerning serving men wildly loved by the young ladies of the house, and proffered by them to bold, bad aristocrats. "Let us be moral," said Mr Pecksniff—"Let us contemplate existence." Mr Pecksniff made not the faintest effort to live up to his principles; Richardson did. Otherwise moral tags were meat and drink to both these gentlemen.

Apparently his serious demeanour impressed three young girls, who asked him to write some love-letters for them. We may be sure that the youthful Richardson was most circumspect and thoroughly enjoyed himself over the transaction. It afforded him a good introduction into the ways of femininity.

His wife died in 1731, before he had achieved any literary fame, then came Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded, in 1740, his first fiction and one that scored an instant and signal success. Encouraged by its reception, he issued a volume of Familiar Letters in 1741, the nature of which may be gauged by the following extracts.

This to a young lady on her riding-habit:

"I have been particularly offended at your new riding habit which is made so extravagantly that one cannot easily distinguish your sex by it. You look neither like a modest girl nor an agreeable boy."

Again, on music:

"Much music enervates the mind. What grace is it to sing with the grace of a hired musician?"

Brevity was not characteristic of Richardson, and the full title of Pamela ran thus:

"Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded. In a series of familiar letters from a beautiful young damsel to her parents, now first published in order to cultivate the principles of Virtue and Religion in the minds of the youth of both Sexes. A narrative which has its foundation in Truth and Nature and at the same time that it agreeably entertains by a variety of curious and affecting incidents is entirely divested of all those images, which in too many pieces calculated for Amusement only tend to inflame the minds they should instruct."

The volume sold well from the start, and Pope said of it that it would do more good than many volumes of sermons. At Slough, the blacksmith read the story to the villagers by the forge fire, and so pleased were his audiences by the marriage of the heroine that they insisted on ringing the church bells. The book evoked a stream of correspondence. Richardson's letter bag was always overflowing, and of his letters there are nearly a thousand extant. The interest excited by Pamela was fully sustained by Clarissa Harlowe. Both books had one element in common. Each deals with a matter that has never failed to attract readers of fiction or spectators of melodrama—the picture of a girl struggling against adverse fate. Pamela gives us a young girl in lowly life, pressed by the dishonourable attentions of her employer's son, Clarissa with a girl in better material circumstance, in love with a scapegrace. In neither case is there anything to be said in favour of the gentlemen, but whereas Pamela's affection seems largely a matter of shrewd calculation and worldly wisdom, that of Clarissa, however misguided, is genuine enough.

In both cases we are faced by much the same problem—the struggle between environment and character. Circumstances say—"Do this!" Morality says—"Do that!" Which will prevail? Will the woman succumb to temptation, or prove mistress of her fate?

Pamela solves the problem by insisting on marriage with her good-for-nothing but well-to-do lover. He marries her, thus is Virtue Rewarded. Clarissa holds out against the worthless Lovelace, finally dying of grief, and shaming him by her death into some sense of his blackguardly conduct.

Clarissa is not merely a more attractive character than Pamela, she is more carefully and subtly drawn, and her appeal to the reader's sympathies more comprehensible. The end to Pamela is—bathos; there is real pathos in Clarissa's death. Pamela's lover is a dull lay figure. Lovelace, perhaps, is also a lay figure, but he is not a dull one. If not alive, the puppet, at any rate, is smartly dressed.

So firm an affection did Clarissa rouse in her readers that the veteran Colley Cibber swore "if she should die he would no longer believe in Providence."

But for fulsome compliment, there is nothing to cap the flattery of the "minister of the Gospel" who thought that if some of Clarissa's letters had been found in the Bible they would have been regarded as manifest proofs of divine inspiration.

Richardson's friend, Lady Bradshaw, besought him to reform Lovelace and marry him to Clarissa. The novelist was obdurate. Moralist as he is, he had, happily, some artistic conscience. So poor Lady Bradshaw sobbed piteously over the last harrowing chapters, to the discomfort and annoyance of her husband. What is the meaning, she had asked on one occasion, of the word—Sentiment? Certainly, she ought to have known.

Clarissa was followed by Sir Charles Grandison. Hitherto his chief characters had been women. Someone had persuaded him to try his hand at a model gentleman, and Grandison is the result.

Placed beside that admirable picture of the eighteenth-century courtly knight, Sir Roger de Coverley, his limitations are obvious enough. Coverley is lovable, with his ripe geniality and quaint tenderness. Grandison, eschewing human frailties, succeeds merely in shaping as a dreadful prig. Yet for all that he is no lay figure. He strikes one as the stiff eighteenth-century prototype of the redoubtable Sir Willoughby Pattorne. Meredith drew his man in the spirit of mocking irony; Richardson in the spirit of admiring didacticism. The result is not wholly dissimilar. Each is profoundly self-centred, artificial, and prosy to the core, with many external graces and accomplishments. For this reason probably, he may interest the modern reader, despite his exasperating "uprightness," certainly not in the way intended by Richardson, but because he does, in his way, give us a certain type of man.

Richardson's house in the North End Road, Fulham, was crowded by worshippers at this time, and we have a picture of the plump little author wearing a velvet cap and dressing-gown, with one hand on his heart, the other holding a copy of Grandison, reading aloud to his admirers in the garden.

CHARACTERISTICS

(1) The Sentimental Note—Sentimentality is one of the big stage properties of romance, and because of its almost universal appeal, romance was so dearly loved for many centuries. With the advent of realism into fiction, sentimentality bulked far less prominently. Neither Greene nor Nash discarded it, but the effort to infuse actuality into fiction led necessarily to a method that considered other matters than a constant appeal to the emotions. In Defoe it is at a minimum. He was by temperament neither fanciful nor emotional, and the absence of sentiment in his writings is, from the point of view of the popular novelist, his most notable defect.

Richardson's enormous popularity is due to the fact that he recognised the part played in everyday life by sentiment, and he gave his readers sentiment enough to please the most emotional of them. His deliberate, minute, detailed method enabled him to give the utmost effect to this sentimental note. To-day we are not moved by discursive sentimentalising to a like extent, though even now the sentimental writer may always reckon on a large audience, but in those days when sentiment was tabooed in verse, a generous supply of it in fiction proved especially acceptable. It is a mistake to speak as we sometimes do of the formal, unemotional eighteenth century; it is an estimate based entirely on its leading school of poetry. People at large were fully as prone to sentiment, as fond of sentiment, then as now. Literary fashions may change, but human nature remains pretty constant from century to century; and the absence of sentiment and passion in the verse of the day, merely served to exaggerate its expression in the fiction of the time.

Richardson's method is cumulative. For instance, in Pamela, each letter is rather more harrowing than the one preceding, in Clarissa, each scene more poignant until the climax is reached.

(2) The Characterisation—Some writers, like Defoe, paint their characters with an economy of touches (for Defoe's power of detail is exerted to elucidate his incidents, and the probabilities of his stories, not his personages and their fidelity to life). Others, such as Richardson, build up their characters slowly—touch by touch and line by line, so that they gradually assume a stereoscopic substantiality. We learn about them from their own speeches and behaviour, and from what others say about them. Thus it is that despite the astounding prolixity of the author, he does achieve his purpose, in impressing upon the imagination a story with some real character in it. No doubt there is a good deal that might be spared, trivialities of gossip that do not further any valuable purpose, such as the names of the persons who went in the separate coaches on the occasion of Grandison's wedding, or the exact amount of money that Sir Charles gave to the village girls who decked the pathway with flowers, but he leaves out no detail of importance in filling up the full-length portraits.

This does not imply, of course, that Richardson is uniformly successful in his characterisation. On the contrary, he is remarkably circumscribed. But when he knows his character, he has the art of making us know the character also. Women, with their subtleties and inconsistencies, he can depict with extraordinary skill, and for the first time in the history of English fiction, we have the woman's point of view. This power of portraying women is often seen among the dramatists, especially the Elizabethan ones; but no Elizabethan novelist showed any special faculty in this direction, and Defoe was great enough to realise his limitations here.

Richardson, therefore, is not only our first novelist of character, but our first novelist of feminine character. Pamela may not be the sweet and virtuous maiden Richardson tried to make us think she is, but that is because the conventional moralist in him blinds the author to the significance of those masterly touches by which he himself places the character of this crafty little minx before us. Clarissa also, seen through the prismatic glory of her creator's tears, fails to convince us of her supreme claims to moral excellence, but she certainly does convince us of her reality as a certain type of woman, with her lifelike vacillations, her mingled obstinacy and weakness, and such delightful touches as the tearing of Lovelace's ruffles. In his third novel, Grandison takes the central place, and the women are more sketchily drawn, yet the two girls, Harriet Byron and Clementia, are cleverly differentiated, and are by no means puppets.

Of the men, one must speak with greater reserve. Lovelace has found vigorous defenders, and it may well be true, as Mr Dobson maintains, that Richardson knew the male villain pretty intimately—but intimacy with a scoundrel gives no guarantee of artistic power to depict that scoundrel. My own view is that Richardson's temperament was largely feminine, his standpoint on life almost entirely feminine, and that where he did succeed with his male characters, it was in those feminine aspects that are to be found in men no less than in women.

Lovelace is really a woman's rake tempered by the moralist; Grandison is a woman's "gentleman." Virile humanity was quite beyond Richardson's reach, but the feminine element in man Richardson could always suggest.

(3) Morality.—"There is always something," remarked Dr. Johnson, "which Clarissa preferred to truth." Johnson was a great, though disconcerting, admirer of the novelist, and here he certainly strikes on the real weakness of Richardson's moral outlook. He valued himself upon the morality of his pieces; never relinquished the pulpit attitude, yet the morality when analysed is found to be often little better than discreet opportunism. Pamela, as we have seen, was a designing little madam, and Clarissa, certainly his finest creation, has no vital strength of character or nobility of soul. She is chaste, sensitive, and sympathetic; when we have said that we have said all. She does not belong to the highest type of womanhood.

Yet Richardson not only took himself seriously as a novelist and classed his fictions with such books as Taylor's Holy Living and The Whole Duty of Man, but was esteemed by most of his contemporaries as a profound teacher.

The morality of Richardson is the morality of his age, not salted by a tolerant humour as in Fielding's case, but sentimentalised often to an unhealthy extent. "If you were to read Richardson for the story," said Johnson in an oft-quoted passage, "your impatience would be so much fretted, you would hang yourself." It might well be said to-day that if you read him for his morality you deserved someone else to hang you.

Johnson counselled us to read him for his sentiment. The modern reader would prefer, no doubt, and with good reason, to read him for his power of delineation, and for a literary style that despite its prolixity, and involutions, is yet singularly effective. Given leisure and determination, there is still much pleasure to be derived from Richardson's fictions, and we may comprehend, even if we do not absolutely endorse, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's tribute: "I heartily despise him, and eagerly read him, nay, sob over his work in a most scandalous measure."

HIS HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE AND INFLUENCE

Richardson introduced sentimentality into English fiction and popularised it for ever. Without his influence we might never have had Tristram Shandy; we certainly should have been without Joseph Andrews, and all could we have afforded to lose both these novels. Then the feminine standpoint taken in his writings stirred many able women to continue and amplify the feminine tradition. Fanny Burney and Jane Austen are indebted to him, and a host of lesser names. In France, Rousseau's La Nouvelle Héloïse is frankly inspired by Clarissa, while Diderot grew hysterical in his praise, and in Germany, the sentimental vogue aroused by Richardson culminated in Goethe's Sorrows of Werther.

These things must be remembered when we shudder at his moralising, laugh at his absurdities, and yawn over his interminable length. He is the first novelist to show a real and vital knowledge of the human heart, its perversities and contradictions—the first to analyse the woman's point of view, and the man who did that deserves some measure of praise from posterity.

LETTER FROM MISS HOWE TO CLARISSA

My cousin, Jonny Fynnet, is here, she is all prate, you know, and loves to set me a prating, yet comes upon a very grave occasion—to procure my mother to go to her grandmother Larkin, who is bed-ridden, and has taken it into her head that she is mortal and should make her will, but on condition that my mother who is her relation will go and advise as to the particulars of it, for she has a high opinion of my mother's judgment in all notable affairs.

Mrs Larkin lives seventeen miles off, and as my mother cannot endure to lie out of her own house she proposes to set out in the morning, and get back at night. So to-morrow I shall be at your service, nor will I be at home to anybody.

As to the impertinent Hickman, I have put him upon escorting the two ladies, in order to attend my mother home at night. Such expeditions as those, and to give up women a little air at public places, is all I know these darning fellows are good for.

Here I was interrupted on the honest man's account. He has been here those two hours, and was now going. His horses at the door. My mother sent for me down, pretending to want to say something to me.

Something she said when I came that signified nothing—evidently for no reason called me—but she wished to give me an opportunity to see what a fine bow her man could make. She knows I am not over-ready to oblige him with my company, if I happen to be otherwise engaged. I could not help showing a fretful air when I saw her intention.

She smiled off the visible fretfulness, that the man might go away in good humour with himself.

He bowed to the ground, and would have taken my hand, his whip in the other, but I would not have it, and withdrew my hand.

"A mad girl," said my mother.

He was quite put out, took his horse's bridle, bowing back till he ran against his servant. He mounted his horse—I mounted up-stairs after a lecture.

Hickman is a sort of fiddling, busy, yet, to borrow a word from you, unbusy man, has a great deal to do, and seems to me to dispatch nothing. Irresolute and changeable in everything but in teasing me.

The man however is honest, has a good estate, and may one day be a baronet, an't so please you. He is humane, benevolent, and, people say, generous. I cannot but confess that now I like anybody better, whatever I did once.

He is no fox-hunter. He keeps a pack, indeed, but prefers not his hounds to his follow-creatures. No bad sign for a wife, I own. He loves his horse, but dislikes racing in a gaming way, as well as all sorts of gaming. Then he is sober, modest, they say virtuous—in short, has qualities that mothers would be fond of in a husband for their daughters, and for which perhaps their daughters would be the happier could they judge for themselves.

Strange that these sober fellows cannot have a decent sprightliness, a modest assurance with them. Something debonnaire, which need not be separated from their awe and reverence, when they address a woman. You and I have often retrospected the faces and minds of grown people, that is, have formed images, from their present appearances, as far as they would justify us, what sort of figures they made when boys and girls. And I'll tell you the lights in which Hickman, Solmes, and Lovelace, our three heroes, have appeared to me, supposing them boys at school.

Solmes I have imagined to be a little sordid rogue, who would purloin and beg every boy's bread and butter from him.

Hickman, an overgrown, lank-haired, chubby boy, who would be punched by everybody, and go home and tell his mother.

Lovelace, a owl-pated villain, full of fire, fancy, and mischief, an orchard robber, a wall climber, a horse rider without saddle or bridle—neck or nothing. A sturdy rogue, who would knock and cuff, and do no right, and take no wrong to anybody, would get his head broke, then a plaster for it, while he went on to do more mischief. And the same dispositions have grown up with them, and distinguished them as men.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF MISS BYRON TO MISS LUCY SELBY

"I thank you, sir, for your good opinion of me, but I cannot encourage your addresses."

"You cannot, madam, encourage my addresses! And express yourself so seriously. Good Heaven! I have been assured, madam," recovering from his surprise, "that your affections are not engaged. But surely it must be a mistake. Some happy man—"

"Is it," interrupted I, "a necessary consequence that the woman who cannot receive the addresses of Sir Hargrave Pollexfen must be engaged?"

"Why, madam, as to that—I know not what to say. But a man of my fortune, and I hope not absolutely disagreeable either in person or temper; of some rank in life—"

He paused; then resuming,—"What, madam, if you are as much in earnest as you seem, can be your objection? Be so good as to name it, that I may know whether I can be so happy as to get over it?"

"We do not, we cannot, all like the same person. Women, I have heard say, are very capricious. Perhaps I am so. But there is a something (we cannot always say what) that attracts or disgusts us."

"Disgust! madam. Disgust! Miss Byron."

"I spoke in general, sir. I dare say nineteen women out of twenty would think themselves favoured in the addresses of Sir Hargrave Pollexfen."

"But you, madam, are the twentieth that I must love, and be so good as to let me know—"

"Pray, sir, ask me not a reason for a peculiarity. Do you not yourself show a peculiarity in making me the twentieth?"

"Your merit, madam—"

"It would be vanity in me, sir," interrupted I, "to allow a force to that plea. You, sir, may have more merit than perhaps the man I may happen to approve of better. But—shall I say?—(pardon me, sir)—you do not—you do not," hesitated I, "hit my fancy. Pardon me, sir."

"If pardon depends upon my breath, let me die if I do! Not hit your fancy, madam!" (And then he looked upon himself all round.) "Not hit your fancy, madam!"

"I told you, sir, that you must not expect anything from me but the simplest truth. You do me an honour in your good opinion, and if my own heart were not in this case a very doted one, I would answer you with more politeness. But, sir, on such an occasion as this I think it would not be honourable, it would not be just, to keep a man in an hour's suspense when I am in none myself."

"Confound me!—and yet I am enough confounded!—but I will not take an answer so contrary to my hopes. Tell me, madam, by the sincerity which you boast, are you engaged in your affections?"

"I am a free person, Sir Hargrave. It is no impeachment of sincerity if a free person answers not every question that may be put to her by those to whom she is not accountable."

"Very true, madam. But as it is no impeachment of your freedom to answer this question either negatively or affirmatively, and as you glory in your frankness, let me beseech you to answer it. Are you, madam, or are you not, disengaged in your affections?"

"Excuse me, Sir Hargrave. I don't think you are entitled to an answer to this question. Nor, perhaps, would you be determined by the answer I should make to it, whether negative or affirmative "

" Give me leave to say, madam, that I have some little knowledge of Mr Fenwick and Mr Greville, and of their addresses. They have both owned that no hopes have you given them, yet declare that they will hope Have you, madam, been as explicit to them as you are to me ? "

" I have, sir "

" Then they are not the men I have to fear—Mr. Orme, madam— "

" Is a good man, sir "

" Ah, madam ! But why then will you not say that you are engaged ? "

" If I own I am perhaps it will not avail me It will still much less if I say I am not "

" Avail you ! dear Miss Byron ! I have pride madam If I had not I should not aspire to your favour But give me leave to say " (and he reddened with anger) " that my fortune, my descent, and my ardent affection for you considered, it may not dis avail you Your relations will at least think so if I may have the honour of your consent for applying to them "

" May your fortune, Sir Hargrave, be a blessing to you It will, in proportion as you do good with it But were it twice as much, that alone would have no harm for me My duties would be increased with my power My fortune is an humble one, but were it less it would satisfy my ambition while I am single, and if I marry I shall not desire to live beyond the estate of the man I choose "

" Upon my soul, madam, you must be mine. Every word you speak adds a rivet to my chains "

" Then, sir, let us say no more upon the subject. "

" But you will allow of my visits to your cousin, madam ? "

" Not on my account, sir. "

" You will not withdraw if I come ? You will not refuse seeing me ? "

" As you will be no visitor of mine, I must be allowed to act accordingly Had I the least thought of encouraging your addresses, I would deal with you as openly as is consistent with my notions of modesty and decorum "

" Perhaps, madam, from my gay behaviour at Lady Betty Williams's you think me too airy a man You have doubts of my sincerity You question my honour "

" That, sir, would be to injure myself "

" Your objections, then, dear madam ! Give me, I beseech you, some one material objection "

" Why, sir, should you urge me thus ? When I have no doubt, it is unnecessary to look into my own mind for the particular reasons that move me to disapprove of the addresses of a gentleman whose professions of regard for me, notwithstanding, entitle him to civility and acknowledgment "

" By my soul, madam, this is very comical,— "

" I do not like thee, Dr Fell "

" The reason why, I cannot tell— "

" But I don't like thee Dr Fell "

" Such, madam, seem to me to be your reasons "

" You are very pleasant sir But let me say, that if you are in earnest in your professions, you could not have quoted anything more against you than these humorous lines "

" I was not aware of that," replied he.

" Excuse me cousin," said I turning to Mrs Reeves, " but I believe I have talked away the tea time "

" The devil fly away with the tea kettle," said Sir Hargrave¹

II. PROSE: (b) THE GREAT NOVELISTS—(11) HENRY FIELDING.

HENRY FIELDING (1707-1754)

In person, disposition, and pedigree, Henry Fielding presents a remarkable contrast with his famous contemporary. In the first place, he was an aristocrat, the "House of Fielding" claiming kinship with that of Hapsburg, and dating from the twelfth century His great grandfather was the first Earl of Desmond, his grandfather Canon of Salisbury, his father one of Marlborough's generals On the mother's side, his grandfather was a Justice of the King's Bench, and Lady Mary Wortley Montagu was his cousin

Fielding was good looking, tall, and well made, with abundant animal spirits, a fine wit, and an open, genial disposition, one well calculated to attract a host of friends One thing only, and that no unusual one, tempered the young man's sunny satisfaction with life—the poverty of his patrimony

Born at Sherpham Park, near Glastonbury, in 1707, he was educated for Eton by a Mr Oliver, who "could have acted the part of Falstaff without stuffing," and was noted for "a stateliness in his gait when he walked not unlike that of a goose, only he stalked the slower "

After leaving Eton, in reaction against book-study maybe, he planned an elopement with a Miss Sarah Andrew, but this, owing to her guardian's care, remained merely a pious aspiration After journeying to Leyden to study law, he became embarrassed by his father's forgetfulness in the matter of an allowance, so he came back to London, resolved to see what his own wits could do for him

The most obviously lucrative business in those days for a young man of parts was playwriting, and the young wit wasted little time in getting to work.

Love in Several Masques was produced in 1728, and a host of others quickly followed, the majority fairly successful, but none of them having much merit save the amusing Tragedy of Tragedies; or The Life and Death of Tom Thumb the Great (1731), in which he parodied agreeably the mannerisms of Lee and Rowe Another of them, Don Quixote in England, is worth recording since it contained that typical English song, "The Roast Beef of Old England "

The playwright then made drama on his own account, he fell in love with a Miss Charlotte Craddock, a beautiful, wealthy, and accomplished lady who lived at Salisbury For her he waited four years, during which time the course of true love underwent many exciting vicissitudes Then, in 1735, he tired of playwriting, not because of financial failure in that direction, for he had done well from a material point of view, but because he realised that the drama gave him no proper scope for his own literary gifts. Political satire interested him for a while, then he turned to the Bar, and while there was attracted by the sensational success of Pamela In 1742 he planned and executed what was, in inception and form, a parody of Richardson's book, but was in essence a fresh stage in the development of the novel. Fielding was then thirty-five.

Encouraged by its success he published, in 1743, three volumes of Miscellanies, including one of the finest pieces of ironical fiction in the language—Jonathan Wild. Then for a while he devoted himself to Whig journalism, writing the True Patriot and the Jacobite Journal; and in 1749 published his most popular novel, Tom Jones. Meanwhile his wife had died, and the author had become a Bow Street Magistrate. While performing his duties here, which he did with vigour and admirable sense, he found time to produce Amelia in 1751, and to conduct for some time the Covent Garden Journal. His health broke down and he travelled abroad, hoping to restore it. Fielding's vitality, however, had been sapped, and he died in October 1754, at Lisbon. After his death, his last book, A Voyage to Lisbon, was published.

HIS WORK

When Fielding planned out Joseph Andrews, on the modest lines of a burlesque, he had not reckoned on his creative imagination and on Parson Adams. In chapter xi the worthy parson appears and takes the story into his own hands. It ceases to become a satire on the novel of morals and becomes the pioneer of the novel of manners. Here we have the dividing line between Richardson and Fielding as novelists. Not that Fielding in his own way is not also a pronounced moralist. But he is a painter of manners first, and Richardson was first a moralist.

Jonathan Wild (1743) reveals Fielding in another light. There is nothing here of the robust satirical humour of the novels, nothing of the discursive moralising, little of the social historian. It is a grim and powerful piece of ironic portraiture, showing on an heroic scale the villainies of the highwayman, and wrought with an artistic skill and clarity of purpose that it would be hard to overpraise. The underlying thesis, indeed, is a kind of anticipation of De Quincey's brilliant Murder as One of the Fine Arts. The feature that unites Jonathan Wild with the novels is the vitality of the characterisation, great and small.

But the flavour of Jonathan Wild is too subtle, too bitter for some palates, and Tom Jones is certainly more to the taste of most people. Certainly, like Kipling's Tommy, Tom Jones "ain't no bloomin' ero," and in his anxiety to emphasize his humanity, Fielding seems—to the modern reader at any rate—to have drawn rather a too ordinary "young man about town." But if Tom himself is not a particularly attractive scapegrace, there are many characters who are attractive. Good-natured Allworthy is by no means insipid as he might easily have been. Black George is a vigorously vital rascal; Partridge is amusing company, and Squire Western an irresistible picture of the "three-bottle" country gentleman. The real villains and humbugs (hot-blooded villainy Fielding can always condone), are somewhat too villainous to convince us; but if we find Blifil too monstrous to stomach, there is the breezy exuberance and liveliness of the story-telling by way of compensation.

Amelia, his third novel, is the fruit of his later years, and reflects Fielding as the critic of legal administration and our social machinery. The buoyancy of his earlier method is replaced by a graver, maturer style, as befitted one who had learned much of contemporary life on its seamy side while a magistrate. There is less humour, less gaiety, less diversity than before, but in the more serious passages, Fielding is at his happiest. None of his women characters have the grace and sweetness of Amelia. She is drawn from life, and in her the novelist paints, with tender fidelity and with the delicate insight born of love and knowledge, the charms of a womanly woman, devoid of the sugary namby-pambyism that Richardson could never resist, and of the conventional touches that make Sophia Western never anything more than a pretty shadow.

CHARACTERISTICS

(1) His Satiric Humour—The society that Fielding painted was a coarse and noisy one, but Fielding draws attention to the fact that "its bark is worse than its bite," that it is more inviolous and thoughtless than deliberately bad. His genial humour playing over its rough surface, easily and spaciouly irradiates everyone who is not a hypocrite or a buff. The essential humanity of his characters is their most attractive asset, and this it is that gives such astonishing vitality to his work. His treatment of hypocrisy is the least satisfactory illustration of his art, for his hearty detestation of it prevents him even from making his hypocrites plausible. Minor affectations he can deal with tolerantly and pleasantly enough, and one recalls Parson Adams urging Joseph Andrews to resign his Fanny "peaceably, quietly, and contentedly," by philosophic considerations conveniently deduced from the Bible and from Seneca, then being suddenly faced with a calamity of his own, the supposed loss of his child, when straightway the affectation of philosophy slips from him. On the whole this humour of Fielding is nowhere more pleasantly expressed than in the picture of the lovable parson—good-hearted, absurd, and most impractical of men, like a full-blooded Don Quixote.

One can well understand how his rich humour delighted Dickens and stimulated him to create like portraits of his own, portraits often more ludicrous, but not more actual. Certainly, the character of Parson Adams alone justified John Forster's comment on Fielding's habit of "discerning what was good and beautiful in the homeliest aspects of humanity."

The precise value of Fielding's moral attitude towards life may be disregarded for the moment. Even apart from that, it is quite easy to understand the feud between him and Richardson. Richardson's immense solemnity precludes the faintest ray of humour. The modern reader may often smile in reading his pages, but it is at the author, not with him. Fielding, with a more diverse experience of human life, and with a gaiety of temperament that even in mellow years never quite lost its buoyancy, treats his story and his characters always from the point of view of the humorist; not in the least anxious to hide the weaknesses and idiosyncrasies, rejoicing in them rather, and feeling decidedly more comfortable when he can have a good laugh at his hero.

As a rule, Fielding's humour has the roots of geniality about it; unlike Swift's, it is sunny, kindly, and for all its keenness never barbed with poison.

Rarely has it that ironic quality which belongs rather to the philosophic and reflective humorist, a quality near akin to tragedy.

But there is a great and notable exception to the general run of Fielding's humour. That exception is found in Jonathan Wild. As an imaginative picture of ordinary human life, the book is inferior to its predecessor and successor, but as an intellectual presentment in the guise of fiction of a genus of the human species, it stands easily first, as a masterly essay in ironic humour, claiming kinship with the mordant genius of A Tale of a Tub and Candide. Perhaps it is Fielding's greatest achievement in literature; certainly it is one of the great books of the century.

If Parson Adams illustrated the sympathetic quality of Fielding's humour, and Jonathan Wild its intellectual power, Squire Western affords us one of the happiest examples of its moral sensibility. Western is a coarse, violent, domineering man, astonishingly actual, and for all his grossness, never wholly repulsive. Deep down in his sensual nature, and below his fierce intolerance, there is a strain of tenderness and good-heartedness. "I'll turn her out of doors," he screams when he hears of his daughter's affection for Tom. "She shall beg, starve, rot in the street. . . Not one half-penny o' mine. . . I little thought what puss he was looking after. . . She shall be no better than carrion." For all that he is quite easily led by Allworthy, to his own astonishment. "You make me do what you please, and yet I have as good an estate as you and am in the Commission of the Peace." A raging fury when he apostrophises the lover, vowing to "spoil his caterwauls", yet almost an amiable grandfather at the close of the story when the baby's "yawling" delights him, and he declares the sound to be "better than the finest cry of dogs in England," a tribute to the baby's lungs no less than to his own good nature.

(2) His Common-sense Morality—From the very first it is clear that Fielding is resolved to tilt against the cloying sentimentality brought into vogue by Richardson's Pamela. In Joseph Andrews he burlesqued this mawkish ideal, giving us in Abraham Adams a picture of the genuine sentiment for which he cared. This pursuit of current heroics he carries into Jonathan Wild, stripping the picturesque trappings off the "popular" rogue, and displaying him in all his ugliness and brutality. It is quite clear, therefore, that Fielding's attitude was not merely a negative one; his object was to replace a morbid by a healthy, common-sense morality.

The moral intent indeed is obvious in his plays, where he first began to satirise the follies of the day, and this is coupled with an equally vigorous intention of enjoying life to the full. He frowns on all attempts to wave away the "cakes and ale," merely postulating that the cakes should be well baked and the ale sound and wholesome.

If you sup too freely of them, then you must put up with the consequences, Fielding seems to say. If he regards intemperance of living with too indulgent an eye, we must recollect the general tone of his day. The "wild oats" theory was accepted as a necessary step in life. Fielding's coarseness, however, is all above-board. It may be rank, but it is quite honest and straightforward. He may tolerate it; but he makes no attempt to gloss it. This morality does not strike a high note, it is largely a prudential one. Richardson recognised the animalism and called it high-falutin names, Fielding frankly accepted it; man is an animal, according to him, and there is no use disguising the animalism, but he is something more.

This common-sense morality, combined with his satiric humour, gave him a shrewd insight into the weaknesses of his characters. Admirable, for instance, is the sketch of Mrs James in Amelia. Here she is writing about the heroine.

"In the first place her eyes are too large and she hath a look with them that I don't know how to describe; but I know I don't like it. Then her eyebrows are too large, indeed she doth all in her power to remedy this with the pinners, for if it was not for those her eyebrows would be preposterous. Then her nose . . . scar on one side. Neck too protuberant for the genteel size, especially as she laces herself. Lastly, both too short and too tall. Well, you may laugh, Mr James, I know what I mean though I cannot well express it. I mean she is too tall for a pretty woman, and too short for a fine woman. . ."

In sheer artistry, Richardson is the subtler, Fielding the fresher and more vigorous. Taken together, they give us a remarkable picture of the life and ideals of the time, and if Richardson excelled in portraying the complexities of femininity, Fielding just as surely excelled in drawing men. His range is far wider than Richardson's, his outlook more wholesome, and as a novelist of contemporary manners he is unequalled by any of his contemporaries.

JONATHAN WILD

The day now drew nigh when our great man was to exemplify the last and noblest act of greatness by which any hero can signalise himself. This was the day of execution, or consummation, or apotheosis (for it is called by different names), which was to give our hero an opportunity of facing death and damnation, without any fear in his heart, or, at least, without betraying any symptoms of it in his countenance. A completion of greatness which is heartily to be wished to every great man, nothing being more worthy of lamentation than when Fortune, like a lazy poet, winds up her catastrophe awkwardly, and, bestowing too little care on her fifth act, dismisses the hero with a smoking and private exit, who had in the former part of the drama performed such notable exploits as must promise to every good judge amongst the spectators a noble, public, and oxalted end.

But she was resolved to commit no such error in this instance. Our hero was too much and too deservedly her favourite to be neglected by her in his last moments, accordingly all efforts for a reprieve were vain, and the name of Wild stood at the head of those who were ordered for execution.

From the time he gave over all hopes of life, his conduct was truly great and admirable. Instead of shewing any marks of dejection or contrition, he rather infused more confidence and assurance into his looks. He spent most of his hours in drinking with his friends and with the good man above commemorated. In one of these computations, being asked whether he was afraid to die, he answered, "D—n me, it is only a dance without music." Another time, when one expressed some sorrow for his misfortune, as he termed it, he said with great fierceness—"A man can die but once." Again, when one of his intimate acquaintances hinted his hopes, that he would die like a man, he cocked his hat in defiance, and cried out greatly—"Zounds! who's afraid?"

Happy would it have been for posterity, could we have retrieved any entire conversation which passed at this season, especially between our hero and his learned comforter; but we have searched many pasteboard records in vain.

On the eve of his apotheosis, Wild's lady desired to see him, to which he consented. This meeting was at first very tender on both sides; but it could not continue so, for unluckily, some hints of former misadventures intervening, as particularly when she asked him how he could have used her so barbarously once as calling her b——, and whether such language became a man, much less a gentleman, Wild flew into a violent passion, and swore she was the vilest of b——s to upbraid him at such a season with an unguarded word spoke long ago. She replied, with many tears, she was well enough served for her folly in visiting such a brute; but she had one comfort, however, that it would be the last time he could ever treat her so; that indeed she had some obligation to him, for that his cruelty to her would reconcile her to the fate he was to-morrow to suffer; and, indeed, nothing but such brutality could have made the consideration of his shameful death (so this weak woman called hanging), which was now inevitable, to be borne even without madness. She then proceeded to a recapitulation of his faults in an exact order, and with more perfect memory, than one would have imagined her capable of, and it is probable would have rehearsed a complete catalogue had not our hero's patience failed him, so that with the utmost fury and violence he caught her by the hair and kicked her, as heartily as his chains would suffer him, out of the room.

At length the morning came which Fortune at his birth had resolutely ordained for the consummation of our hero's Greatness; he had himself indeed modestly declined the public honour she intended him, and had taken a quantity of laudanum, in order to retire quietly off the stage; but we have already observed, in the course of our wonderful history, that to struggle against this lady's decrees is vain and impotent, and whether she had determined you shall be hanged or be a prime minister, it is in either case lost labour to resist. Laudanum, therefore, being unable to stop the breath of our hero, which the fruit of hemp-seed, and not the spirit of poppy-seed, was to overcome, he was at the usual hour attended by the proper gentleman appointed for that purpose, and acquainted that the cart was ready. On this occasion he exerted that greatness of courage which hath been so much celebrated in other heroes; and, knowing it was impossible to resist, he gravely declared he would attend them. He then descended to that room where the fotters of great men are knocked off in a most solemn and ceremonious manner. Then shaking hands with his friends (to wit, those who were conducting him to the tree), and drinking their healths in a bumper of brandy, he ascended the cart, where he was no sooner seated than he received the acclamations of the multitude, who were highly ravished with his Greatness.

The cart now moved slowly on, being preceded by a troop of horse-guards bearing javelins in their hands, through streets lined with crowds all admiring the great behaviour of our hero, who rode on, sometimes sighing, sometimes swearing, sometimes singing or whistling, as his humour varied.

When he came to the tree of glory, he was welcomed with an universal shout of the people, who were there assembled in prodigious numbers to behold a sight much more rare in populous cities than one would reasonably imagine it should be, viz., the proper catastrophe of a great man.

But though envy was, through fear, obliged to join the general voice in applause on this occasion, there were not wanting some who maligned this completion of glory, which was now about to be fulfilled to our hero, and endeavoured to prevent it by knocking him on the head as he stood under the tree, while the ordinary was performing his last office. They therefore began to batter the cart with stones, brick-bats, dirt, and all manner of mischievous weapons, some of which erroneously playing on the robes of the ecclesiastic, made him so expeditious in his repetition, that with wonderful alacrity he had ended almost in an instant, and conveyed himself into a place of safety in a hackney-coach, where he waited the conclusion with a temper of mind described in these verses:

"*Suave mari magno, turbantibus æquora ventis,
E terra alterius magnum spectare laborem*"

We must not, however, omit one circumstance, as it serves to shew the most admirable conservation of character in our hero to his last moment, which was, that, whilst the ordinary was busy in his ejaculations, Wild, in the midst of the shower of stones, &c. which played upon him, applied his hands to the parson's pocket, and emptied it of his bottle-screw, which he carried out of the world in his hand.

The ordinary being now descended from the cart, Wild had just opportunity to cast his eyes around the crowd, and to give them a hearty curse, when immediately the horses moved on, and with universal applause our hero swung out of this world.

Thus fell Jonathan Wild the Great, by a death as glorious as his life had been, and which was so truly agreeable to it, that the latter must have been dplorably maimed and imperfect without the former; a death which hath been alone waiting to complete the characters of several ancient and modern heroes, whose histories would then have been read with much greater pleasure by the wisest in all ages. Indeed we could almost wish that whenever Fortune seems wantonly to deviate from her purpose, and leaves her work imperfect in this particular, the historian would indulge himself in the license of poetry and romance, and even do a violence to truth, to oblige his reader with a page which must be the most delightful in all his history, and which could never fail of producing an instructive moral.

Narrow minds may possibly have some reason to be ashamed of going thus way out of the world, if their consciences can fly in their faces and assure them they have not merited such an honour; but he must be a fool who is ashamed of being hanged, who is not weak enough to be ashamed of having deserved it.

II PROSE. (b) THE GREAT NOVELISTS—(iii) TOBIAS GEORGE SMOLLETT.

TOBIAS GEORGE SMOLLETT (1721–1771)

HIS LIFE

BORN in 1721, at Dalquhurn House in the West of Scotland, of good stock, young Smollett could boast no better patrimony than had his contemporary Fielding. Like him he received a good education, and was then apprenticed to a surgeon in Glasgow. But his heart lay in books, not in bottles, and 1739 sees him in London with a drama on James I of Scotland in his pocket, and all sorts of wild dreams in his head. Fortune failed to smile on him, however, and so he found employment for five years as a surgeon's mate on board a king's ship, during the war with Spain.

His experiences there stood him in good stead, for during these five years he may be said to have served his apprenticeship to literature. On his return, with Scottish shrewdness he married a woman with money, but being (as Fielding was not) very extravagant, he speedily ran through it. Once again he tried fortune as a surgeon, but his volatile, impetuous temperament did not inspire patients with confidence. No one had seemed anxious to encourage him as a writer of tragedy, so he turned now to satire, Advice and The Reproof (1745). These faring little better, he bothought him of fiction, made use of his youthful experiences, and offered the public The Adventures of Roderick Random.

This novel, if frankly an imitation of the picaresque Spanish fiction Gil Blas, caught the public taste by its liveliness and freshness. Peregrine Pickle followed in 1751, The Adventures of Ferdinand Count Fathom (1753), a poor and ineffective satire on the lines of Jonathan Wild. His last novel, The Expedition of Humphry Clinker, was finished in Leghorn and published a few days before his death in 1771.

HIS WORK

As a writer Smollett could boast a lively and vivid style. His stories are rich in incident, there is abundant "go" in them, and, though very unequal in characterisation, this gift of telling a good yarn prevents him from being dull. Of his three novels, Peregrine Pickle is the freshest and most diversified, Humphry Clinker the mellowest.

But the greatest claim that Smollett has upon our consideration is his genius for depicting oddities. Generally speaking, he is on a lower level as a literary artist than either Richardson or Fielding. He has not a tithe of Richardson's psychological subtlety, nor has his vision the sanity and diversity of Fielding's. But in the creation of oddities he is certainly easily first.

His seamen are the real thing: Tom Bowling (in Roderick Random) and Hawser Trunnion (in Peregrine Pickle) have the salt savour of the sea about them, and are a real and valuable contribution to the portrait gallery of fiction. Here he draws upon his own experiences; he can paint the sea-rover, for he himself has been a sea-rover; and the reader can visualise easily every hole and cranny on board H.M.S. Thunder; while that remarkable concoction "bumbo"—rum, sugar, water, and nutmeg—is not easily forgotten. Hatchway and Pipes are other humorous and vital figures, who impress the memory. That they lapse into caricature from time to time is equally true. But, as with many of Dickens' characters, they are described with such infinite zest, with such huge and obvious enjoyment, that the hilarious contagion spreads to the reader.

Personally Smollett was a man of fiery temper and strong prejudices, with a decided forcefulness of character and an aggressive goodness of heart that seemed to say at times, "If you won't let me do you a service I'll jolly well punch your head!" There is in his work much of that fresh exuberance that we find in Fielding, with greater coarseness and less urbanity. But to the reader with a relish for farce, there is certainly much enjoyment to be found in the rollicking extravagances so abundant in the novels.

In experience of life Fielding and Smollett are about equal. Both knew the vagabond pretty thoroughly, whether as swaggering adventurer or as a "lady without reputation", while as against Fielding's superior knowledge of better class society in town and country may be placed Smollett's knowledge of the sea-rover and his more extensive experience of other countries.

Very popular in his day, with both the women and the men—(did not Lady Mary Montagu call him "dear Smollett," and Johnson warmly commend him?)—his reputation has during the present century declined. If Scott's enthusiastic eulogy errs on the side of overpraise, the verdict of the present generation seems to err on the other side.

He had serious limitations as a story-teller, but when all his defects are duly admitted, this much may be said for him: he invented a new type of character, made possible the creation of Captain Cuttle, inspired Marryat, and Thackeray probably in his Barry Lyndon; while his influence lingers yet in the drolleries of Mr W. W. Jacobs. And this is no poor recommendation.

II. PROSE: (b) THE GREAT NOVELISTS—(iv) LAURENCE STERNE.

LAURENCE STERNE (1713-1768)

BORN in 1713 at Clonmol, Ireland, Laurence was the son of a poor lieutenant, Roger Sterne. His early days were spent at York, Dublin, Liverpool, and Plymouth, and his vicissitudes then, especially the memory of his good-hearted, easy-going father, served him in good stead when he started to write.

After taking his degree at Cambridge he became a priest, and obtained by avuncular patronage a living at Stillington, near Sutton, Yorkshire.

His spiritual qualifications were slight, but these were not looked for at that time. Of his preaching powers there is a legend that, when occasionally he ascended the pulpit at York Minster, "half the congregation left the church, as delivery and voice proved so disagreeable."

However, if his clerical gifts were inconspicuous, he had other qualifications not amiss in a country gentleman. He was a good shot, read, fiddled, and painted, to use his own phrase, "as the fly stung"; and as he had taken the precaution to marry "a homely woman with a fortune," one may judge that he passed his time pleasantly enough. How far he satisfied his flock is another matter.

A rector who would, when going to church, suddenly return home for his gun on espying a covey of partridges must have proved somewhat trying.

The even tenor of his rural life was suddenly interrupted by the amazing success of the Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, the first two volumes of which were published in 1760. Garrick liked it, Bishop Warburton also, while Horace Walpole declared it was "the talk of the town." So Sterne came up to London, and soon settled down as a fashionable gentleman with a penchant for sentimental gallantry. Naturally "the town" was by no means unanimous in its verdict. Richardson denounced it as execrable, Dr. Johnson took exception to its indecency, and both Goldsmith and Smollett ranged themselves among the hostile critics.

Meanwhile the book, despite denunciation and partly because of it, enjoyed a wide circulation, and when the ninth and final volume was published in 1767, Sterne was quite a public character, on visiting terms with all the notable men of the day, both literary and political.

But the excitement of this life proved too much for his delicate health, and he went to the south of France, after borrowing £20 from Garrick (which he never repaid). Needless to say the gay life of Paris attracted him, and ultimately he settled there for a time with his wife and daughter. The fruit of his sojourn abroad appeared in A Sentimental Journey (1768). If it did not increase his reputation, it added to his admirers Horace Walpole, who had been bored by Tristram, approved of his new volume.

But the end was near. His health had never been robust, and his life abroad did not tend to restore it. Soon after his return to London he died of pleurisy in lodgings at Bond Street (1768), and was buried at St George's in the Bayswater Road, his last words being, "Now it has come."

HIS WORK

What is Sterne's contribution to the development of the English novel?

Richardson had given sentimentality, Fielding humour, Smollett liveliness. Sterne blends humour and sentiment in a way peculiarly his own, and although structurally he defies every convention of the novel, yet develops still further the art of characterisation.

Incident is non-existent in Sterne's fiction; there is neither chronology nor progression. His novels are one long parenthesis—a colossal aside to the reader. Yet despite the chaotic incoherence of his method of story-telling, his effects are made with consummate ease.

He is sentimental and humorous, but in a way quite alien to the way of his contemporaries. He makes no attempt, with Richardson, at elaborate analysis, does not vie with Fielding in rolling his jest about with genial mirth, or emulate the uproarious gloe of Smollett. Everything is done by the art of mischievous suggestion. He never cries, he merely flutters his eyelids; never laughs, merely sniggers. This is due to no consideration of delicacy for the indecency of Sterne is as flagrant as any of the time, but because he relished leering innuendo.

He arrests attention by what he leaves unsaid. Yet disagreeable as his indecency is, insufferable as some of his sentiment is, distractedly bewildering as his method may be, of his fine literary craftsmanship there can be no question.

A more careful consideration of his qualities as a writer will reveal this.

CHARACTERISTICS

(1) Subtlety of Humour—Sterne's involved, rambling style and inconsequential manner owes no little to Rabelais and Robert Burton. Stylists, however, have a way of pilfering pleasantly from one another. Elia himself has many echoes of Sir Thomas Browne, and in our own time Stevenson, one of the most delightful of modern prosemen, frankly owned to being the "sedulous ape" to such men as Hazlitt.

Too much, therefore, must not be made of Sterne's indebtedness to others, since after all the real question is not what he took from others, but what he added to his borrowings. Sterne certainly repaid his creditors. He had a fine artistic sense, and developed a style that he made his own, by virtue of the peculiar humour which has little in common with Rabelais' uproarious, full-blooded mirth, or Burton's dry, scholarly wit.

Here are two illustrations of Sterne's humorous method, the first bearing upon character, the other giving a whimsical turn to the narrative:

"It was a consuming vexation to my father that my mother never asked the meaning of a thing she did not understand. That she is not a woman of science, my father would say, is her misfortune; but she might ask a question."

"My mother never did. In short, she went out of the world at last without knowing whether it turned round or stood still—My father had officiously told her above a thousand times which way it was, but she always forgot."

"All you need say of Fontainebleau (in case you are asked) is, that it stands about forty miles (south something) from Paris, in the middle of a large forest. That there is something great in it—That the King goes there once every two or three years, and that during that Carnival of Sporting, any English gentleman of fashion (you needn't forget yourself) may be accommodated with a nag or two to partake of the sport, taking care only not to out-gallop the king. Though there are two reasons why you need not talk loud of this to anyone. First, Because 'twill make the said nag the harder to be got. Secondly, 'Tis not a word of it true—Alas!"

These brief quotations cannot do justice to the subtlety of Sterne's humour, but they serve at any rate to refute the absurd suggestions made in some quarters that his humour lies in its prurency. Sterne's indecency is obvious enough, and on a first reading it will seem more insistent than it really is—it will distract our attention from the exquisite art by which Sterne will delicately construct his characterisation, or atmospherically suggest his scenes. It is here that his humour plays with the swift illumination of summer lightning over his subject, delighting the reader, who has learnt to ignore the indecencies of behaviour in favour of the scrupulous decencies of art—which Sterne rarely fails to respect. To better appreciate the humour, we may turn more especially to the characterisation.

(2) Subtlety of Characterisation—That sensitive, highly self-conscious temperament characteristic of both Richardson and Sterne undoubtedly helped them in niceties of characterisation. Its drawbacks are that it leads too easily into hysterical emotion, its advantages that it enables its possessor to distinguish shades of feeling and sensibility, overlooked by heartier, stronger-fibred natures.

To illustrate at once the merits and defects of Sterne's sentimentalism we have but to turn to the picture of his live Ass of Lyons in Tristram Shandy, then compare that with the scene of Le Fevre's death.

"'Twas but a poor ass, who had just turned in with a couple of large panniers upon his back, to collect eleemosynary turnip tops and cabbage leaves; and stood dubious, with his two forefeet on the inside of the threshold, and with his two hinder feet towards the street, as not knowing very well whether he was to go in or no."

"Now, 'tis an animal (be in what hurry I may) I cannot bear to strike—there is a patient endurance of sufferings, wrote so unaffectedly in his looks and carriage, which pleads so mightily for him, that always disarms me; and to that degree, that I do not like to speak unkindly to him; on the contrary, meet him where I will—whether in town or country—in cart or under panniers—whether in liberty or bondage—I have ever something civil to say to him on my part, and as one word begets another (if he has as little to do as I)—I generally fall into conversation with him, and surely never is my imagination so busy as in framing his responses from the etchings of his countenance—and where those carry me not deep enough—in flying from my own heart into his, and seeing what is natural for an ass to think—as well as a man, upon the occasion. In truth, it is the only creature of all the classes of beings below me, with whom I can do this, for parrots, jack-daws, &c.—I never exchange a word with them—nor with the apes, &c., for pretty near the same reason; they act by rote, as the others speak by it, and equally make me silent—may my dog and my cat, though I value them both—and for my dog he would speak if he could—yet somehow or other, they neither of them possess the talents for conversation—I can make nothing of a discourse with them, beyond the proposition, the reply, and the rejoinder, (which terminated my father's and my mother's conversations, in his beds of justice—) and those uttered—there's an end of the dialogue—But with an ass, I can commune for ever."

"Come, Honesty! said I,—seeing it was impracticable to pass betwixt him and the gate—art thou coming in, or going out?"

"The ass twisted his head round to look up the street."

"Well—replied I—we'll wait a minute for thy driver.—He turned his head thoughtful about, and looked wistfully the opposite way—"

"I understand thee perfectly, answered I—If thou takest a wrong step in this affair he will cudgel thee to death—Well! a minute is but a minute, and if it saves a fellow creature a drubbing, it shall not be set down as ill spent."

"He was eating the stem of an artichoke as this discourse went on, and in the little peevish contentions of nature betwixt hunger and unsavouriness, had dropt it out of his mouth half a dozen times, and pick'd it up again—God help thee, Jack! said I, thou hast a bitter breakfast on't—and many a bitter day's labour,—and many a bitter blow, I fear, for its wages—'tis all—al bitterness to thee, whatever life is to others.—And now thy mouth, if one knew the truth of it, is as bitter, I daresay, as soot—for he had cast aside the stem)—and thou hast not a friend perhaps in all this world, that will give thee a macaroon.—In saying this, I pull'd out a paper of 'em, which I had just purchased, and gave him one—and at this moment that I am telling it, my heart smites me, that there was more of pleasantry in the conceit, of seeing how an ass would eat a macaroon—than of benevolence in giving him one, which presided in the act."

"When the ass had eaten his macaroon, I press'd him to come in—the poor beast was heavy loaded—his legs seemed to tremble under him—he hung rather backwards, and as I pull'd at his halter, it broke short in my hand—he look'd up pensive in my face—'Don't thrash me with it—but if you will, you may'—If I do, said I, I'll be d—d."

That is frankly sentimental, but the sentimentality is not overdrawn, it is quaintly and subtly suggested.

Could anything be worse, however, than such a passage as this?

"The pulse fluttered—stopped—went on—fluttered—stopped again—moved—stopped. Shall I go on? No!"

The reader is certainly inclined to endorse the last exclamation.

Now apply this gift of sentimentality, with its strength and weakness, to characterisation. The visualising power exerts some repression on the prolixity of the writer, and this is all to its advantage; and the sensibility that is always vacillating between humour and pathos helps its possessor to vitalise his creations. Sterne's supreme invention is his invention of Uncle Toby. In some ways Uncle Toby is like Parson Adams—he is eccentric, and has beneath his grotesqueries simplicity, charm, soundness of heart. But if the framework is not dissimilar, the detailed effects by which the character is built up are far subtler. There is a curious intimacy about Sterne's button-holing methods that impress the reader with a greater sense of actuality at times, than he ever feels in turning over the pages of Sterne's contemporaries.

The characterisation is less diverse than in Fielding, less uniformly interesting. But in a few cases it is of the finest quality. None but Sterne could have drawn that delightful kitchen scene at the inn, with the Reverend Mr Yorick's curate smoking by the fire, and suggesting all manner of things by his flashes of silence.

In the province of characterisation Sterne has his own particular niche of fame. No one who is interested in this fascinating aspect of fiction can neglect him on that account.

A SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY

It must have been observed by many a peripatetic philosopher, That nature has set up by her unquestionable authority certain boundaries and fences to circumscribe the discontent of man—she has effected her purpose in the quietest and easiest manner, by laying him under almost insuperable obligations to work out his ease, and to sustain his suffering at home. It is there only that she has provided him with the most suitable objects to partake of his happiness and bear a part of that burthen, which, in all countries and ages, has ever been too heavy for one pair of shoulders. 'Tis true, we are endued with an imperfect power of spreading our happiness sometimes beyond her limits, but 'tis so ordered, that, from the want of languages, connections, and dependences, and from the difference in education, customs, and habits, we lie under so many impediments in communicating our sensations out of our own sphere, as often amount to a total impossibility.

It will always follow from hence, that the balance of sentimental commerce is always against the expatriated adventurer—he must buy what he has little occasion for, at their own price—his conversation will seldom be taken in exchange for theirs without a large discount—and this, by the bye, eternally driving him into the hands of more equitable brokers, for such conversation as he can find, it requires no great spirit of divination to guess at his party—

This brings me to my point; and naturally leads me (if the see-saw of this Desobligeant will but let me get on) into the efficient as well as final causes of travelling—

Your idle people that leave their native country, and go abroad for some reason or reasons which may be derived from one of these general causes—

Infirmary of body,

Imbecility of the mind, or

Inevitable necessity

The first two include all those who travel by land or by water, labouring with pride, curiosity, vanity, or spleen, subdivided and combined in infinitum.

The third includes the whole army of peregrine martyrs; more especially those travellers who set out upon their travels with the benefit of the clergy, either as delinquents travelling under the direction of governors recommended by the magistrate—or young gentlemen transported by the cruelty of parents and guardians, and travelling under the direction of governors recommended by Oxford, Aberdeen, and Glasgow.

There is a fourth class, but their number is so small, that they would not deserve a distinction, was it not necessary in a work of this nature to observe the greatest precision and nicety, to avoid a confusion of character. And these men I speak of, are such as cross the sea and sojourn in a land of strangers, with a view of saving money for various reasons and upon various pretences; but as they might also save themselves and others a great deal of unnecessary trouble by saving their money at home—and as their reasons for travelling are the least complex of any other species of emigrants, I shall distinguish these gentlemen by the name of Simple Travellers.

Thus the whole circle of travellers may be reduced to the following heads

Idle Travellers,

Inquisitive Travellers,

Lying Travellers,

Proud Travellers,

Vain Travellers,

Splenic Travellers,

Then follow

The Travellers of Necessity,

The delinquent and felonious Traveller,

The unfortunate and innocent Traveller,

The simple Traveller,

And last of all (if you please) The Sentimental Traveller (meaning thereby myself) who have travell'd, and of which I am now sitting down to give an account—as much out of Necessity, and the besoin de Voyager, as any one in the class

I am well aware, at the same time, as both my travels and observations will be altogether of a different cast from any of my fore-runners; that I might have mislaid upon a whole much entirely to myself—but I should break in upon the confines of the Vain Traveller, in wishing to draw attention towards me, till I have some better grounds for it, than the mere Novelty of my Vehicle. It is sufficient for my reader, if he has been a Traveller himself, and with study and reflection hereupon he will be able to determine his own place and rank in the catalogue—it will be one step towards knowing himself as it is great odds but he retains some tincture and resemblance of what he imbibed or carried out, to the present hour.

The man who first transplanted the grape of Burgundy to the Cape of Good Hope (observe he was a Dutchman) never dreamt of drinking the same wine at the Cape, that the same grape produced upon the French mountains—he was too phlegmatic for that—but undoubtedly he expected to drink some sort of vinous liquor; but whether good, bad, or indifferent, he knew enough of this world to know, that it did not depend upon his choice, but that what is generally called chance was to decide his success: however, he hoped for the best; and in these hopes, by an intemperate confidence in the fortitude of his head, and the depth of his discretion, Myself might possibly overset both in his new vineyard; and by discovering his nakedness, become a laughing-stock to his people.

Even so it fares with the poor Traveller, sailing and posting through the politer kingdoms of the globe, in pursuit of knowledge and improvements

Knowledge and improvements are to be got by sailing and posting for that purpose, but whether useful knowledge and real improvements, is all a lottery—and even where the adventurer is successful, the acquired stock must be used with caution and sobriety, to turn to any profit—but as the chances run prodigiously the other way, both as to the acquisition and application, I am of opinion, That a man would act as wisely, if he could prevail upon himself to live contented without foreign knowledge or foreign improvements, especially if he lives in a country that has no absolute want of either—and indeed much grief of heart has it oft and many a time cost me, when I have observed how many a foul step the inquisitive Traveller has measured to see sights and look into discoveries; all which, as Sancho Pança said to Don Quixote, they might have seen dry-shod at home. It is an age so full of light, that there is scarce a country or corner of Europe, whose beams are not crossed and interchanged with others—Knowledge in most of its branches and in most affairs, is like music in an Italian street, whereof those may partake, who pay nothing—But there is no nation under heaven—and God is my record (before whose tribunal I must one day come and give an account of this work)—that I do not speak it vauntingly—But there is no nation under heaven abounding with more variety of learning—where the sciences may be more fitly woo'd, or more surely won, than here—where art is encouraged, and will soon rise high—where Nature (take her altogether) has so little to answer for—and, to close all, where there is more wit and variety of character to feed the mind with—Where then, my dear countrymen, are you going—

—We are only looking at this chaise, said they—Your most obedient servant, said I, skipping out of it and pulling off my hat—We were wondering, said one of them, who, I found, was an inquisitive Traveller,—what could occasion the motion—'Twas the agitation, said I coolly, of writing a preface—I never heard, said the other, who was a simple Traveller, of a preface wrote in a desobligeant—It would have been better, said I, in a Vis à Vis

As an Englishman does not travel to see Englishmen, I retire to my room.

II. PROSE—(c) THE RISE OF THE WOMAN NOVELIST (FROM APHERA BEHN TO JANE AUSTEN).

THE RISE OF THE WOMAN NOVELIST

Sex is not merely a simple matter of physical differentiation, as some imagine it. Indeed in its ultimate analysis it is a psychical problem; and it is this fact that lends so great an interest to the contributions made by women to literature.

"Woman is not undeveloped man but diverse." Her outlook is essentially different from that of a man, and her work, therefore, is complementary and supplementary to the man's.

Partly through the exigencies of their historical development, partly because of their psychological characteristics, women have, with certain reservations, proved literary artists of the secondary order only. As poets, philosophers, historians, they have proved on the whole inferior to men; but in the art of fiction they can certainly claim equality, and they can do so not because they rival men on their own special masculine ground, but because by virtue of their femininity they bring into prose certain qualities in which they excel, and in which men are as a rule deficient.

As a rule, I say, for we have to recognise that sexual differences are not bound by physical determinations. Every man has something of the woman in him, every woman something of the man; and this psychological element fluctuates so remarkably that some men are more feminine than masculine, some women more masculine than feminine.

What results from this? From the literary point of view we find that where the two elements are proportionately mingled we get the happiest results. Among the men our greatest writers have been those who have a good share of what we call feminine qualities; among the women, those who have achieved the highest triumphs have been those who with their own feminine gifts have combined a measure also of the masculine. Genius is bi-sexual.

The masculine qualities comprehend a broad grasp of general principles, a logical constructive power, and a faculty for dealing largely and sanely with the big issues of life. The feminine qualities, on the other hand, lie in subtlety rather than vigour of perception, an intuitive insight into the delicate complexities of character, and an intensity and tenacity of passion.

As illustrations of the masculine and feminine methods of approaching the social life of the late eighteenth century we have Fielding and Jane Austen, each of them essentially a painter of manners, concerned in the differences between town and country, satirical in treatment, eschewing sentiment as far as possible. Between them we have a wonderful picture of the time, and the one complements the other, for the differences are rather sexual than purely literary—the one, bold, dashing, painting in strong, vivid colours; the other, delicate, subtle, avoiding violent contrasts, and dealing rather in nuances.

But the feminine note in fiction, the woman's psychological point of view, only gradually found artistic expression, as we shall see if we briefly review the earlier phases of novel-writing.

One of the earliest Englishwomen to write fiction was Mrs. APHRA BEHN, who had lived her early life in India, and later on at Antwerp, before she settled in England.

Writing at a time when the old-fashioned romance was in favour, and the romance at its worst, its most prolix and tawdriest days, she is noteworthy for the use she made of everyday facts and experience, thus anticipating the method of Defoe. But she had nothing of Defoe's genius for actualising her material, and could not escape the "high-falutin'" style of the elder Romanticism.

But the fact that in Oroonoko she made use of her acquaintance with Eastern races, and that in The Fair Jilt she paints a modern adventures, distinctly Continental in type, is certainly to her credit. Her technique is imperfect and imitative. She has little idea of putting the woman's point of view. Had she done thus she would have stood on a far higher level, for she was a woman of intelligence. As it is, she follows in the wake of the male story-teller.

When we come to the early years of the eighteenth century, it is manifest that women are beginning to realise their aptitude for novel-writing.

Immediate successors to Mrs. BEHN, and contemporaries of Defoe, were Mrs. MANLEY with her New Atlantis (1709), and Mrs. HAYWOOD with her Utopian Memoirs. These two ladies were prolific writers, and Mrs. Haywood dealt largely with the short story.

Their early work is extremely artificial, and Mrs. Manley died before the great era of the novel inaugurated by Richardson and Fielding. But some idea of the influence of these writers can be gained by comparing the earlier work of Mrs. Haywood with her later novels, written about the mid-century. All of these show that the imitative faculty is largely in the ascendant still. Yet the woman writer of the day did exhibit from time to time traces of that aptitude for detailed effects, and little subtleties of observation, in which she was to score so remarkably later on.

The awakening was at hand, and Richardson was the dumpy Fairy Prince. His extraordinary knowledge of women and women's ways showed clearly in what direction the woman writer could hope to shine.

The little trivialities that go to make up life were actualised by women with a fineness which had escaped man's more blundering touch, and which man could not hope to equal. His knowledge might be more varied, his experience wider, but certain complexities of existence, light and shade effects of character, women on the whole were far more suited to portray.

Miss FIELDING—Henry Fielding's sister—owed more to Richardson than to the author of Tom Jones. Selecting an environment of adventure ill suited to her powers, she none the less showed in David Simple (1744) a gift of painting character greatly in excess of previous writers. The book was praised by Richardson, who seized this opportunity to disparage her brother.

Later on we have a certain imaginative power shown by FRANCES SHERIDAN—mother of the dramatist—in her Memoirs of Miss Sidney Biddulph (1761).

Then towards the close of the age come yet greater signs of promise. Of Mrs. Radcliffe mention is made elsewhere. Her influence on her generation and on her successors is indubitable, despite her crudeness and absurdities.

But most of the feminine pioneers in fiction had seriously handicapped themselves by choosing for their medium the romantic type of fiction, and despite Mrs. Radcliffe's success, this is not to her advantage. Romanticism to be effective demands a broad, massive treatment rather than a subtle, detailed one. It was not in romance that woman was to gain her laurels, but in her own particular realm of experience—at the fireside.

The Robertsonian School of Drama has been dubbed the "Cup-and-Saucer School"; the term is equally applicable to the fiction of Miss Burney and Miss Austen.

What helped women like Fanny Burney and Maria Edgeworth, Susan Ferrier, and above all Jane Austen, to realise the real extent of their powers and to give us the fruit of their own experiences of life, rather than imitations of the man's point of view, was the change of manners that took place at the close of the eighteenth century. The coarse brutality of Fielding and Smollett's day, gives way to an era when a greater refinement and a quieter taste of life became fashionable. This was clearly advantageous to the woman writer; and four women in particular—three women of considerable talent, one woman of genius—occupy an important place in the development of the English novel.

HANNAH MORE (1745–1833) was the daughter of a Gloucestershire schoolmaster, and the friend of Garrick, by whom she was introduced to the Johnson circle. Her single novel, Calista in Search of a Wife (1809), shows the satirical bent that was to find such lively expression in the feminine fiction of the near future. But Fanny Burney's Evelina is the first book of distinctive literary power in this direction.

FANNY BURNEY (1752–1840) came of a Norfolk family, being born at King's Lynn, where her father was an organist. Her girlhood was spent in London, and from an early age she showed a passion for writing, greatly to the dismay of her stepmother, who thought such pursuits were unladylike. Impressed, no doubt, by this unfavourable opinion, the sensitive story-teller solemnly burnt her first novel, The History of Caroline Evelyn; but stories have a strange vitality of their own that defies material destruction, and it was not long before the history of Caroline becomes incarnate again in Evelina, or the History of a Young Lady's Entrance into the World, published anonymously. The success of the book was instantaneous, and the author's name soon leaked out. Fanny Burney found herself famous, approved of by the great, gruff Doctor himself, and warmly praised by such men as Burke and Sir Joshua Reynolds. The book is an admirable picture of the manners of the time, from the woman's point of view. Of humour there is a pleasant spice, though it is subdued, of characterisation there is singularly little; and there is next to no sentiment. In fact, the book lives by its spirited and delicate externalisation of the life of her age. Evelina herself is not interesting, her conventionality and shy self-effacement make of her a colourless young woman, but some of the coarser feminine types are excellently handled, and the pictures of the eighteenth-century "blood," from the feminine standpoint, is undeniably effective.

The motif of the story, that of a young lady of good family and slender fortune, ignorant of the world, trying to make her way in the London life of the time, was perhaps suggested by a novel by Mrs. FRANCES BROOKE, entitled The Excursion (1777). Certainly Fanny Burney knew of the novel and was acquainted with the writer, whom she describes as possessing an "agreeable ugliness." Mrs. Brooke's novel is devoid of merit; and in treatment and method Miss Burney owed nothing to her friend.

The success of Evelina encouraged her to write a successor, and in 1782 Cecilia, or the Memoirs of an Heiress, was published; a story of family pride, that lacked the freshness of its predecessor; while her two last tales, Camilla (1796) and The Wanderer (1814), were very feeble productions, largely due to the fact that she attempted to depict sides of life of which she had no experience, and partly also to her departing from the simplicity of her early manner in order to copy the Johnsonian period.

At her best in Evelina, her delightful Diary, and in parts of Cecilia, she showed a delicacy of satire and a faithful observation, above all a genuinely distinctive point of view, assuredly not without their influence on her similar though greater successor—Jane Austen.

Before dealing with Jane Austen, the most famous exponent of the novel of manners, something must be said of Maria Edgeworth and Susan Ferrier.

MARIA EDGEWORTH, the daughter of a gentleman who owned some property in Co. Longford, Ireland, was born at Black Bourton, near Reading, in 1767, and until the age of fifteen resided in England, eventually migrating to the family estate of Edgeworthstown; her father, himself a keen educationist, taking considerable interest in her training. Literary power early showed itself, and her first work, when but fifteen, was a translation of Madame de Genlie's Adèle et Théodore, a collection of letters on education, later, she was called upon to assist her father in a book on Practical Education, his own large family of twenty-one children giving him ample scope for putting his theories to the test. Maria Edgeworth was also a prolific writer on educational matters, and published The Parent's Assistant, in six volumes, in 1800, but her real power lay in the domain of fiction, and particularly in her delineation of Irish peasant characters. Her first novel was written before she was twenty, though it did not appear till 1814, under the title of Patronage. In 1800 the famous Castle Rackrent was published, and Belinda a year later. She also wrote a large number of tales for the young, some comic dramas published in 1817, and in 1820 the Memoirs of her father. She died in 1849.

Maria Edgeworth shows greater vivacity, and a more genial breadth than Fanny Burney, but less delicacy of touch, though her education theories, largely inspired by Thomas Day and by her father, hindered her as a literary artist. "It has been my daughter's aim," said Richard Lovell Edgeworth, "to promote by all her writings, the progress of education from the cradle to the grave . . ." Unhappily, this is too true, yet despite the strenuous didacticism and moral aim in her earlier tales for children, her shrewd sense of character and her liveliness often triumph over the moralist in her. Her Irishmen are real Irishmen, and her success as a writer of Irish life inspired Scott, so he assures us, with his characteristic generosity and modesty: "Without being so presumptuous as to hope to emulate the rich humour, pathetic tenderness, and admirable tact, which pervade the works of my accomplished friend, I felt that something might be attempted for my own country, of the same kind with that which Miss Edgeworth so fortunately achieved for Ireland—something which might introduce her natives to those of the sister kingdom in a more favourable light than they had been placed hitherto, and tend to procure sympathy for their virtues and indulgence for their foibles."

SUSAN FERRIER (1782-1854) was the daughter of a clerk of the Court of Session, Edinburgh, a colleague of Sir Walter Scott, whose long friendship with her, and experience of her tactful sympathy helped to lighten the burden of his later years. Scott was also a great admirer of her work, and while her identity remained undiscovered, he was credited with its production.

An interesting and characteristic fact about Susan Ferrier is, that she wrote only three novels: Marriage (1818), The Inheritance (1824), Destiny (1831), and despite the urgent appeal of her publisher and the unequivocal success of her stories, she declined to add to their number. What Miss Edgeworth did for Irish life, Miss Ferrier did for Scottish. The two writers had no little in common—humour, observation, and a vein of earnest didacticism, but Miss Ferrier's work shows greater variety.

The idea of Marriage—the incursion of a fashionable young woman into the rough, dour atmosphere of a Highland home—is carried out with abundant force and humour. Her father, an impecunious peer, nourished ambitious notions for his daughter's future, and when she elopes with a good looking but poor young Scotchman, he promptly disowns her. Accordingly, her husband takes her to his father's house, which Lady Juliana idealises in her own mind, as a romantic and delightful place. The reality proves a severe shock.

MARRIAGE

Just at that moment they had gained the summit of a very high hill, and the post-boy, stopping to give his horses breath, turned round to the carriage, pointing at the same time, with a significant gesture, to a tall thin grav house, something resembling a tower, that stood in the vale beneath. A small sullen-looking lake was in front, on whose banks grew neither tree nor shrub. Behind, rose a chain of rugged cloud-capped hills, on the declivities of which were some faint attempts at young plantations, and the only level ground consisted of a few dingy turnip fields, enclosed with stone walls, or dykes, as the post-boy called them. It was now November, the day was raw and cold; and a thick drizzling rain was beginning to fall. A dreary stillness reigned all around, broken only at intervals by the screams of the sea-fowl that hovered over the lake, on whose dark and troubled waters was dimly discerned a little boat, plied by one solitary being.

"What a scene!" at length Lady Juliana exclaimed, shuddering as she spoke. "Good God, what a scene! How I pity the unhappy wretches who are doomed to dwell in such a place! and yonder hideous grim house—it makes me sick to look at it. For heaven's sake, bid him drive on!" Another significant look from the driver made the colour mount to Douglas' cheeks, as he stammered out, "Surely it can't be, yet somehow I don't know. Pray, my lady," letting down one of the glasses, and addressing the post-boy, "what is the name of that house?"

"Hoose!" repeated the driver, "ca' ye then a hoose! Thon's gude Glenferm Castle."

In the second novel, The Inheritance, the characterisation of Scottish folk is even richer and racier. One of the characters, Miss Pratt, is not unworthy of Jane Austen's pen, and her loquacity and habit of quoting the opinion of an entirely supposititious nephew, may possibly have suggested to Dickens the invention of that more delightful myth, Mrs. Harris.

Destiny is written in the same key as its predecessor, and deals with much the same life. Perhaps it is more forced than its companions, but shows no marked falling off in power.

The description of Mrs. Fairbairn is among Miss Ferrier's happiest sketches, and well illustrates both her humour and observation.

"Mrs Fairbairn was one of those ladies, who, from the time she became a mother, ceased to be anything else. All the duties, pleasures, charities, and decencies of life were henceforth concentrated in that one grand characteristic, every object in life was henceforth viewed through that single medium. Her own mother was no longer her mother, she was the grandmother of her dear infants, her brothers and sisters were mere uncles and aunts, and even her husband ceased to be thought of as her husband from the time he became a father. He was no longer the being who had claims on her time, her thoughts, her talents, her affections, he was simply Mr Fairbairn, the noun masculine of Mrs Fairbairn, and the father of her children. Happily for Mr. Fairbairn he was not a person of very nice feelings or refined taste; and although at first he did feel a little unpleasant when he saw how much his children were preferred to himself, yet in time he became accustomed to it, then came to look upon Mrs Fairbairn as the most exemplary of mothers, and finally resolved himself into the father of a very fine family, of which Mrs. Fairbairn was the mother."

Another name that belongs to this period, although the writer lived on, like Miss Ferrier, to the mid-nineteenth century, is Miss MARY RUSSELL MITFORD (1787-1855). She was a gentle, kindly woman, burdened with a plausible, spendthrift father, of the Horace Skimpole genus, in whom she credulously trusted. Her work is of a miscellaneous character, she wrote verse, tried her hand at tragedies, and later in life wrote a disappointing autobiography.

Despite the fact that she had known many interesting people, she had small gift of making them live in the pages of her Recollections (1852), though their range is surprising, including on one hand references to the prodigality of Sheridan's entertainment, and pleasant references to James Payn and Ruskin on the other.

But the work by which she will be known is Our Village (1824-1832), a series of charming sketches of rural life, flavoured with delicate humour and unmistakably feminine throughout. Living through the revival of Romanticism, she belongs by temperament and method to the later eighteenth century, to the school of manners of which Fanny Burney was a pioneer, and Jane Austen the mistress craftsman.

OUR VILLAGE

The avenue is quite alive to-day. Old women are picking up twigs and acorns, and pigs of all sizes doing their utmost to spare them the latter part of the trouble; boys and girls groping for beech-nuts under yonder clump; and a group of younger elves collecting as many dead leaves as they can find to feed the bonfire which is smoking away so briskly amongst the trees,—a sort of rehearsal of the grand bonfire nine days hence, of the loyal conflagration of the arch-traitor Guy Vaux, which is annually solemnised in the avenue, accompanied with as much squibbery and crackery as our boys can beg or borrow—not to say steal. Ben Kirby is a great man on the 6th of November. All the savings of a month, the hoarded halfpence, the new farthings, the very luck-penny, go off in fumo on that night. For my part, I like this daylight mockery better. There is no gunpowder—odious gunpowder! no noise but the merry shouts of the small fry, so shrill and happy, and the cawing of the rooks, who are wheeling in large circles overhead, and wondering what is going forward in their territory—seeming in their loud clamour to ask what that light smoke may mean that curls so prettily amongst their old oaks, towering as if to meet the clouds. There is something very intelligent in the ways of that black people the rooks, particularly in their wonder. I suppose it results from their numbers and their unity of purpose, a sort of collective and corporate wisdom. Yet geese congregate also, and geese never by any chance look wise. But then geese are a domestic fowl, we have spoiled them; and rooks are free commoners of nature, who use the habitations we provide for them, tenant our groves, and our avenues, but never dream of becoming our subjects.

JANE AUSTEN

Jane Austen was born on December 16, 1775, at Steventon, near Basingstoke, a tiny village amid the chalk hills of North Hants. Her father was rector of the place, her mother, Cassandra, the daughter of the Rev. Thomas Leigh, and niece of the famous wit, Theophilus Leigh, for many years Master of Balliol. Jane was the youngest of seven children, and her life was singularly tranquil and uneventful. Occasional private theatricals, and a rare visit to Bath and London, broke the gentle monotony of her home life. We gather that she was a great reader, knew something of modern languages, and was an excellent needlewoman, "especially in satin stitch." Little, however, is known of her, and none of the letters that survive tell us anything of her inner life.

In person she was "a tall, slender, clear brunette," with hazel eyes, good features, and curly brown hair. In temperament cool, detached, reserved, keenly humorous. Beyond the mild flirtations of the countryside that accompanied dancing and tea-making and theatricals, we have no evidence of any emotional crisis in her life. In fact, at every point almost she presents the exact antithesis to the other daughter of a country parson destined later on to make the Yorkshire moors articulate.

She died in 1817, of consumption, and was buried at Winchester, in the north aisle of the cathedral.

HER WORK

Jane Austen was a born story-teller, and revelled in it from early years. She wrote from sheer love of writing, was not sensitive to criticism, her stories being published anonymously during her lifetime.

Someone has said that in politics she was a mild Tory. Mildness and equability certainly characterised her general attitude throughout life. There were no extremes in her nature. Singularly judicial, she formed no violent estimates of people, and is scrupulously fair in her pictures.

And about what are her pictures?

The tattle, the trivialities of life in a small country town, when tea-time was an exciting event, and a subscription ball a crisis in one's career; when romance expressed itself in country walks (usually with a chaperone), when tragedy hinged upon the non-appearance at the cross-roads of the agreeable young man who danced so well at the ball.

Faithful observation, personal detachment, and a fine sense of ironic comedy are among Jane Austen's chief characteristics as a writer. As a testimony to her excellent sense and good feeling, one may say that, subjected to all the snobberies that abound in provincial towns, she never showed any trace of being affected by them. Not greatly affected by social miseries, she was in a measure sympathetic and tolerant towards the poor; and without the faintest weakness for the aristocrat and well-to-do. She did not pretend to be a social reformer, and it is useless and foolish to gird at her because the underworld is always kept out of view. But this one may always find in her books—an entire absence of simulation of feelings. Folly she ridicules wherever she finds it. Sin she excuses wherever she can; judging a man and woman by their opportunities in life.

Five novels alone stand to her credit: Pride and Prejudice, 1796-7; Northanger Abbey, 1798; Sense and Sensibility, 1797; Mansfield Park, 1814; Emma, 1816. Persuasion, written in 1816, was not published till after her death; another novel, Lady Susan, was never published, and The Watsons she left unfinished.

Her first biographer claimed for her a modest place beside Fanny Burney and Maria Edgeworth, but since that time many a great critic has sung her praises in the loftiest strains.

No one has expressed the peculiar quality of her art more happily than Scott: "The big bow-wow strain I can do myself, like any now going, but the exquisite touch that renders commonplace things and characters interesting from the truth of the description and the sentiment is denied me."

The secret of her power lies in the complete mastery she has as an artist over her material. She was finely alive to her limitations, never touched a character or scene she did not thoroughly know, and never invented a story or personage which she did not subject to such minutely intimate treatment that the reader feels as if it were all a fragment of autobiography.

CHARACTERISTICS

(1) Her Faithful Observation.—The art of observation is an art that every great novelist necessarily excels in, for the first essential in any story is the illusion of reality. No exuberance or fertility of imagination can take its place; nor is this illusion possible without the patient, observant fidelity of the painter with the phenomena of life as they present themselves to the painter's vision.

Defoe was a sound observer, he knew his middle-class citizens and he knew his vagabonds, but the examples he gives us are types rather than individuals. Crusoe is a God-fearing London citizen ready to combine good sense and piety; Moll Flanders, a ne'er-do-well, Captain Singleton, a dashing adventurer. We appreciate the class to which they belong and their general fidelity to life. But they are not individualised. He is more concerned to make us accept his incidents as credible than his characters as real. Richardson, far more concerned with individualisation, gives greater solidarity to his characters—his feminine ones especially; but being devoid of humour, his power to visualise, though strong, is not varied. It has been said that we can see all round his characters; the present writer confesses his inability in this direction. Certain qualities he sees very clearly, but one and all are too drenched in sentiment for any complete appraisement. Fielding's great humour intensifies his vision, and in such characters as Parson Adams and Squire Western, we feel in the presence of individual characters, not types.

The special charm of Jane Austen's novels lies, not in any greater insight into character, but in the fine impartiality with which she individualises and differentiates them. Her compass is not great, but within it she never fails. It is certainly significant that her favourite poet should have been Crabbe, for Crabbe was a minute observer. He described Nature like an unimaginative naturalist, and much as he loved the country poor, he never spares them, never idealises them. His pictures are finely dispassionate. Jane Austen, also loving her kind, loved them with the joy of the scientist. She found them crowding about her tea parties, her church gatherings, her balls, and she reproduced them for us with an unemotional fidelity, sometimes a little cruel, but never unfair.

She was perfectly acquainted with her métier, and never attempted what was out of her line. Once, on being asked to write an historical romance, she replied:

"I am fully sensible that (such a romance) might be much more to the purpose of profit or popularity than such pictures of domestic life in country villages as I deal in. But I could no more write a romance than an epic poem. I could not sit seriously down to write a serious romance under any other motive than to save my life, and if it were indispensable for me to keep it up and never relax into laughing at myself or at any other people, I am sure I should be hung before I had finished the first chapter. No, I must keep to my own style and go on in my own way; and though I may never succeed again in that, I am convinced that I should totally fail in any other."

Nor did she concern herself with social problems, and we feel no more the curse of poverty in her books than we feel the power of passion that sweeps through the writings of Charlotte and Emily Brontë.

Yet curiously enough, for all her minute observation, she rarely describes personal appearance. Jane Eyre and Becky Sharp are familiar enough in their outward appearance; but Elizabeth Bennet and Miss Bates we could only recognise when we had heard them talk.

Take for instance this scene from Emma:

"The whole party were assembled, excepting Frank Churchill, who was expected every moment from Richmond, and Miss Elton, in all her apparatus of happiness, her large bonnet and her basket, was very ready to lead the way in gathering, accepting, or talking. Strawberries, and only strawberries, could now be thought or spoken of. 'The best fruit in England—everybody's favourite—always wholesome. These, the finest beds and finest sorts. Delightful to gather for one's self—the only way of really enjoying them. Morning decidedly the best time—never tired—every sort good—Hautboy infinitely superior—no comparison—the others hardly eatable—Hautboys very scarce—Chels preferred—White Wood finest flavour of all—price of strawberries in London—abundance about Bristol—Maple Grove—cultivation—beds when to be renewed—gardeners thinking exactly different—no general rule—gardeners never to be put out of their way—delicious fruit—only too rich to be eaten much of—inferior to cherries—currants more refreshing—only objection to gathering strawberries the stooping—glaring sun—tired to death—could bear it no longer—must go and sit in the shade.'"

Mr. Collins, that delicious illustration of the servile cleric, might easily be passed in the street, but he is stamped for ever upon our memories by his speech.

"My reasons for marrying are, first, that I think it a right thing for every clergyman in easy circumstances (like myself) to set the example of matrimony in his parish, secondly, that I am convinced it will add very greatly to my happiness, and, thirdly, which perhaps I ought to have mentioned earlier, that it is the particular advice and recommendation of the very noble lady whom I have the honour of calling patroness. Twice has she condescended to give me her opinion (unasked too!) on this subject; and it was but the very Saturday night before I left Hunsford,—between our pools at quadrille, while Mrs. Jenkinson was arranging Miss de Bourgh's footstool,—that she said, 'Mr. Collins, you must marry. A clergyman like you must marry. Choose properly, choose a gentlewoman for my sake, and for your own, let her be an active, useful sort of person, not brought up high, but able to make a small income go a good way. This is my advice. Find such a woman as soon as you can, bring her to Hunsford, and I will visit her.' Allow me by the way to observe, my fair cousin, that I do not reckon the notice and kindness of Lady Catherine de Bourgh as among the least of the advantages in my power to offer. You will find her manners beyond anything I can describe, and your wit and vivacity, I think, must be acceptable to her, especially when tempered with the silence and respect which her rank will inevitably excite. Thus much for my general intention in favour of matrimony, it remains to be told why my views were directed to Longbourn instead of my own neighbourhood, where I assure you there are many amiable young women. But the fact is, that being, as I am, to inherit this estate after the death of your honoured father (who, however, may live many years longer,) I could not satisfy myself without resolving to choose a wife from among his daughters, that the loss to them might be as little as possible when the melancholy event takes place which, however, as I have already said, may not be for several years. This has been my motive, my fair cousin, and I flatter myself it will not sink me in your esteem. And now nothing remains for me but to assure you in the most animated language of the violence of my affection. To fortune I am perfectly indifferent, and shall make no demand of that nature on your father, since I am well aware that it could not be complied with, and that one thousand pounds in the four per cents, which will not be yours till after your mother's decease, is all that you may ever be entitled to. On that head, therefore, I shall be uniformly silent, and you may assure yourself that no ungenerous reproach shall ever pass my lips when we are married."

Humour touches and illuminates all her best characters

Mrs. Bennet laments that after her husband's death she may be turned out. "My dear," says her husband, "do not give way to such gloomy thoughts. Let us hope for better things. Let us flatter ourselves that I may be the survivor."

(2) Her Power of Self-detachment—She was serene and equable, caring for many things but for nothing in an especial degree. Most things amused her, few things angered her. She greets those she dislikes with a slight contemptuous smile, she never rages at them, as Fielding would. And this power of self-detachment, of eliminating from her story those strong predilections that often sway an author's creations, enabled her to be an artist pure and simple. There is no didacticism, no philosophy, no propaganda in her fictions. We have a perfect picture of provincial life in the early eighteenth century; a delicate water-colour to put beside the more vigorous oil-painting of Fielding.

(3) Her Sense of Comedy—Miss Austen's tales are not laughter provoking, but they leave a rippling sense of pleasure behind them. Her humour is quiet, delicate, ironical. She is not a satirist, for satire connotes moral purpose. Jane Austen never lashed our follies, she faintly arched her eyebrows and passed on. There is scarcely any scene she did not see and did not touch on the humorous side, whether the fear of ghosts (Northanger Abbey), private theatricals (Mansfield Park), a picnic (Emma), a proposal (Persuasion). But she never exaggerates the fun.

She is at her best perhaps in little strokes, and delicate touches. "Her father was a clergyman without being neglected or poor, and a very respectable man though his name was Richard and he had never been handsome"¹

These touches may be appreciated best in such an apparently unpromising subject as Emma going to the front door, to watch the slow life of the place.

"Emma went to the door for amusement. Much could not be hoped from the traffic of even the busiest part of Highbury—Mr. Perry walking hastily by, Mr. William Cox letting himself in at the office door; Mr. Cole's carriage horses returning from exercise; or a stray little boy, or an obstinate mule, were the liveliest objects she could presume to expect; and when her eyes fell on the butcher with his tray, a tidy old woman travelling homewards from shop with her full basket, two curs quarrelling over a dirty bone, and a string of dawdling children round the baker's little bay window, eyeing the gingerbread, she knew she had no reason to complain, and was amused enough, quite enough, still to stand by the door."

At a time when sentimentalism was in the hey-day of its glory, when folk wept over Richardson and shuddered over Mrs. Radcliffe, or if indisposed for these things relished the stronger fare of Fielding and Smollett, the departure made by Jane Austen required no small courage and self-reliance. She is the disciple of no school, though well read and appreciative of the great writers of the day. She felt she could do certain things well and she did them, neither deterred by lack of appreciation, nor tempted to seek popularity by reason of material disadvantages.

Her circumstances helped her to give that finish and delicacy to her work, that had Fate been harsher might have proved impossible. There is a cool radiance about all her work, a happy sanity. It was part of her everyday life, to be placed aside should a visitor come, to be resumed when he left, to be pursued unostentatiously and tranquilly in the midst of the family circle. She knew precisely what she wanted to do, and she did it in the way that suited her best. Certainly she has had her reward.

(d) LETTER AND MEMOIR WRITERS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

MEMOIR literature enjoys a greater vogue in France than in England, but the zest for experimentalising in literature that began to be noticeable about the close of the seventeenth century and continued throughout the eighteenth, led to the creation of a class of books, written for amusement rather than for any ulterior purpose. Authorship became a pleasant game for many people of leisure, and those who in an earlier age would have indited sonnets, and penned amatory lyrics, now turned their attention to satiric verse, gossip letters on things in general, or political squibs.

By means of this light, discursive literature, we have a steady flow of illuminating gossip on the life of the time, highly valuable to the social historian.

LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU came of an aristocratic Whig family, was connected by blood with the diarist Evelyn, and was a distant relation also of Pepys. This link with the great diarist, agreeably symbolises the literary affinity that binds together the diarist and memoir writers.

Born in 1689, she was very beautiful as a child.

and her proud father is said to have toasted her at the famous Kit Cat Club. His ideas on the subject of marriage, however, did not coincide with hers, so she eloped with Edward Wortley Montagu in 1712, who was greatly attracted by her graces of mind and body. In 1718 Montagu went as ambassador to Constantinople, accompanied by his wife, and in this way material was collected for her Turkish Letters. Many of these had been prepared with a view to publication, but though known to a circle of friends, were not published until after Lady Mary's death. The writer had donned Turkish dress while abroad, and made a close study of Turkish customs. This enabled her to dispel a good deal of Saxon prejudice and ignorance about the Ottoman character. On her return she lived in England for some years, and then, unaccompanied by her husband, went abroad again for a considerable period, soon after her daughter, in true filial imitation, had eloped with Lord Bute. From Italy she wrote frequently to her daughter, and the letters are among her best. In them her keen humour and intellectual alertness are clearly shown; she is equally happy either in describing her life at home (not far from Brescia) or in commenting on the fiction of Richardson and Smollett, that had been imported for her special benefit. In 1761 she returned to England, only to die of cancer in the next year.

As a writer, her fame rests entirely upon her letters. She wrote satirical verse in imitation of Gay and Pope, the lighter verse tolerably good, the more serious indifferently so. Her Diary, which might have proved of the greatest interest, was left to her daughter and burnt by her just before her death.

Although there was no open rupture with her husband, her deliberate seclusion in Italy for so many years gave rise to many rumours and scandals, and among her enemies were Pope and Horace Walpole.

Undoubtedly she was the cleverest woman of her day, with a certain hardness in her nature and with no wealth of wit sufficient to compensate for this; but with much solid sense and keen insight into character. As a letter writer she has a clear, lively, and natural style.

AS A LETTER WRITER

You may guess how this disguises them, so that there is no distinguishing the great lady from her slave. 'Tis impossible for the most jealous husband to know his wife when he meets her, and no man dare follow a woman in the street. This perpetual masquerade gives them entire liberty of following their inclinations without danger of discovery. The most usual method of intrigue is, to send an appointment to the lover to meet the lady at a Jew's shop, which are as notoriously convenient as our Indian houses. The great ladies seldom let their gallants know who they are, and it is so difficult to find it out, that they can very seldom guess at her name they have corresponded with above half a year together. You may easily imagine the number of faithful wives very small in a country where they have nothing to fear from a lover's indiscretion, since we see so many that have the courage to expose themselves to that in this world, and all the threatened punishment of the next, which is never preached to Turkish damsels."

HER CRITICISM

Well-turned periods or smooth lines are not the perfection either of prose or verse, they may serve to adorn, but can never stand in the place of good sense. Copiousness of words, however ranged, is always false eloquence, though it will ever impose on some sorts of understandings. How many readers and admirers has Madame de Sévigné, who only gives us in a lively manner and fashionable phrases, mean sentiments, vulgar prejudices, and endless repetitions? Sometimes the title-tattle of a fine lady, sometimes that of an old nurse, always title-tattle; yet so well gilt over by airy expressions and a flowing style, she will always please the same people to whom Lord Bolingbroke will shine as a first-rate author. . . . His confederacy with Swift and Pope puts me in mind of that of Bessus and his swordsmen in the King or no King? who endeavour to support themselves by giving certificates of each other's merit. Pope has triumphantly declared that they may do and say whatever silly things they please, they will still be the greatest geniuses nature ever exhibited.

HER OUTLOOK ON LIFE

At length, by so much importunity,
Take, Molly, at once the inside of my breast.
Thus stupid indifference so often you blame,
Is not owing to nature, to fear, or to shame;

I am not as cold as a virgin in lead,
Nor are Sunday's sermons so strong in my head:
I know but too well how time flies along,
That we live but few years, and yet fewer are young.

But I hate to be cheated, and never will buy
Long years of repentance for moments of joy.
Oh! was there a man (but where shall I find Good sense and good nature so equally joined?)
Would value his pleasure, contribute to mine;
Not meanly would boast, nor loudly design,
Not over severe, yet not stupidly vain,
For I would have the power, yet not give the pain.

No pedant, yet learned, no rake-helly gay,
Or laughing because he has nothing to say;
To all my own sex obliging and free,
But never be fond of any but me;
In public preserve the decorum that's just,
And show in his eyes he is true to his trust!
Then rarely approach, and respectfully bow,
But not fulsomely pert, nor yet toppishly low.

But when the long hours of public are past,
And we meet with champagne and a chicken at last,
May every fond pleasure that moment endear,
Be banished afar both discretion and fear!
Forgetting or scorning the airs of the crowd,
He may cease to be formal, and I to be proud,
Till lost in the joy, we confess that we live,
And he may be rude, and yet I may forgive.

And that my delight may be solidly fixed,
Let the friend and the lover be handsomely mixed;
In whose tender bosom my soul may confide,
Whose kindness can soothe me, whose counsel can guide.

From such a dear lover as here I describe,
No danger should fright me, no millions should bribe.
But till this astonishing treatment I know,
As I long have lived chaste, I will keep myself so.

I never will share with the wanton coquette,
Or be caught by a vain affection of wit.
The toasters and songsters may try all their art,
But never shall enter the pass of my heart.
I loathe the lewd rake, the dressed idling despoiler.
Before such pursuers the nice virgin flies,
And as Ovid has sweetly in parable told,
We harden like trees, and like rivers grow cold.

Another letter writer and diarist is MARY CLAVERING, who married Lord Cowper. She entered the household of Queen Caroline in 1714, and kept a diary which, though much of it was destroyed by fire, gives amusing sidelights on the doings of the Hanoverian Court. What survived was edited by Spencer Compton in 1864. It has no special literary charm, but is certainly interesting in its way. Lady Cowper knew most of the literary men of the time—Swift, Young, Gay, Arbuthnot, Horace Walpole, Lord Chesterfield; and was on excellent terms with Pope, as the following compliment shows:

("Envy, be silent and attend!")
I know a reasonable woman,
Handsome and witty, yet a friend."

Another contemporary is John, Lord HERVEY, of whom Lady Mary Montagu said "the human race was divided into men, women, and Hervey's." He was an excellent wit and a rhymester of fair capacity, and between his family and Lady Mary there was a strong bond of friendship.

Naturally, therefore, Pope disliked him and pilloried him in the Dunciad. Nor was Pope his only mordant critic. However, he could take care of himself, and retaliated with equal spirit and bitterness in his Memoirs.

Sir Robert Walpole made use of Hervey's acid pen while he was in power, and he took service under the Government as Lord Privy Seal, distinguishing himself as a vigorous pamphleteer. His Memoirs, published after his death, give a highly satirical picture of Court life during the reign of George II, and with the exception of the Queen and the Princess Caroline, none escaped his gift of cynical portraiture.

Of a very different stamp is PHILIP DORMER STANHOPE, fourth Earl of Chesterfield, born in 1694. After a brief but fairly important political career (at one time he was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland), he retired upon literature in 1748, whether from doancess or ennui, or a combination of those, it is hard to determine. His literary fame rests upon his letters to his illegitimate son. As a letter writer he is certainly remarkable, though in no way like to any of the other letter writers with whom we have been dealing. Mannered and circumspect to an irritating degree, he was a good writer of the precise school, a versatile scholar, and a man of shrewd judgment.

As for his general outlook on life, perhaps no saying of his is more self-illuminating than his well-known dictum: "If there were no God it would be necessary to create one."

Among the many letter writers of the time, however, there is no one whose personality and work is more original and provocative than Walpole's.

HORACE WALPOLE, the third son of the famous Sir Robert, was born in 1717, went to Eton and Cambridge, and spent his earlier years in travel. Although at a later time he became an active politician, he did not distinguish himself in this capacity, and his fame rests on his varied contributions to literature.

Among his more notable writings are Historic Doubts, Anecdotes of Paintings, The Castle of Otranto, and above all, his letters.

Of his Castle of Otranto some detailed mention is made elsewhere. Here he may be regarded merely as a letter writer. With the exception of Pope, it is questionable whether any writer of the age caught more exquisitely the affectations and artificialities of the time than did this fop of genius.

He is the very prince of gossips, and the acrid effeminacy of the man, little as it redounds to his credit as a personality, proved invaluable to him in this capacity. Had he been less fond of tea parties, less prone to tattle, his letters would have lost half their savour. Beside him, Lady Mary and Lord Chesterfield seem astoundingly heavy-handed in their satire. Horace Walpole had a delicacy of touch, a neat and airy deftness, more Gallic than English.

That this cynical trifler should be one of the precursors of the Romantic revival, one of the pioneers of the mediæval enthusiasts, is one of the pleasant paradoxes of literary history.

Perhaps the cynical and flippant side of the man has been over-emphasized. We have to remember the tone and character of the society in which he moved, and when we come across glimpses in his letters of genuine friendliness, and kindness of heart, and recall his fine enthusiasm for our old cathedrals, and his undoubted artistic feeling and predilection for the mystery and romance of a by-gone age, we may not unreasonably conjecture, that a good deal of his trifling was a pose, and that there was more substance in him than is commonly allowed.

However that may be, and taking him at his own estimate in his letters, he is certainly a consummate maker of trifles, and an admirable painter of the foibles of his time.

EXTRACT FROM LETTER TO THE COUNTESS OF AILESBUURY

June 13, 1761 I never ate such good stuff, nor smelt such delightful bombons, as your ladyship has sent me. Every time you rob the duke's dessert, does it cost you a pretty snuff-box? Do the pastors at the Hague enjoy such expensive retributions? If a man steals a kiss there, I suppose he does penance in a sheet of Brussels lace. The comical part is that you own the theft, and send it me, but say nothing of the vehicle of your repentance. In short, madam, the box is the prettiest thing I ever saw, and I give you a thousand thanks for it.

When you comfort yourself about the operas, you don't know what you have lost, nay, nor I neither, for I was here, concluding that a serenata for a birthday would be as dull and as vulgar as those festivities generally are, but I hear of nothing but the enchantment of it. There was a second orchestra in the footman's gallery, disguised by clouds and filled with the music of the king's chapel. The choristers behaved like angels, and the harmony between the two bands was in the most exact time. Eliza piqued herself, and beat both heaven and earth. The joys of the year do not end there. The under-actors open at Drury-lane to-night with a new comedy by Murphy, called All in the Wrong. At Ranelagh all is fire-works and sky-rockets. The birthday exceeded the splendour of Haroun Alraschid and the Arabian Nights, when people had nothing to do but to scour a lantern, and send a gem for a hamper of diamonds and rubies. Do you remember one of those stories, where a prince has eight statues of diamonds, which he overlooks because he fancies he wants a ninth, and to his great surprise the ninth proves to be pure flesh and blood, which he never thought of? Somehow or other, Lady — is the ninth statue; and, you will allow, has better red and white than if she was made of pearls and rubies.

I enclose the list your ladyship desired. You will see that the Plurality of Worlds are Moore's, and of some I do not know the authors. There is a late edition with those names to them.

My duchess was to set out this morning. I saw her for the last time the day before yesterday at Lady Kildare's. — never was a journey less a party of pleasure. She was so melancholy, that all Miss —'s oddness and my spirits could scarce make her smile. Towards the end of the night, and that was three in the morning, I did divert her a little. I slipped Pam into her lap, and then taxed her with having it there. She was quite confounded; but, taking it up, saw he had a telescope in his hand, which I had drawn, and that the oard, which was split, and just waxed together, contained these lines:

Ye simple astronomers, lay by your glasses;
The transit of Venus has proved you all asses:
Your telescopes signify nothing to scan it:
'Tis not meant in the clouds; 'tis not meant of a planet:
The seer who foretold it mistook or deceives us;
For Venus's transit is when Grafton leaves us.

I don't send your ladyship these verses as good, but to show you that all gallantry does not centre at the Hague.

HISTORIANS FROM THE SIXTEENTH TO THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

THE art of the historian and the art of the novelist are closely related. In both cases a faculty for story-telling and a sense of characterisation are of high importance. There is a scientific side to history, with which fiction is not concerned, demanding such gifts as balance of judgment, veracity of outlook, and power of reasoning. History is not a science, and by the variability of its data cannot be regarded as such, but a scientific study of its phenomena is certainly helpful in giving it weight and value. With the scientific side it is clear we are not concerned here as students of literature. What does concern us is the artistic side, the power of painting human life and human institutions with vitality and actuality. That the picture may be one-sided, perchance based on documents of doubtful value, will prejudice its scientific value, but need not divest it of fidelity to human nature and arresting power over the imagination. So while veracity and balance of judgment are rightly considered as essential to the great historian, he must first of all be a literary artist in some measure, or his other qualities will count as nothing.

The first important departure from the crowd of chroniclers and annalists that meet us in the Middle Ages and Earlier Renaissance, is signalled by Bacon in his History of the Reign of Henry VII. Here, at any rate, there is something of the art and insight without which the historian becomes little better than a compiler. There is a measure of the same seriousness of purpose in Lord Herbert of Cherbury's Life of Henry VIII., and Lord Herbert was better circumstanced than Bacon when he wrote his history, in being able to avail himself of many original documents.

There is sanity and sobriety in Archbishop Spottiswood's History of the Church of Scotland, while in Irish history, Spenser's View of the Present State of Ireland, dominated as it is by matters of personal interest, is none the less a remarkable picture of Elizabethan politics.

At this point, something may be said of some of the materials of history with which the Stuart period is rich. Strictly speaking, State papers and letters do not belong to historical literature, except where here and there a letter or a document may possess some artistic value apart from the bald statement of fact contained in it. But the stuff of history bears so intimate a connection with historical literature, and merges often so insensibly into it, that it is scarcely out of place to devote some attention to the matter.

JOHN RUSHWORTH'S collection of Private Passages of State, and Remarkable Proceedings in Five Parliaments, is the first really important collection of English State Papers. Rushworth was Clerk's Assistant to the House of Commons, and secretary to the Council of War in 1648. These volumes contain valuable first-hand evidence of the political and ecclesiastical embroilments of the time. The last volume ends with the trial of Strafford.

Thurloe's well-known name comes next—JOHN THURLOE, the secretary of Oliver Cromwell—and in his collection of State Papers we deal with much that throws light on the policy of Cromwell, both at home and abroad. These may be supplemented by the letters and speeches of CROMWELL himself, made familiar to us by Carlyle. He was a born letter writer, and his rugged forcefulness, his religious conviction, and shrewd insight, are well exhibited in them.

Equally admirable in a different way, is the correspondence of Sir HARRY WOTTON, the friend of Donne, the author of a fine poem, "Ye meaner Beauties of the night," the subject of an elegy by Cowley and a biography by Izaak Walton.

Born in 1568 in Kent, he was educated at Winchester and Oxford, afterwards spending several years in travel. Under James he was thrice Ambassador at Venice, and finally became Provost of Eton, dying in 1639. He was a voluminous letter writer, and in his official letters to James he salted his political reports with attractive humour. Outside of his correspondence, his literary projects were fragmentary but suggestive, especially the Characters of Essex and Buckingham. A pleasant style and a fresh and vigorous outlook, distinguish his work. Equally vigorous are the letters of the ill-fated Strafford (1611–1640).

Turning to the time of the Civil War, we have in addition to the material furnished by Thurloe and Cromwell, the FAIRFAX Correspondence and the Letters and Papers of the VERNEY Family down to 1639, merging later into the Memoirs of the Verney Family.

A good picture is given in the Verney Memoirs of the discomforts and miseries suffered by the families of Royalists during the Civil War. The discomforts, one might say, were general—London was in a perpetual ferment and unrest from the day when Charles attempted the arrest of the five members. The extraordinary sums voted by the citizens on behalf of the Parliament, the general atmosphere of bitter party dissension, made it a very miserable time for quiet folk of whatever party. Sir Ralph Verney had neither sided with the King in his prosperity, nor would fight against him in his adversity. Naturally he had enemies on either side, and his wife was hard put to it, during his absence abroad, to look after his interests.

She thus writes in 1646

"We are at this very instant safely arrived here in Southwark, but extremely weary that I can scarce hold my pen. All provisions are most extremely dear, beef fourpence, veal and mutton eightpence per pound, corn above eight shillings the bushel. Famine is very much feared. There was never so much disorder as is now in the Towne, for everie one is as much discontented as too possible. The Butchers have begun the way to all the rest, for within this too days they all did rise upon the exise men and burnt downe the exise house and flung the exise money forth into the middle of the street, and they say beat some of the exise men. The Houses were in much disorder upon this but dare not hang any of them; they say they will leave this to the law, which cannot hang them for the law only makes itt a rott."

Again, here is a comment on the Puritan preachers:

"One hears a very strange sort of sarvis, and in such a tone that most people do nothing but laughs at it. And everybody that receives must be examined before the Elders, who they all swore asketh them such questions that would make me blush to relate."

Finally, we come to the Familiar Letters of JAMES HOWELL, Historiographer Royal to Charles II. These are more in the nature of political table-talk, and brief essays. He was a strong anti-puritan, and was not unduly particular to accuracy of statement, but he was often clear, pithy, and humorous; even when discursive and gossip, he rarely fails to be interesting.

CLARENDON, in his History of the Great Rebellion (published 1702-4), carries us a stage further in the development of historical literature. If as stylist he is inferior in clarity and grace to some who preceded him, he has a greater gift of narrative and a remarkable faculty for visualising his characters. In his sketches of Falkland, of Godolphin and Chillingworth, he has given us live and memorable portraits.

Contemporary with these writers is GILBERT BURNET (1643-1715), whose History of the Reformation (1679, 1682, and the third volume in 1714) had many of the qualities that distinguish Clarendon's work. It is of course frankly polemical and Protestant. There is an arresting quality in Burnet's ecclesiastical history, that marks also his later History of My Own Times (1723). More agreeable and varied as a writer than Clarendon, he is inferior to him in his faculty for telling a story. But there is life in his narrative, and actuality. Partisanship marks all the writers of this time, but both in Clarendon and Burnet, with all their limitations, there is an undeniable sense of reality which is a valuable acquisition to the art of history making.

HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES

He (Charles II) was affable and easy, and loved to be made so by all about him. The great art of keeping him long was the being easy and the making everything easy to him. He had made such observations on the French government, that he thought a king who might be checked or have his ministers called to an account by a parliament was but a king in name. He had a great compass of knowledge, though he was never capable of much application or study. He understood the mechanics and physic, and was a good chemist, and much set on several preparations of mercury, chiefly the fixing it. He understood navigation well, but above all he knew the architecture of ships so perfectly that in that respect he was exact rather more than became a prince. His apprehension was quick and his memory good. He was an everlasting talker. He told his stories with a good grace, but they came in his way too often. He had a very ill opinion both of men and women, and did not think that there was either sincerity or chastity in the world out of principle, but that some had either the one or the other out of humour or vanity. He thought that nobody did serve him out of love, and so he was quits with all the world, and loved others as little as he thought they loved him. He hated business, and could not be easily brought to mind any, but when it was necessary, and he was set to it, he would stay as long as his ministers had work for him. The ruin of his reign, and all his affairs, was occasioned chiefly by his delivering himself up at his first coming to a mad range of pleasure.

STEELE (1643-1737), equally well known for his Ecclesiastical Memorials (1721) has little of the literary power of Burnet or Clarendon, but he was a painstaking and sincere writer who took his work with a high seriousness, that showed the increasing interest in scholarly historical research.

Following these writers come JEREMY COLLIER, with his thoughtful, erudite, and somewhat pedestrian Ecclesiastical History (1708-14), and DANIEL NEAL, whose vigorous History of the Puritans (1732) is a valuable contribution to the history of Non-conformity.

Scotland has reason to be proud of ANDREW FLETCHER of Saltoun, a scholar and traveller, who had been trained early in life by Burnet himself, and whose writings on contemporary political subjects are marked by political insight and a charm and liveliness of style, uncommon at this time among Scottish prose writers. In one of his shorter pieces on Government, there is to be found the well-known saying referred to "a very wise man," that "if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of the nation."

HENRY ST. JOHN, 1st Viscount BOLINGBROKE, was born of ancient lineage, at Batterssea, in 1678, and educated at Eton. Profligate and dissipated in youth, he afterwards became one of the most brilliant and versatile men of his day—and the "guide, philosopher, and friend" of Pope.

In 1701 he entered Parliament, held several public offices, and negotiated the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. His intrigue to compass the downfall of Harley being successful, he ambitiously plots to restore the Stuart dynasty. The subsequent impeachment and fall of Bolingbroke in the prime of his manhood, is one of the well-known incidents in English political history.

Handsome and dignified in appearance, with extraordinary charm of voice and manner, and wonderful eloquence, it was said by a contemporary, however, that "few people believed in him without being deceived, or trusted him without being betrayed." His chief works are Reflections upon Exile, written during his first period in France, Letters on the Study of History, and a Letter on the True Use of Retirement, during his second visit; Letters on the Spirit of Patriotism, and Idea of a Patriot King. His death took place in 1751.

Bolingbroke's literary style is strongly impressed by his powers as an orator. The insincerity of the man, and the superficiality of his methods, must not blind us to the clarity, the neatness, the easy wit of his style. As a master of political invective he has few superiors; he was a good letter writer, and it has been said that he was "the first English writer to recognise and illustrate the cardinal principle of the continuity of history."

ROGER NORTH's (1653-1734) Lives of the Norths (1742-4) illustrates the growing interest in characterisation begetting an age of Fiction, and is rich in literary grace and in that lucidity of method and shrewdness of outlook characteristic of the best writers of the time.

About the middle of the eighteenth century the art of history-making shows still further development in the hands of Hume, Robertson, and Gibbon.

The clear, ironical method of HUME lends especial value to his fragmentary History of England, over which he took eight years. If less remarkable as an historian than as a philosopher, there is no doubt that his intellectual power and philosophical acuteness proved valuable assets in his historical writings.

WILLIAM ROBERTSON (1721-1793), with less intellectual force but no less literary ability, discloses in his History of Scotland and his History of the Reign of the Emperor Charles V (1769), careful research and philosophical breadth. Perhaps the point of superiority in these writers over earlier ones is the growth of the judicial and critical spirit and the broader philosophic outlook.

Goldsmith, by virtue of his delightful style, and Smollett with his vigorous gift of narrative, are names worth remembering in historical work, but they did nothing for the development of this subject, and can scarcely be called historians. What they did was to popularise history, and cause it to bulk more prominently in the public view.

We now come to EDWARD GIBBON, born at Putney in 1737; a delicate, precocious boy, educated at Westminster School and Magdalen College, Oxford, whither he went in 1752 "with a stock of crudition that might have puzzled a doctor, and a degree of ignorance of which a schoolboy would have been ashamed." He led a somewhat free and easy life at the university, and a study of certain controversial writings led him to join the Roman Church at the age of sixteen. Leaving Oxford, he was sent to Switzerland to pursue his education under different surroundings, and he eventually returned to Protestantism.

During the five years he was abroad, he travelled considerably, and while in Rome conceived the idea of writing his History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, and for six years was at work on the first volume, published in 1776. Meanwhile, interested in politics, in 1774 he became member for Liskeard, and afterwards Lymington, supporting the American policy of Lord North's ministry; he was appointed a commissioner on colonial trade, but no permanent Government post forthcoming, he threw up politics in 1783 and retired to Lausanne, where he led a simple, studious life, working hard on his magnum opus until June 27, 1787, when, "between the hours of eleven and twelve," he says, "I wrote the last lines of the last page in a summer house in my garden. The sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent."

With closing years came sorrow, bereavements, and indifferent health, and death came suddenly on January 16, 1794, while in London.

Gibbon was by far the greatest historian of his age, and one of the greatest of any age. As a literary stylist he is sufficiently remarkable, with his clear, imposing, rhythmic prose, but he is even more remarkable for that intuitive faculty that endows some men so richly with the historic sense quite apart from their scholarship. This faculty it is that enables Gibbon to present his work as an organic whole, with the details properly subordinate to the main structure.

Perhaps his only serious defect as an historian was his inability to understand enthusiasm, and the forces to which enthusiasm could give rise. This was a defect in many writers of his age, and if it qualifies our admiration for him as a thinker, it does not gravely affect his skill as an historian.

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE

The gensality of princes, if they were stripped of their purple and cast naked into the world, would immediately sink to the lowest rank of society, without a hope of emerging from their obscurity. But the personal merit of Julian was, in some measure, independent of his fortune. Whatever had been his choice of life, by the force of intrepid courage, lively wit, and intense application, he would have obtained, or at least he would have deserved, the highest honours of his profession, and Julian might have raised himself to the rank of minister or general of the state in which he was born a private citizen. If the jealous caprice of power had disappointed his expectations, if he had prudently declined the paths of greatness, the employment of the same talents in studious solitude would have placed beyond the reach of kings his present happiness and his immortal fame. When we inspect with minute, or perhaps malevolent, attention, the portrait of Julian, something seems wanting to the grace and perfection of the whole figure. His genius was less powerful and sublime than that of Caesar, nor did he possess the consummate prudence of Augustus. The virtues of Trajan appear more steady and natural, and the philosophy of Marcus is more simple and consistent. Yet Julian sustained adversity with firmness, and prosperity with moderation. After an interval of one hundred and twenty years from the death of Alexander Severus, the Romans beheld an emperor who made no distinction between his duties and his pleasures, who laboured to relieve the distress and to revive the spirit of his subjects, and who endeavoured always to connect authority with merit, and happiness with virtue. Even faction, and religious faction, was constrained to acknowledge the superiority of his genius in peace as well as in war, and to confess, with a sigh, that the apostate Julian was a lover of his country, and that he deserved the empire of the world.

EDMUND BURKE, like Gibbon, was one of the great prosemen of the age. Beyond that, the two men have nothing in common except being contemporaries and in the same literary set.

May we not imagine that many a young student entering Trinity College, Dublin, has been fired with enthusiasm to emulate one of those two famous Irishmen whose monuments stand like sentinels, on either side, guarding its main entrance—the one, Oliver Goldsmith, the other, that great orator, statesman and political writer, Edmund Burke?

Born in Dublin, in 1729, Burke was the son of an Irish lawyer and educated with two brothers at a Quaker school at Ballitore, co. Kildare, which he left two years later for Dublin University, taking his degree in 1748. His father wished him to become a lawyer, but not so the son. Though he came to London and was entered at the Middle Temple, he soon finds more congenial company within that famous circle over which Samuel Johnson presided, and concentrates his mind upon "his study of history and philosophy, the outcome of which was the anonymous publication of A Vindication of Natural Society in 1756, and an Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful, which attracted so much attention that it was translated into French and German. The following year appeared A Sketch of American History, in two volumes; and for several years he wrote the whole of the Annual Register, published by Dodsley.

It is not, however, in the domain of literature where Edmund Burke is best known. In 1761 politics claimed him. Acting as private secretary to "Single-Speech" Hamilton, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and four years later to the Marquis of Rockingham, the Prime Minister, paved the way for his entry into Parliament. As member for Wexford he was chosen in 1765, and for twenty-eight years there was scarcely a more prominent figure in the life of St. Stephen's. Certain disturbances arising out of the expulsion of John Wilkes by the House of Commons in 1768, had previous to this inspired his well-known Thoughts on the Present Discontents (1770).

Burke reached the pinnacle of fame in 1788, when he led the impeachment of Warren Hastings in a speech that lasted four days; during which he brought before his hearers the most vivid pictures of the beauties of the East as well as the horrors and desolation of the tortured Hindoos. Catholic emancipation, the abolition of the slave trade, and the great French Revolution likewise claimed his attention.

The year 1791 saw the break with his friend Charles James Fox, over the bill for the division of Canada. Burke's violent denunciation urged Fox to whisper, "There is no loss of friendship, I hope?" "Yes," said Burke, "there is loss of friendship. I know the price of my conduct: our friendship is at an end."

In 1794, retiring from public life to his beautiful home at Beaconsfield, Bucks, he met with a terrible blow in the death of his only son by rapid consumption. Burke's health gradually failed, and he died on July 7, 1797, and was buried in Beaconsfield Church.

Burke is first and foremost an orator. That must be remembered in estimating his manner and matter. He is therefore a great rhetorician, rich in passionate declamation, and excelling where splendour and force are required, though with little power of variety or delicacy of emphasis.

His gifts as a writer are nowhere better displayed than in his magnificent though one-sided Reflections on the Revolution in France—"Mother of all evil!"—in Burke's opinion.

In comparing Burke's prose at the close of the century, with the prose of Dryden in its early years, we cannot help noticing the gradual swing back of the pendulum to Renaissance models. Flinging off in Dryden all the glitter and colour of the Elizabethan prosemen, striving above all after plainness of speech, homeliness of phrase, and flexibility of method, the prosemen having tidied up the gorgeous confusion that beset so much of the prose at their start, grew tired of the plain veracity of speech, and gradually recaptured some of the golden qualities of the Elizabethan and Caroline writers.

But we are concerned here especially with the literary man as historian. What of Burke in this connection?

Burke deals with the history of his own time rather than with the past, and his claim upon us as an historian is that he brings to his work a lofty imagination, an impassioned manner, and a philosophical insight—qualities assuredly needed in the making of history. However, they may need balancing by the more pedestrian faculties of precision and judgment.

It is a fine tribute to Burke's power that his work, concerned as it is with the politics of his own age, should possess so much permanent value for the student of literature and history. The subjects with which he is concerned are big and important ones, for the transitional age in which he lived abounded in problems of striking and memorable importance, but his greatness is due less to the greatness of his subjects than to the greatness of his way of approaching them. To-day, we may realise clearly enough the inevitable character of that "red, fool fury of the Seine," which Tennyson epitomised in a neat but shallow phrase. But the price paid for the great upheaval, necessary as it may have been, was terrible and lamentable enough; and no one saw this side of it better than Burke, as his glowing tribute to Marie Antoinette testifies.

Sometimes he touches what seems to be a passing phase of political disturbance, as when he deals with the troubles in connection with John Wilkes, but he wrung from them a wise and coolly reasoned discussion of the dangers to English liberty that may lurk even in Parliamentary government. The breadth and largeness of his outlook is nowhere better illustrated than in the speech on Conciliation with America (1775), where he makes light of the legal argument in favour of taxing the Colonies taking up his position on the more durable ground of sense and expediency.

"The question with me is, not whether you have a right to render your people miserable, but whether it is not to your interest to make them happy."

There is always with Burke the immediate particular problem, that leads him to some wise and weighty generalisation, that has enriched our store of political maxims long after the occasion that evolved it has been forgotten.

THOUGHTS ON THE CAUSES OF PRESENT DISCONTENTS

To complain of the age we live in, to murmur at the present possessors of power, to lament the past, to conceive extravagant hopes of the future, are the common dispositions of the greatest part of mankind; indeed the necessary effects of the ignorance and levity of the vulgar. Such complaints and humours have existed in all times, yet as all times have not been alike, true political sagacity manifests itself in distinguishing that complaint which only characterises the general infirmity of human nature, from those which are symptoms of the particular distemperature of our own air and season.

ON CONCILIATION WITH AMERICA

If we mean to conciliate and concede; let us see of what nature the concession ought to be. To ascertain the nature of our concession, we must look at their complaint. The colonies complain, that they have not the characteristic mark and seal of British freedom. They complain that they are taxed in a parliament in which they are not represented. If you mean to satisfy them at all, you must satisfy them with regard to this complaint. If you mean to please any people, you must give them the boon which they ask; not what you think better for them, but of a kind totally different. Such an act may be a wise regulation, but it is no concession—whereas our present theme is the mode of giving satisfaction.

Sir, I think you must perceive, that I am resolved this day to have nothing at all to do with the question of the right of taxation. Some gentlemen startle—but it is true; I put it totally out of the question. It is less than nothing in my consideration. I do not indeed wonder, nor will you, sir, that gentlemen of profound learning are fond of displaying it on this profound subject. But my consideration is narrow, confined, and wholly limited to the policy of the question. I do not examine, whether the giving away a man's money be a power expected and reserved out of the general trust of government, and how far all mankind, in all forms of polity, are entitled to an exercise of that right by the charter of nature. Or whether, on the contrary, a right of taxation is necessarily involved in the general principle of legislation, and inseparable from the ordinary supreme power. These are deep questions, where great names militate against each other, where reason is perplexed, and an appeal to authorities only thickens the confusion. For high and reverend authorities lift up their heads on both sides; and there is no sure footing in the middle. This point is the great Serboman, between Damietta and Mount Carmel Old, where a misæ whole have sunk. I do not intend to be overwhelmed in that bog, though in such respectable company. The question with me is, not whether you have a right to render your people miserable, but whether it is not your interest to make them happy. It is not, what a lawyer tells me I may do, but what humanity, reason, and justice tells me I ought to do. Is a politic act the worse for being a generous one? Is no concession proper, but that which is made from your want of right to keep what you grant? Or does it lessen the grace or dignity of relaxing in the exercise of an odious claim, because you have your evidence-room full of titles, and your magazines stuffed with arms to enforce them? What signify all those titles, and all those arms? Of what avail are they, when the reason of the thing tells me, that the assertion of my title is the loss of my suit, and that I could do nothing but wound myself by the use of my own weapons?

Such is steadfastly my opinion of the absolute necessity of keeping up the concord of this empire by a unity of spirit, though in a diversity of operations, that, if I were sure the colonists had, at their leaving this country, sealed a regular compact of servitude, that they had solemnly abjured all the rights of citizens, that they had made a vow to renounce all ideas of liberty for them and their posterity to all generations, yet I should hold myself obliged to conform to the temper I found universally prevalent in my own day, and to govern two millions of men, impatient of servitude, on the principles of freedom. I am not determining a point of law, I am restoring tranquility; and the general character and situation of a people must determine what sort of a government is fitted for them. That point nothing else can or ought to determine.

REFLECTIONS ON THE REVOLUTION IN FRANCE

At once to preserve and to reform is quite another thing. When the useful parts of an old establishment are kept, and what is superadded is to be fitted to what is retained, a vigorous mind, steady persevering attention, various powers of comparison and combination, and the resources of an understanding fruitful in expedients are to be exercised, they are to be exercised in a continued conflict with the combined force of opposite vices, with the obstinacy that rejects all improvement, and the levity that is fatigued and disgusted with everything of which it is in possession. But you may object—"A process of this kind is slow. It is not fit for an assembly which glories in performing in a few months the work of ages. Such a mode of reforming possibly might take up many years." Without question it might, and it ought. It is one of the excellencies of a method in which time is amongst the assistants that its operation is slow, and in some cases almost unperceptible. If circumspection and caution are a part of wisdom, when we work only upon inanimate matter surely they become a part of duty too, when the subject of our demolition and construction is not brick and timber, but sentient beings, by the sudden alteration of whose state, condition, and habits, multitudes may be rendered miserable. But it seems as if it were the prevalent opinion in Paris, that an unfeeling heart, and an undoubting confidence, are the sole qualifications for a perfect legislator. Far different are my ideas of that high office. The true lawgiver ought to have a heart full of sensibility. He ought to love and respect his kind, and to fear himself. It may be allowed to his temperament to catch his ultimate object with an intuitive glance, but his movements towards it ought to be deliberate. Political arrangement, as it is a work for social ends, is to be only wrought by social means. There mind must conspire with mind. Time is required to produce that union of minds which alone can produce all the good we aim at. Our patience will achieve more than our force. If I might venture to appeal to what is so much out of fashion in Paris, I mean to experience, I should tell you, that in my course I have known, and, according to my measure, have co-operated with great men, and I have never yet seen any plan which has not been mended by the observations of those who were much inferior in understanding to the person who took the lead in the business. By a slow but well-sustained progress, the effect of each step is watched, the good or ill success of the first, gives light to us in the second, and so from light to light, we are conducted with safety through the whole series.

SCHOLARLY RESEARCH AND THE PROGRESS OF EDUCATION DURING THE SEVENTEENTH AND EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

SCHOLARLY RESEARCH

THE seventeenth century reaped the advantages of the enthusiastic study of the Classics, made in the hey-day of the Renaissance. The writers of the sixteenth century had saturated themselves with the master writers of Greece and Rome, it remained for the succeeding age to apply the knowledge thus gained both in the pursuit of science and in literary productiveness. The gain to science we are dealing with elsewhere. The effect upon literature has already concerned us in dealing with the poetry, prose, and drama of the time. Here the more purely academic side will be noted.

Latin was the language favoured in the seventeenth century, as in earlier times, by scholars; though many books were published both in Latin and English. Bacon's Novum Organum, and the later disputations of the learned Casaubon with James I, may be instanced as illustrations of this tendency, while it must be remembered that the scientific discoveries of such men as Harvey and Newton were given to the world in Latin. Latin indeed was the international medium of communication between men of learning.

The increasing interest in Biblical research, resulting from the Reformation, gave an added stimulus to the study of Greek and Hebrew.

The difference between the scholarly spirit of the sixteenth and that of the seventeenth century, lay in the sharpened sense of practicality. These languages were used now not merely to indulge the literary temperament, but to further the practical needs of the time. For instance, the earlier study of Classical Antiquities and Ancient Institutions pointed a way for the treatment of English Institutions, and at the universities the investigation of past literatures was guided very largely by the theological bias of the day. To such an extent was this carried that one college authority counselled the study of "Protestant mathematical books." The enormous concentration of interest on the Bible, necessarily weakened scholastic interest in the Greek writers, whose paganism was looked upon as a serious qualification of their authority.

While most of the important scholars devoted themselves to theological matters, rather than to classical studies, while Pearson was expounding the Creed, and William Lloyd, Bishop of St Asaph, discoursing on Church History, a great scholar arose, RICHARD BENTLEY, whose interests were far wider than those writers.

Born in 1662, he was educated at Wadsworth and Cambridge, becoming later a tutor in the house of Benjamin Stillingfleet. Afterwards he became Master of Trinity, gained fame in sedulous controversy as to the rival merits of Ancient and Modern, and died in 1742, leaving behind him a reputation as a gruff north-countryman of vast learning and immense dialectical power.

The great controversy that brought fame to Bentley arose in this wise. In 1690 Sir William Temple, a whole-hearted admirer of the Classics, praised certain letters belonging to ancient literature, claiming for them superiority over anything in more modern times. The letters praised were the so-called letters of Phalaris, a cruel tyrant of Agriguntum. Charles Boyle published in 1695 a fresh edition of the letters, complaining of Bentley's conduct in debarring his access to a MS of Phalaris in the Royal Library. Bentley replied in a conciliatory way, but Boyle seemed determined on making himself offensive. Bentley's nature was not constructed on bland and gentle lines, and he lost little time in asserting the letters to be spurious, blaming Boyle's teachers rather than the young writer—the last scornful touch showing the temper of the man.

Bentley's enemies were roused by this. Inferior to him in learning, they were his superiors in art and in the art of letters and led by Francis Atterbury, they published an indictment intended to crush Bentley for ever, as a dismal dry-as-dust, and as a man who did not scruple to plagiarise other men's views to suit himself. The public, quite incompetent to judge the merits of the case, were led by sentimental consideration to acclaim Boyle and his following. Bentley bided his time, accepting his chastisement with apparent indifference. Then in 1699, having gone into the matter more fully, he published his reply. He then showed on linguistic grounds how impossible it was to accept the letters as genuine, and his reply proved convincing to most contemporary scholars. A practical expression of this was shown in the appointment made soon after to the Mastership of Trinity College. Unhappily, his great and deserved reputation as a scholar was not sufficient for him. Infirmities of temper and a growing arrogance disclosed themselves aggressively in later life, and he showed grievous lack of judgment in essaying the editing of Milton's writings, a task that shows only too clearly his limitations as a man of letters. Before his death Pope had pilloried him in the Dunciad, as a terrible dullard. Dull he may have been, and often was in matters of literary taste, but to picture him as his enemies did as merely a high and dry pedant, is as absurd as it is unfair.

During the late seventeenth century, a vigorous movement was made in the direction of local antiquities, and a number of writers of great industry made a notable departure from the old haphazard way of using existing compilations without discrimination, and with method and precision endeavoured to get at their subject by a study of local documents and records and careful topographical investigation. Oxford was the centre of this antiquarian movement, and among the memorable names are, Sir WILLIAM DUGDALE, with his Antiquities of Warwickshire; ANTHONY WOOD, a diarist and author of Survey of the Antiquities of Oxford; THOMAS HEARN, Assistant Keeper in the Bodleian Library, whose series of Medieval English Church Chronicles carried the History of England down to the reign of Richard I; and THOMAS TANNER, with his account of monastic records, in which he defended the monasteries against the more audacious of the charges brought against them by Protestant historians.

Less solid in learning than these writers, though more attractive as a writer, was JOHN AUBREY, whose Brief Lives of famous people were written to help Wood. Aubrey belonged to the pleasant gossiping order of writer, he was a man of literary fragments, with insufficient perseverance to any solid work on his own account. But he had an excellent eye for foibles of character, as these lives testify. He was a born portrait-painter and, unlike many of his age, could be intimate and vivid without being spiteful.

THE PROGRESS OF EDUCATION

During the Middle Ages, the work of education was practically confined to the monasteries. These were the only universities, for the clergy had a monopoly of learning, as the etymology of the word "cleric" shows. Attached to these monasteries, in some cases, were chorister-schools—the germ of the later Grammar Schools—and on the dissolution of the monasteries many schools of this description were built and endowed by means of the money taken from the monastic houses. Education in the days of the Renaissance signified a thorough grounding in Greek and Latin, and all that was asked of the master in addition to his classical knowledge, was his "pious" qualification. Between 1509 and 1553, more than a hundred schools were opened in England. The method of teaching in these times, however, was exceedingly crude and arbitrary. Implicit confidence was placed in the birch, kindness was an unknown quantity among the teachers, the opinion prevailing that he who could beat the hardest could teach the best.

NICHOLAS UDAL, the famous Etoman, enjoyed an unenviable reputation in this respect. Small wonder that Ascham complained that "Learning is robbed of her best wits by the great beating," and his comments on the methods employed were in no ways exaggerated. "They went to the Grammar School little children; they come from thence great lubbers, always learning and little profiting . . . their whole knowledge of learning without a book was told only to their tongue and lips and never ascended up to the brain and head." The schools themselves were like prisons, cold and cheerless. Schooling started at 6 A.M., holidays were scanty (barely a fortnight throughout the year), and if a boy played truant he ran the risk of being treated as Sir Peter Carew was—beaten unmercifully and coupled to a dog with a leash.

At the University matters were little better, the students being still treated like children, and half starved. Many who survived this drastic treatment developed into uncomfortable prigs, and one cannot read about Lady Jane Grey's studies without the feeling that here we have a cultured and gentle nature largely spoiled. Happily for her, she had the rare advantage of an amiable and considerate teacher to compensate her for harsh parents.

"When I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand, or go, eat, drink, be merry or sad, be sewing, playing, dancing, or doing anything else, I must do it as it were in such weight, measure and number, even so perfectly as God made the world, or else I am so sharply threatened—yea, presently sometimes with pinches, nips, and bobs and other ways (which I will not name for the honour I bear them), that I think myself in hell, till time come that I must go to Mr. Elmer, who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning that I think all the time nothing while I am with him. And when I am called from him I fall on weeping, because whatsoever I do else but learning is full of grief, trouble, and fear."

During the Civil War, educational enterprise fell into abeyance, and at the Restoration period new ideals, fresh methods of education began to make themselves felt. Meanwhile echoes of the older method may be found in the letters of Lucy Hutchinson, where she speaks of no less than eight tutors who tend her youthful mind at the mature age of seven; of these methods, one cannot speak save in terms of condemnation. In the creation of Charity Schools in the place of the older Grammar Schools, the note of the new attitude is struck, and in one of Bishop Butler's Sermons the design is made clear.

It was "not in any sort to remove poor children out of the rank in which they were born, but keeping them in it, to give them the assistance which their circumstances plainly called for, by educating them in the principles of religion as well as of civil life, and likewise making some sort of provision for their maintenance, under which last I include clothing them, giving them such learning—if it be called by that name—as may qualify them for some common employment, and placing them out to it as they grow up."

Meanwhile the education of the well-to-do was and continued to be one-sided. Little attempt was made to use scientific knowledge, modern languages, history, geography, for purposes of instruction, while the only use made of mathematics was to teach them in a restricted degree for purposes of material welfare. Small surprise, then, that men like Milton in his tractate on Education, and Hobbes in his Leviathan and Behemoth, denounced University methods. No doubt Milton's ignorance of youthful psychology militates against the utility of some of his ideas, but his contention that more attention should be paid to a concrete knowledge of men and affairs, was undeniably sound.

Throughout the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries reformers sprang up, inspired by the newly kindled interest in science and modern languages, and at length the controversy became more fully part of the long-lived struggle between the advantages of Ancient and Modern Literature. An important stage was reached in the progress of education by Locke's treatise, Some Thoughts on Education. To Locke the primary concern of education was a moral one. Matters intellectual should be subordinate in youth to matters moral. Learning therefore is of less account than soundness of character or that practical wisdom which makes a man a master of affairs, with good judgment. Locke's views are further amplified and expressed more maturely in his famous Essay on the Human Understanding—a book that inspired Rousseau and, to come to modern times, Herbert Spencer.

Compared with such educational ideals as found expression in Matthew Arnold and Huxley, Locke's notions seem one-sided and restricted. He shared the distrust of his age in imagination and feeling, has little to say of the humane influence of the arts or the practical advantages to be derived from the study of the physical sciences. In short, he writes as an Utilitarian. None the less, he was greatly in advance of his time, and his schemes, as compared with those of his age, were generous and comprehensive, and we are grateful to him for his insistence on the study of mathematics and of the handicrafts.

If the education of boys was unsatisfactory, that of girls was deplorable. To read and write was, in the view of many, quite sufficient. The "complete gentlewoman" of the time was an expert in dancing and in playing the spinnet and guitar; in artistic dabbling and in culinary exercises. Here her accomplishments ceased. Pope's picture of the fashionable woman in The Rape of the Lock described truly only too many, and Addison's exhortations were certainly needed.

But a change of front was at hand, and about the year 1700 a change for the better in the status of women took place. Swift had made suggestions for reform in the instruction of girls, though he had little belief in their capacity. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, though convinced that scholarly qualifications were for the professional man, yet counselled a generous course of instruction, including arithmetic, philosophy, and poetry; with a touch of bitterness she advised learned women to conceal their attainments as they would a physical defect.

The idea of a liberal education for girls was, however, not part of the scheme of eighteenth-century education, and grammar-school education was provided exclusively for boys; girls presumably not being intended to "serve God in Church and State."

Toward the close of the century a movement started in the direction of elementary education, but this begins a new chapter in the history of our subject.

SCOTS VERSE AND PROSE FROM THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY TO THE COMING OF BURNS

THE vigorous early growth of Scots verse, that followed the death of Chaucer, and gave a greater vitality to Scottish literature than to English, in the intermediate period preceding the English Renaissance, was not maintained. While English poetry was reviving under Wyatt and Surrey and Gascoigne, Scotland did little except produce a crop of satirical verse nourished more or less by the Reformation, with a rough, not wholly unattractive tang to it, but little artistic beauty. Following this there are two names of some note, contemporary with Sidney and Spenser—ALEXANDER SCOTT and ALEXANDER MONTGOMERIE.

Of Scott we know little as a man. He seems to have been unhappy both in his domestic relations, and in his endeavours to make a competency. His work is heterogeneous. Pious and satirical verse jostle with amorous ditties, in a manner characteristic of his time. Probably his love ditties show him in his most attractive manner: these are pleasantly written, showing sincerity and feeling.

Scott's contemporary, Alexander Montgomerie, strikes a stronger and more personal note. He was known as Captain Montgomerie, and served the Regent Morton at one time. His most considerable work is The Cherrie and the Slae (Sloe), an allegory presumably, dealing with the merits of the sweet fruit that grows on high out of reach, and the sloe, small and insignificant beneath it. Familiar abstractions appear: Hope, Reason, Experience, &c., with a running commentary of their own. There are some agreeable passages of description and a few flashes of humour, and the whole poem is written in a curious metre that became popular and evoked many imitations.

Besides this poem, Montgomerie wrote nearly a hundred sonnets, respectable in quality, but not equal to the best work of the Elizabethan sonnet-craft, some devotional pieces, and some ribald matter, a burlesque, Navigaton, and a few love ditties. His work, on the whole, is more varied and more distinctive than Scott's.

Born about 1550, he died in the early years of the seventeenth century.

Sir ROBERT AYTON (1570-1638), born in Fife, was knighted by James I, and played a prominent part in the Court politics of the time. He was a scholar, and wrote in many languages, and it is noteworthy that there is no trace of Scots dialect in his English verse; which shows a sharp cleavage with the older Scots school of verse.

This cleavage is even more marked in the EARL OF STIRLING (c. 1580-1640), whose lyric work, the Aurora collection, is strictly in line with the Elizabethan song writers, so far as treatment is concerned, though inferior to the best of these. He wrote also tragedies: Cræsus, Darius, Alexander, Julius Cæsar, dignified and meritorious in many ways, and the Exhortation to Prince Henry, somewhat in the vein of Drayton, and held by some to be his best work.

In quality, however, he is easily surpassed by his friend, DRUMMOND OF HAWTHORNDEN (1585-1649). He was cultured and accomplished, and his sonnets, lyrics, elegies, characteristically Jacobean in the school of Donne, display many beauties and felicities.

"Doth then the world go thus, doth all thus move?
Is this the justice which on Earth we find?
Is this that firm decree which all doth bind?
Are these your influences, Powers above?
Those souls which vice's moody mists most blind,
Blind Fortune, blindly most their friend doth prove;
And they who thee, poor idol Virtue! love,
Fly like a feather toss'd by storm and wind
Ah! if a Providence doth sway this all,
Why should best minds groan under most distress?
Or why should pride humility make thrall,
And injuries the innocent oppress?"

Heavens! hinder, stop this fate, or grant a time
When good may have, as well as bad, their prime!"

Turning to the prose of this period, we recognise in it singularly little of first class importance. Previous to Knox and Buchanan, there is only the anonymous Complaint of Scotland (1549), stiff and archaic in form, with little to commend beyond its isolated position, and its virulent attack on England.

JOHN KNOX, of course, was a great personality in his way, but as a man of letters he is not considerable. A vigorous, truculent writer, his aim is religious and moral, and his First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment (government) of Women (1558) is more remarkable for its quaint title and uncompromising point of view, than for any literary interest.

His contemporary, GEORGE BUCHANAN, has more claim upon the student of letters. For part of his life he lived in France, concerned in schoolmastering, among his pupils being Montaigne. Most of his work was written in Latin, and his English prose, at times suggesting an analogy with Ascham though less clear and straightforward, is vigorous and polemical in trend.

JAMES I has some claim as a writer of clear, forcible prose, with his Counterblast to Tobacco, and the Basilicon Doron; but the most distinguished name is that of Sir THOMAS URQUHART, Knight of Cromarty (1611-1660), a notable Royalist whose style has many of the interesting characteristics of Elizabethan prose, salted with national idiosyncrasies. He gave us a translation of Rabelais, and some extraordinary works on scientific and literary subjects.

In approaching ALLAN RAMSAY, we meet the pioneer in Scotland of that movement towards naturalism and passion in poetry that culminated in the Romantic Revival, finding in Burns its greatest exponent across the Border, and some half dozen great names in English literature further south.

Apprenticed to a wigmaker in Edinburgh, Ramsay came across Watson's choice selection of Scottish lyrical verse, and they affected him much as the old ballad had affected Sir Philip Sidney.

Starred up to write himself, he starts in a vein that is mostly satirical, and even when pathetic is more whimsical than sentimental. Dealing almost entirely with low life, he gives us a vigorous, realistic picture of Edinburgh types in the eighteenth century.

In addition to his lighter pieces, there is his pastoral drama The Gentle Shepherd, where he presents a picture of rustic life, somewhat conventionalised, it is true, to suit the requirements of the day, yet with a certain freshness and naturalness, and a pleasant humour, that give it distinction. He did a good deal of work in the matter of resetting old songs, but he was far happier in the lighter moods than in the sentimental. Yet his English lyrics enjoyed a fair popularity, and despite the commonplace character of much of his writing, his undoubted interest in Scots vernacular literature, and his zeal in popularising it, did a good deal to prepare the way for Burns.

A SONG

My Peggy is a young thing,
Just entored in her teens,
Fair as the day, and sweet as May,
Fair as the day, and always gay
My Peggy is a young thing,
And I'm not very auld,
Yet well I like to meet her at
The wauking of the fauld.

My Peggy speaks sae sweetly,
Whene'er we meet alane,
I wish nae mair to lay my care,—
I wish nae mair of a' that's rare
My Peggy speaks sae sweetly,
To a' the lave I'm cauld,
But she gars a' my spirits glow
At the wauking of the fauld

My Peggy smiles sae kindly,
Whene'er I whisper love,
That I look down on a' the town
That I look down upon a crown
My Peggy smiles sae kindly,
It makes me blithe and bauld;

And naething gie's me sic delight
As wauking of the fauld.

My Peggy sings sae saftly,
When on my pipe I play,
By a' the rest it is confest,—
By a' the rest, that she sings best.
My Peggy sings sae saftly,
And in her songs are tauld,
With innocence, the wale o' sense,
At wauking of the fauld.¹

Among other predecessors of Burns are WILLIAM HAMILTON of Bangour, with his happily rhythmic Braes of Yarrow ("Busk ye, busk ye, my bonny bride"), 1724; GEORGE HALKET, an Aberdeen schoolmaster and a Jacobite ballad writer, the effective song writers ALEXANDER ROSS and JOHN SKINNER of "Tullochgorum" fame. Of this gay effusion indeed, Burns has said it was "the best Scots song Scotland ever saw." Another Jacobite singer is ALEXANDER GEDDES, a man of considerable accomplishment, who showed his scholarship in his translation of Theocritus and Virgil and his humorous insight into rustic life, in his Wee Wifukie.

Many eighteenth-century Scottish songs familiar to the modern reader, are either anonymous or of doubtful authorship.

There is nae Luck about the Hoose, for instance, appeared about 1771. Its authorship is uncertain, though James Beattie added two verses to the original; but I had a Hoose and I had nae man, Eurick Bards, Here awa' there awa', O'er the Moor among the Heather, are songs whose paternity has never been determined. Lady ANNE BARNARD (1750-1825) wrote Auld Robin Gray, while the ill-fated figure of ROBERT FERGUSON (1750-74) is perhaps the most interesting personality, after Ramsay, in the period before Burns. His gift as a writer of vernacular verse was shown in his fifteenth year, while a student at St. Andrews; and during his brief life he distinguished himself as a poet of urban life, especially the rough urban life and primitive jollities of Edinburgh towards the end of the eighteenth century.

These things are exhibited with humour and whimsical charm in Auld Reekie, Wale of ilka Town, Leith Races, Hallow Fair. His few experiments in rural subjects are equally happy, such as To the Bee, and the sketch of a winter's night in a farm kitchen, entitled The Farmer's Ingle. At the age of twenty-four he died in a madhouse, but in his slender output, he had already shown more imaginative promise and artistic excellence than any of his predecessors, though his work was necessarily less varied and extensive than Ramsay's.

DEVELOPMENT OF PHILOSOPHIC THOUGHT IN THE SEVENTEENTH AND EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

Thomas Hobbes; John Locke; George Berkeley; David Hume; Thomas Reid; Joseph Butler.

THOMAS HOBBES (1588-1679)

HIS LIFE

"TERROR and I," says Hobbes, "were born twins" This is a witty allusion not merely to his own timidity but also to the circumstances under which he entered the world. On April 5, 1588, Mrs Hobbes, the wife of a Malmesbury clergyman, alarmed by the rumours of the Spanish Armada, gave premature birth to a boy who received the somewhat appropriate name of Thomas. Shortly after this event, his father, a passionate man, struck a fellow-parson at the church door, and sought safety in flight. Brought up by an uncle, Hobbes entered Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1603, but apparently gained little from the university, where mediæval traditions still lingered, and where geometry—according to his own account—was neglected as a black art. He became, however, skilled in snaring jackdaws and “took great delight to go to the book-binders’ shops and lie gazing on mappes.” In 1608 he was appointed tutor to the son of the Earl of Cavendish, and for the next twenty years remained with the young lord as friend and companion; for Hobbes was both facetious and obliging—even to the extent of borrowing money for his aristocratic pupil. During this period of his life he devoted his leisure mainly to the classics, but in 1628 his interests were revolutionised. His patron dying in the June of that year, Hobbes obtained another scholastic post and left for the Continent with his new charge. It was whilst they were in Paris that the following memorable incident occurred. “Being in a Gentleman’s library,” says Aubrey, “Euclid’s elements lay open and ’twas the 47th El libri I. He (Hobbes) read the proposition ‘By God,’ said he, ‘this is impossible.’” Further study correcting this conclusion, he became “in love with geometry.”

Returning to England in 1631, he began to apply his newly acquired mathematics to philosophy, and by 1640 some of his theories were published in manuscript form. Apprehensive, however, as to how the Long Parliament would view the political opinions expressed, he retired to Paris, where he remained seven years. Here he wrote the Leviathan. In this famous book, which appeared in 1651, his hostility to the Catholic Church was sufficiently explicit to make England a more desirable home. Crossing the Channel for the last time, he made his peace with the political authorities and completed his system of philosophy with a work containing his first principles, it was published in 1655 under the title of De Corpore.

Hobbes’ closing years were filled with controversies—mathematical and theological. He was charged with atheism, and at one time Parliament threatened to take the matter up. The philosopher alarmed for his safety, protested that the law did not allow his being burnt for heresy. The Bill of inquiry, however, was dropped—probably owing to Court influence. For the King was well disposed towards the old man whose pupil he had been for a short time, when as Prince of Wales he was living an exile in Paris. Moreover, Charles was highly diverted by the contests of wit between his courtiers and the philosopher, whose appearance at Court he hailed with the remark, “Here comes the bear to be baited.”

Mentally active to the last, Hobbes rounded off his long life with an autobiography in Latin verse. He died in the August of 1679, relieved at last “to find a hole to creep out of the world at.”

HIS PHILOSOPHY

All philosophers have of necessity systematic minds, but Hobbes possessed the sense of order in a marked degree. He was therefore not content with any general explanation of the universe, he wished to go further and show how everything conformed to his theory. From his first principle he believed it was possible for him to deduce both the physical world and the behaviour of men with all the certainty of a demonstration in Euclid. So firmly was he imbued with the method of geometry. What was the starting point of this great undertaking? It was the materialistic doctrine that the universe is composed of atoms—or to use Hobbes’ word, bodies—possessing the property of motion. The corporeal dance has produced the world in which we live, and the results could not possibly be other than what they are, because all the movements are regulated by certain unchanging laws, the whole course of events linked by a chain of cause and effect from which chance and Divine interference are alike excluded. In other words, the universe is a huge and ever-developing mechanism, and we are only hindered by our mental capacity from forecasting its future. If this account is correct, it will be obviously necessary to reduce mind, somehow or other, to terms of matter. This is precisely what Hobbes does. All mental operations, he says, are only “motion and agitation of the brain.” The objection that consciousness appears to be something entirely different from motion does not weigh with him. Because, in the first place, if the difference was real it would contradict one of his most fundamental beliefs, namely, that everything which exists is material, and secondly, he is convinced that the testimony of consciousness is, in itself, unreliable. It is constantly deceiving us, he says, in our dreams, for example, or when external agencies such as mirrors or physical injuries produce hallucinations. Moreover, he points out that smell or taste of a particular object varies with different persons. In short, our ideas are nothing more than phantasms.

Consequently, in Hobbes’ psychology, there is some attempt to translate mental phenomena into the language of physics. Desire and aversion, for instance, are regarded as physical attraction and repulsion respectively. But he speedily abandons this naive undertaking, though still believing in the soundness of the theory which prompted it. When considering the ethical and political conduct of men he wisely refrains from endeavouring to explain it as the results of bodily movements, and adopts instead the more fruitful method of psychological analysis. This part of his system he calls civil, as distinguished from natural, philosophy. The root idea of Hobbes’ political and ethical theories is that man is a purely selfish animal, invariably pursuing his own personal good, irrespective of the interests of others. When we act benevolently it is either in the hope of receiving some benefit in return, or because it gratifies our sense of self-importance. Again, the feeling of pity is equally egoistical; it is simply fear for our own well-being. The misfortunes of other people conjure up similar calamities likely to befall ourselves in the future. But in a society where the members are bent on their own aggrandisement, there will be an inevitable conflict of interests. Now it is to prevent this system of cut-throat competition that government exists. In a "state of nature," says Hobbes, there is universal war. Force and fraud are the only two methods which an individual adopts to realise his aims. Consequently, "the life of man is solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short." But as men become more rational it is seen that this violence defeats its own ends and that a more effectual way to secure one's own good is to respect the good of others. Reason itself, however, is not of sufficient strength to effect this change of policy. It is, therefore, necessary for men "to confer all their power and strength upon one man or upon an assembly of men." This "Mortal God" or Leviathan preserves peace by issuing commands or laws and inflicting penalties upon those who disobey them. It is not perfectly clear whether or no Hobbes intended this mutual agreement—or social contract as it is called—to be regarded as historically true; he certainly admits that government can arise in other ways, namely, by conquest or by extension of the family principle. In any case his main point seems to be that the central authority, however it originated, is obeyed from motives of self-interest, that is to say, either from fear of punishment or from dread of anarchy. Another feature of Hobbes' political philosophy is his contention that if government is to justify its existence by maintaining the peace, it must possess undivided authority—a point not fully realised by his contemporaries. The sovereignty of England, for example, must not be shared by King and Parliament, it must be vested in one or the other. Personally he favoured a despotism, though he appears to have recognised that a democracy was logically compatible with his theory of sovereignty.

Hobbes' great work, the Leviathan, is informed with a vigorous imagination that imparts to it agreeable literary qualifications; moreover, it exhibits a striking logical power. We must dispute his premises as to the selfish and undisciplined character of human nature, unbridled, if we wish to join issue with him. For granting these, there is little to find fault with in his deductions. Moreover, his method is admirable. Keeping his central idea always in view, he illustrates his point with a clarity, force, and economy of words that compel our admiration for the writer, however we may feel towards the philosopher, and his influence on the fine prose writers of the succeeding era must have been considerable.

Originality of thought is by no means synonymous with clarity of expression, nor greatness of intellect with distinction of style.

The remarkable contribution to thought and speculation therefore, made by the great philosophers of the eighteenth century, Hobbes, Locke, Berkeley, and Hume, are the more memorable inasmuch as they were contributions to literature no less than to philosophy.

The distinctive character of Hobbes' literary style is its lucidity, terseness, and pungency. Comparing it with that of his great predecessor, Bacon, we feel how entirely suitable each man's literary method was for the work it had to do. Bacon was essentially a pioneer; he had to stimulate the imagination, to compel the attention, to extol a way of research. His rich allusiveness, his striking imagery, his aphoristic resonance, is peculiarly adapted for his purpose. The barer, sharper style of Hobbes is quite as efficient in its own way. His work was more provocative, more challenging than that of Bacon; and it was to his advantage that he was less of a scholar.

"He had read much," Aubrey tells us, "if one considers his long life, but his contemplation was much more than his reading. He was wont to say, that if he had read as much as other men, he should have continued still as ignorant as other men. The manner of writing (Leviathan) was thus. He walked much and contemplated, and he had in the head of his cane a pen and ink-horn, carried always a note-book in his pocket, and as soon as the thought darted, he presently entered it into his book, or otherwise might have lost it."

In conclusion, Hobbes has a twofold claim on our gratitude. He rendered a real service to ethical thought, though not precisely in the way he anticipated, by indirectly disproving the doctrine of the absolute selfishness of mankind. For a fallacy can never be refuted until it is succinctly formulated. But there is another and more positive distinction attaching to his name. He aimed a blow at ignorance and superstition by insisting that all physical phenomena must be explained by natural causes. In other words, he maintained with clearness and vigour a principle which is the foundation of all modern science.

LEVIATHAN

A Commonwealth is said to be instituted when a multitude of men do agree and covenant, every one with every one, that to whatsoever man or assembly of men shall be given by the major part, the right to present the person of them all (that is to say, be their representative), every one, as well he that voted for it as he that voted against it, shall authorise all the actions and judgments of that man or assembly of men in the same manner as if they were his own, to the end to live peaceably amongst themselves and be protected against other men. From this institution of a Commonwealth are derived all the rights and faculties of him or them on whom the sovereign power is conferred by the consent of the people assembled.

First, because they covenant it is to be understood they are not obliged by former covenant to anything repugnant hereunto. And consequently they that have already instituted a commonwealth, being thereby bound by covenant to own the actions and judgments of one, cannot lawfully make a new covenant amongst themselves, to be obedient to any other, in anything whatsoever, without his permission. And, therefore, they that are subjects to a monarch, cannot without his leave cast off monarchy and return to the confusion of a disunited multitude, nor transfer their person from him that beareth it to another man or other assembly of men; for they are bound, every man to every man, to own and be reputed author of all that he that already is their sovereign shall do and judge fit to be done, so that any man dissenting all the rest should break their covenant made to that man; and they have also every man given the sovereignty to him that beareth their person, and therefore if they dispose him they take from him that which is his own, and so again it is injustice.

JOHN LOCKE (1632-1704)

There is no figure more typical of the general drift of thought in the eighteenth century than John

Locke. Hobbes' philosophy has a bolder breadth, but its sweeping comprehensiveness makes it to some extent alien to the tentative, practical, and compromising spirit of the age of Dryden and Johnson.

Berkeley's speculative brilliance anticipates to some extent the idealising tendency of the Romantic movement. Hume amplified and carried still further Locke's system of thought, but his very subtlety and remorseless logic, though characteristic of certain sides of eighteenth-century thought, were less typical than Locke's of this thought as a whole. A spirit of free inquiry, tempered by a love of compromise, toleration in religious matters save when matters of State suggested otherwise, practical common-sense as a guide in life,—in all these things there is no able spokesman than Locke.

HIS LIFE

In the summer of 1632, John Locke's mother was visiting relatives at Wrington, a village in Somersetshire, and it was here, on August 29, that the philosopher was born, but his boyhood was spent at his home in Pensford, a few miles distant, where he was brought up by his father, an attorney and "man of parts," on somewhat puritanical lines. In 1646 he entered Westminster School, then controlled by Dr Busby, of burling notoriety, and six years later gained a studentship at Christ Church, Oxford. Here, as elsewhere, the Puritan authorities were in the ascendant, and they not only required an account of the Sunday's discourse from the undergraduates but also provided them with one or two more sermons during the week. It is therefore hardly surprising that the young man "spent a good part of his first year in reading romances," more especially as, like Hobbes, he greatly disliked the educational methods of the University. With characteristic independence he refused to take lecture notes "deferentially," for which act of revolt he was described by a horrified contemporary as "a man of turbulent spirit, clamorous and discontented." Nevertheless, Locke seems to have been an industrious, if somewhat unorthodox worker; and in 1659 he was elected to a life studentship at his college. The next eight years were filled with great intellectual activity. His philosophical interests were aroused by reading Descartes, but they by no means monopolised his attention, he lectured on Greek and Rhetoric and studied medicine. This branch of scientific knowledge appealed to his concrete mind, and its acquisition proved of service both to his friends and himself, for he was constitutionally delicate, always suffering from asthma and in later years from a chronic form of consumption. But Locke was not to remain in scholarly seclusion. In 1666 Lord Ashley, afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury, coming to drink the waters at Oxford, made his acquaintance through a chance meeting, and was so favourably impressed that the following year saw Locke an inmate of the Earl's household in the Strand. His versatility speedily justified the compliment paid him. He saved his patron's life by a difficult operation, and became his confidential adviser. Moreover, he found a wife for his lordship's son, which was possibly not the least difficult undertaking, seeing that the prospective bridegroom was "a shapeless lump." But there were greater anxieties to come, for the political intrigues in which Shaftesbury subsequently engaged rendered the philosopher—though unjustly—an object of suspicion. However, he disappointed his enemies by leading "a very cunning, unintelligible life," and by way of rendering his safety more secure crossed over to Holland in 1683, where he remained until the accession of William III. Here, save for one attempt at capture, the English Government left him unmolested, and contented itself with depriving him of his studentship. Locke was thus left free to complete his famous Essay on the Human Understanding, which was begun, so he tells us, in the belief that one sheet of paper would contain all his thoughts on the subject. Apparently the anticipation was ill-founded, as the work extends over one thousand pages. The Essay was published together with his Treatise of Governments in 1690, following the first Letter on Toleration, which had appeared for the first time in English during the previous year. Perhaps the happiest period of Locke's life was spent with his friends Sir Francis and Lady Masham, in their rural home at Oates in Essex, where he installed himself in 1691. Henceforward he only braved the "pestilential smoke" of London when his duties as Commissioner of Appeals made it necessary for him to do so. In this peaceful retreat the old man not only answered various criticisms on the Essay but wrote in addition his celebrated Treatise on Education, and the Reasonableness of Christianity. In 1704 he surmised that "the dissolution of the cottage was not far off," it came on October 28. His practical and kindly nature is well illustrated in his will, which directed an inexpensive funeral in order that the money saved might benefit the poor of the parish.

HIS PHILOSOPHY

By his friends we are told Locke was termed "Doctor" on account of his medical attainments. But the title possessed a greater significance than was intended for he was a physician not only of the body but also of the mind. Locke was profoundly convinced that the mediæval intellect had wasted much of its substance in fruitless speculations concerning the universe. Locke struck out a new pathway in philosophy. Bacon had pointed out the natural defects of human intelligence in the study of phenomena, and sought to amend these by bettering the method. Locke improved on this, by a searching study of man's intellect in order to determine the truth and certainty of knowledge, and thus theorising about knowledge and the grounds of belief upon which we hold our opinions, came to be known as epistemology. Before we make so many guesses about things, said Locke in effect, let us take stock of our thinking apparatus and appraise its value. The Essay concerning Human Understanding is therefore an attempt to save man from this disease of verbiage by showing that the capacity of the human mind is limited.

But before Locke can determine the precise extent of our real knowledge there is a preliminary consideration to be faced. It is necessary to discover the source or sources from which it is derived. Now he argues that the basis of our knowledge lies in experience; without it the mind is like a blank sheet of paper. Further, this experience may be divided according to the two channels through which it comes. Our senses provide one medium, therefore Locke proposes calling their various contents Ideas of Sensation. Upon the material thus presented the mind operates by perceiving, remembering, comparing, and so on. These mental processes may be termed Ideas of Reflection, since they are obtained by the mind reflecting on its own activities.

But what is the nature of the experience derived in this twofold manner? Does it give us ideas which represent, either directly or indirectly, things that actually exist? Locke replies in the affirmative. In the first place we are certain of our own existence, because even the very act of doubting this fact implies, as Descartes had pointed out, someone who doubts. Again, the reality of God is also an assured fact, since conscious selves necessitate the existence of a First Cause that is capable of bringing them into being. Nor does Locke question the reality of material objects, for he notices that there is an element of compulsion in our sense experiences; they are forced upon us whether we will or no. He concludes, therefore, that their cause must be referred to external substances. These material bodies possess in themselves certain essential qualities—extension, motion, solidity, figure, number—which produce in us ideas that exactly represent them, and they have in addition the power of giving rise to various ideas like those of colour, taste, smell, which however exist only in the mind, and have no corresponding qualities in the objects from which they are derived.

Having attempted by these arguments to show that the knowledge gained from experience deals with concrete realities, Locke has now to determine the extent of our knowledge concerning them. With regard to spiritual beings the limitations he apparently thinks are fairly obvious, since we are ignorant of all spirits save of those that dwell in our own bodies and of God their supreme Cause. About the physical world there is also a wide field for conjecture. Here, according to Locke, our knowledge is confined to individual objects because it is beyond our powers to discover a necessary connection between their primary, or inherent, and secondary, or derived, qualities. "We are so far from knowing what particular figure, size, or motion of parts produces a yellow colour, or sweet taste or sharp sound, that we can by no means conceive how any size, figure, or motion of any particles can possibly produce in us the idea of any colour, taste, or sound whatsoever." Seeing therefore that we cannot discover the precise nature of sense objects, such knowledge as we possess must be restricted to our present experiences and memories of them. Consequently our predictions of their future existence and behaviour are concerned only with probabilities, not with certainties. In other words, we can never attain knowledge of the material world which is universally true.

The result of Locke's inquiry, then, is to show that "our minds are not made as large as truth, nor suited to the whole extent of things." Nevertheless these limitations, considerable though they are, in no wise prevent our attaining happiness both here and hereafter. It is possible to gain sufficient knowledge of nature by experimental means to ensure our comfort in this life, and we are assured also of a God who will reward us with immortality for the goodness of conduct on earth. The knowledge of this future existence and its dependence on right-doing Locke derives from Christianity, and we are to believe these revelations on account of their moral reasonableness, which is heightened by the miraculous and well-attested manifestations with which they are accompanied.

Now it is important that the individual should be given freedom to pursue these mundane and celestial forms of happiness. His spiritual life ought not to be embarrassed by his being compelled to accept theological subtleties, for they do not contain the essentials of Christianity, which, as already suggested, are very simple and possess unmistakable rationality. Accordingly Locke would have the English Government abstain from interfering in matters of religion and extend toleration to all forms of opinion, save Roman Catholicism and Atheism, both of which are inimical to civil society. Nor must the material welfare of the members of the community be hindered by the State, since Government only exists for the good of the governed. Consequently, if any particular form of political authority misuses its functions, the people, through the majority of their representatives, have a right to exchange it for one more suitable. Locke attempts to vindicate this view, which provides a justification for the Revolution of 1688, by appealing, like Hobbes, to a social contract. But his conception of the nature of the contract differs from that of his predecessor in an important manner—the powers of the individual are surrendered not to a ruling body consisting of a person or persons, as in Hobbes' account, but to the community. Therefore such power as the Government possesses is partial only and may be revoked.

With Hobbes, Locke agrees that every man gives up his actual power to the state, yet he does not surrender it unconditionally, argues Locke, but for certain specific purposes. He gives up his liberty to an extent for the sake of a few privileges. Examining Hobbes' absolute monarchy, Locke sees here no civil society at all, no common judge with authority. Such an one has no right to impose his will on all, for the ultimate source of power must as a practical necessity be in the will of a majority. The community, in short, is like a joint stock company, established for the mutual preservation of their lives, liberties, and estates.

Locke's influence on the course of thought, both English and Continental, has been far-reaching. But his advocacy of religious toleration and of civil liberty, valuable as it was, is not his most distinctive contribution. What we peculiarly associate with his name is his empirical teaching—though he was not altogether consistent in this respect. It is this feature of his writings which has provoked perhaps the most important of all philosophical controversies, in raising the question as to whether or no we can penetrate the secrets of the universe by a method other than experience, and one which transcends it.

ON THE HUMAN UNDERSTANDING

Since therefore it is unavoidable to the greatest part of men, if not all to have several opinions without certain and undubitable proofs of their truths, and it carries too great an imputation of ignorance, lightness, or folly, for men to quit and renounce their former tenets presently upon the offer of an argument which they cannot immediately answer and show the insufficiency of, it would, methinks, become all men to maintain peace and the common offices of humanity and friendship in the diversity of opinions, since we cannot reasonably expect that any one should readily and obsequiously quit his own opinion, and embrace ours with a blind resignation to an authority which the understanding of man acknowledges not. For, however it may often mistake it can own no other guide but reason, nor blindly submit to the will and dictates of another. If he you would bring over to your sentiments be one that examines before he assents, you must give him leave at his leisure to go over the account again and recalling what is out of his mind examine the particulars to see on which side the advantage lies, and if he will not think our arguments of weight enough to engage him anew in so much pains, it is but what we do often ourselves in the like case, and we should take it amiss if others should prescribe to us what points we should study, and if he be one who takes his opinion upon trust how can we imagine that he should renounce those tenets which time and custom have so settled in his own mind that he thinks them self-evident and of an unquestionable certainty, or which he takes to be impressions he has received from God himself or from men sent by Him? How can we expect, I say, that opinions thus settled should be given up to the arguments or authority of a stranger or adversary? especially if there be any suspicion of interest or design as there never fails to be where men find themselves ill-treated. We should do well to commiserate our mutual ignorance, and endeavour to remove it in all the gentle and fair ways of information and not instantly treat others ill as obstinate and perverse because they will not renounce their own and receive our opinions, or at least those we would force upon them when it is more than probable that we are no less obstinate in not embracing some of theirs. For where is the man that has incontestable evidence of the truth of all that he holds or of the falsehood of all he condemns, or can say that he has examined to the bottom all his own or other men's opinions? The necessity of believing without knowledge nay, often upon very slight grounds in this fleeting state of action and blindness we are in should make us more busy and careful to inform ourselves than to constrain others. At least those who have not thoroughly examined to the bottom of all their own tenets, must confess they are unfit to prescribe to others and are unreasonable in imposing that as truth on other men's belief which they themselves have not searched into, nor weighed the arguments of probability on which they should receive or reject it. Those who have fairly and truly examined and are thereby got past doubt in all the doctrines they profess and govern themselves by would have a juster pretence to require others to follow them but these are so few in number and find so little reason to be magisterial in their opinions, that nothing insolent and impertinent is to be expected from them, and there is reason to think, that if men were better instructed themselves, they would be less imposing on others.

GEORGE BERKELEY (1685-1753)

His Life

Little is known of George Berkeley's parentage save that his father came of an English stock and that his mother was "probably" Irish. He himself was born on March 12, 1685, in the neighbourhood of Kilkenny, and after four years' schooling in that city passed on to Trinity College, Dublin, at the age of fifteen. A story told of him during his undergraduate days aptly illustrates his courage and enthusiasm.

In company with Contarine—Oliver Goldsmith's benevolent uncle—and a college companion, he had been to witness an execution, on their return Berkeley insisted upon his friends suspending him from the ceiling in order that he might experience the sensations of hanging. They gratified his curiosity with unpleasant thoroughness, for he was cut down only to collapse on the floor. On regaining consciousness the youthful experimenter unexpectedly exclaimed "Bless my heart, Contarine, you have rumbled my band!"

Saved to the world, Berkeley prosecuted his studies on less adventurous lines and became tutor of his college at the early age of twenty-two. But though revelling in "delightful" mathematics and lecturing on Greek, his lifelong interest was already asserting itself, quickened, no doubt, by Locke's Essay, which had obtained immediate recognition in Dublin University.

In 1709 his precocious intellect began to unburden itself in an Essay towards a New Theory of Vision, and in the year following appeared the Principles of Human Knowledge, which contains his famous denial of the existence of matter. Need less to say, this doctrine did not escape the ridicule that Berkeley anticipated for it, and a certain doctor went so far as to declare that the author required medical treatment.

In the Three Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, Berkeley endeavoured to meet various philosophic objections to his theory, and it was partly in connection with the publication of this work that he came to London in 1713. Here his personality and ability speedily gained him an introduction to that brilliant literary circle which distinguished the close of Queen Anne's reign. We find him breakfasting with Swift and dining with Steele, Addison entertained him at the first night of Cato, while Pope presented him with a copy of his poem on Windsor Forest, declaring that there had been given "to Berkeley every virtue under heaven." A still wider experience awaited Berkeley in the two Italian tours which occupied the greater part of the next few years.

Returning to Ireland in 1721, he, three years later, obtained the Deanery of Derry, which brought with it £1100 a year. But the philosopher was not content to enjoy his good fortune. He now conceived the project of founding a college in Bermuda which was to spread Christianity and learning amongst the Indians of North America; and urged his cause with such persuasiveness and energy that he obtained the promise of a parliamentary grant. In the autumn of 1728 Berkeley sailed for Rhode Island with his newly married wife. His expectations, however, were not realised, the Government proved faithless, and after nearly three years of waiting, the disappointed Social Idealist came back to England. But his American visit was not altogether unprofitable. In the seclusion of his beautiful home at Newport he prepared the most immediately successful of all his works—Alciphron, or the Minute Philosopher—a polemic against the increasing scepticism of the day. Not long after his return in 1734 he was made Bishop of Cloyne, where he remained for the next eighteen years, pursuing his meditations and bringing up his family.

Berkeley had always possessed a great appreciation for certain forms of art. His Journal, written in Italy, and his correspondence, point to an innate appreciation of beauty both in Art and Nature; and this interest seems to have been shared by his children, for whom a certain Signor Pasquino was engaged to teach them music. Evidently the philosopher had lost none of his fascinating qualities, for on one occasion we learn that the Italian, whose feelings outran his English, expressed the wish that God would "pickle" his employer.

The last enthusiasm of Berkeley's life was for nothing else than tar water. Its medicinal properties had been brought to his notice whilst abroad; and subsequent experiments induced the belief that he had discovered a veritable panacea. He accordingly set up works for its manufacture, with a view to dosing the whole neighbourhood. Moreover, his philosophic imagination became excited. "What," he asked, "is the ultimate source of those benefits, for which tar water is immediately responsible?" The result of his inquiries were embodied in Siris, or the Charm, a curious compound of medicine and metaphysics. It is here that we come across a phrase which Cowper often has the credit of originating, as when Berkeley refers to tar water as a beverage that "cheers but not enebriates."

Desiring to end his days in Oxford, he removed there in 1752, but did not long survive the change, dying suddenly in the January of the following year.

Quite apart from Berkeley's intellectual genius, his personality was a singularly charming and persuasive one, and few men with powers so brilliant as his, have been so modest and unaffected. Handsome in appearance, gracious and attractive in manner, fine-hearted in feeling, he was indeed an "Admirable Crichton" among littérateurs.

HIS PHILOSOPHY

What distinguishes Berkeley from his immediate predecessors in British Philosophy is the fact that his system of thought is more exclusively concerned with the fundamental problems of life. This is particularly noticeable when we compare Berkeley with Hobbes. The interests of the latter were geocentric, to put men on the path towards controlling nature for their own advantage and to give them a justification for a peaceable existence—these were the objects of his philosophy. Locke's standpoint, as we have seen, was less mundane, though even he devoted a considerable share of his philosophic powers to the "here" and "now."

But in all his most important writings Berkeley confines his attention to problems which bear, either directly or indirectly, on the ultimate nature of the universe; he leaves out of account questions of politics and sociology. Not that he held aloof from the life of the day; his social projects and activities should disprove that charge, but he did not philosophise about it, save in a few instances. This characteristic of his work was due partly to the native subtlety of his intellect, which peculiarly fitted him for metaphysics, partly also to religious motives. For if his philosophy can be said to have had any aim other than truth for truth's sake, it was to confute sceptics and materialists.

Berkeley's system has a twofold aspect, it is at once destructive and constructive. The former claims priority on grounds both of temporal and logical sequence, for it not only chiefly engaged Berkeley's attention during the earlier years of his philosophic career, but it also provided him with a basis upon which his theory of ultimate reality is built. The critical side of his work is a refutation of the doctrine that such a thing as matter exists, and by "matter" he means a substance which is quite apart from mind—that is to say, capable of existing just the same even if there were no beings who perceived it. In positive language, Berkeley believes that it is mind which gives reality to so-called material objects, consequently, these things are only forms of consciousness—in a word, ideas. This position he has now to justify. Supposing we adopt the opposite theory and affirm that matter does exist, then our assertion must be based either on actual experience or on inference. To take the former alternative, is there any direct knowledge of its existence? On first thoughts it seems quite plausible to answer "yes." "There is the world of physical objects around us," it will be said, "which we perceive with our various senses, and surely all these things are not ideas?"

But it is just this conclusion which Berkeley denies, and he gives two reasons for his denial. In the first place, he argues that the tastes, colours, sounds, &c., which we have, exist only in the mind, for they vary not only with different people but even with the same individual. For instance, he points out that if you put both your hands, one of which is hot and the other cold, into water of an intermediary temperature, then the water will feel warm in the one case and cool in the other. But this would be an impossibility if heat and coldness were properties which belonged to the liquid itself. In this argument Berkeley is, of course, in agreement with Locke, but the last-named philosopher, it will be remembered, drew a distinction between what he called primary and secondary sense qualities. The former, which includes motion, form, and solidity, he thought were really possessed by the external world by reason of their stability. Berkeley, however, refuses to make this division, for he maintains that the primary qualities also fluctuate. Had he lived to-day he might have called attention to the fact that the landscape which appears stationary to people seated in their gardens seems to be in rapid motion when viewed from the carriage window of an express train. And the same reasoning applies to form and solidity; it depends on the percipient, he would say, whether a thing is big or small, hard or soft. On the ground then of their variability, Berkeley deprives physical objects of the few remaining properties left them by Locke. But he seeks to strengthen the conclusion that the material things which we perceive exist in our minds by a further consideration. To apprehend the external world necessitates experience. But of what does this experience consist? It consists, answers Berkeley, of various kinds of ideas. A flower, for instance, is nothing more than a bundle of sensations of form, colour, smell, and so on, and any other object one likes to take will be found on reflection to be only a combination of different modes of consciousness. We now come to the second alternative.

Although, according to Berkeley, we cannot gain any direct knowledge of matter, is it not possible to infer its existence? He has argued, it is true, that our immediate sense experiences are mental in their character, but this does not exclude the cause of them being material; in other words, even if we allow the "physical" world to be ideal, the source which underlies it may have an existence independent of consciousness. To this supposition, Berkeley objects that "matter" possesses no powers of activity, and that therefore it is quite incapable of producing ideas or sensations in us. In the light of modern physics, it must be admitted that this line of reasoning is not very satisfactory, though it by no means follows that he could not have used an argument which would have been more conclusive.

There now remains for consideration the purely constructive aspects of Berkeley's philosophy, which must be outlined very briefly. Matter has been resolved into ideas, but in addition to these ideas, there is, says Berkeley, something quite distinct from them, a soul or spirit which perceives the objects of knowledge. Introspection, he believes, assures him of his own Being or Self; and the existence of other human spirits can be inferred. For I am directly responsible for certain sensations such as signify bodily movement, for example, and since I also possess similar ideas which are not dependent on my own agency, it is legitimate to argue that other spirits exist who are concerned in their production. But what or who is the cause of the perceptions that constitute the world of nature? Their existence is certainly not caused by my own Being, or by Things like myself. But ideas cannot produce themselves, and the possibility of material causation has been excluded; they must, therefore, concludes Berkeley, have been created by an eternal spirit who impresses them on our minds. Now this spirit, he affirms, is possessed not only of infinite power but also of infinite goodness and wisdom, by reason of the beneficent character of sense-phenomena. The admission that "natural productions . . . are not all equally perfect" in no wise disturbs Berkeley's deduction, because apparently he believes that evil can be justified on the ground that it is a means to our future moral perfection.

In striking contrast with Locke, Berkeley founded no School of Philosophy. Only in comparatively recent years has his system in its entirety begun to attract attention, though some of his negative conclusions, as we shall see, were carried into the stream of philosophic thought through his immediate successor, Hume. Nevertheless, it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that Berkeley is one of the most subtle dialecticians our country has ever produced. Nor can any exponent of Materialism to-day afford to ignore some of his formidable arguments against that point of view.

Moreover, arresting and challenging as his philosophy is, it owes no little of its effectiveness to the fine literary style in which it is couched.

Clear and straightforward in his manner, he is never bald, and when need be can emphasize a subtle argument with literary grace and delicate irony. He has all the clarity of Hobbes, with the distinction and urbanity of Addison, and had his interests been in the direction of letters rather than of abstract thought, he would still have been one of the prominent figures of the time. As it is, he remains a model for all philosophic writers.

"This safe and cheap medicine (tar water), suits all circumstances and all constitutions, operating easily curing without disturbing, raising the spirits without depressing them, a circumstance that deserves repeated attention, especially in those climates, where strong liquors so fatally and so frequently produce those very distresses they are designed to remedy, and, if I am not misinformed, even among the ladies themselves, who are truly much to be pitied. Their condition of life makes them a prey to imaginary woes, which never fail to grow up in minds unexercised and unemployed. To get rid of these, it is said, there are some who betake themselves to distilled spirits. And it is not improbable they are led gradually to the use of these poisons by a certain complaisant pharmacy, too much used in the modern practice, palsy drops, poppy cordial, plague water, and such like, which being in truth nothing but drams disguised yet, coming from the apothecaries, are considered only as medicines.

"The soul of man was supposed by many ancient sages to be thrust into the human body as into a prison for punishment of past offences. But the worst prison is the body of an indolent epicure, whose blood is inflamed by fermented liquors and high sauces, or rendered putrid, sharp and corrosive, by a stagnation of the animal juices through sloth and indolence, whose membranes are irritated by pungent salts, whose mind is agitated by painful oscillations of the nervous system, and whose nerves are mutually affected by the irregular passions of his mind. This ferment in the animal economy darkens and confounds the intellect. It produceth vain terrors and vain conceits, and stimulates the soul with mad desires, which, not being natural, nothing in nature can satisfy. No wonder therefore there are so many fine persons of both sexes, shining themselves, and shone on by fortune, who are inwardly miserable and sick of life.

"The hardness of stubbed vulgar constitutions renders them insensible of a thousand things that fret and gall those delicate people, who, as if their skin was peeled off, feel to the quick everything that touches them. The remedy for this exquisite and painful sensibility is commonly sought from fermented, perhaps from distilled liquors, which render many lives wretched that would otherwise have been only ridiculous. The tender nerves and low spirits of such poor creatures would be much relieved by the use of tar water, which might prolong and cheer their lives. I do therefore recommend to them the use of a cordial, not only safe and innocent, but giving health and spirits as surely as other cordials destroy them."¹

OF THE PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN KNOWLEDGE

If we inquire into what the most accurate philosophers declare themselves to mean by material substance, we shall find them acknowledge they have no other meaning annexed to those sounds but the idea of Being in general, together with the relative notion of its supporting accidents. The general idea of Being appeareth to me the most abstract and incomprehensible of all other; and as for its supporting accidents, this, as we have just now observed, cannot be understood in the common sense of these words, it must therefore be taken in some other sense, but what that is they do not explain. So that when I consider the two parts or branches which make the signification of the words material substance, I am convinced there is no distinct meaning annexed to them. But why should we trouble ourselves any farther, in discussing this material substratum or support of figure and motion, and other sensible qualities? Does it not suppose they have an existence without the mind? and is not this a direct repugnancy, and altogether inconceivable?

But though it were possible that stolid, figured, moveable substances may exist without the mind, corresponding to the ideas we have of bodies, yet how is it possible for us to know this? Either we must know it by sense or by reason. As for our senses, by them we have the knowledge only of our sensations, ideas, or those things that are immediately perceived by sense, call them what you will but they do not inform us that things exist without the mind, or unperceived, like to those which are perceived. This the materialists themselves acknowledge. It remains therefore that if we have any knowledge at all of external things it must be by reason, inferring their existence from what is immediately perceived by sense. But what reason can induce us to believe the existence of bodies without the mind, from what we perceive, since the very patrons of Matter themselves do not pretend there is any necessary connection betwixt them and our ideas? I say it is granted on all hands, and what happens in dreams, frenzies, and the like, puts it beyond dispute, that it is possible we might be affected with all the ideas we have now, though there were no bodies existing without resembling them. Hence, it is evident the supposition of external bodies is not necessary for the producing of our ideas, since it is granted they are produced sometimes, and might possibly be produced always in the same order we see them in at present, without their concurrence. But though we might possibly have all our sensations without them, yet perhaps it may be thought easier to conceive and explain the manner of their production, by supposing external bodies in their likeness rather than otherwise, and so it might be at least probable there are such things as bodies that excite their ideas in our minds. But neither can this be said, for, though we give the materialists their external bodies, they by their own confession are never the nearer knowing how our ideas are produced, since they own themselves unable to comprehend in what manner body can act upon spirit, or how it is possible it should imprint any idea in the mind. Hence it is evident the production of ideas or sensations in our minds, can be no reason why we should suppose Matter or corporeal substances, since that is acknowledged to remain equally inexplicable with or without this supposition. If therefore it were possible for bodies to exist without the mind, yet to hold they do so, must needs be a very precarious opinion; since it is to suppose, without any reason at all, that God has created innumerable beings that are entirely useless, and serve to no manner of purpose.

In short, if there were external bodies, it is impossible we should ever come to know it; and if there were not, we might have the very same reasons to think these were that we have now. Suppose—what no one can deny possible—an intelligence without the help of external bodies, to be affected with the same train of sensations or ideas that you are, imprinted in the same order and with like vividness in his mind. I ask whether that intelligence hath not all the reason to believe the existence of corporeal substances, represented by his ideas, and exciting them in his mind, that you can possibly have for believing the same thing? Of this there can be no question—which one consideration were enough to make any reasonable person suspect the strength of whatever arguments he may think himself to have, for the existence of bodies without the mind.

DAVID HUME (1711–1776)

HIS LIFE

"Our Davie's a fine, good-natured orator, but uncommon wake-minded", in these not over-complimentary terms Mrs Hume is said to have described her younger son. The maternal estimate, however, has been accepted with reservation. Good-natured Hume certainly was, but his "wake-mindedness" the world has yet to discover.

Coming of a good stock, he was born in Edinburgh on the 26th of April 1711, though the modest family estate of Ninewells lay in Berwickshire, close to the Border. His father died in Hume's infancy, but his mother, with whom he had no little in common, survived to 1749. Our knowledge concerning his education is meagre, but he seems to have been a remarkable lad, judging from a letter written to a friend when but sixteen years of age. He gravely informs his correspondent that his "peace of mind is not sufficiently confirmed by philosophy to withstand the blows of fortune. This greatness and elevation of soul is to be found only in study and contemplation—this alone can teach us to look down on human accidents." An attempt to apply himself to law was unsuccessful, for he was already cherishing literary ambitions. The next few years were occupied in study, but his spirits becoming oppressed he determined on a change of life, and in 1734 entered a merchant's office at Bristol. The experiment, however, was a short one, and abandoning commerce Hume proceeded to France, in the quietude of La Flèche, where Descartes had received his education, he composed the celebrated Treatise on Human Nature—an amazing achievement for so youthful a writer, presenting as it does a revolutionary system of philosophy. The first two volumes—the third following a year later—were published in 1739, but their reception severely disappointed the author eager for fame, and he describes the Treatise as falling "dead born from the press." But it must be admitted that Hume was not evenly satisfied, for a review which said the book bore "incontestable marks of a great capacity, of a soaring genius but young and not yet thoroughly practised," is referred to as "somewhat abusive." Nevertheless he may have found some recompense in the success that attended his Essays in Moral and Political, which appeared shortly afterwards. "Something" in this work having taken the fancy of the Marquis of Annandale, a nobleman of feeble intellect, he invited the philosopher to live with him, and Hume passed through a trying experience which terminated at the end of a year.

In 1748 he accepted, at the shortest notice, the post of secretary to General St. Clair, and accompanied the latter on an expedition which, instead of proceeding to Canada as originally intended, made a descent upon the French coast and finally returned home. Apparently Hume created a good impression, for after a short interval his services were again enlisted by the same commander, who was conducting a mission to the Courts at Vienna and Turin. Whilst he was abroad in 1748, the Philosophical Essays concerning Human Understanding made an anonymous appearance. This work in his opinion superseded the Treatise, which he now regarded as a premature production, regretting his "haste a hundred and a hundred times." Returning to Ninewells in 1749, Hume's pen seems to have been busily engaged, for in 1751 came The Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals, and by this date the Dialogues on Natural Religion were already written, though not published until after his death. The Political Discourses quickly followed, which achieved an immediate success, and made Hume famous. Crossing the Channel they affected Economic thought in France, and their influence must have been considerable upon his close friend and admirer—Adam Smith. The philosopher had now removed to Edinburgh, and was happily established in a little household consisting, beside himself, of a sister "and two inferior members, a maid and a cat." For a wife, he frankly declared, was not among life's necessities, looks on the other hand were indispensable, and of these he had more than he could use. This last statement possessed undoubted truth, as Hume had recently obtained a library appointment which gave him access to over thirty thousand volumes! The salary of the new post he passed on with characteristic kindness to a blind poet named Blacklock. Under these favourable conditions the History of England was commenced. He rapidly produced a volume covering the early Stuart period, and after having brought the account down to the Revolution, worked his way backwards, as it has been said, in "crab-like" fashion. Before the completion of this big work, a Natural History of Religion was added to his list of achievements.

In 1763 Hume was invited by Lord Hertford, the English Ambassador to France, to undertake the secretarial duties of the Embassy, the office was accepted, though with no great alacrity, for he was not anxious to leave his native country again. At Paris an overwhelming reception was accorded him, and the feted philosopher, in his own words, trod on "nothing but flowers." Certainly Hume found French society infinitely more agreeable than the company of "the barbarians who inhabit the banks of the Thames." For Rousseau, indeed, he professed great affection and admiration, comparing him favourably with Socrates; though further experience of that eccentric genius produced analogies of a less flattering description. Despite, however, his antipathy towards Englishmen, Hume spent a short time in London as Under-Secretary of State for Scotland and returned in 1769, "very opulent," to Edinburgh, where his remaining days were passed. He wrote an Autobiography in the year previous to his death, which occurred on August 25, 1776, and was anticipated with courageous equanimity. "Upon the whole," said Adam Smith, "I have always considered him as approaching nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the nature of human frailty will permit."

HIS PHILOSOPHY

Hume's philosophy is of peculiar interest, because we find in it that sceptical spirit which is such a marked characteristic of modern times. It is therefore not surprising that his intellectual position had commended itself strongly to philosophically minded scientists.

Convinced, like Locke, of the limitation of our faculties, he believed that we should avoid "all distant and high inquiries" and confine ourselves "to such subjects as fall under daily practice and experience." In his hands, however, empirical investigation produced some startling results.

Hume agrees with Berkeley in challenging the existence of matter. He contends, in much the same manner as his predecessor, that it cannot be directly perceived to exist. A recapitulation of these arguments would therefore be somewhat superfluous, and it is sufficient to state his conclusion.

All that "can ever be present to the mind," he says, "are perceptions." Nor can the reality of matter be inferred. For "by what argument"—to mention his most obvious objection—"can it be proved that the perceptions of the mind must be caused by external objects . . . and could not arise either from the energy of the mind itself or from the suggestions of some invisible and unknown spirit, or from some other cause still more unknown to us?" It is acknowledged that, in fact, many of these perceptions are not from anything external as in dreams, madness, and other diseases." In passing it may be well to note Hume's analysis of the mind. The perceptions of which it is composed are divided into two classes—impressions and ideas.

The former are more lively than the latter and include "all our sensations, passions, and emotions, as they make their first appearance in the soul," whereas "the faint images of these (impressions) in thinking and reasoning" are ideas. But Hume of course carries the work of destruction much further than Berkeley does. The Bishop, indeed, had argued a material substance out of existence, but he never attacked the idea of a spiritual substance; on the contrary, as we have seen, it forms an essential part of his teaching. The Scottish philosopher, however, takes a very different view. One of the distinctive features of his system is the denial of mind in the above sense of the word. According to him, what we term the mind is "nothing but a bundle or collection of different perceptions which succeed one another with an inconceivable rapidity and are in a perpetual flux and movement." He professes ignorance of an ego or self which is permanent amidst this unceasing change, and in which our perceptions—as he calls them—inherers. His objections to this theory seem to be twofold. In the first place he maintains that it is unnecessary; ideas do not require a spiritual substance for their support, each of them may be regarded as self-subsisting. Secondly, he finds no evidence in favour of the hypothesis. "For my part," says Hume in an oft-quoted passage, "when I enter most intimately into what I call myself, I always stumble on some particular perception or other, of heat or cold, light or shade, love or hatred, pain or pleasure. I never can catch myself at any time without a perception, and never can observe anything but the perception." It is evident, then, that this idealism is of a peculiar kind; the universe, as he sees it, is composed only of mental phenomena, of impressions and ideas which are continually changing.

Another highly important characteristic of Hume's thought is his criticism of the popular notion of causality. To call A the cause and B the effect means, according to this view, that A produces B by "some power" residing in it. Now Hume maintains that there is no proof of such a connecting power as is here supposed, we observe merely a sequence of events. To begin with, it is impossible to discover this causal force in external objects. We only perceive, for instance, that light attends the striking of a match—one event succeeds the other, that is all. Nor does our inner experience show that it exists. It is indeed asserted that we are conscious of exerting "internal power"—that volition, for example, causes bodily movement. But this is a fallacy. Careful introspection simply shows that "the motion of our body follows upon the command of our will." But if we observe nothing more than succession of events, from whence, it will be asked, is our notion of the causal relation derived? From custom, and custom alone, replies Hume. After constantly finding two objects in conjunction, he says "the mind is carried by habit, upon the appearance of one event, to expect its usual attendant and to believe that it will exist. This connection, therefore, which we feel in the mind, this customary transition of the imagination from one object to its usual attendant, is the sentiment or impression from which we form the idea of power or necessary connection. Nothing farther is in the case."

Probably no part of Hume's writings has attracted more general attention than his Essay on Miracles, for he was here attacking a belief which to many people was the very basis of Christianity. The publication of the Essay synchronised with the appearance of another inquiry into supernatural occurrences which came from the pen of the Rev. Conyers Middleton, and according to Hume, "eclipsed" his own production. Middleton, however, merely challenged the credibility of the Patristic Miracles; Hume's criticism, on the other hand, was comprehensive in its scope. A miracle, as he defined it, is "a violation of the laws of nature." Now "no testimony is sufficient to establish a miracle unless the testimony be of such a kind that its falsehood would be more miraculous than the fact which it endeavours to establish, and even in that case there is a mutual destruction of arguments, and the superior only gives us an assurance suitable to that degree of force which remains after deducting the inferior." But this essential requirement is not forthcoming. For there is good reason to believe that the fallaciousness of human testimony in this matter is less miraculous than a transgression of the laws of nature. And since miracles, according to Hume, form an integral part of Christianity, "mere reason," he concludes, cannot establish the truth of this religion. Nor does "mere reason" render Hume unqualified assistance in establishing the principles of natural religion. True, he affirms the existence of a Superhuman Being, finding in the argument from design a rational basis for this belief—the adjustment of all the different parts of nature manifest an "Intelligent Author." But beyond this obviously imperfect sort of Theism Hume does not appear to venture. He maintains that we can only ascertain the nature of such a Being as a Deity from the character of his productions, and that we cannot infer qualities other than those which are displayed in his workmanship. We may endow him with wisdom and goodness in so far as the Universe exhibits these traits, but it is not legitimate to infer "further attributes or further degrees of attributes." On the whole, it is not altogether unlikely that the sceptical Philo of the Dialogues expressed Hume's own intellectual position in resolving all natural theology "into one simple . . . proposition, that the cause or causes of order in the Universe, probably bear some remote analogy to human intelligence."

Of all his writings, Hume considered his Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals to be "incomparably the best," and, as it may be surmised, he approached the subject from an empirical standpoint. In order "to reach the foundation of ethics and find those universal principles from which all censure and approbation is ultimately derived," we must "observe that particular in which the estimable qualities agree on the one hand, and the blamable on the other." Now an examination of meritorious qualities shows that they are all alike in this respect—they are "useful or agreeable." This beneficent characteristic produces a feeling of pleasure in the spectator which is approbation. We applaud the useful actions. But to whom are they useful? Not merely to ourselves, for we praise conduct that is unconnected with, and even actually opposed to, self interest. For instance, we often commend actions which have occurred in past ages, or in distant lands, and cannot have any possible relation to our own well-being. Such being the case, it is obvious that qualities or acts that contribute to the happiness of others merit our approval. In this sympathetic regard for human welfare lies "one great source of moral distinctions." Amongst the virtues he distinguishes those which are (a) useful to others, (b) useful to the person himself, (c) immediately agreeable to others, (d) immediately agreeable to the person himself. Humanity, for example, benefits our fellow-men, prudence especially serves the interests of the individual; wit again gives direct social pleasure, whilst philosophic serenity is a satisfaction to its possessor.

Hume's influence was profound. Not only has he been called the "Father of Modern Agnosticism," but his work, by arousing opposition, gave rise to fresh systems of thought. However we may view his opinions, there can be no doubt that he is a most arresting thinker, and philosophy owes much to his exceedingly acute intellect.

In Scotland, Hume's thought had a stimulating effect upon THOMAS REID (1710-1796), whose name is associated with the "Common-sense" school of philosophy. This sober critic of scepticism was a native of Kincardineshire, and as a boy "of good and well-wearing parts" was sent to complete his education at Aberdeen, where he subsequently became a Regent of Philosophy in King's College. In 1763 he succeeded Adam Smith in the Professorial Chair at Glasgow, and retired only to busy himself in vigorous old age with the production of his Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man. His earlier work on Inquiry into the Human Mind on the Principles of Common Sense had appeared in 1764, and evoked the friendly if not wholly unambiguous appreciation of Hume, to whom Reid had sent it in manuscript, he politely informed the author that "it is certainly very rare that a piece so deeply philosophical is wrote with so much spirit, and affords so much entertainment to the reader." By the principles of Common Sense, Reid means "original and natural judgments," which are "the inspiration of the Almighty," and cannot be rejected without "metaphysical lunacy." We have, for example, an immediate assurance that external objects exist. The basis of scepticism, in his opinion, was the belief common to ancient and modern philosophers alike—that what we directly perceive "must be some image present to the mind." Reid maintained, on the contrary, that material things, besides our own sensations or ideas, are self-evident. Thus he regarded as his main achievement

ETHICAL THINKERS

To thoroughly appreciate the work of any thinker an understanding of his mental environment is necessary. In the case of Butler such consideration is particularly useful, because his religious philosophy is, to a large extent, a criticism of prevalent opinions. Even his ethical position, which comes first in order, will be elucidated by briefly noticing the achievements of some of his immediate predecessors and contemporaries.

In the region of ethical theory the early part of the eighteenth century witnessed an attack upon the views promulgated by Hobbes. This provocative philosopher, it will be remembered, had reduced all morality to enlightened self-interest which was the outcome of experience and reflection. Now practically all the important moralists in the period with which we are dealing are at one in denying this doctrine. In direct opposition they maintained that right conduct is recognised as such intuitively. The precise nature of the intuitive faculty, however, is somewhat variously conceived.

With some, it is purely rational, with others it is more a matter of feeling; whilst Butler differs in a measure from both these schools in identifying it with the conscience.

JOSEPH BUTLER (1692-1752)

With BUTLER our ethical guide becomes the conscience. A cultivated taste may make us appreciate what is good and dislike what is bad, but conscience informs us what ought to be done. "There is," says Butler, "a principle of reflection in men, by which they distinguish between, approve and disapprove their own actions." It is, in short, "the voice of God within us."

Virtue, then, is acting according to the dictates of conscience. But what is the nature of the conduct that conscience would have us pursue? Briefly stated, it is exercising various fundamental feelings in human nature so that they accomplish the ends for which they were designed, and thus form a harmonious combination. Of these feelings benevolence is one, self-love is another, whilst there is a third class, that comprises instincts having for their immediate objects neither the happiness of self nor the happiness of others, but which nevertheless are capable indirectly of promoting both these ends—as for example the desire for social companionship. But does the virtuous man's obedience to duty conform to his own personal happiness? Butler answers in the affirmative. "Duty and interest," he says, "are perfectly coincident for the most part in this world, but entirely and in every instance, if we take in the future and the whole; for this is implied in the notion of a good and perfect administration of things." This reply is noteworthy for bringing out another difference between his ethics and those of Shaftesbury. The latter moralist dispenses with Butler's qualification. With unflinching optimism he seems to find a complete harmony existing between virtue and the happiness of the individual even in this life. In his view apparently one can safely affirm that "to be wicked and vicious is to be miserable and unhappy," without taking into consideration any future state of existence.

As regards the intellectual difficulties of Christianity, Butler thinks that these may form part of the trial which we are undergoing here. Besides, our general experience should warn us to anticipate their existence, for much which occurs in the natural world appears mysterious to our limited faculties. "How capricious and irregular, by way of information, would it be said, is that of invention, by means of which nature instructs us in the matter of science, and in many things upon which the affairs of the world greatly depend that a man should by this faculty be made acquainted with a thing in an instant, when perhaps he is thinking of somewhat else, which he has been in vain searching after it may be for years." Perhaps, if Butler had been conversant with the theory of the subconscious mind, this mental process might possibly have seemed less "capricious" and "irregular."

We are also reminded that with regard to Christianity men expect absolute certainty, which they do not require before deciding other questions of great importance. Indeed, such complete assurance is not forthcoming; "to us Probability is the very Guide of Life"

Moreover, Butler insists in his writings on the practical advantages of belief, an argument which was reiterated by another celebrated divine—Bishop Blougram, the hero of Browning's poem—and is a decided favourite with many pragmatic Christians at the present day. Even if the truth of Christianity were a matter of doubt, "would it not," asks Butler, "be madness for a man to forsake a safe road, and prefer to it one in which he acknowledges there is an even chance he should lose his life, though there was an even chance likewise of his getting safe through it?" "A mistake on the one side is much more dangerous than a mistake on the other"

The Analogy enjoyed a great popularity despite its logical shortcomings, not only with its own but also with later generations. Indeed for over one hundred years, so one of his biographers tells us, it was considered to be one "of the best manuals upon the evidence of revelation" To-day it is read probably more from curiosity than with expectations of theological profit. If its past success seems somewhat surprising, it must be remembered that the endeavour to justify religion by an empirical logic always makes a strong appeal to the English intellect, especially when the argument assumes a utilitarian aspect

But in justice to Butler one must add that, however inadequate the Analogy may be regarded as a religious Apologia, it certainly exposed a grave weakness in the Deistic position. For in this book the author repeatedly calls attention to the deficiencies in nature of which his opponents apparently took but little account. Consequently, even when criticism has had its say, we must pay a tribute to Butler's candour. It can never be said that he is one of those theologians who dwell lightly upon life's evils in the hope of minimising the magnitude of this eternal problem in philosophy.

"Persons who speak of the evidence of religion as doubtful, and of this supposed doubtfulness as a positive argument against it, should be put upon considering what that evidence indeed is which they act upon with regard to their temporal interests, for it is not only extremely difficult, but in many cases absolutely impossible, to balance pleasure and pain, satisfaction and uneasiness, so as to be able to say on which side the overplus is. There are the like difficulties and impossibilities in making the due allowance for a change of temper and taste, for satiety, disgusts, ill health, any of which render men incapable of enjoying, after they have obtained, what they most eagerly desired. Numberless, too, are the accidents, besides that one of untimely death, which may even probably disappoint the best-concerted schemes, and strong objections are often seen to be against them, not to be removed or answered, but which seem overbalanced by reasons on the other side, so that the certain difficulties and dangers of the pursuit are by everyone thought justly disregarded, upon account of the appearing greater advantages in case of success, though there be but little probability of it. Lastly, every one observes our hableness, if we be not upon our guard, to be deceived by the falsehood of men, and the false appearance of things; and this danger must be greatly increased if there be a strong bias within, supposed from indulged passion, to favour the deceit. Hence arises that great uncertainty and doubtfulness of proof, wherein our temporal interests really consist"¹

PROGRESS OF SCIENTIFIC THOUGHT

THE early history of scientific knowledge is associated with much that to us, in these days of enlightenment, savours of sheer madness. Men spent long years of their lives in the vain hope of discovering the elixir of life, or in endeavouring to transmute base metals into gold. It is difficult for us to realise that these men were frequently gifted with mathematical skill and scientific imagination. They desired to penetrate the mysteries of nature, to gain a knowledge of hidden things—hence in the eyes of the common people, their researches gained for them a reputation as magicians, and they were looked upon as being in league with the powers of evil. Their extravagant dreams, untempered by sober research and experiment, resulted in the crude medley of astrology, alchemy, and necromancy, out of which the sciences gradually emerged.

ROGER BACON heralds the dawn of the true scientific spirit in England. Bacon as a young man had come under the influence of Grosseteste, a scholar at Oxford, who occupied a position equivalent to that of Chancellor. Bacon in his Opus Majus has many passages in which he speaks with gratitude of his master, and he especially emphasizes two points: Grosseteste's knowledge of science, and the importance attached by him to a study of Greek and Hebrew writings, since they formed two chief avenues to a knowledge of the scientific works of Aristotle and of the mathematicians and naturalists who succeeded him.

Bacon tells us that in 1266 he had been a student for forty years. They were years spent in patient experiment and investigation, in observing the stars, the correction of the Calendar, in astronomical studies, learning Hebrew from Jews and

Greek from foreigners visiting this country. It is probable that Bacon was in Paris about 1240, and that he joined the Franciscan Order shortly afterwards. In 1273 a new Superior of the Order was appointed, Bacon's orthodoxy was suspected, and he was removed from Oxford to Paris for the next ten years. In 1286 a letter was sent to him from Pope Clement IV, requiring him to make a copy of his writings, and it is to this command that we owe the Opus Majus. Bacon having no money, could only write when supplied with parchment.

The Opus Majus reveals Bacon as an ardent Catholic who desires to see the Pope become the spiritual ruler of the world, and unites with his dreams for the Church, an intensely practical spirit. The Pope should have a complete survey of his domains, hence part of the Opus Majus is devoted to this, this, however, cannot be accurately done until astronomical surveys have been made of the world.

Bacon insisted that the habitable portion of the globe extended farther to the east and to the south than was commonly supposed. This is the passage quoted by Columbus in a letter written in 1498 to Ferdinand and Isabella.

In 1274, Jerome of Ascoli became General of the Order, Bacon was tried and condemned for his doctrines that "contained certain suspicions," suffered imprisonment for fourteen years, and died in 1292, two years after his release.

Bacon desired to see established, under papal authority, a school of Greek and Oriental philology, in order that the culture of the East might be accessible to the Western nations. He realised the importance of mathematics and the experimental sciences, and dreamed of the papal power becoming supreme through the possession of both earthly and spiritual knowledge. His dreams were doomed to meet with disappointment, the downfall of the Papacy and the Hundred Years' War caused the progress of scientific thought to be arrested for two hundred years, and the man who was generations ahead of his own day lived on in the popular imagination as a magician.

Two hundred years later there was born in Prussia a German named COPERNICUS, who was destined to revolutionise the history of thought, by giving to the world a new conception of "Man's place in the Universe." The author of De Revolutionibus Orbium Caelestium was a quiet, studious, orthodox monk who compiled tables of the motions of the planets, and by application of these calculations to each of the bodies in the solar system he proved the earth to be a planet that revolved round the sun.

This great work, dedicated to the Pope and published at the expense of a cardinal, was issued in 1543, as its author lay dying. The full significance of the discovery was not appreciated by the Church until some years later, when BRUNO and GALILEO began to publicly expound the Copernican theory.

Bruno, refusing to recant, was burnt to death in 1600. Galileo was born in 1564. He very early became acquainted with the writings of Bruno and the Copernican system.

Galileo publicly demonstrated to the Aristotelians their error concerning falling bodies. He invented a thermometer, a calculating compass, and in 1609, after hearing an account of a Dutch optician's telescope, he set to work and made one for himself, improved it, and began to make observations.

For the first time (January 8, 1610) the satellites of Jupiter were seen, the mountains of the moon; innumerable new stars, the phases of Venus and spots on the sun! Withal, his main glory lies in that he "first laid the foundation of mechanics on a firm basis. He first discovered the true Laws of Motion."¹

The iron hand of dogmatic belief was stretched out to crush the exponents of teaching that threatened to undermine the authority of the Church. Galileo was summoned to Rome to defend his scientific beliefs. He was forced to recant, and finally forbidden to teach, or to publish anything more, or receive friends.

In 1637 he became blind. The regulations were then not so strictly enforced, and during this time he was visited by John Milton. He died in 1642.

The effect of the Reformation in England was to set men's minds free from the "dead hand" of authority. Scientific inquiry began in the reign of Elizabeth. FRANCIS BACON—like his namesake Roger—once more proclaimed the necessity for experiment and investigation in order to discover truth, and the Novum Organum heralds a new era.

Under the Stuarts, who were great patrons of learning, rapid advance was made in many directions. A spirit of eager inquiry was abroad that is reflected in much of the literature of the seventeenth century. The new interest taken in medicine, anatomy, and agriculture is indicated in many ways in the diaries of Pepys and John Evelyn, in the writings of Sir Thomas Browne, and in the poetry of Cowley. Various minor inventions paved the way for later discoveries. The introduction of the decimal system, the invention of a slide rule, the publication of tables of logarithms, were indications of the new interests.

JOHN EVELYN studied medicine in Padua in 1645, and a few years later attended a course of chemistry lectures in Paris given by Le Tellure. Evelyn afterwards presented his rare tables of veins and nerves to the Royal Society.

Evelyn devoted himself to horticulture. He wrote a book on Forest Trees, Sylva, that remained for many years the standard work on the subject. Evelyn in his travels abroad made a point of visiting the "cabinets" of collectors (the equivalent of the modern museum), and recording the curiosities he saw.

LORD HERBERT of Cherbury prided himself on his knowledge of medicine, studied Paracelsus and considered it part of a gentleman's education to know how to make medicines. Milton advocated the teaching of medicine and horticulture.

Yet something of the old distrust of science lingered during the earlier years of the century. Sir Walter Raleigh's encouragement of chemistry was deemed "atheistical"; and while Hobbes was at Oxford "geometry made no part of any student's training." Indeed, those who taught mathematics were regarded as "lunhs of the devil"; while even at the mid-century Hobbes tells us that the universities had only just given over thinking geometry to be "art diabolical."

So much suspicion of science having emanated from theological quarters, it is interesting to note that JOHN NAPIER (1550-1617), the discoverer of logarithms, made his early reputation through a theological treatise that achieved the distinction of being translated into several languages.

The Royal Society, founded about 1660 in order to promote scientific research, is a significant sign of the times. It showed that the all-absorbing interest in theological matters was giving place to fresh aims and interests; it portended, too, a change of attitude that would make for toleration. For bigotry and science do not harmonise. Further, the ideals of its members favoured a clear, concise, literary style, and these literary methods, already affected by French influences, were greatly helped by this stimulus to scientific research.

The Royal Society originated in London in 1645, when a few philosophers met together each week to discuss scientific questions. Afterwards their meeting place was at Oxford, then Gresham College, until political excitements put an end to academic discussion, and the house of learning became a Puritan harrack. But after the Restoration, the King, partly because he was interested in these subjects, partly because he wished to distract attention from current controversy, gave the Society the name of the Royal Society.

In 1710 the Society moved to a house in Fleet Street (that had formerly belonged to "Praise-God Barebones" but had been rebuilt by Wren in 1670 after its destruction in the fire), and here the Society stayed for over seventy years. Pepye and Wren, former presidents, now gave way to the energetic and dominating personality of Newton. After its long sojourn in Fleet Street, the Society was moved to rooms in Somerset House (1780), and from thence to Burlington House. Several interesting relics of Newton are still in the possession of the Society, the sundial which he cut when a lad on the wall of his father's house, the first reflecting telescope made by him in 1671, and the original mask of his face.

That this Society at the outset of its long and distinguished career was not pedantic in its scientific investigations may be judged from the first catalogue of its museum. Here are a few items:

"A stag beetle, whose horns worn in a ring are good against the cramp."

"A bone—said to be taken out of a mermaid's head."

"The quills of a porcupine, which on certain occasions the creature can shoot at the pursuing enemy. . . ."

But barring a few little weaknesses like the foregoing, the legacy of years of superstitions, the Royal Society from its very inception achieved a fine work in cutting down the rank weeds of ignorance.

In 1642, the year Galileo died, ISAAC NEWTON was born at Woolthorpe, some six miles south of Grantham. Destined for a farmer and grazier, Newton very early displayed tendencies that were hardly likely to produce a good agriculturist. He would often be found sitting under the hedges working out mathematical problems, or busily engaged in constructing a model when he should have been buying or selling at the market. Complaints were made to his uncle, the rector of Burton Coggles, concerning his behaviour; who advised that he should be sent to school and then to Cambridge.

At Trinity College, Newton devoted himself to the study of mathematics, discovered the "binomial theorem," and a little later, at the age of twenty-two, the "differential calculus." In 1665-6, during his enforced retirement into the country owing to the plague, sitting in his garden meditating on the problem as to why the planets go round the sun, he saw "the apple" fall. In a moment it occurred to Newton that the force of gravity might be the cause of the movement of the planets. He at once endeavoured to prove his theory, but his calculations were thrown out by an error then made in estimating the size of the earth. Sixteen years later, with correct data, Newton was able to vindicate his theory.

Newton next turned his attention to the study of Optics. He bought prisms and lenses and tried to improve telescopes. Whilst occupied thus he discovered the nature of white light, the doctrine of colour, and invented the first reflecting telescope, now in the library of the Royal Society, London. But Newton's greatest work was yet to come, The Principia, in which he gave to the world the discovery made many years earlier, and which had been laid aside until he became acquainted with the measurements of the degree made by Picard, when the length of a degree was found to be nearly seventy miles instead of sixty.

For two years Newton was absorbed body and soul in working out his theory once more in the light of this new knowledge.

"Mathematicians regard the achievement now as men might stare at the work of some demigod of a bygone age, wondering what manner of man this was, able to wield such ponderous implements with such apparent ease."¹

Having written the first part of The Principia, Newton, not wishing to be involved in controversy, locked it up in his desk, and it was only through the instrumentality of Halley that Newton was induced to complete and publish this transcendent work.

Newton died at the age of eighty-five, honoured and respected; the greatest scientific philosopher England has ever had.

An interesting illustration of the hearing of science upon literature is seen in Newton's Observations upon the Prophecies of Holy Writ. This work does not, as may be imagined, signify an incursion by a scientist into the domain of literature, but a key to a literary problem from a scientific standpoint. For he showed that the interpretation of figures of prophecy is essentially mathematical, and the symbols of such books as Daniel and The Apocalypse can only be properly understood by one learned in the character of astronomical symbols.

Newton's genius was such that men for the next century felt that the "Universe had been explored," and that nothing more was left to be done:

"Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in Night;
God said, 'Let Newton be,' and all was light."

WILLIAM HARVEY, the discoverer of the "circulation of the blood," was born at Folkestone in 1578. He was educated at King's School, Canterbury, and entered Caius College, Cambridge, in 1593. The choice of Caius College seems to indicate that Harvey already intended to be a doctor, for the study of practical anatomy had been introduced by Dr. Caius, who obtained from Queen Elizabeth a charter allowing the college the bodies of two criminals annually, for the purpose of dissection.

Harvey then travelled through France and Germany to Italy, and became a student at the University of Padua—then specially renowned for its anatomical school, owing to the labours of Vesalius and his successor Fabricius.

Padua, being the university town of Venice, offered greater safety to Protestant students than most foreign universities at this time. Here Harvey, under the direction of Fabricius, his master and friend, engaged in a study of the valves of the veins. He became a Doctor of Medicine in 1602 and returned to England, obtained a degree from Cambridge, and soon after settled in London, where he became physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital.

In 1615 he was appointed Lumleian Lecturer, and lectured upon Surgery.

"At this time Harvey was thirty-seven years of age. A man of the lowest stature, round faced, with a complexion like the wainscot, his eyes small, and full of spirit; his hair as black as a raven and curling; rapid in his utterance, choleric, given to gesture, and used when in discourse with any one, to play unconsciously with the handle of the small dagger he wore by his side."¹

The notes of these lectures show that Harvey had already discovered the circulation, although his treatise was not published until 1621, and after he had spent much time in verifying and illustrating his theory.

Harvey was for many years physician to Charles I. He became a personal friend of the King's, and accompanied him on many journeys. The King's interest in Art and Science is testified by the numerous occasions on which Harvey directed the attention of his royal master to things curious and unusual.

Harvey's Treatise on Development affords testimony to the slow emergence of the most original thinkers from the bondage of the Schoolmen. Harvey died in 1657; three years later the Royal Society was founded, among the earlier members were Sir Christopher Wren, and the Hon. Robert Boyle. A notable exclusion from the list of members was the learned Sir Thomas Browne, probably owing to his literary style, since the Society insisted on its members adhering to a plain, matter-of-fact language that could be understood by the ordinary artisan. Newton was made a member in 1671, and became President in 1703, holding the office for twenty-four years.

During the eighteenth century, science does little more than mark time, the great periods of progress being the seventeenth and nineteenth centuries. Progress was made, however, in chemistry and electricity, and the name of Priestley is one of the links between the literature and science of the time. As a philosophic writer he belongs to the Deistic school, was a determinist and tried to square a materialistic philosophy with a belief in the Christian Revelation. But his "doctrine of philosophical necessity" is of far less moment than his discovery of oxygen; in other words, he will be remembered rather as a scientist than as a philosopher.

Scientific geology became an actuality towards the close of the century, and is associated with the names of James Hutton and William Smith; and wider biological speculation began to be put forth, thus preparing the way for Darwin and Spencer.

Such is the record of the progress of Science in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, for a parallel in rapid development it is necessary to turn to the nineteenth.

The Victorian era has been remarkable for the manner in which the scientific spirit has entered into the life, and consequently the literature, of the period. Not only has it been distinguished for its multifarious mechanical inventions, but it has seen the reign of scientific law bringing order out of chaos. The idea of "chance" as entering largely into men's lives has been eliminated by the new conceptions of causation.

This change in thought was in great measure brought about by the publication of Lyell's Principles of Geology in 1830-33. The Principles ran into eleven editions, and did more to stimulate the study of geology than any other work. Lyell demonstrated "the immense superiority" of the uniformitarian theory of the earth's formation, as opposed to the "catastrophic." The latter explained the changes in the earth's surface to be the result of earthquakes, volcanoes, and floods, whilst the former accounted for these changes by the slow and long-continued action of glaciers, rivers, and land subsidence. Lyell made use of the important discoveries that had been made by Werner, Hutton, and William Smith, and used them to prove that earth-changes were subject to uniform laws, and thus geology became a science in the strict sense of the word.

The influence of modern scientific thought upon our literature is clear as noonday; the influence of earlier scientific investigation upon letters is less clear at first sight, but none the less indisputable. This may be regarded from a twofold standpoint. We may consider such of our men of science as had power of literary expression, and we may observe the indirect influence of scientific thought upon our poets and prosemen. The first is the least important, but must not be overlooked.

SIR JOHN HERSCHEL (1792-1871) and Mrs SOMERVILLE (1780-1872) had considerable literary power and exhibited it in Familiar Studies on Scientific Subjects, and the Mechanism of the Heavens, while WILLIAM SMITH (1769-1835), by his geological writings, inspired Sir CHARLES LYELL (1797-1875), a clear and capable writer, with his far-reaching explanation of the geological past by uniformity of law. Nor can the literary faculty be denied to Sir CHARLES BELL (1774-1842), whose Anatomy of Expression and remarkable investigations into nervous phenomena, went far towards that correlation of mind and body, so emphasized to-day.

Sometimes the man of science learns from the man of letters, and we must not forget Berkeley's brilliant attack on the theory of inert matter, that preceded by many years the discoveries of the dynamic possibilities hidden in electricity.

Romanticism suggests no fraternity with the physical sciences. Yet Shelley's youthful enthusiasm for chemistry is of significance. There was much of the scientist in Shelley's making; some of his most elaborate fantasies, e.g. The Cloud, are as scientifically impeccable as they are artistically flawless.

Sir HUMPHRY DAVY's (1778-1829) connection with the Romantic movement is an interesting one. He had a taste for story-telling, metaphysical speculation, and verse-writing, as well as for experimental science; and while apprenticed to a surgeon in Penzance, indulged in all these predilections. At the age of nineteen he turned his attention especially to chemistry, and about this time made the acquaintance of Coleridge and Southey. Soon afterwards he became lecturer to the Royal Institution of London, and his eloquence and literary charm greatly facilitated the spreading impression he made with his fresh and striking chemical experiments. His lecture On Some Chemical Agencies of Electricity gained the prize of the French Institute. With the variety and scientific importance of his work we are not here concerned, but the literary power of the man is especially noteworthy, for it enormously increased his immediate influence and profoundly impressed Coleridge. Indeed he was one of the idols of the youthful Coleridge, and the scientific exactitude of that poet's wonderful nature pictures in The Ancient Mariner and Christabel, is only less remarkable than their beauty, while those who have read his Aids to Reflection will recall his eulogy of the chemist.

Mental Science, as might be expected, is even more intimately connected with literature. The poets were in advance of the scientists of their age here, and there is a profounder grasp of psychological law in Coleridge and Wordsworth than we find in either Bentham or Reid. Indeed the connection between Romanticism and Science is an ultimate and precious one; it is one that will deserve careful and conscientious study.

ART AND SCIENCE

The characters of the poet and painter have been often compared; and the analogy between their objects and their methods is so striking, as to have been generally felt and acknowledged. Visible images constitute the great charm of poetry, and they are the elements of painting, and the end of both arts is to represent the admirable in nature, and to awaken pleasurable, useful, or noble feelings. Painting, however, appeals to the eye by immediate characters, it possesses a stronger chain of association with passion; it is a more distinct and energetic language, and acts first by awakening sensation and then ideas. Poetry is less forcible, for it operates only by imagination and memory, and not by immediate impression, unless indeed in the performance of the drama, or in impassioned recitation. A representation by words is inferior in strength to representation by images, but it has the advantage in being more varied, and capable of a more extensive application. It speaks of sentiments and thoughts and affections, which can never be delineated by the pencil, and it has within its power, not only the world of sensation, but likewise the world of intellect.

In music, the powers of art are infinitely more limited than in poetry or painting. The pleasure results from mere combinations of sounds, and is as transient as the motions of the air, by which they are produced. To communicate feeling is the highest attribute of the art. Its means are wholly inadequate to convey ideas, and the attempts at imitation have generally produced only a ludicrous effect. It has this advantage, however, over poetry and painting, that its influence is more immediate and instantaneous, and perceived without study or reflection, that it acts as if by enchantment, and appealing merely to sensation, yet subdues both imagination and memory, makes the soul obedient to its impulses, and creates for the time a world of its own.

The mechanical arts and the fine arts can hardly be compared, the objects of the first being utility, of the last, pleasure. The mechanical arts delight us only indirectly, and by indistinct associations, the fine arts either directly or by immediate associations. The steam-engine may be an object of wonder, as connected with the power by which it was produced, and the power which it exerts, but to understand its beneficial effects requires extensive knowledge, or a long detail of facts. Mechanism in general is too complicated to produce any general effect of pleasure. Inventions are admired by the multitude, more on account of their novelty or strangeness, than on account of their use or ingenuity. The watch which is the guide of our time, is employed and considered with indifference. But we pay half-a-crown to see a self-moving spider of steel.

In the truths of the natural sciences there is, perhaps, a nearer analogy to the productions of the refined arts. The contemplation of the laws of the universe is connected with an immediate tranquil exaltation of mind, and pure mental enjoyment.

The perception of truth is almost as simple a feeling as the perception of beauty, and the genius of Newton, of Shakespeare, of Michael Angelo, and of Handel, are not very remote in character from each other. Imagination, as well as reason, is necessary to perfection in the philosophical mind. A rapidity of combination, a power of perceiving analogies, and of comparing them by facts, is the creative source of discovery. Discrimination and delicacy of sensation, so important in physical research, are other words for taste, and the love of nature is the same passion, as the love of the magnificent, the sublime, and the beautiful.

PART V

THE ROMANTIC REVIVAL

(c. 1780-c. 1830)

INTRODUCTION

No label can accurately describe a period so rich and varied in achievement as the fifty years following the death of Johnson. Yet, while allowing for those distinctive qualities that a genius gives to, rather than takes from an age, there will be found certain underlying characteristics linking the writers of the period together in a masonic brotherhood.

The term that best fits these varying yet fundamentally intimate features, is the term Romance, for trite and well-worn though it be, it expresses as does no other word, the peculiar appeal to the imagination made by the great writers of this time.

What is Romanticism? What is this emotional tide which ebbs and flows throughout literary history, reaching high-water mark in the age of Shakespeare and of Wordsworth, yet taking on so varying a complexion in the work, say, of a Marlowe or a Scott?

Romanticism, generally speaking, is the expression in terms of art of sharpened sensibilities, heightened imaginative feeling, and although we are concerned only with its expression in literature, Romanticism is an imaginative point of view that has influenced many art forms, and has left its mark also on philosophy and history. The loose popular meaning attached to the word indicates roughly its defects rather than its merits, for it is often used as synonymous for extravagances and sentimentality.

The word classical has been mentioned with reference to eighteenth-century literary modes, and in opposing to it the word romantic, we cannot do better than examine the suggestive remarks of Walter Pater on the subject.

"What is classical comes to us out of the cool and quiet of other times, as a measure of what a long experience has shown us will, at least, never displease us. And in the classical literature of Greece and Rome, as in the classics of the last century, the essentially classical element is that quality of order in beauty which they possess, indeed, in a pre-eminent degree."

Order, clarity, tranquillity are obviously classical qualities, and these are the qualities that have engaged our attention in dealing with the literature of the Dryden and Johnson age. Pater goes on to define the romantic character in art as consisting in "the addition of strangeness to beauty." "The desire of beauty," continues Pater, "being a fixed element in every artistic organisation, it is the addition of curiosity to this desire of beauty that constitutes the romantic temper." Further he adds.

"The essential elements of the romantic spirit are curiosity and the love of beauty, and it is as the accidental effect of these qualities only, that it seeks the Middle Ages, because in the overcharged atmosphere of the Middle Ages there are unworked sources of romantic effect, of a strange beauty to be won, by strong imagination out of things unlikely or remote."

Curiosity and the love of beauty. These are certainly integral factors in Romanticism, the one intellectual, the other emotional. Are they, however, the only essential elements? Romanticism seems to me more broadly based than this, more complex also.

May we not say that the features most insistent in Romanticism are a subtle sense of mystery, an exuberant intellectual curiosity, and an instinct for the elemental simplicities of life.

The supreme Romantic movement in English letters was the Renaissance. It had transformed not only English but European life; but like every great impulse in Art and Life, it had been followed by a period of reaction. The great Romantics were, as I have said, also realists, but among the lesser spirits Romanticism always generates a certain tendency to exaggeration and aloofness from the conditions of ordinary life. It was the business of the common-sense, unimpassioned school that followed to correct these defects. This it accomplished, and it bequeathed to English literature a greater clarity, a closer correspondence with the actualities of life, then in its turn becoming artificial and one-sided, another tidal movement was needed for purposes of spiritual adjustment.

The Romantic Revival was the result of no one cause. Broadly speaking, it was the inevitable corollary of the Renaissance and Reformation. The dignity and importance of man as man, the glories of the world of nature,—these ideas, of which we hear so much at the close of the eighteenth century, were born centuries before, and had been gradually working in men's minds through all the political unrest of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The first flowering of Romanticism in England, the bloody horrors of the French Revolution, the kindling of a new idealistic philosophy in Germany under Kant and Hegel, the political upheaval in America, all these things were but varying symptoms of a general ferment that had lasted on from the fifteenth century.

It is well to remember this, for although the social theories of Rousseau, roughly embodied in the familiar phrase, the "return to nature," did materially affect doctrinaires like William Godwin, and through Godwin, Shelley; and although the battle-cry of the Revolutionaries, "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity," unpressed itself on the youthful imagination of Wordsworth and Coleridge, the general characteristics of the Revival suggested above were collateral with the Revolution, not derived from it. They arose, as we may see, in verse and fiction during the lifetime of Pope, and unpressed many an imagination long before the overthrow of the Bastille had given these ideas a more urgent vitality.

Let us consider these characteristics of Romance at greater length.

The subtle sense of mystery is found on analysis to be a complex emotion compounded of awe in the presence of the unknown, wonder in presence of the known, and an exquisite response to manifestations of beauty wherever they may be found—that we may call for want of a better word—Rapture.¹

Now if we search for an expression of this in the life of the age under discussion we shall meet it in Philosophy, in History, in its attitude towards nature and towards social life. Romanticism, when it touches philosophy, favours mysticism and idealism, and we have but to place Kant and Hegel beside Hume and Locke, to appreciate the influence of Romanticism here. For the more subtle our sense of mystery the less satisfied we are with the materialistic explanation of the universe, and the more we demand an ideal rather than an empirical solution of phenomena, or if we regard the theological implications, this sense of mystery drives us away from the dualism of the old Deists to the pantheism of the Hegelians.

In History, the awakened sensibility led to the study of the past, to the fond dallings with Mediævalism. It was because many thought they saw in mediævalism a richer inspiration for the mysterious forces they felt about them that they turned from modern conditions of life towards the folk-lore and legendary wealth of the Middle Ages. So emphatic a part did mediævalism play in the Revival of Romance that Heine saw in it merely the reproduction of the life of the Middle Ages. Yet mediævalism, as Pater shrewdly observed, is an accidental not an essential characteristic of Romance.

At its onset, Romance drives those who feel its spell into strange by-paths of thought and feeling, away from the broad highway of ordinary human experience. It was thus with Marlowe in his world-moving visions; thus with Scott in his fervent mediævalism.

But ultimately it brings us back to the highway—only at a greater elevation. We seek it first in the thunder and the earthquake of the fantastic and bizarre, and find it after all in the still small voice of everyday life. In other words, Romanticism is not opposed to Reality. It is Reality transfigured by new powers of vision and feeling. In the deep sense of the word, Marlowe and Scott are realistic because of their Romanticism. Marlowe hunted at it in his Edward II, though he died too young to realise its full implication. Scott realised it perfectly in his faithful pictures of Scottish life and character.

It was the element of mysticism in mediæval life that appealed, heightened by the passage of time and the unlikeness of life then to life under modern conditions. History embraced by Romanticism gave birth to the historic novel and inspired a Chateaubriand and Scott; while in that borderland where History and Philosophy meet, we find arising an idealistic conception of laws by Montesquieu, and of political opinion by Burke. The result of this was to make philosophy more historical, and history more philosophical. As regards the effect of the sense of mysticism on natural phenomena, an effect quite patent not only in the poetry but the prose also of the time, this much may be said, it is not that men like Wordsworth and Shelley cared for Nature more than did Shakespeare, or in our own time Tennyson, but they cared in a different way. Wordsworth found brooding and tranquillising thought at the heart of Nature; Shelley an ardent and persuasive love. In other words, they spiritualised Nature. To Shakespeare the primrose was a pretty yellow flower, and "nothing more." To Tennyson, the landscape was an exquisite stage property, in which human emotions might be pictorially framed. Shakespeare, with the hearty objectivity of his age, loved Nature without questioning how and wherefore. Tennyson, with the introspective tendency of his age, put his sentiment under the microscope, and found that modern science had stripped Nature of her pontifical robe of metaphysics.

The gradual reawakening of this sense of mystery, may be seen by tracing the nature poetry of the age from Thomson's Seasons to the songs of Blake; and noting the change from a friendly appraising of Nature's charm to a passionate abandonment to her magic. Finally, if we look at the social problems of the time we shall realise that human life has been invested with a tenderer sanctity, and that the spiritual importance of man, irrespective of class, has received a deeper significance.

The social implications of Romanticism are found especially in the writings of Rousseau.

We now turn to our second characteristic: an exuberant intellectual curiosity.

Given an increased sense of awe, wonder, and beauty, in short, an illumination of the imagining faculty, the reaction of this on the more purely intellectual or rationalising side of man is natural and inevitable.

The enthusiasm for the Middle Ages, sometimes called the Gothic Revival, was two-sided. On the one, it satisfied the emotional sense of wonder, on the other, the intellectual sense of curiosity. Men like Addison saw only the extravagant side of the movement. "Gothic" for them was a term of reproach connoting what was grotesque and lawless in art and literature, and they failed completely to realise that this was merely a symptom of the intense vitality of mediæval methods and ideals; and was in no way an integral part of it. Even in Horace Walpole and Mrs Radcliffe, where the extravagances of mediævalism are patent enough, the strength of mediævalism as an artistic and intellectual inspiration is not hard to discover. Walpole's imitation castle at Strawberry Hill may have been little more than an amusing toy, but the genuine interest in the great architecture of the Middle Ages involved in it, pioneered not merely the richer antiquarian interest of Scott, but the ecclesiastical splendour of the Tractarian Movement, and the "fundamental brain-work" of the Pre-Raphaelite school. Ridiculous and dull his Castle of Otranto may appear to-day, but it prepared the way for Ivanhoe, reminded men once more of feudal times, and stirred an interest in the past that was to find a more intelligent expression in the revival of old ballad poetry, the study of such mediæval arts as glass staining, wood carving, tapestry embroidery, and a livelier acknowledgment of the greatness of an age that gave us our finest cathedrals and churches.

Nowhere is the intellectual curiosity of Romanticism better shown than in the regeneration of English poetic style. The earlier dissatisfaction with eighteenth century conventions led to a mere imitation of Spenser. That is always the case in the history of literary movements. First of all there is a reversion to an older convention, a mere slavish return to other fashions. It is only gradually realised that, not by imitation but by a fresh creative outburst, an expression of the present in terms not of ancient externals but ancient ideals and tendencies, that Art is revived and glorified.

The first sign of the change, then, is in the imitation of Spenser shown in such poems as Thomson's Castle of Indolence and Shenstone's Schoolmistress. The more important stage is reached when Bishop Percy, with his ballad collection, reminded men of the metrical inspiration to be found elsewhere than in Dryden and Pope.

Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, consisting of old heroic ballads, songs, and other pieces of our earlier poetry, was published in three volumes in 1765. To the learned few it had been known that there existed a body of popular verse that had lived on from the Middle Ages, coming down to us chiefly by word of mouth, deeply rooted in the ancient folk-lore of the Aryan race. In an earlier chapter of this work we have seen something of the rich store of ballad verse, and realised how closely incorporated it was with the lives of the common people. The value of this store to modern literature was made clear in the Revival of Romance. The metrical peculiarities of the old ballad gave fresh inspiration to great poets like Coleridge and Keats. Without these ballads rescued by Percy, it were a hard matter to imagine how our great Romantic poets would have shaped Wordsworth's own indebtedness is slight, but Scott's obligations are obvious. Both The Ancient Mariner and La Belle Dame Sans Merci are directly inspired by their fresh naïveté, and in much of the work of Rossetti, and the earlier work of William Morris, the indebtedness is unquestionable.

Scott's tribute to Percy's Reliques is worth recalling:

"I remember well the spot where I read these volumes for the first time. It was beneath a huge plantain tree in the ruins of what had been intended for an old-fashioned arbor in the garden I have mentioned. The summer day sped onward so fast that, notwithstanding the sharp appetite of thirteen, I forgot the hour of dinner, was sought for with anxiety, and was still found entranced in my intellectual banquet. To read and to remember was, in this instance, the same thing, and henceforth I overwhelmed my school-fellows, and all who would hearken to me, with tragical recitations from the ballads of Bishop Percy. The first time, too, I could scrape a few shillings together; I bought unto myself a copy of these beloved volumes; nor do I believe I ever read a book so frequently, or with half the enthusiasm."

The intellectual curiosity of Romanticism is further illustrated in the publication of Macpherson's Ossian. Into the controversy to which it gave rise there is no need to enter here. Genuine or not, the "stuff" of verse, turgid and high-flown as it frequently is, and unlike the Gaelic inspiration it professes to be, yet exerted an influence second only to Percy's Reliques, stimulating fresh interest in our literary origins, as well as influencing emotionally a generation starved by the Popian couplet, and ready to welcome the pleasurable melancholy that underlay Ossian, as a blessed relief from eighteenth century optimism.

Romanticism, putting aside its purely æsthetic and emotional elements, induces a speculative and inquisitive turn of mind. Perhaps this is most apparent in such thinkers as Hegel, who appeals to the intellect even more perhaps than to the religious emotions. Mention has been made of the effect of the heightened sense of mystery in philosophy and history, but in these departments of thought, the intellectual aspects of Romanticism are more significant than even the æsthetic. Hegel's dialectic is an intellectual attempt to satisfy the idealising passion that lies behind Romanticism, and Rousseau's "Return to Nature" may be regarded as an intellectual generalisation apart from its æsthetic suggestiveness. So also in Poetry, we have not only to reckon with the æsthetic inspiration, with the heightened sensibility of the imagination, but with the speculative, intellectual power that underlies the best work of such writers as Wordsworth, Shelley, and Coleridge.

Incoherent and contradictory as this may prove at times, it is impossible to ignore the suggestiveness of Wordsworth's poetic theory, of Shelley's transcendentalism, and Coleridge's critical insight. As an illustration take Shelley's transcendental reading of Nature, that some readers find so vague and misty. Acceptable it may not be to some minds, vague it assuredly is not, since Shelley's philosophy of Nature is perfectly clear and consistent, and in his finest lyrics, such as The Cloud and The West Wind, there is a logical power of development and, when the poet is so disposed, a scientific accuracy, that is too often overlooked by the slovenly reader. Take this fragment from another poem, depicting the history of a globe of dew—

As the dissolving warmth of dawn may fold,
A half unfrozen dew globe, green and gold,
And crystalline, till it becomes a wing'd mist
And wanders up the vault of the blue day,
Outlives the noon, and as the Sun's last ray
Hangs o'er the sea, a flame of fire and amelyst "

Beautiful lines certainly, and none the less beautiful because scientifically impeccable. In the literature of the age, however, we shall necessarily find a fuller expression of the intellectual stimulus of Romanticism in the prose than in the verse.

The revolution wrought in literary criticism by the Romantic writers is a matter of common knowledge. Roughly speaking, what it did was to transform Criticism from the cult of finding faults to the art of revealing beauties. It brought into the interpretation of great writers the creative imagination of the poet. The historical method of criticism inaugurated by Coleridge, substituted order for chaos, viewing the subject relatively in terms of its time and place; it put an end to the old absolute standard of criticism, in which current prejudices and standards served as the one criterion. That some of the Romantic critics, for all their brilliance and sensibility, failed to transcend at times the time spirit of their own day or peculiar idiosyncrasies of temperament, is merely an indication of human infirmity. The important point is, that the view they upheld has been responsible for the richest and most suggestive criticism that our literature can boast, for in its romantic inspiration it is both intellectual and imaginative—intellectual in its form, imaginative in its comprehending vision of the inner soul of literature.

The third characteristic noted in Romanticism was an instinct for the elemental simplicities of life. This may be traced both in the poetry and prose of the time. Rousseau is the pioneer here. He it was who eloquently emphasized the dignity of man as man, and dwelt upon the transcendent power of human love. The reaction against the complexities of civilisation, especially insistent in the growing life of our teeming cities, that is so marked to-day in the writings of socialistic idealists like Edward Carpenter and William Morris, started with Rousseau.

The new attitude towards Nature was indeed only part of a larger naturalism that sought to bring us back to the bosom of Nature, and reclaim us from the superfluous conventions with which we had choked the elemental virtues of life. As a result of this we got the idealising of childhood by Blake and Wordsworth, and of simple unsophisticated natures by Burns, Wordsworth, and Coleridge; and the sense of mystery which we have seen sending seekers to a remote past, was gradually realised to be capable of satisfaction closer at hand. The great Romantic poets found it not only in the inspiration of the Middle Ages and in Greek art, but in the simplicities of everyday life; an ordinary sunset, a walk over the hills, a cluster of spring flowers, the rain-bearing west wind, the song of the nightingale, a cottage girl, a simple old daleman—such are a few of the subjects that inspired to supreme achievement: a Wordsworth, a Coleridge, a Shelley, a Keats.

The Humanistic teaching that lay implicit here can be traced clearly in the more didactic if less imaginative literature of America. Emerson's spiritual asceticism, Thoreau's "reduction of life to its lowest terms," and his sylvan solitudes; the open air, democratic fervour of Whitman, are offshoots of Romanticism, while the absorption by Byron and Shelley of certain aspects of the French Revolution, the glorification of Liberty, the vindication of the natural instincts, these matters that merged into the great stream of Humanitarian sentiment which swept through our life and literature in the early years of the nineteenth century, had their source and inspiration in the Revival of Romance.

Romanticism as expressed in the literature of the age had, of course, in common with every great movement, definite limitations of its own. It was essentially a school of ideas, of splendid generalisations. Little attempt was made by its exponents to apply their ideas to the concrete problems of the day; it harped on Man rather than Men, sought the way of escape from modern conditions of life rather than a reconstruction of that life in its reaction against the town and boudoir literature of the previous age too readily accepted what was primitive, wild, strange, and picturesque, as the essential glories of life. Among its lesser souls, moreover, we see the tendency to exalt the merely bizarre and to replace the old conventions of "correctness" at all costs for extravagances at all costs.

But all this was inevitable. No great movement ever took place that did not sweep out of proper perspective certain aspects of life and thought. In the zeal for fresh air, some windows are bound to get smashed, as Lowell puts it in one of his essays. The chief thing to remember is that the fresh air was badly wanted, our literature needed a vivifying and expanding influence. Thus the writers of the time achieved. Our Victorian literature had been far less rich in concrete beauties, in intellectual constructiveness, in sanity and strength, without even the untrained and riotous splendour that gave dynamic power to the men and women of the Romantic Revival.

THE LADY ISABELLA'S TRAGEDY; OR, THE STEP-MOTHER'S CRUELTY

There was a lord of worthy fame,
And a hunting he would ride,
Attended by a noble train
Of gentry by his side

And while he did in chase remain,
To see both sport and play;
His lady went, as she did feign,
Unto the church to pray.

Thus lord he had a daughter deare,
Whose beauty shone so bright,
She was belov'd, both far and neare,
Of many a lord and knight.

Fair Isabella was she call'd,
A creature faire was she;
She was her father's only joye,
As you shall after see.

Therefore her cruel step-mother
Did envy her so much,
That daye by daye she sought her life,
Her malice it was such.

She bargan'd with the master-cook,
To take her life awaye :
And taking of her daughter's book,
She thus to her did saye

Go home, sweet daughter, I thee praye,
Go hasten presentlie ,
And tell unto the master-cook
These words that I tell thee

And bid him dresse to dinner streight
That faire and milk-white doe,
That in the parke doth shine so bright,
There's none so faire to shewe

This ladye fearing of no harme,
Obey'd her mother's will
And presently she hasted home,
Her pleasure to fulfil

She streight into the kitchen went,
Her message for to tell ,
And there she spied the master-cook
Who did with malice swell

Now master-cook, it must be soe,
Doe that which I thee tell ,
You needes must dresse the milk white doe,
Which you do knowe full well

Then streight his cruell bloodye hands,
He on the ladye layd ,
Who quivering and shaking stands,
While thus to her he sayd

Thou art the doe that I must dresse,
See here, behold my knife ,
For it is pointed presently
To ridd thee of thy life

O then, cries out the scullion-boye,
As loud as loud might bee ,
O save her life, good master-cook,
And make your pyes of mee !

For pityes sake do not destroye
My ladye with your knife ,
You know shes is her father's joye,
For Christes sake save her life !

I will not save her life, he sayd,
Nor make my pyes of thee ,
Yet if thou dost this deed bewraye,
Thy butcher I will bee

Now when thus lord he did come home
For to sit downe and eat ,
He called for his daughter deare,
To come and carve his meat

Now sit you down, his ladye sayd,
O sit you downe to meat
Into some nunnery she is gone,
Your daughter deare forget

Then solemnlye he made a vowe,
Before the compaignie,
That he would neither eat nor drinke
Until he did her see

O then bespake the scullion-boye,
With a loud voice so hye
If now you will your daughter see,
My lord, cut up that pye ,

Wherein her flesh is minced small,
And parched with the fire ,
All caused by her step-mother,
Who did her death deare

And cursed bee the master-cook,
O cursed may he bee !
I proffered him my own heart's blood,
From death to set her free

Then all in blacke this lord did mourne,
And for his daughter's sake,
He judg'd her cruell step-mother
To be burnt at a stake.

Likewise he judg'd the master-cook
In boiling lead to stand ,
And made the simple scullion-boye
The heire of all his land ¹

A HUE AND CRY AFTER CUPID

Beauties, have you seen a toy,
Called Love, a little boy,
Almost naked, wanton, blinde -
Cruel now, and then as kinde ?
If he be amongst yee, say ,
He is Venus' run-away.

Shew, that will but now discover
Where the winged wag doth hover,
Shall to night receive a kinse,
How and where herself would wish :
But who brings him to his mother
Shall have that kinse, and another.

Markes he hath about him plentie,
You may know him among twentie ;
All his body is a fire,
And his breath a flame entire
Which, being shot, like lightning, in,
Wounds the heart, but not the skin

Wings he hath, which though yee clip,
He will leape from lip to lip,
Over liver, lights, and heart,
Yet not stay in any part,
And, if chance his arrow misses,
He will shoot himselfe in kisses

He doth boare a golden bow,
And a quiver hanging low,
Full of arrows, which onbrave
Dian's shafts , where, if he have Any head more sharpe than other,
With that first he strikes his mother.

Still the fairest are his fuell,
When his daies are to be cruell ,
Lovers' hearts are all his food,
And his bathis their warmest blood ,
Nought but wounds his hands doth season,
And he hates none like to Reason

Trust him not his words, though sweet,
Seldome with his heart doe meet :
All his practice is deceit,
Every gift is but a bait -
Not a kinse but poysen beares,
And most treason's in his teares

Idle minutes are his raigne ,
Then the straggler makes his gaine,
By presenting maids with toys,
And would have yee think them joyes -
Tis the ambition of the elfe
To have all childish as himselfe

If by these yee please to know him,
Beauties, be not wice, but show him.
Though yee had a will to hide him,
Now, we hope, yee'll not abide him,
Since yee heare this falsers' play,
And that he is Venus' run-away ²

OLD TOM OF BEDLAM

Forth from my sad and darksome cell,
Or from the deepe abysses of hell,
Mad Tom is come into the world againe
To see if he can cure his distempered braine.

Feares and cares oppresse my soule ;
Harke, howe the angrie Furies howle !

Pluto laughs, and Proserpine is gladd
To see poore naked Tom of Bedlam madd.

Through the world I wander night and day
To seeke my stragglng senses,
In an angyre moode I mett old Tyme,
With his pentarchye of tenses.

When me he spied,
Away he hyed,
For tyme will stay for no man:
In vaine with cryes
I ront the skyes,
For pity is not common

Cold and comfortless I lye:
Helpe, oh helpe! or else I dye!
Harke! I heare Apollo's teame,
The carman 'gins to whistle;
Chast Diana bends her bowe,
The boare begins to bristle

Come, Vulcan, with tools and with tackle,
To knoeke off my troublesome shackles,
Bid Charles make ready his warne
To fetch me my senses againe

Last night I heard the dog-star bark;
Mars not Venus in the darke,
Lumping Vulcan het an iron barr,
And furiously made at the god of war.

Mars with his weapon laid about,
But Vulcan's temples had the gout,
For his broad horns did so hang in his light,
He could not see to aim his blowes aright:

Mercurye, the nimble post of heaven,
Stood still to see the quarrell,
Gorrel-bellied Bacchus, gyant-like,
Bestryd a strong-beere barrel

To mee he dranke,
I did him thanke,
But I could get no cyder;
He dranke whole butts
Till he burst his gutts,
But mine were ne'er the wyder.

Poore naked Tom is very drye:
A little drinke for chantage!
Harke, I hear Acteon's horne!
The huntmen whoop and hallowe
Ringwood, Royster, Bowman, Jowler,
All the chase do followe

The man in the moon drinke claret,
Eates powder'd beef, turnip, and carrot,
But a cup of the old Malaga sack
Will fire the bushe at his backe!

CONTINENTAL INFLUENCES ON THE REVIVAL OF ROMANCE IN ENGLAND. (a) The Influence of Germany, (b) The Influence of the French Revolution

CONTINENTAL INFLUENCES ON THE REVIVAL OF ROMANCE IN ENGLAND

(a) THE INFLUENCE OF GERMANY

DURING the last few years of the eighteenth century, an extraneous influence from Germany came to swell the insular stream of change that had already modified considerably the literary ideas of an Addisonian, Popian, and Johnsonian age. In Germany the literary climate had been much the same as in England. French Classicism, that from the time of the Restoration had so profoundly affected English literature, had taken root even more firmly in Germany. Johann Jacob Bodmer and his follower Heinrich Myller, sounded a vigorous protest against the literary domination of France, and by the publication of the Nibelungenlied, stirred the imagination of their countrymen to refashion a national literature, and turned their thoughts in the direction of greater freedom, greater spontaneity, a richer play of fancy. We need not concern ourselves with the band of writers who followed in their lead, for this is a matter of German literary history. It is sufficient to note the increasing interest in things mediæval, that showed unmistakably the flow of the Romantic tide; most significant sign of all, the sudden absorbing interest in the Shakespearean drama. Wieland's work as translator, was followed by the more famous Tieck-Schlegel translations (1797-1813), but it was Wieland who first interested Goethe in Shakespeare, and Herder who brought the magic of mediæval folk-song into his life. Meanwhile Lessing, about 1767, had tried to show the greater affinity between Sophocles and Shakespeare than between Sophocles and the French classical dramatists.

In short, just as in England, the new movement was a protest and a challenge to the decorous, common-sense, unimaginative ideals that had hitherto ruled poetry and prose. The protest was more violent, the reaction more excessive than in England, and the mediævalism of the new school laid greater stress on supernaturalism and mythology. Pure fantasy overran the literature to a degree of extravagance that found no counterpart in our country. But the classical models it superseded were less formidable than ours in England. Our Romantic Revival, as we have seen, proceeded more slowly, and for a long while its pioneers compromised with the classicists, whose impressive contribution to letters there was no denying, and even our greatest Romantic writers showed the lingering influence of the school of Dryden and Pope.

In Germany there were no great writers of the Classical school, so the movement went on more impetuously, and with little attempt at compromise; it synchronised with the awakening of German national self-consciousness. It was natural, therefore, that it should assume an importance that reacted on English literature. It had the good fortune to sweep into the stream some minds of the first magnitude, the youthful Goethe, the scholarly Schlegel brothers, Novalis the mystic, Fouqué the author of Undine, Brentano the romancer, and Uhland, one of the founders of romance philology.

Then in April 1788 a paper was read before the Royal Society of Edinburgh by that thoroughgoing sentimentalist Henry Mackenzie, in which attention was drawn to German romantic literature, and the "literary persons of Edinburgh" learned that "the taste which dictated the German compositions was of a kind as nearly allied to the English as their language, those who were from their youth accustomed to admire Shakespeare and Milton became acquainted for the first time with a race of poets who had the same lofty ambition to epurn the flaming boundaries of the universe and investigate the realms of chaos and old Night; and of dramatists who, disclaiming the pedantry of the unities, sought, at the expense of occasional improbabilities and extravagance, to present life on the stage in its scenes of wildest contrast, and in all its boundless variety of character . . . Their fictitious narratives, their ballad poetry, and other branches of their literature which are particularly apt to bear the stamp of the extravagant and the supernatural, began also to occupy the attention of the British literati."

Some years later (1794), Scott became acquainted with a translation of Burger's poems by William Taylor of Woolwich, having heard about his harrowing ballad Lenore, and in the following year published a translation of this poem which had greatly impressed him. Others beside Scott and Taylor had anglicised the poem, that had certainly left a strong impression on the imagination of the time. The ballad tells of a German soldier who had died in the Seven Years' War, and who came riding along on a spectral steed one night to carry off his sweetheart. Through the night they ride together, and come to a churchyard at cockcrow. Then in a flash the horse dissolves into mist, and the lover's armour falls to pieces, disclosing the skeleton within, and the girl realises that the charnel vault is her bridal chamber and her bridegroom none other than death.

Taylor is an important connecting link between German and English Romanticism. By his translations and literary criticism he did much to make German literature known in England. He had become acquainted with Goethe while in Germany and had published translations of Goethe's Iphigenie auf Tauris (1793). His powers of criticism may have been small and his tastes were eclectic, but of his skill as a translator there can be no question. "You have made me hunger and thirst after German Poetry," wrote Southey, in 1799. Certainly he prepared the way for a greater mediator between the two countries—Thomas Carlyle.

One distinctive feature of German romantic literature lay in its multitude of fictions in verse and prose, dealing with ancient magic and ceremonies. They found a more congenial soil amid the legend-haunted scenery of the Rhine and the Black Forest than in our island; and it must be allowed that German concoctors of melodramatic romances managed their "horrors" better than Horace Walpole did in his Castle of Otranto. But the cult of the blood-curdler was not confined to Germany; and if Walpole owed nothing to their imaginations, Mrs Radcliffe and Monk Lewis, Beckford and Mrs. Shelley, assuredly did, while Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel and Marmion were not free of debt to Goethe's play, Goetz (1773).

Just as Goethe's Goetz gave an impulse to Scott, so did his Sorrows of Werther colour the work of Byron. The doublet freely made use of in Schiller's plays, left its impress on Coleridge.

More powerfully still did Kant influence the English Romantic movement on its intellectual side. Passing through the prism of imagination of Coleridge, it served as a transcendental beacon to fire English religious thought, and to its inspiration both the High and Broad Church movements owe philosophic obligations.

Finally, so far as German Romanticism in English literature is concerned, came that vigorous interpreter—Thomas Carlyle.

Thus in reviewing the main current of the German influence in Britain, we have seen that England, through her Shakespeare, first carried the sacred fire of Romanticism to Germany. It is quite clear that the earlier phases of our Romanticism were quite independent. Percy's Reliques, Macpherson's Ossian, Walpole's Romances, owed nothing to our Continental neighbours. Only in the later years of the century did Germany repay her debt to England, and she did so on two distinct occasions. William Taylor, Scott, and Monk Lewis are the earlier borrowers from Germany. The second stage opens with Coleridge, and is rounded off by Carlyle.

With the differences between English and German Romanticism we are scarcely concerned in this necessarily brief sketch, but this much may be said. German Romanticism was more philosophic and critical, more coherent in its body of writing; it was not merely an exuberant outpouring of the artistic imagination, as with Scott, Coleridge, and Shelley, but a creed, and a religion. Madame de Staël's words significantly indicate its main trend: "Tragedies and Romances," she wrote, "have more importance in Germany than in any other country. They take them seriously there, and to read such and such a book, or see such and such a play, has an influence on the destiny and the life. What they admire as art, they wish to introduce into real life; and poetry, philosophy, the ideal, in short, have often an even greater empire over the Germans than nature and the passions." Wertherism involved the suicide of a number of young German students, and Schiller's Robbers started a fashion in highway robbery. English Byrones were satisfied by a disarrangement of collar, Scott's romances had no other effect save that of keeping our forefathers up reading when they ought to have been in bed. In short, while English Romantic literature was merely a light-hearted escape from, German literature was a serious expression of, its life.

(b) THE INFLUENCE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

The Romantic movement in France followed the political Revolution, and was considerably later, therefore, than either the English or the German.

While it owed something to both Scott and Byron and Goethe, its own reaction upon other countries was slight, and its influence upon English literature is confined to a few Victorian writers like Swinburne. But the social and political upheaval in France did play a considerable share in influencing the course of English Romance.

Our indebtedness to Rousseau has already been touched upon, and it is possible to distinguish three phases of the French Revolution, each of which affected English Romanticism (1) The Doctrinaire phase—the age of Rousseau ; (2) the Political phase—the age of Robespierre and Danton, (3) the Military phase—the age of Napoleon.

Rousseau's sentimental influence touched Blake, Wordsworth, and Coleridge ; his intellectual influence Godwin, and through Godwin, Shelley. A lover of external nature, and of simple ways of living, these things found expression in the earlier poets. The compelling value of love shown in the New Heloise, is what Shelley reiterated with so much ecstatic eloquence.

Rousseau's intellectual position was briefly this. Original impulses are good, because they are natural. Men have become evil, because they left uncontaminated nature, growing luxurious and artificial. To escape from this state of sickness, we must return to the mountains and meadows. In other words, we are to destroy the social structure raised by man during centuries of human history, and start afresh. Why do political institutions exist ? Merely to enable the rich man to rob the poor, the tyrant to oppress the weak. Force is mischievous. There is no compulsion with anything but love. There is no way of erecting a new social order save by the light of pure reason. The perfectibility of human reason was taught by Godwin in his Political Justice, and from this book Shelley declared he had learnt "all that was valuable in knowledge and virtue." Godwin, of course, as we shall see later on, owed his views to others beside Rousseau. But Rousseau was a very potent influence.

Byron is scarcely touched by the intellectual side of the Revolution, and from the historical side he certainly stood aloof, at once fascinated and repelled. What does emerge in Byron's poetry is the last phase of the movement, with Napoleon as the great figure. Byron's own intensely egotistic nature seized upon that aspect of the Revolution which sees in it the conflict of personalities. The tremendous force of the greater personalities, especially Napoleon, intoxicates him, and runs through his poetry. Living at a time of disillusionment, it is rather as a negative power that he shaped in English Letters, but towards the close of his life he realised the moral emptiness of a restless, self-centred nature, and ended in a fine blaze of disinterested social enthusiasm.

The doctrinaire side of the French Revolution, the Revolution as an intellectual theory, gave substance not merely to Godwin's philosophy, but to Blake's spiritual creed. For Godwin it was a reasonable hypothesis, to Blake, a vivifying joy. Freedom to him was a kind of mystical rapture, antinomian certainly, but so exalted and impassioned, so free from dross, that it sounds the same high note of beauty as did Shelley's lyrical poems.

In 1789 the second phase of the Revolutionary movement opens, and in the first flush of the struggle, it stirred to the depths the imagination of the English Romantic writers, and Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey caught the contagious enthusiasm. Truly as Wordsworth exclaimed :

"Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive,
But to be young was very heaven."

The spiritual asceticism and stoical vigour of Wordsworth's genius soon horrified him with the blood and fire across the water. But Wordsworth's recantation, and the lapse of Coleridge, must not blind us to the fact that the best work of both poets had been done in the days of their Revolutionary enthusiasm.

Yet the most whole-hearted singer of the Revolution was Shelley, and this was not because he looked more leniently on the horrors of the guillotine, or looked beyond the immediate disaster to a future reconstruction, but because his imagination was far less concrete than those of his great contemporaries. Ideas inspired him, not episodes ; so he drank in the doctrines of Godwin, and ignored the tragic perplexities of the actual situation. Widely divergent in temperament and genius as Shelley and his mentor were, they had this in common—a passion for abstract speculation. Only where Godwin expressed them in pedestrian prose, Shelley gave to them music and colour.

And so it was that the catch phrase of the Revolution, "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity," found no more impassioned champion, or more eloquent singer, than Shelley. But it was the Revolution as an idea, not as a concrete historical event.

Looking back upon these diverse streams of Romanticism, it will be seen that both the revival in England and in Germany are revivals from French Classicism, and like the earlier Romantic movement in the fifteenth century, carry with them potentialities of intellectual unrest and speculation, that tend to break down other banks of thought than those of literary convention.

In Germany, Romanticism has a special political significance. It denoted not merely the breakdown of the long-lived Classicism, but the starting into self-conscious life of National feeling. In addition to this it fell in with a conservative and reactionary spirit, such as certainly marked no other romantic movement. Many German romantic writers joined the Roman Catholic Church, carrying their mediæval enthusiasm to a logical conclusion.

It was otherwise in Britain. On certain sides it took the radical impress of the French Revolution, and where it was unaffected by the Revolution, political views and literary ideals were wholly disconnected. No attempt was made to harmonise them. Scott, the most successful mediævalist, remained a Protestant, and despite his keen democratic sympathies as a novelist, maintained to the last a stiff and unyielding Toryism ; while Byron, the most radical and revolutionary in some ways of our poets, was a warm admirer of the eighteenth century school of verse.

In literature as in politics we are a people of compromise, and compromise marks our Romanticism as it does everything else in English life. A more consistent and homogeneous development of the romantic spirit may be studied in conservative Germany, and in revolutionary France.

I. POETRY: (a) Burns and Blake.

ROBERT BURNS (1759-1796)

HIS LIFE

"I was bred to the plough," said Robert Burns; but "the rank of Burns is the very first of his art," was the dictum of Byron

In December 1757, to a homely, clay-built cottage erected by his own hands in Alloway, near Ayr, William Burnes brought his bride, Agnes Broun, and here on the 25th of January 1759 (the year which also saw the birth of the German poet Schiller), Robert, the eldest of their seven children, was born; a few days later the frail homestead was damaged by a storm, and mother and child forced to seek shelter with a neighbour

At the age of six Robert was sent to the village school, and the following year, with his brother Gilbert, placed under the tuition of John Murdoch, who has left us an interesting account of the brothers "I was a good deal noted for a retentive memory," Burns tells us, and "though it cost the schoolmaster some thrashings, I made an excellent English scholar"; he also acquired a slight acquaintance with Latin and French. As a boy, few books came in his way; The Life of Hannibal—the first he read—made him wish he were "tall enough to be a soldier", from the local blacksmith he borrowed The History of Sir William Wallace, that "poured a Scottish prejudice into my veins," said the poet, "which will boil along there till the flood-gates of life shut in eternal rest" Later, he read considerably

At thirteen, when most boys are poring over school books, making merry with school companions and getting into mischief, the young Robert was thrashing the farm crops for market, when fifteen he was his father's chief labourer and sharing the anxiety of his parents regarding ways and means—small wonder that the long working days ended with "a dull headache," which later gave rise to the nervous depression that affected him more or less throughout his life

The country custom of working in couples in the fields, first caused him to "commit the sin of rhyme" The youthful poet's partner, Nelly Kirkpatrick, was "a bewitching creature" who inspired his first song, Once I loved a Bonnie Lass, before he was sixteen, after which he gradually added to his songs

Burns' parents were a simple, devout, and affectionate couple, at times hard put to it to make both ends meet; his father had leased Mount Oliphant farm in 1766, in the hope of keeping his family together, but bad seasons and unproductive land, with the knowledge of borrowed money to be repaid, hung over him like a cloud At last the "stern factor whose threatening letters set us all in tears" forced him to relinquish the lease in 1777, and the family migrated to Lochlea, Tarbolton, some ten miles distant

At Tarbolton he took part in the local debating club, and in the endeavour to "give his manners a brush," joined a dancing class much against the wishes of his father, who from that time seemed to show a dislike for his son, which the poet wrote afterwards, "was one cause of the dissipation which marked my succeeding years"

The summer months of 1778 were spent on the smuggling coast of Kirkoswald, for instruction in land surveying; but here, while making fair progress in his studies, he "learned to fill his glass" and "mix without fear in a drunken squabble"; however, he gained considerable experience of men and women, and returned home in time for the harvest with certain rough edges rubbed off his rustic manners

The next four years of his life were uneventful, if we except his friendship with Alison Begbie, the Mary Morison of his later poems, who refused his offer of marriage

Despairing of making a livelihood at farming, in 1782 he left Tarbolton for Irvine to learn flax-dressing with a relative, here he made acquaintances "of a freer manner of thinking and living than he had been used to" This venture ended disastrously, their shop took fire, was burnt out, and "I was left," says Burns, "like a true poet, not worth a sixpence," so he was forced to return to the farm The following year his father's health broke down, a life of constant worry and anxiety ended in consumption, and he died on February 13, 1784, a broken-hearted man His mother lived to an advanced age

On the death of his father, "the hell-hounds that prowl in the kennel of justice" took their due, and the family were left in that poverty which Burns termed "the half-sister of death, and the cousin-german of hell" They managed, however, to scrape a little money together to prevent separation and with Robert's "hair-brained imagination" and his brother Gilbert's "good sense" they joined forces and started farming on their own account at Mossiel, near Mauchline Here it was he first met with Jean Armour

Farming was no more prosperous in the hands of the brothers than it had been with their father, so in 1786 Robert decides to emigrate to Jamaica. He had taken his passage, when it occurred to him that by publishing some of his poems he might add to his resources and also leave a memento of himself in his native land John Wilson of Kilmarnock agreed to print six hundred copies, and the collection included The Cottar's Saturday Night, To a Mouse, and several other well-known poems The volume came under the notice of Dr Blacklock, the blind poet and critic, who predicted such fame for the author that the Jamaica venture was abandoned and a trip to Edinburgh taken instead, where he arrived with a few shillings in his pocket and without a single letter of introduction, but his fame had preceded him, the peasant-poet became the rage, and all classes combined to do him honour. The following year (1787) a second edition was published by William Creech, of Edinburgh. On the strength of a large sale he made a tour of the North before his return to Mossgiel; in 1788, having received some four or five hundred pounds from his publisher, he took Ellisland Farm, near Dumfries, married Jean Armour, and settled down. This farm was no more successful than the others, so when a friend succeeded in procuring him the office of exciseman for the district, in 1790, Burns added to his income by becoming "a poor rascally gauger, condemned to gallop two hundred miles every week to inspect dirty ponds and yeasty barrels." In 1791 farming was given up in disgust, and the following year, owing to certain sympathetic opinions expressed with the French Revolutionaries and British Reformers, an order was made by the Board of Excise to inquire into the matter. Burns repudiated their "damn'd dark insinuations of hellish, groundless envy," and also said, with regard to his Reform principles, "I look upon the British Constitution, as settled at the Revolution, to be the most glorious on earth." At the same time I think, not alone, that we have a good deal deviated from the original principles of that Constitution." When the French threatened invasion, Burns was one of the first to join the Dumfries Volunteers, and wrote several patriotic songs.

A third edition of the poems with the addition of Tam o' Shanter appeared in 1793, and in the same year he wrote Scots wha hae.

Grim poverty had tracked him relentlessly throughout his life and was about to boat a retreat, an excise collectorship was within view, and he was looking forward to "a life of literary leisure with a decent competence," when he contracted rheumatic fever, and at the early age of thirty-seven died, on July 21, 1796.

It has been said that "none but the most narrow-minded bigots think of Burns' errors and frailties but with sympathy and indulgence, and none but the blindest enthusiasts can deny their existence."

HIS WORK

The bulk of Burns' work was done between 1789 and 1796. From the time of his sojourn in Mossgiel in 1784, his art found full and satisfying expression, with but little change in power of execution, and merely an increasing fondness for the lyric form in which he excelled.

Like his great contemporary, Scott, he loved the past and lived upon its glories, showing the intimate, spiritual connection between the life of a bygone age, and the life of his own day. The forms he used were forms hallowed by years of tradition, and he gave them fresh and glorious vitality. And never does he soar higher than when he kept to the old ballad verse and the "native wood notes wild." When he is under the passing influence of some other writer, as in certain of his English poems, he is far less effective. The great eighteenth century writers exercised no doubt a useful restraining influence at times, on his passion and headstrong genius, but their influence is best when unconscious, and when all is said, his richest obligations are to the minstrels of his own land.

In his pictures of men and women he is vividly concrete; and there we live in the open with the smell of the earth in our nostrils, and the sound of careless laughter and primal agonies in our ears. His figures have the same rude life, though not the same richness as Shakespeare's, and though he takes us mostly among the peasant class that he knew so intimately, he will introduce us also to the howling dervishes of piety, to Moodie who "clears the points of faith with rattlin' and wi' thumpin'"; to the factor and the retailer and the broad-minded lawyer, Gavin Hamilton, prosecuted for "causing his servants to dig new potatoes in the garden on the last Lord's Day." But to whomever he brings us, or wherever he takes us, he does so with a jolly, exuberant energy that gives us continual glimpses into the nature of the singer. It is always clear as noonday in his singing; there are no half lights, no subtle suggestions; it is sharply visualised, and clear cut. He is a genuine democrat, but in the sense that Scott was one, not in the sense that Shelley was one, or that the youthful Wordsworth was one. Unlike the great Romantic poets, the fever of the Revolution never burned in his veins. His radicalism was poetic, not political; though it was made of the substance that created revolutionaries. For if ever there was a poet who loved freedom as the breath of life, even when it ran into licence, that poet was Burns, and this passion for freedom, for the free expression of individuality, is a rough, elemental spirit, the spirit indeed of the great god Pan, who comes into our literature from time to time to freshen and revive it.

There is a royal ease about Burns at his best, he sings as naturally as he breathes.

"Some rhyme to court the countra clash,
An' raise a din,
For me, an aim I never fash,
I rhyme for fun."

It was "fun" that rarely deserted him, and even during those last miserable years, when both health and spirit failed, and physical excesses wore him down, the "fun" of the singer defied the failing health of the man. He sang magnificently up to the very last.

Pace, passion, precision; these things mark his great achievements, whether in satire or song. Tam o' Shanter rushes along like a whirlwind; The Jolly Beggars is a foaming torrent; The Cottar's Saturday Night starts in a slow and pensive vein, but soon breaks away. He rattles happily through the narrative of the Two Dogs, and the songs are breathless melodies, with the warmth of the sunshine in them, and the freshness of the mountain air.

The special genius of Burns lay in the unerring instinct with which he seized upon the scattered folk-poetry of Scotland, transmuting its ore through the alembic of his own ardent imagination into the most precious gold, its alloy purged away its treasure refined and beautified. Many of the familiar features in Scots poetry which we have noticed in dealing with the writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, reappear in Burns, love and intimate knowledge of Nature, a quaint and racy dialect, a passionate concreteness of imagery, a rich allusiveness—these were focussed with especial brilliance in his genius. He seemed to sun up in himself all that was finest in Scots song. With the homeliness of Cowper and the veracity of Crabbe, he combined a breadth of humour and a poignant intensity transcending his English contemporaries. A man of the people, in the most literal sense of the word, his songs were often direct transcripts from personal experience, and though the women who inspired his song were rough toilers of the field, primitive and uncultured, they sufficed to inspire him with the finest love poetry in our literature.

Such a stanza as the familiar

"Had we never lov'd sae kindly,
Had we never lov'd sae blindly,
Never met—or never parted,
We had ne'er been broken-hearted" concentrates in its simple intensity of feeling and expression the inmost heart of sex-romance. It is not, as many fine love poems are, the expression of a single mood and temperament, but the expression in inevitable language of the moods of thousands. Happy and sympathetic as his nature poetry is, it is as the poet of humanity that we remember him. The human note is paramount. Especially is he the poet of the rustic toiler, he knew their virtues and their frailties, and has sung of both with unequalled sympathy and insight. His own frailties as a man are their frailties, they bring him nearer to us, bound by ties of tenderness and pity.

When he strays away from his own class, when—whether as a letter writer or a poet—he tries to deal with social matters that are alien to his nature, or with forms of verse inimical to his art, then we merely see in him the rough uncultured man assuming an unnatural and uncongenial pose. For he was not the poet of civilisation and culture, his wit was not subtle enough, his knowledge not full enough, for such matters, and when the tide of popularity floated him for a while into these strange harbours, we can only regret it—natural though it was—and wait until the momentary lapse is passed, and he is his own primal, simple, unaffected self again. And if his work reflects the tragedy it also reflects the humour, for humour is elemental no less than pathos, and the two lie closely together, cheek by jowl in the bosom of Nature. Is it surprising that he could draw laughter as well as tears, and that the man who could charm us with My Love is like a Red Red Rose, or thrill us with Ae Fond Kiss and then we Sever, could also move the genial springs of our nature with the gay and rollicking Tam o' Shanter, or the keenly satirical Holy Willie's Prayer?

Beyond the passion, the homeliness, the humour of Burns, there lies another reason for his compelling appeal in the potency of his personality. Widely as he differed from Byron in many ways, there are not a few personal points that account for the magnetism exerted by both men. Quite apart from his stage tricks, Byron expressed himself fully and unreservedly in his work, his vigorous vitality, his contempt for timid conventions, his delight in the strong and elemental, and his undernote of melancholy, all these are matters fully as dear to Burns. Even in their weaknesses they have a bond of union; and both men were frankly alive to their frailties and follies, whatever air of bravado they might assume in the face of the world.

The charm of Burns' best verse lies in his perfect mingling of man and nature. He carries into his scenic pictures the same tenderness he shows in dealing with the cottagers. This to a daisy:

"Wee, modest, crimson-tipp'd flow'r,
Thou's met me in an evil hour,
For I maun crush amang the stoure
Thy slender stem
To spare thee now is past my pow'r,
Thou bonnie gem"

And he loves a bird or a mouse with the caressing affection many of us scarcely give to children:

"Ilk happy bird, wee helpless thing
That in the merry months of spring
Delighted me to hear thee sing,
What comes o' thee?
Where wilt thou cover thy clattering wing
And close thy ee?"

The humanitarian note that is so notable a feature of the now era, that meets us in the pensive verse of Cowper, in the ecstasies of Blake, the theorising of Godwin and the philosophy of Bentham, strikes a clear, unequivocal note in Burns. Coleridge epitomised the feeling in his lines

"He prayeth well who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast"

Poetry, as Wordsworth said, comes from the heart and goes to the heart. The truth of this saying is never more apparent than when we are reading Burns, whether he is telling of the love of a man for a maid, of family kinship round the cottage hearthstone, of a wounded hare, of a scarred and sorrowful human life, this vibrant heart appeal lifts the simple material of his songs into that stuff of life, which always gives literature its humanising power.

THE COTTAR'S SATURDAY NIGHT

My lov'd, my honour'd, much respected friend,
No mercenary hard his homage pays,
With honest pride, I scorn each selfish end,
My dearest mood, a friend's esteem and praise
To you I sing, in simple Scottish lays,
The lowly train in life's sequester'd scene,
The native feelings strong, the guileless ways,
What Aiken in a cottage would have been,
Ah! tho' his worth unknown, far happier there, I ween
November chill blows loud wi' angry sigh,
The short'ning winter-day is near a close,
The miry beasts retreating frae the plough,
The black'ning trains o' craws to their repose.
The toil-worn cottar frae his labour goes,
This night his weekly toil is at an end,
Collects his spade, his mattocks, and his hoe,
Hoping the morn in ease and rest to spend,
And weary, o'er the moor, his course does homeward bend

At length his lonely cot appears in view,
Beneath the shelter of an aged tree,
Th' expectant wee things, toddlin' stacher through
To meet their Dad, wi' fichterin' noise an' glee
His wee bit ingle, blinkin' bonnie,
His clean hearth-stane, his thrifty wife's smile,
The haping infant prattling on his knee,
Does a' his weary carking care beguile,
An' makes him quite forget his labour and his toil.

Belyve, the elder barns come drapping in,
 At service out, among the farmers roun';
 Some ca' the plough, some herd, some tentle rin
 A cannie errand to a neebor town;
 Their eldest hope, their Jenny, woman grown,
 In youthfu' bloom, love sparkling in her e'e,
 Comes hame, perhaps, to shew a braw new gown,
 Or deposit her sair-won penny-fee,
 To help her parents dear, if they in hardship be.
 Wi' joy unfeign'd brothers and sisters meet,
 An' each for other's welfare kindly epiers
 The social hours, swift-wing'd, unnotic'd fleet;
 Each tells the uncos that he sees or hears
 The parents, partial, eye their hopeful years;
 Anticipation forward points the view.
 The mother, wi' her needle an' her sheers,
 Gars auld claes look amais at weel's the new;
 Then mixes a' wi' admonition due.
 Their master's an' their mistress's command,
 The vounkers a' are warn'd to obey;
 An' muid their labours wi' an eydent hand,
 An' ne'er, tho' out o' sight, to jauk or play;
 "An' Oh! be sure to fear the Lord alway,
 An' mind your duty, duly, morn an' night!
 Lest in temptation's path ye gang astray,
 Implore His counsel and assisting might -
 They never sought in vain that sought the Lord aright!"
 But hark! a rap comes gently to the door,
 Jenny, wha kens the meaning o' the same,
 Tells how a neebor lad cam o'er the moor,
 To do some errands, and convoy her hame.
 The wily mother sees the conscious flame
 Sparkle in Jenny's e'e and flush her cheek;
 Wi' heart-struck anxious care inquires his name,
 While Jenny haffins is afraid to speak,
 Weel pleas'd the mother hears, it's nae wild, worthless rake
 Wi' kindly welcome, Jenny brings him ben,
 A strappin' youth, he takes the mother's eye;
 Blythe Jenny sees the visit's no ill ta'en,
 The father cracks his horses, plough, and kye
 The youngster's artless heart o'erflows wi' joy,
 But blate and faithfu', scarce can weel behave;
 The mother, wi' a woman's wiles, can spy
 What makes the youth sae bashfu' an' sae grave;
 Weel pleas'd to think her barn's respected like the lave,
 O happy love! what love like this is found!
 O heart-felt raptures! bliss beyond compare!
 I've paced much this weary, mortal round,
 And sage experience bids me this declare—
 "If heav'n a draught of heav'nly pleasure spare,
 One cordial in this melancholy vale,
 'Tis when a youthful, loving, modest pair,
 In other's arms breathe out the tender tale,
 Beneath the malk-white thorn that scents the ev'ning gale."

JEAN

Of a' the airts the wind can blaw,
 I dearly like the west,
 For thro' the bonnie lassie lives,
 The lassie I lo'e best
 There wild woods grow, and rivers row,
 And monie a hill between,
 But day and night my fancy's flight
 Is o'er wi' my Jean
 I see her in the dewy flowers,
 I see her sweet and fair
 I hear her in the tuneful birds,
 I hear her charm the air
 There's not a bonnie flower that springs
 By fountain, shaw, or green,
 There's not a bonnie bird that sings,
 But minds me o' my Jean

THE BANKS O' DOON

Ye flowery banks o' bonnie Doon,
 How can ye blume sae fair!

How can ye chant, ye little birds,
 And I sae fu' o' care!
 Thou'll break my heart, thou bonnie bird,
 That sings upon the bough;
 Thou minds me o' the happy days.
 When my fause luvie was true.
 Thou'll break my heart, thou bonnie bird,
 That sings beside thy mate;
 For sae I sat, and sae I sang,
 And wistna o' my fate.
 Aft hae I roved by bonnie Doon,
 To see the woodbine twine;
 And ilka bird sang o' its luvie,
 And sae did I o' mine
 Wi' lightsome heart I pu'd a rose
 Upon a morn in June,
 And sae I flourish'd on the morn,
 And sae was pu'd o' noon.
 Wi' lightsome heart I pu'd a rose
 Upon its thorny tree;
 But my fause luvie staw my rose,
 And left the thorn wi' me

A RED, RED ROSE

O my Luvie's like a red, red rose
 That's newly sprung in June.
 O my Luvie's like the melodie
 That's sweetly play'd in tune!
 As far art thou, my bonnie lass,
 So deep in luvie am I,
 And I will luvie thee still, my dear,
 Till a' the seas gang dry:
 Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
 And the rocks melt wi' the sun;
 I will luvie thee still, my dear,
 While the sands o' life shall run.
 And fare thee weel, my only Luvie,
 And fare thee weel a while!
 And I will come again, my Luvie,
 Tho' it were ten thousand mile.

WILLIAM BLAKE (1757-1827)

James Blake was a hosier in Broad Street, Golden Square, with little money to spare for a son's education: but he did what lay in his power to assist William (b. 1757), whose artistic gifts showed themselves at quite an early age. James had wished to bring the boy up in his own trade, but Destiny had other views for the lad, and the father was sensible enough not to oppose them. At the age of ten the son went to a drawing school in the Strand, where he learned to draw from the antique. He remained here for four years, and during this time his eager, sensitive face was to be seen at most of the important art sales, where he was dubbed "the little connoisseur." During this time, moreover, he amused himself by writing verses, afterwards collected and published under the title of Poetical Sketches.

The merit of the verse is not considerable, but it has an interest for the student of literary history as showing Blake's early interest in the Elizabethans—a profoundly formative influence in shaping his genius.

He was apprenticed in 1777 to James Basaré, an engraver, and remained with him for seven years, after which he went to the School of the Royal Academy, where he learned to draw from the model. It is not known whether he ever studied painting systematically as he studied drawing and engraving, but we know that he experimented on his own account in water colours.

In 1782 he made a happy marriage with Catherine Boucher, the daughter of a market gardener, and the young couple lived for a while in Green Street, Leicester Square. Blake, who had always exhibited a picture in the Royal Academy, had made the acquaintance of many artists of note, among them Flaxman and Fuseli, and was getting into touch with literary society. The publication of his early verso marked him as a poet of promise, and though the two aspects of his artistic genius were for a while disconnected, the draughtsman and poet drew closer together as the years went on, until after a period of intermingling, the pictorial artist triumphed over the literary artist, in self-expression.

In 1784 he set up as a print seller and engraver, in company with another artist, but in 1787 the partnership came to an end, and he continued in business independently, becoming his own printer and publisher. The first fruits of his work were the Songs of Innocence, a volume remarkable both for the beauty of the verse, and the accompanying decorative designs. His mystical bent of mind shadowed in the volume, found fuller expression in The Book of Thel (1787), and The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1790), The Gates of Paradise and The Vision of the Daughters of Albion (1793). In 1794 came the Songs of Experience. In his earlier Songs he had given us his vision of the beauty in life, now he deals with the ugliness in life, that experience has taught him. With this volume Blake's finest work as a poet closes. His mystical faculty henceforth found a more satisfying expression in decorative design, his love of symbolism gave an obscurity to his later verse, that weakens their appeal, on the other hand it gave a richer complexity to his work as a decorative artist. From 1796 he is actively concerned in the art of illustration, and the books he enriched in this way are Young's Night Thoughts, Blair's Grave, and remarkable designs for the Canterbury Pilgrims, also his own prophetic books, the Jerusalem, Emanation of the Great Albion and Milton. In later life he became, with John Linnell and other water-colour painters, attracted to astrology, and made his magnificent designs for the Book of Job. He died in 1827, at Fountain Court in the Strand.

Except the Poetical Sketches and The French Revolution, all Blake's works were produced on a method that he alleged was communicated to him in a vision by the spirit of his brother. Along with the text were illustrative designs and marginal ornamentations, these being worked on copper plates in relief, and afterwards printed in colour on paper, and finally coloured with exquisite delicacy by the artist himself. The illustrations to the Book of Job, made when he was seventy, give us the engraver at his best, both as a technician and imaginative artist. Despite an influential circle of intimate friends, the genius of Blake, whether as poet or artist, was unrecognised by the public at large, during his lifetime. But neglect never troubled him, for his hold upon the spiritual world comforted and sustained him through the vicissitudes of his life.

HIS WORK

The early work of Blake was chiefly lyrical. The Poetical Sketches were published in 1783, the Songs of Innocence in 1789; then, in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, the symbolic note appears; it subserves more and more the symbolism of the poet and his mystical doctrines.

As a visionary he touched both Art and Letters; he is ever looking behind the visible frame of things, for the glories and terrors of the world of spirit; not with the earnest, ethical intent of Wordsworth, but with the eye of one who cannot help dreaming dreams and seeing visions. The visionary in him may and often will overpower the artist, and a wild confusion of imagery often blurs his work, whether as draughtsman or singer, but if at times it drowns his clarity and simplicity, it gives a phantom touch of extraordinary subtlety, and to much of his work an exquisite beauty, that lifts his lyric faculty into an atmosphere like that of no other poet. His first efforts precede the work of Cowper and Burns, and the better part of his work was accomplished before Wordsworth had found himself in the Lyrical Ballads. The liberty that Burns emphasized as an integral part of life, Blake cherished as the source of his spiritual intuition. He drew, as the peasant poet did, plenary inspiration from Nature, but with a mystic rapture alien to the Scots singer. Burns lingered on the concrete show of life, it is enough for him. Blake cares for the splendour of human love, or the rapture of the sun and sky, only so far as it carries him to some inner fire whence they have their being. Compare any love song of Burns with one of Blake's, and we realise this at once.

"Like as an angel glittering in the sky
In times of innocence and holy joy;
The joyful shepherd stops his grateful song
To hear the music of an angel's tongue

So when she speaks, the voice of Heaven I hear,
So when we walk, nothing impure comes near,
Each field seems Eden, and each calm retreat,
Each village seems the haunt of holy feet

But that sweet village where my black-ey'd maid
Closes her eyes in sleep beneath night's shade,
When'er I enter, more than mortal fire
Burns in my soul, and doth my song inspire."

He loved the Elizabethans for their naturalness and rhythmic music, but save at the very outset, he never imitated them, for his own lyric faculty was peculiarly original, less intense than theirs, but no less ecstatic and lovely, in its more ethereal way. It is like the singing of a happy child, expressed with the art of a man. He shook off the heavy preoccupations of a world in the first throes of the Industrial Revolution; he ignored the material cares that clog and chafe the spirit. He saw in the simple joys and raptures of ordinary life a Paradise regained. And in the Songs of Innocence, he entered an Eden to which man had long been alien. No poet, not even Wordsworth, drew from simpler sources than he; and none revelled with such gay and exquisite abandonment of spirit in their life. If he had the naturalness and spontaneity of a child, he had also his wild luxurious fancy, and a quaint, delicious fantasy binds by threads of shimmering gossamer all living things, uniting them in a spirit of joyous abandon and tender sympathy.

" Farewell, green fields and happy groves,
Where flocks have took delight,
Where lambs have nibbled, silent moves
The feet of angels bright;
Unseen, they pour blessing,
And joy without ceasing,
On each bud and blossom,
And each sleeping bosom

They look in every thoughtless nest,
Where birds are cover'd warm,
They visit caves of every beast,
To keep them from all harm
If they see any weeping
That should have been sleeping,
They pour sleep on their head,
And sit down by their bed "

And the woods and streams add their benison also :

" the green woods laugh with the voice of joy,
And the dimpling stream runs laughing by,
When the air does laugh with our merry wit,
And the green hill laughs with the noise of it."

But the rapture of Blake is not unthinking, while he loves his Eden, he is not deaf to the ugly clamour of the world outside. If he wrote the Songs of Innocence, he wrote also the Songs of Experience. The singer that gave us

" 'I have no name—
I am but two days old.'
What shall I call thee?
'I happy am,
Joy is my name'
Sweet joy befall thee!"

gave us also .

" My mother groan'd, my father wept,
Into the dangerous world I leapt;
Helpless, naked, piping loud,
Like a fiend hid in a cloud

Struggling in my father's hands,
Striving against my swaddling-bands,
Bound and weary, I thought best
To sulk upon my mother's breast "

His pastoral note is not the affectation of a mere sentimentalist. This is his ideal .

" For Mercy has a human heart,
Pity, a human face,
And Love the human form divine,
And Peace the human dress "

But he knew the bitterness of hate, and what misery it wreaked on human-kind

" I was angry with my friend;
I told my wrath, my wrath did end.
I was angry with my foe—
I told it not, my wrath did grow.

And I watered it in fears,
Night and morning, with my tears;
And I sunned it with smiles,
And with soft deceitful wiles

And it grew both day and night,
Till it bore an apple bright,
And my foe beheld it shine,
And he knew that it was mine,

And into my garden stole
When the night had veiled the pole:
In the morning glad I see
My foe outstretched beneath the tree."

Both the naturalism and mysticism of the Romantic Revival found expression in Blake; and on this point he differs from pioneers like Burns, who is simply naturalistic, or Cowper, who is only slightly touched by mysticism. On the naturalistic side he deals with the simplest phases of life; with the instinctive life of the child; with the love of flowers, hills and streams, the blue sky, the brooding clouds; and yet the mystical vision of the poet is always transforming these familiar things, touching obscure aspects, and spiritualising the most commonplace, into something strange and wonderful. The human note in Burns is untouched by supernaturalism. To Blake every spot is holy ground; angels shelter the birds from harm, the good shepherd looks after his sheep, the divine spark burns even in the breasts of savage animals. Cruelty to animals incensed Blake, he would give them the same freedom he wishes for humankind.

" A Robin Redbreast in a Cage
Puts all Heaven in a Rage!
A Dog starv'd at his Master's Gate
Predicts the ruin of the State
A Horse misus'd upon the Road
Calls to Heaven for Human Blood.
Each outcry of the hunted Hare
A fibre from the Brain does tear.
A Skylark wounded on the wing
A Cherubim does cease to sing

He who shall hurt the little Wren
Shall never be belov'd by men
The wanton Boy that kills the Fly
Shall feel the Spider's enmity
He who torments the Chafer's sprite
Weaves a Bower in endless Night.
The Caterpillar on the leaf
Repeats to thee thy Mother's grief.
Kill not the Moth nor Butterfly,
For the Last Judgment draweth nigh "

Mysticism in poetry is blended usually with a wistful melancholy. "The desire of the moth for the star, of the night for the morrow," animates the poet's soul, and in his hungering after eternity, he feels more and more dissatisfied with the show of life. But Blake is an exception. He is a joyful mystic; for him the morning stars sing together, and the splendour of life outweighs its shadows. There are no mournful regrets in his verse, no sighing for a day that is dead. Evil rouses his anger, not his tears. Sorrow he accepts cheerfully as a necessary twin to joy:

" Joy and woe are woven fine,
A clothing for the soul divine;
Under every grief and pine
Runs a joy with silken twine
It is right it should be so,
Man was made for joy and woe;
And, when thus we rightly know,
Safely through the world we go "

Unlike some mystics he did not seek after the spirit world because he despised the world of sense, but because he loved it so well he felt there was more in it than man could fathom here. His mysticism was not an aspiration for the future: it was a realisation of the present. "The Kingdom of Heaven is within you": we have only to free ourselves from what is base and paltry, and we live in this realm of spiritual beauty now. The only un-reality for Blake was the external world; the great reality the world of his visions. Whatever validity we may attach to these visions, we cannot write them off as the delusions of an unbalanced mind, for he never confused them with the phenomena of ordinary life; they were differentiated by his mind as something wholly distinct.

Blake's mind was abnormal certainly, and his faculty for visions extraordinary, but the fact that we cannot share them does not necessarily discredit them. We do not even solve the problem by calling him mad; for even the madman's world is not necessarily an untrue world; mingled though it may be with false estimates as to the precise nature of what he sees and hears. "The Lunatic, the Lover, and the Poet are of imagination all compact", and to the madman may be vouchsafed glimpses of awful realities, that are denied to ordinary perception and feelings. That Blake cannot correlate all he sees, or clarify his cloud of imagery, is another matter altogether. Yet whatever view we hold as to the objective value of Blake's visions, they profoundly controlled his Art; and if the source of much obscurity, and no little violent over-emphasis, is also the source of much that is beautiful and inspiring. No poet has externalised ideas with greater vividness than he; and had he only taken as much care to focus his visions, as he did to beautify and elaborate his technique, his power as a poet would have been more compelling.

But there is a side of his mysticism that is deep-rooted in the practical side of his nature, and touches the problems of life. His view of Love resembles Shelley's. We do what is right not from some categorical imperative, but because love bids us act so. The intellectual analysis of spiritual truths revolted him. Logic and argument offend him. I know, he says, and there is an end of the matter. For theology he had no love, and priestcraft he abominated. It was the theologian and the priest who had added to the misery of the world by their distorted picture of God.

Love, thought Blake, was so often confused with self-love:

"Love seeketh not Itself to please,
Nor for itself hath any care,
But for another gives its ease,
And builds a Heaven in Hell's despair."

So sung a little Clod of Clay,
Trodden with the cattle's feet,
But a pebble of the brook
Warbled out these metres meet:

"Love seeketh only Self to please,
To bind another to Its delight,
Joys in another's loss of ease,
And builds a Hell in Heaven's despite."

Another bond of union with Shelley is his passion for Liberty. He thunders at kings and priests and oppressive rulers in his prophetic writings, nor will he spare his own country when he thinks she has been false to freedom.

"But vain the Sword and vain the Bow,
They never can work War's overthrow.
The Hermit's Prayer, the Widow's Tear
Alone can free the World from fear."

For a Tear is an Intellectual Thing,
And a Sigh is the Sword of an Angel King,
And the bitter groan of the Martyr's woe
Is an Arrow from the Almighty's Bow."

There is an elfin note in Shelley, there is an elfin orchestra in Blake. At times it sounds in our ears like something grotesque and incomprehensible. The singer loses himself in the "illimitable universe," leaving upon our minds a mere confusion of signs and symbols, or under the glow of some great idea rushes into the wildest extravagances of speech.

But at his best, his daring simplicity, his naïveté, his spiritual beauty, claims our sympathies and thrills our imagination, as only a great poet has power to do.

REEDS OF INNOCENCE

Piping down the valleys wild,
Piping songs of pleasant glee,
On a cloud I saw a child,
And he laughing said to me:

"Pipe a song about a Lamb!"
So I piped with merry cheer,
"Piper, pipe that song again,"
So I piped: he wept to hear

"Drop thy pipe, thy happy pipe;
Sing thy songs of happy cheer!"
So I sung the same again,
While he wept with joy to hear.

"Piper, sit thee down and write
In a book that all may read"
So he vanished from my sight,
And I pluck'd a hollow reed,

And I made a rural pen,
And I stain'd the water clear,
And I wrote my happy songs
Every child may joy to hear.

SONO

My silks and fine array,
My smiles and languish'd air,
By Love are driven away;
And mournful lean Despair
Brings me yew to deck my grave;
Such end true lovers have.

His face is fair as Heaven
When springing buds unfold
O why to him was't given,
Whose heart is wintry cold?
His breast is Love's all-worshipp'd tomb,
Where all Love's pilgrims come.

Bring me an axe and spade,
Bring me a winding-sheet;
When I my grave have made,
Let winds and tempests beat:
Then down I'll lie, as cold as clay;
True love doth pass away!

I. POETRY: (b) WORDSWORTH AND HIS GROUP—Wordsworth—S. T. Coleridge—Robert Southey—Samuel Rogers—Mrs. Hemans—James Montgomery—Robert Montgomery.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH (1770-1850)

HIS LIFE

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH was born at Cookermouth in Cumberland, April 7, 1770, being the second son of John Wordsworth, "attorney-at-law." Both of his parents died while he was a boy, and William recalled an intimate friend telling him that his mother once said to her, that "the only one of her five children about whose future she was anxious was William, and he, she said, would be remarkable, either for good or for evil."

"The cause of this was owing to my stiff, moody, and violent temper; so much so that I remember going once into the attic of my grandfather's house at Penrith upon some indignity having been put upon me, with an intention of destroying myself with one of the foils, which I knew was kept there. I took the foil in hand, but my heart failed. Upon another occasion, while I was at my grandfather's house at Penrith, along with my eldest brother, Richard, we were whipping tops together in the large drawing-room, on which the carpet was only laid down upon particular occasions. The walls were hung round with family pictures, and I said to my brother, 'Dare you strike your whip through that old lady's petticoat?' He replied 'No, I won't.' 'Then,' said I, 'here goes!' and I struck my lash through her hooped petticoat, for which, no doubt, though I have forgotten it, I was properly punished."

If only Wordsworth had proved as self-critical of his work as he was of his conduct, posterity might have been spared so voluminous a body of indifferently verse. But our poet was not built that way. He seems to have been an eager reader while a boy, and was well acquainted with the great critics of the eighteenth century. However, it was not from books, but from his early associations with Nature that he was to find his real inspiration.

In October 1787 he went up to St. John's College, Cambridge. Despite the qualms he afterwards expressed in his long autobiographical poem, The Prelude, that he had in the thoughtlessness of youth paid too little heed to the impressive surroundings, yet many of the cloistral charms of the University are recorded by him with affectionate fidelity. "Scarcely Spenser's self," he protests,

"Could have more tranquil visions in his youth,
Or could more bright appearances create
Of human forms with superhuman powers,
Than I beheld loitering on calm clear nights
Alone, beneath this fairy work of earth."

While the poet had gazed, as Milton had done before him, on the "storied windows richly dight" of King's College Chapel, and

"That branching roof
Self poised, and scooped into ten thousand cells
Where light and shade repose, where music dwells
Lingering, and wandering on as loth to die—
Like thoughts whose very sweetness yieldeth proof
That they were born for immortality."

Even in these years he was meditative and susceptible to scenic beauties; for the rest he was somewhat a boorish youth, self-confident, not overfond of study, his deepest sympathies being with the simple life of the country. Gradually his mind expanded, his sympathies broadened, and a holiday tour in Switzerland and France brought him into the ardent Revolutionary atmosphere of the Continent. Perhaps if a suitable opportunity had presented itself he would have flung himself into the life of soldiering at this time. He had been a keen student of military history; while his passionate, headstrong nature was captivated by the idea of commanding troops, and fighting for the Revolutionary cause.

But he had no means of realising this dream, and on leaving Cambridge he went to London, uncertain as to his future, certain only that he was not "good enough for the Church." London did not take his youthful imagination by storm: he was not a "crowd-worshipper" like Browning, and though interested in Man, cared little for Tom, Dick, and Harry. In fact he always preferred to study the "still, sad music of humanity" from meditative heights.

None the less his life in London was not unproductive, as two or three noble sonnets and such tender pieces as The Reverie of Poor Susan testify. But Paris rather than London obsessed his youthful imagination, until the bloody horrors of the Revolution sickened him, his enthusiasm grew cold and faltered, and was ultimately turned in other directions.

During the period of disillusionment his greatest comforter proved his sister Dorothy

"She gave me eyes, she gave me ears,
And humble cares, and delicate fears;
A heart the fountain of sweet tears,
And love, and thought, and joy."

After the production of the Lyrical Ballads, Wordsworth and his sister set sail for Germany. The four months' stay there did little to broaden his mind or intensify his powers; for, unlike Coleridge, he was not sensitive to the thought of his age, and not responsive to new influences. But it proved an agreeable holiday, and perhaps the detachment from English surroundings served to throw the poet more exclusively upon his imaginative memories. Certainly the English poems he wrote during this time, such as Lucy Gray and Ruth, are especially happy in their simplicity and charm.

On his return he and his sister went to live in the Lake district, where his earliest impressions had been gathered, and round Grasmere and Rydal the poet lived for fifty years.

His marriage to Mary Hutchinson of Penrith took place in 1802. It was not an epoch-making event in his imaginative life, though it proved a happy and peaceful union. She made a good wife and an interesting companion, but as an influence cannot rank either with his sister Dorothy, or with Coleridge.

The record of these years is, on the whole, the pleasant, uneventful record of a man of simple, austere tastes, much goodness of heart and somewhat limited powers of friend making. One of the generous friendships to be noted was that with Sir George Howland Beaumont, who at an earlier period had become acquainted with Coleridge, and even before he met Wordsworth was a great admirer of his verse. To Beaumont, Wordsworth wrote many interesting letters relating to his work. Wordsworth's long poem The Prelude, finished in 1805, was intended as a sort of portico to The Recluse. The Recluse was never written, a fragment only surviving under the title of The Excursion—a poem which he had hoped to shape as "the first and only true philosophical poem in existence." During later years Wordsworth more considerably extended his circle of acquaintances. Keats saw and admired him, Rogers proved friendly and useful, and Sir Henry Taylor—a younger admirer—introduced the poet to some of the Benthamite school, while Crabb Robinson followed his movements with the attentive respect of a disciple. Keble at a later date showed him an almost fervid worship, that greatly delighted the old poet. In fact, after many years of neglect he was at last regarded by many with respect, with respect and affection by a few, but concerning his poetic genius there was no cavilling. Jeffrey's thundering "This will never do" had long since died into silence.

In 1843, on Southey's death, he accepted the Laureateship, but his work was done, and the few years that still remained were interesting to his personal friends, rather than to the world outside. He died in the spring of 1850.

The very reverse of Lamb in temperament, Wordsworth yet runs the same risk as Lamb did of being wrongly estimated. Lamb, full of whims and caprices, extravagant moods and a wilful childlikeness that puzzled and offended serious men like Carlyle, was often put down as a wild, irresponsible creature, amiable and amusing, perhaps, but with no solid depth. And yet, as we know, those surface qualities which so charmed some and so offended others, concealed a fine moral beauty and astonishing strength of character.

Wordsworth on the other hand, whose portentous seriousness often moved the irrepressible Elia to some prank, was obviously deficient in those touches of light and shade, those little graces of disposition that endear a man to his friends, and it is thought by many that he was a cold, self-sufficient man. But he was not cold, and behind his natural reserve glowed a strong, deep, even violent feeling. His affection for his sister and daughter bears witness to this. But he had subjected his feelings to a rigorous self-control, knowing his own passionate nature.

De Quincey speaks significantly of the brooding intensity of his eye, and the bursts of anger at the report of evil doings, and Coleridge has referred to him in some memorable lines as an "ever-enduring man."

Among the many pen sketches of the man, that of Carlyle is perhaps the happiest, and there is unerring penetration shown in the concluding sentence:

"He talked well in his way, with veracity, easy brevity and force, as a wise tradesman would of his tools and workshops, and as no unwise one would. His voice was good, frank and sonorous, though practically clear, distinct and forcible rather than melodious; the tone of him business-like, sedately confident, no discourtesy, yet no anxiety about being courteous, a fine, wholesome rusticity, fresh as his mountain breezes, sat well on the stalwart veteran and on all he said and did. You would have said he was a usually taciturn man, glad to unlock himself to audiences sympathetic and intelligent whom such offered itself. His face bore marks of much, not always peaceful, meditation, the look of it not bland or benevolent so much as close, impregnable and hard. The eyes were not very brilliant but they had a quiet clearness, there was enough of brow and well-shaped; rather too much of cheek, face of squarish shape and decidedly boyish, large-boned, lean, and still firm knit tall and strong-looking when he stood, a right good old steel-grey figure, with a fine rustic simplicity and dignity about him, and a veracious strength looking through him."

His treatment of Hartley Coleridge will serve to extenuate many little ungracious mannerisms. When all hope of reclaiming Hartley from drink was over, Wordsworth paid for his lodgings, took care of him and treated him with gentle, large-hearted consideration to the day of his death.

Miss Martineau, in her interesting description of him, has depicted him as being often attended by half a score of cottagers' children, the youngest pulling at his cloak or holding by his trousers, while he cut ash switches out of the hedge for them.

It is a pretty touch, and may be taken with other and less amiable vignettes of the "good old steel-grey figure."

HIS WORK

It was Wordsworth's aim as a poet to seek for beauty in meadow, woodland, and the mountain-top, and to interpret this beauty in spiritual terms. He is for ever spiritualising the moods of Nature and winning from them moral consolation, and it was his special characteristic to concern himself, not with the strange and remote aspects of the earth and sky, but with Nature in her ordinary, familiar, everyday moods.

Wordsworth's best work was done between 1796 and 1808. Although he lived until 1850 and was writing up to the very last, there are only occasional flashes of his real genius during this later period. Roughly speaking, one may say that the decline of his poetic inspiration and the decline of his revolutionary enthusiasm synchronised. The Republican Wordsworth is the great Wordsworth, the Tory Wordsworth is the second-rate and third-rate poet. It would be unfair to say that he did no work of the first order after 1808, part of The Recluse was written after that date, and there is fine work there, there are memorable Sonnets also, e.g. I thought of Thee (c. 1820), Scorn not the Sonnet (c. 1823). But the old power, the ancient magic, comes fitfully and rarely, whereas in the earlier period, the output is wonderfully level in its high quality.

Looking first of all at the poet's general outlook on life, it will be noted that he is concerned specially with two things—Nature and Man. The subject-matter is less comprehensive than at first sight it appears.

In Nature, the poet is concerned far less with the sensuous manifestations that delight most of our Nature poets, than with the spiritual that he finds underlying these manifestations. The primrose and the daffodil are symbols to him of Nature's message to man, the grandeur of the mountain torrent appeals to him because he can link its beauty in his mind with the glory of the floating clouds, with the charm of a young girl's face, a sunrise for Wordsworth is not a pageant of colour, it is a moment of spiritual consecration :

" Magnificent

The morning rose in memorable pomp
Glorious as e'er I had behold—in front
The sea lay laughing at a distance, near
The solid mountain shone, bright as the clouds,
Gran-tinctured, drenched in empyrean light,
And in the meadows and the lower grounds
Was all the sweetness of a common dawn—
Dews, vapours, and the melody of birds,
And labourers going forth to till the fields

My heart was full, I made no vows, but vows
Were then made for me; bond unknown to me
Was given, that I should be, else sinning greatly,
A dedicated Spirit "

With the outward show of things, with Nature's bewildering profusion, her teeming concrete life, her riddles, her magical appeal to the eye and the sense of touch, he is little concerned. The appeal to the ear does indeed interest him as a poet, but only because through sound he can interpret the particular consolation and benison he is seeking. He listens to the discords only to detect the harmony underlying "a central peace subsisting at the heart of endless agitation." Wordsworth, Coleridge, Byron, Shelley, Keats, were all poets of Nature, but in what different ways. Wordsworth and Shelley have this point in common. They, unlike their contemporaries, intellectualised Nature, their music, each glorious in its own way, is set to transcendental language. They are not merely poets of Nature, they are prophets of Nature, they are concerned less to depict than to explain, less to marvel at her beauty than to exult at its inner significance. They are over moving from the external fact to the idea. It is otherwise with Coleridge, Byron, and Keats.

Coleridge, sympathising as he does intellectually with his friends' transcendentalism, is far more readily influenced by the multifold sensuous appeal of Nature; while Byron and Keats delight with a frankly pagan joy in landscape, waterscape, and cloudscape, and are content to worship the goddess, not to consult the oracle.

But if Wordsworth and Shelley have a common end in view, their way of achieving that end is sufficiently distinctive. Wordsworth proclaims peace and order to be at the heart of things, Shelley, Love; Shelley's method is largely diffusive, Wordsworth's concentrative. Shelley finds expression in a cry—sometimes of pain, sometimes of joy—but always at his most impassioned moments a cry; for Shelley's mind was ever overhung with wonderful dreams.

There is very little of the visionary in Wordsworth's spiritual meditation.

That this method of repression carried with it limitations is obvious. Variety, light and shade must needs be sacrificed. On the other hand it certainly gave depth and intensity, whence came what Matthew Arnold finely called "the bare, sheer, penetrating power" of his best work. And to achieve this stark splendour he is content to leave much on one side. Thus he speaks of times when

"The gross and visible frame of things
Relinquishes its hold upon the sense,
Yea, almost on the mind itself, and seems
All unsubstantialised "

He gazes around him and

"Ocean and earth, the solid frame of earth
And ocean's liquid mass in gladness lay
Beneath him—Far and wide the clouds were touched
And in their silent faces could be read
Unutterable love. Sound needed none,
Nor any voice of joy, his spirit drank
The spectacle, sensation, soul and form
All melted into him; they swallowed up
His animal being, in them did he live,
And by them did he live, they were his life.
In such access of mind in such high hour
Of visitation from the living God,
Thought was not, in enjoyment it expired,
No thanks he breathed, he professed no regret;
Rapt into still communion that transcends
The imperfect offices of prayer and praise
His mind was a thanksgiving to the power
That made him, it was blessedness and love "

The passage is a fine one, more notable, however, for its spiritual ecstasy than for its poetic presentment. To combine the two, and to be both deeply mystical and nobly poetical, that is the constant aim of Wordsworth, and while it is productive of many of his most disastrous experiments in verse, it is the source also of some of his greatest things—grand rhapsodies such as Tintern Abbey.

Unhappily it is so fatally easy for mysticism to slip into theological formula and when the Moralists obtrude poor Imagination has to hide away. One deplores the didacticism of Wordsworth the more, since he can when he wishes give delicate and subtle expression to the sheer sensuous delight of the world of Nature. He can feel the elemental joy of Spring:

"It was an April morning, fresh and clear
The rivulet, delighting in its strength,
Ran with a young man's speed, and yet the voice
Of waters which the river had supplied
Was softened down into a vernal tone
The spirit of enjoyment and desire,
And hopes and wishes from all living things
Went circling, like a multitude of sound."

And can take a pleasure fully as keen in the placid lake:

"The calm
And dead still water lay upon my mind
Even with a weight of pleasure, and the sky,
Never before so beautiful, sank down
Into my heart, and held me like a dream "

He can actualise with fine clarity all the little graces and charms of a summer day:

"The northern downs
In clearest air ascending, showed far off
A surface dappled o'er with shadows fleecy
From brooding clouds,"

and can throw the very spirit of June into a couplet:

"Flaunting Summer when he throws
His soul into the briar rose "

A brief study of Wordsworth's scenic pictures, with their rhythmic felicities, will reveal to the student the peculiar power of the poet in actualising sound and its converse, silence.

An interesting contrast with Shelley is discernible here. Wordsworth is the poet of the ear just as Shelley is the poet of the eye, and never more felicitous than in conveying some phase of silence, tone of sound.

The following passages will illustrate to some extent the dominant characteristic, for, as Shelley said, Wordsworth has awakened "a kind of thought in sense."

"The winds that would be howling at all hours
And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers."

"To lie and listen to the mountain flood Murmuring from Glaramara's inmost caves"

"A gentle shock of mild surprise
Had carried far into his heart, the voice
Of mountain torrents"

How distinctively Wordsworthian these lines. What poet other than Wordsworth would have preferred the sound to the pictorial effect of the torrent? Shelley in particular would have delighted in dwelling on the prismatic effect of the sunshine upon the waters. Shelley, indeed, is a direct contrast, and insists on colour where we might reasonably expect that sound would have attracted him. Take his famous Ode to the Skylark. He is more concerned with colour effects than the song of the bird.

"Higher still and higher
From the earth thou springest;
Like a cloud of fire
Thou blue deep thou wingest . . ."

Then again, in the well-known description of skating—The Prelude—with what suggestive power does Wordsworth convey the still, frosty, sensitive atmosphere.

"So that the darkness and the cold are fled

Meanwhile the precipices rang aloud,
The leafless trees and every icy crag
Tinkled like iron, while far-distant hills
Into the tumult sent an alien sound
Of melancholy not unnoticed"

The restfulness of evening, and the spacious quietness of the country allure him:

"It is a beauteous evening, calm and free,
The holy time is quiet as a nun
Breathless with adoration, the broad sun
Is sinking down in its tranquillity"

"How sweet it is, when Fancy rooks
The wayward brain, to saunter through a wood!
An old place full of many a lovely brood,
Tall trees, green arbours, and ground flowers in flocks;
And wild rose tip-toe upon hawthorn stocks"

In fact, just as the thinker in Wordsworth is always striving to realise the peace at the heart of things, and of the joy that comes from peace—so does the literary artist strive to exhibit this peace and joy through one of the channels of sense, the one most effective for his purpose.

Now and again the eye is charmed with some pictorial fancy, as the image of the mountain daisy with "The beauty of its star-shaped shadow thrown On the smooth surface of the naked stone."

which was written when the poet was over seventy. But, the witchery of sound is the witchery that we realise with the most compelling beauty. As the poet of the eye he has many peers, and in richness of effect and subtlety of appeal must yield the palm to a crowd of singers less great than himself; but when it comes to the symbolism of sound, Wordsworth is supreme. No other poet could have written:

"A voice so thrilling ne'er was heard
In springtime from the cuckoo-bird,
Breaking the silence of the seas
Among the farthest Hebrides," or in a very different mood have given us this:

"Better than such discourse doth silence long,
Long, barren silence, square with my desire
To sit without emotion, hope, or aim,
In the loved presence of my cottage fire,
And listen to the flapping of the flame,
Or kettle whispering its faint undersong"

If we pass from Wordsworth's attitude towards Nature to his attitude towards Man, the same method is observable. Just as in Nature he is always eager to pass from the concrete to the abstract, so in dealing with humanity he is less concerned with individuals than with certain qualities common to mankind. Nature had awakened his earliest inspiration; under her influence he had dedicated himself to the life of the interpretative imagination, and he saw man—if I may so put it—through Nature's eyes, dwelling therefore, not on accidents of temperament and disposition that go to differentiate men and women from each other, but on those primal qualities of humanity where Man and Nature touch and blend.

Thus his love of Nature is transferred to the shepherd and simple daleman of the North, and after them to ordinary men and women with ordinary joys and sorrows.

The strong Republican sympathies of his earlier years gave a glow to his pictures of rural life where the real and ideal meet and blend, and where the humdrum is spiritualised. In later years, when the latent conservatism of his nature gained the mastery, and when he shrank from the Revolutionary watchword that inspired Shelley throughout life, his characterisation is less sure, and where once he had been content to let his pictures tell their own tale, he is anxious to emphasize some particular moral.

But already he had done much for the agricultural poor that Dickens was to achieve later for the town poor—had drawn attention to the tender homeliness of their lives, shown their fearless independence and rugged sincerity. Indeed, the sentiment of that hackneyed strophe from Lady Clara Vere de Vere concerning "kind hearts" and "simple faith" is more essentially Wordsworthian than Tennysonian in spirit, and his knowledge of peasant ways and of the peasant character was gained by patient, watchful investigation. He believed in them and he admired them, and with the passion of a scientist he collects eagerly facts and traits that may help him to build up his portraits; and it is ever one thing he is on the look-out for—something to inspire man's higher faculties. He watches men and women with the expectant gaze of a man who is looking for some particular attitude or posture which he is anxious to portray. No doubt by this method he missed a great deal of rich human material, but he is a moralist at heart, with one steady purpose in view, and leaving aside much that was fascinating and perplexing, he contents himself with a few broad, simple issues, and there, at his best, he exhibits a massive splendour of compelling power.

It is quite natural that Wordsworth should elect to deal with the more primal life of country places, where simple, human qualities were not overlaid by artificial conventions. Ignoring the coarseness and pettiness of this life, he fixed his gaze upon the qualities of strength, endurance, unaffected simplicity, courage, and hope. And thus he winnows away the baser elements, until he finds the pure gold. Nature and Humanity he treats ever in the same way:

"Love had he found in huts where poor men lie,
His daily teachers had been woods and rills,
The silence that is in the starry sky,
The sleep that is among the lovely hills."

Only by purging away the accidentals, only by allowing your own emotion to be "recollected in tranquillity," only by climbing the heights of contemplation and ridding yourself of petty cares and distractions, will you get a true and faithful vision of human life. That was Wordsworth's view.

Some men are hard to read, because of their reserve:

"He is retired as noontide dew,
Or fountain in a noonday grove,
And ye must love him, ere to you
He will seem worthy of your love."

He draws our attention to the pathetic figure of the aged Cumberland beggar, and elicits our sympathies for the old leech-gatherer, placing each of these simple figures in a noble background of landscape and cloudecape until they are dignified by the spacious beauty of the earth:

"Gray locks profusely round his temples hung
In clustering curls like ivy, which the bite
Of Winter cannot thin; the fresh air lodged
Within his cheek as light within a cloud."

Apart from the sanctifying touch of Nature, men and women are poor creatures to Wordsworth. The farther we travel from Nature, the more paltry we become. This is the burden of his splendid sonnet The World is too much with us. Better, he says in effect, people the woods and streams, the plains and ocean, with nymphs and gods and goddesses, and retain something of the fresh simplicity and austere endurance of Nature, than give up our souls to the mere accumulation of wealth and to the superficial life of pleasure.

From these general considerations of Wordsworth's poetry let us pass to consider more particularly the methods of the literary artist rather than the poetic thinker; the manner of the poet rather than his matter.

The forms he adopts are the narrative, the lyrical, the elegiac, and the sonnet.

His narrative poetry is sometimes cast into heroic metre, sometimes into that of the ballad, and in each medium he achieved distinction. His ballad verse has not the fire and lift of Scott, but exhibits often a simple force and chaste tenderness unmatched by his contemporaries. Here, as always, in Wordsworth's poetry, simplicity lapses at times into triviality, but in ballads like Lucy Gray, there is no touch of triteness to mar the simple strength and unaffected beauty of the story. His narrative powers are considerable; and his gift of simple directness stands him in good stead here; yet he is not at his best in narrative for the simple reason that his deep interest in spiritual crises rather than physical, his preference for meditating over his subject and delaying or obscuring the story, renders him effective in snatches, but not effective as a good narrative poet should be.

The full force of his genius is best displayed in elegiac, sonnet, and lyric form. Read his narrative, and rarely do you feel the glow of romantic imagination. But once allow the meditative muse in Wordsworth to come to the fore, and the slumbering romantic fervour breaks forth at once in such lines as:

"Old unhappy far-off things
And battles long ago."

To the lyric Wordsworth brought a freshness and pensive sweetness that give them quite an original place in lyric literature. The Elizabethan lyric had become stereotyped; when not imitated it was neglected for other forms. Wordsworth breathes new life into it. He had not the force and versatility of Shelley, but he helped to prepare the way for that consummate lyric genius, by taking themes of rural life as inspirations. The dainty and delicate grace of poems like Three years she grew, She dwelt among the untrodden ways, I wandered lonely as a cloud, familiar and well-worn as they are, have no superior of their kind in our language.

There is a certain metallic quality in Wordsworth's poetic style, that gives a strength and grandeur to his happiest inspirations, and merely strikes one as hard and awkward in his uninspired moments. But whether good or poor, the metallic quality is never absent; it may be gold with which he provides us, it may be aluminum, but there is the inflexibility, the non-plasticity of metal in any case.

Here we may find an analogy with Milton's diction, which has the same hard strength, though not to the same extent as Wordsworth. This is not due to any literary influence, merely to the fact that there is a measure of the same spiritual temperament and way of expressing that temperament in both men. Wordsworth, as we know, admired Milton greatly, but he was far too individual, and unresponsive to external influences, to mould his diction on that of another, however great. This metallic quality gives a clear-cut purity to the poet's work, that invests the naturalness of his method with dignity. Why, we ask, is there this deplorable inequality in Wordsworth's style? No poet had a higher regard for his calling than he, the slap-dash carelessness of Byron is as alien to him as the crude luxuriance of the early Keats, yet no great poet has descended to greater depths of bathos and puerility than he. The poet who could write with a fine austere reserve :

"She is dead,
The light extinguished of her lonely hut,
The hut itself abandoned to decay
And she forgotten in the quiet grave," could also perpetrate these lines about a grave :

"I've measured it from side to side,
'Tis three feet long and two feet wide."

The poet who could pen such a line as :

"The silence that is in the starry sky,"

could suffer this line without a qualm :

"The silent heavens have goings on"

His deficient sense of humour is accountable for many banalities, but the chief reason for this mixture of puorility and grandeur is due to his poetic theory. This theory is set forth elaborately in the preface to the later editions of the Lyrical Ballads, where Wordsworth professes to use "a selection of the language really used by men in humble and rustic life," while at the same time he tried "to throw over" the matter described, "a certain colouring of imagination." Now, had Wordsworth meant by this a rich infusion into poetic diction of racy dialect and the quaint idiomatic expression of an unlettered rustic, he could no doubt have achieved some remarkable results, as Burns and others have done. But nothing was more remote from his intention. He would scrupulously purge the rustic speech of all particular conventions ; and in so doing take away its individual flavour, reducing the diction to something that was merely bald and prosaic.

Poetry can learn something from rustic speech most assuredly, as Ebenezer Elliot showed, but this is something quite other than Wordsworth imagined.

Happily, Wordsworth's splendid imagination was often too potent for his theory, and in his best work he unconsciously ignores it altogether.

His natural diction is the "grand manner," resonant with stately beauty, and it is only when uninspired, or in some mistaken outburst of conscientious endeavour, that he jars upon us with his flat and foolish speech. But if the theory as he understood it and tried to practise it was an unsound one, there was behind the theory the entirely sound principle that poetic style should be as simple and sincere as the language of everyday life, and that the more the poet draws on elemental feelings and primal simplicities the better for his art.

If the lyric form suited him better than the narrative, the sonnet and elegy suited him even better still. He was first stirred in the direction of sonneteering by hearing his sister Dorothy read some of Milton's in 1801 ; and from this date to the end of his life he was richly productive in sonnet making, with an impressive total of five hundred to his credit.

The best of these were written during the early years of the century, mostly in 1802, and include : Milton ; Westminster Bridge , It is a beautiful evening , and The World is too much with us (1806).

After 1808 there is a decline, not in workmanship but in imaginative beauty ; but right up to the last he will flash out again and again with something of the old passion and splendour, and thus just when we had made up our minds that his inspired mood was a thing of the past. Of these later sonnets, some of the River Duddon group and one on Mutability are among his best.

The technical exaction of the sonnet medium, the necessity for clear and orderly development, and the opportunity it afforded for intellectual articulation, all these things lent themselves readily to Wordsworth's reflective cast of mind, and cool clarity of diction. The particular form he chooses is not that known as the Shakespearean form—only once does he experiment in this—but in the Miltonic form based on the traditional Italian structure. Wordsworth did valuable service to English poetry, by thus reinstating the sonnet, and the poets who followed him, notably Keats and Dante Gabriel Rossetti, were not slow to take the hint, and develop still further its possibilities.

His elegiac poems, with which we may couple the odes, also give us Wordsworth in his highest moments, and exhibit his power of fusing metaphysical thought with lyrical feeling. Nature and the spirit that animates and transcends Nature, this is the theme of Tintern Abbey, and Ode on Intimations of Immortality. Our appreciation of the Ode will depend to some extent upon our sympathy with its metaphysical standpoint, but even those who are not touched by Wordsworth's idealism of childhood, cannot be blind to the splendid rhythmic felicities with which the Ode abounds, felicities that have passed into our language and become incorporate with it.

What then is the cumulative effect of Wordsworth's verse, what its dominant note ? It is not ecstatic, not gay, not tragic, but it is profoundly restful and restorative.

There is a fine sedative influence about Wordsworth's poetry which soothes and tranquillises, never enervates, and John Stuart Mill, distracted by the political problems of the day, turned to him with infinite relief. "I felt myself," he says, "at once better and happier as I came under their influence." The curative influence attributed to "light rays," from which heat rays have been excluded, suggest an analogy with the influence of Wordsworth's work. The "heat rays" of poetry find little place in his calm, meditative muse, all that can fever or distract has been eliminated. What remains is a beneficent focus of cool light. Many have been the sick minds since Mill's time on whom the "medicine" of Wordsworth's poetry has wrought a like change.

In his admirable pen-portrait of Wordsworth, Carlyle speaks of his "veracious strength," and this perhaps is the most enduring quality in his best work. To many of us he has given a glimpse of "truths that wake to perish never" ; while even to those for whom his mysticism carries no inspiration there are touches like these, splendid in their stoical fortitude :

"We men that in our morn of youth defied
The elements,—must vanish ; be it so !—"

ODE

Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood

There was a time when Meadow, grove, and stream,
The earth, and every common sight,
To me did seem
Apparell'd in celestial light,
Tho' glory and the freshness of a dream
It has not now as it hath been of yore—
Turn wheresoe'er I may,
By night or day,
The things which I have seen I now can see no more.

The rainbow comes and goes,
And lovely is the rose;
The moon doth with delight
Look round her when the heavens are bare;
Waters on a starry night
Are beautiful and fair;
The sunshine is a glorious birth,
But yet I know, where'er I go,
That there hath pass'd away a glory from the earth.

Now, while the birds thus sing a joyous song,
And while the young lambs bound
As to the tabor's sound,
To me lone there came a thought of grief.
A timely utterance gave that thought relief,
And I again am strong
The cataracts blow their trumpets from the steep;
No more shall grief of mine the season wrong;
I hear the echoes through the mountains throng,
The winds came to me from the fields of sleep,
And all the earth is gay;
Land and sea
Give themselves up to jollity,
And with the heart of May Doth every beast keep holiday;—
Thou Child of Joy,
Shout round me, let me hear thy shouts, thou happy
Shepherd-boy!

Ye bless'd creatures, I have heard the call
Ye to each other make, I see
The heavens laugh with you in your jubilee;
My heart is at your festival,
My head hath its coronal,
The fulness of your bliss, I feel—I feel it all,
O evil day! if I were sullen
While earth herself is adorning,
This sweet May-morning,
And the children are culling
On every side,
In a thousand valleys far and wide,
Fresh flowers, while the sun shines warm,
And the babe leaps up on his mother's arm,—
I hear, I hear, with joy I hear!
—But there's a tree, of many, one,
A single field which I have looked upon,
Both of them speak of something that is gone:
The pansy at my feet
Doth the same tale repeat:
Whither is fled the visionary gleam?
Where is it now, the glory and the dream?

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting—
The Soul that rises with us, our life's Star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar—
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God, who is our home.
Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
Shades of the prison-house begin to close
Upon the growing Boy,
But he beholds the light, and whence it flows,
He sees it in his joy;

The Youth, who daily farthest from the east
Must travel, still is Nature's priest,
And by the vision splendid
Is on his way attended;
At length the man perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day.
Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her own;
Yearnings she hath in her own natural kind,
And, even with something of a mother's mind,
And no unworthy aim,
The homely nurse doth all she can
To make her foster-child, her inmate Man,
Forget the glories he hath known,
And that imperial palace whence he came.

UPON WESTMINSTER BRIDGE

Earth has not anything to show more fair:
Dull would he be of soul who could pass by
A sight so touching in its majesty—
This City now doth like a garment wear
The beauty of the morning, silent, bare,
Ships, towers, domes, theatres, and temples lie
Open unto the fields, and to the sky,
All bright and glittering in the smokeless air.
Never did sun more beautifully steep
In his first splendour valley, rock, or hill;
No'er saw I, never felt, a calm so deep!
The river glideth at his own sweet will:
Dear God! the very houses seem asleep;
And all that mighty heart is lying still!

LUCY

Three years she grew in sun and shower,
Then Nature said, "A lovelier flower
On earth was never sown,
This child I to myself will take;
She shall be mine, and I will make
A lady of my own

"Myself will to my darling be
Both law and impulse: and with me
The girl, in rock and plain,
In earth and heaven, in glade and bower,
Shall feel an overseeing power
To kindle or restrain.

"She shall be sportive as the fawn
That wild with glee across the lawn
Or up the mountain springs,
And hers shall be the breathing balm,
And hers the silence and the calm
Of mute insensate things

"The floating clouds their state shall lend
To her; for her the willow bend—
Nor shall she fail to see
Even in the motions of the storm
Grace that shall mould the maiden's form
By silent sympathy.

"The stars of midnight shall be dear
To her, and she shall lean her ear
In many a secret place
Where rivulets dance their wayward round,
And beauty born of murmuring sound
Shall pass into her face.

"And vital feelings of delight
Shall rear her form to stately height,
Her virgin bosom swell;
Such thoughts to Lucy I will give
While she and I together live
Here in this happy dell."

Thus Nature spake—The work was done—
How soon my Lucy's race was run!
She died, and left to me
This heath, this calm and quiet scene;
The memory of what has been,
And never more will be.

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE (1772-1834)

His Life

Samuel Taylor Coleridge was born at Ottery St. Mary in Devonshire on October 23, 1772. His father was an easy-tempered country parson, remarkable both for his knowledge of books and ignorance of practical affairs. It was fortunate, therefore, that in his mother he had a parent who proved more energetic in advancing her son's interests in life. The future "logician, metaphysician bard" was a dreamy and indolent lad, loving nothing better than to lie in the sun and read fairy tales, until he had thoroughly alarmed himself by all kinds of magical possibilities. Sensitive, introspective, highly imaginative and indolent, the child was in every respect father of the man. In 1781 his father died, and Coleridge obtained a preferment to Christ's Hospital. At this critical juncture, it is a pity that there was no one to exercise a wise directing influence upon him. His only relative in London was an affectionate but injudicious uncle who, declared Coleridge, "used to carry me from coffee-house to coffee-house and tavern to tavern, where I drank and talked and disputed as if I had been a man."

Coleridge's disposition was singularly attractive, and at this time he had shaken off his indolence for a while and was full of youthful enthusiasms. From the allurements of bootmaking to the study of Homer nothing came amiss to him. One day he was desperately anxious to be a cobbler, another day he pored over all the medical books he could find, at another time the accents of "the inspired charity boy," as Lamb called him, reciting Homer or Pindar, "sounded through the walls of the old Grey Friars." Even at this early age he suffered from bad health, particularly rheumatic trouble, the legacy of a childish runaway adventure.

At Cambridge 1791-4, he became an ardent republican, and was the leader of a band of enthusiasts apparently more addicted to wine parties than to the pursuit of learning. As an interlude he ran away and enlisted, a strange proceeding, as he had a horror of warfare. However, this freak soon came to an end, and shortly after we find Coleridge engrossed in a scheme for the reformation of the human race. The scheme bore the high-sounding term—Pantisocracy; and was communistic in essence. Kindred souls alone were to be admitted, while the scene of action selected was the backwoods of America. Southey participated in this scheme, which soon fell through when it came down to the sordid matter of ways and means.

In the spring of 1796, through the assistance of his friend Cottle, he published his first volume, Poems on Various Subjects, a volume curiously stiff and turgid in form for a poet who was to shape so soon as a pioneer of the simple style. Twelve months later he met William Wordsworth at the village of Racedown in Dorsetshire, a memorable encounter that proved the beginning of a memorable friendship.

The stimulus of Wordsworth's companionship helped to mature his poetic genius, and the sympathetic intelligence of Dorothy Wordsworth also had the happiest effect upon the young poet's imagination.

Dorothy Wordsworth had been impressed from the first by Coleridge's genius and attractive personality, and in 1845 we are told, across the mists of nearly half a century, she, as well as her brother, retained the liveliest possible image of Coleridge on his arrival at Racedown; how he did not keep to the high road but leapt over a gate and bounded down the pathless field by which he cut off an angle. And at the time she thus recorded her first impression of the visitor:

"He is a wonderful man. His conversation teems with soul, mind, and spirit. Then he is so benevolent, so good-tempered and cheerful, and like William. At first I thought him very plain, that is for about three minutes. . . . His eye is large and full and not very dark, but grey—such an eye as would receive from a heavy soul the duldest expression, but it speaks every emotion of his animated mind. It has more of the poet's eye in a fine frenzy rolling, than I have ever witnessed. He has fine dark eyebrows and an overhanging forehead."

His marriage in 1795 to Sarah Fricker did not prove a happy one. It was the old story of incompatibility of temperament. Coleridge was a difficult man to get on with; erratic, indolent, and unbusinesslike; his wife felt keenly these deficiencies, and had not sufficient sympathy or imagination to see the better side of the man, or to realise what judicious management might effect.

About this time Coleridge had thoughts of entering the Unitarian ministry, and it was on the occasion of his preaching in the Unitarian Chapel at Shrewsbury that Hazlitt first heard him. Hazlitt's enthusiasm found expression in one of his best papers, and although years brought a measure of disenchantment, nothing ever quite dissipated that enthralment that the poet seemed to cast over all with whom he came into contact. Soon after this, however, Coleridge's religious opinions underwent a change, and in 1807 he was described as a fully developed Trinitarian. Probably the study of German philosophy contributed largely to this change. In other matters also, a conservative reaction set in; for his Revolutionary enthusiasm died away, and he threw in his lot with the Tory politicians.

Meanwhile the Lyrical Ballads, the fruit of a walking tour in North Devon with Wordsworth, had brought the two poets fame. But early in the new century the poet's health broke down, and as a solace for the physical pain that racked him, he had recourse to opium. "It acted," he said, "like a charm, like a miracle. I recovered the use of my limbs, of my appetite, of my spirits, and this continued for nearly a fortnight. At length the usual stimulus subsided, the complaints returned, the supposed remedy was resorted to, but"—adds the poet solemnly—"I need not go through the dreary history."

The slavery had now begun. The tyranny of opium spread its dark shadow over the remainder of Coleridge's life. He has given us some account of his state of mind in the pathetic Ode to Dejection, from which I quote a few lines:

"There was a time when, though my path was rough,
This joy within me dallied with distress,
And all misfortunes were but as the stuff
Whence Fancy made me dreams of happiness."

But now afflictions bow me down to earth,
Nor care I that they rob me of my mirth,
But O, each visitation
Suspends what Nature gave me at my birth,
My shaping spirit of imagination."

In a letter written about this time he says:

"You bid me rouse myself. Go, bid a man paralytic in both arms, to rub them briskly together and that will cure him."

His friends did break him off the habit for a time; but he suffered so dreadfully as to say it was better to die than to endure his present sufferings. But the effort was persisted in. From time to time his health improved for a short space, and something of the old gaiety returned—and he was very amused at the theory advanced by one of his friends that the cause of his ill was not opium but Satanic power. His general attitude was one of melancholy, sometimes terrible in its self-abasement. To one friend who had been very kind to him he wrote thus:

"DEAR SIR,—For I am unworthy to call any good man friend—accept my entreaties for your forgiveness and prayers. Conceive a poor miserable wretch, who for many years has been attempting to beat off pain, to a constant recurrence to the vice that reproduces it. Conceive a spirit in Hell, employed in tracing out for others, the road to that heaven from which his crimes exclude him. In short, conceive whatever is most wretched, hopeless and hopeless, and you will form as tolerable a notion of my state, as it is possible for a good man to have. I used to think the text in St. James, that 'he who offended in one point, offends in all,' very harsh, but I now feel the awful, the tremendous truth of it. In the one crime of opium, what crime have I not made myself guilty of—ingratitude to my Maker, and to my benefactors—injustice and unnatural cruelty to my children, self contempt for my rejected promise—bribe, nay, too often falsehood. After my death I earnestly entreat that a full and unqualified narrative of my wretchedness and of its guilty cause may be made public, that at least some little good may be effected by my direful example."

What more terribly pathetic letter was ever penned by a man of genius. His health was consequently on a perpetual see-saw, and although his imaginative powers, excited to additional brilliance by the narcotic, flamed out at intervals, his power of concentration seemed growing weaker and weaker. A voyage to Malta and Italy effected little good. It is true that his intellectual powers were brilliant enough, but with an inability to fix his mind upon any consecutive piece of work, this availed him little. His fine intelligence, like a rudderless boat, drifted hither and thither on the stream of every passing emotion. Urged on by his friends, he started a course of lectures in London, which, though broken by ill-health and its usual attendants, achieved much success. A subsequent course on Shakespeare seems to have been even more striking. These lectures were delivered extemporaneously, and only fragmentary records exist of them. Coleridge began one of his lectures thus: "The lecture I am about to give you this evening is purely extemporary. Should you find a nominative case looking out for a verb or a fatherless verb for nominative case, you must excuse it." He spoke for nearly two hours and fascinated his audience by his eloquence of thought and expression.

In 1819, depressed by misunderstandings with his friends, and worried by the usual want of money, he received a fresh blow by the expulsion of his son Hartley, on the score of intemperance, from his Oxford Fellowship. The scholastic success and brilliant promise of his boy had always been a joy and pride to Coleridge. He saw in his degradation the inheritance of his own weakness of will. His health became worse, and he plunged yet more deeply into the solace offered by his grisly comforter. From this date until his death in July 1834 he never regained his health, except for brief intervals. The tortures of conscience, however, and the harsh but often salutary admonition of friends, helped to keep the opium habit within bounds, although it had affected his constitution far too deeply to admit of any permanent recovery, or of any complete emancipation. His days of literary work were now things of the past. It was as a talker, and one of the most marvellous that ever lived, that he is noted during the last ten years of his life. His reputation and his attractive personality brought to Highgate some of the first minds of the day. On those famous Highgate Thursdays men crowded to hear him speak in his strange chanting voice, on every conceivable subject. From 1830 till his death in 1834, he was practically confined to a sick-room. Harriet Martineau and Emerson sought him about this time. Despite his long rambling monologues, and the impossibility of engaging him in connected conversation, for his intellect invariably shot off into some meteoric display on its own account, despite this, he fascinated all hearers. Miss Martineau, whose way of thinking, and whose mental temperament was at the opposite pole to that of Coleridge, wrote, "His eyes were as wonderful as they were ever represented to be, light grey, and actually glittering. I am glad to have seen his weird face, and heard his dreamy voice." Even Carlyle, who humorously grieved in characteristic caustic fashion that in listening to Coleridge you "swam and fluttered in the mistiest, wide, unintelligible deluge of things for most part, in rather profitless, uncomfortable manner," yet admitted that "glorious islets at times rose out of the haze." "Balmy, sunny islets of the blost and the intelligible; and that eloquent, artistically expressive words you always had."

In the summer of 1834, Coleridge felt that he was dying.

"I am dying," he said pathetically, "but without expectation of a speedy release. Is it not strange that very recently bygone images and scenes of early life have stolen into my mind like breezes blown from the spice islands of youth and hope—those twin realities of the phantom world? I do not add love, but what is love but youth and hope embracing and seen as one?"

On the evening before his death he dictated to his friend, Mr. Green, portions of his Religious Philosophy, till gradually articulation became difficult: he fell into a state of unconsciousness, and a few hours later passed quietly away.

"He was the most wonderful man that I have ever known," faltered Wordsworth when he heard of his death. Such a tribute coming from a man always diary of praise, and never prone to gush, is certainly significant. Various views are held as to Coleridge's place as a thinker: there is unanimity about his remarkable personality.

Richly imaginative, subtly humorous, acutely discerning, with a genius for friendship no less than for letters, he left an ineffaceable impression upon all with whom he came into contact. Notwithstanding his infirmities of character, he was essentially a great man. Lamb's happy dictum was not the extravagant hyperbole of a partial friend, but the appraisement of a true critic, when he called him "an Archangel—slightly damaged."

HIS WORK

The claims of Coleridge to a niche in the temple of poetic genius rest on a tenuous body of verse, the production of six short years. For the remaining thirty it is as an adventurer in other realms of literature that he must be appraised. With these aspects of his work we are not concerned here. It is Coleridge as one of the great poets of Romanticism that compels our immediate attention.

The first impulse towards expression in poetry came with the chance reading of the Sonnets of Bowles: it stirred within him that rich and ardent delight in natural beauty that had always been his dowry, and of which he now became, for the first time, self-conscious as an artist.

His early experimental work merely shows us a young man of versatile intellect and highly sensitive imagination, with ill-regulated power of expression. Republican ideals claimed him for a brief space—briefer even than in the case of Wordsworth—but his political sonnets, turgid in quality, are interesting only so far as they show the intellectual influence of Priestley and Godwin. Social radicalism, however, never struck firm roots in his nature, and of far more importance in his earlier mental history is the influence of metaphysics.

Nominally an Unitarian, his religious philosophy is largely Pantheistic, and his Theism has little in common with the matter-of-fact Unitarian thought of his day. Attracted towards large monistic theories of life, he is fascinated by mystics like Boehme and Plotinus, and such philosophers as Spinoza, Hartley, and Berkeley appealed powerfully to his speculative imagination.

His spiritual interpretation of the universe, coupled with a rich yet delicate appreciation of the beauties of the physical world, may be traced in his verse at this period, in The Song of the Pines (1793); the Lines on an Autumnal Evening; Lewti (1794), especially in Religious Musings (1794–1796). His Fall of Robespierre is quite unimportant as a piece of literature, though here and in some of the Religious Musings the revolutionary ardour, always more idealistic than concrete, breaks out in vaguely rhetorical expression.

The first period ends with the rupture of his early intimacy with Southey, and in the memorable meeting with Wordsworth.

In the second period, the intimacy with Wordsworth and with his sister Dorothy bears its first fruits in the odes To the Departing Year, and To France. This abandonment of his youthful social ideals is celebrated here with a fire, passion, and freedom of expression hitherto lacking in his work, the scenery round Stowey moving him more profoundly than his former scenic surroundings. Probably the subtler charm of his fresh nature pieces, The Lime Tree Bower, Frost at Midnight, Fears in Solitude (1797–8), is due more to the influence of his new friends than to any greater appeal in the environment. But the full flowering of his genius—this was only the blossom time—came (in 1797–8), with The Ancient Mariner, Christabel (1797–1800), and Kubla Khan (1798). Of these poems, Kubla Khan is only an exquisite dream fragment. The other two exhibit the highest power of Coleridge as a poet; and Coleridge at his highest has no rival even among his great contemporaries. To have written one of these poems alone would have brought him within the small circle of supreme makers of verse. Each of its kind is unique. After Christabel the poet never reached the heights again, though a few minor pieces survive of his later writings, dealing with Dejection, Love and Hope, that show some measure of his ancient cunning. It was not a decline of poetic power, as in Wordsworth's case, but an arrest of poetic power, of creative imagination. His imagination was as rich as ever, his intellect as restless and keen, but they sought expression in channels other than those of verse.

This sudden drying up of the fount of poetry has been attributed by many critics to defects of character, especially infirmity of will. That infirmity of will had much to do with the chaotic and fragmentary character of his later work cannot be gainsaid, that it explains his abandonment of poetry I do not believe. The peculiar character of his poetic inspiration, its sudden outbursts, its dreamlike character, the mysterious way in which it would come and go, leaving him unable to complete what he had begun, those things suggest something that might well visit a youthful imagination, and then, when the flush of youth and youth's sensibility had passed, itself melt away. "This wind bloweth where it listeth . . ." The quality of Coleridge's poetic genius does not suggest long life, it is like a superb sunrise that is bound by the laws of its being to fade into the light of common day, for it draws its sustenance from the mysterious half lights, the meeting of night and morning, and with the dissipation of nocturnal mysteries its magic is weakened and dissipated.

There are two outstanding characteristics in the poet's work, the first a psychical, the second an intellectual quality. The psychical element lies in its pervading sense of mystery; the intellectual, in the crystalline simplicity with which this sense of mystery is expressed.

A love of mystery was, as we have seen, a dominant feature of romantic story telling, from Horace Walpole and Mrs Radcliffe down to Sir Walter Scott. It led its earlier votaries into the dim recesses of mediævalism, where the wealth of superstition, and the robust excitement of stirring adventures furnished copious material for the mystery maker. But if we compare the supernaturalism of Walpole and Mrs Radcliffe with that of Coleridge, we realise in a moment the difference between the maker of horrors and the maker of horror. These romancers were not charlatans, their sense of mystery, though not delicate and subtle, was genuine enough so far as it went. But they mistook its manifestations; they felt bound to give their mysteries a "local habitation and a name," nor stayed to remember that the infiniteness they strove so vigorously to banish lay at the source of its magic; and that by subtle suggestion, not by crude description, do you create the atmosphere.

Coleridge does not use the spells of mediævalism as so many stage properties, he absorbs them into himself, and they reappear rarely distilled and inextricably blended with the poet's exquisite perception of the mysteries that surround the commonplace things of everyday life. If we survey the content of The Ancient Mariner, its amazing comprehensiveness will strike us, no less than its imaginative power. Every phase of landscape, seascape, and cloudscape is touched upon, from the quiet scenery of an English woodland to the lurid scenery of the tropics. The poet touches with equal power and beauty every phase of life at sea—the ship flying before the freshening gale, the torrid fierceness of the stagnant waters, the freezing cold of the Arctic region, the horrors of the becalmed passage, the blessedness of the welcome rain, the clear sky, the storm cloud, the great sea fog, the incarnate fury of the storm, the soothing peace of the temperate seas, the loneliness of the great ocean, and the welcome sight of familiar landmarks once again as the mariner views the peaceful English harbour, and over the whole poem there is that strangeness and remoteness even when describing simple ordinary things, that marks the highest Romantic art. With that supreme art which ever seems artless, so simple and spontaneous are its methods, Coleridge gives us glimpses from time to time of the wedding feast to which the Mariner had been bidden—a ballad within a ballad, and how effective the contrast between the innocent merriments of the bridal feast from which the Guest has been detained and the tragic anguish of the mysterious Mariner's tale:

"The sun came up upon the left,
Out of the sea came he!
And he shone bright, and on the right
Went down into the sea
Higher and higher every day,
Till over the mast at noon—
The Wedding-Guest here beat his breast,
For he heard the loud hurrahs
The bride hath paced into the hall,
Red as a rose is she,
Nodding their heads before her goes
The merry minstrelsy
The Wedding-Guest he beat his breast,
Yet he cannot choose but hear,
And thus spake on that ancient man,
The bright-eyed Mariner"

The whole poem is wrought with the colour and glamour of the Middle Ages. From the quaint embroideries of the "merry minstrelsy" to the central pattern of the Catholic idea of penance; everywhere we see the mediæval touch—the fateful cross-bow, the vesper bell, the shriving hermit, the invocation to "Mary Queen." Yet there is no slavish attempt to reproduce another age. The voyage itself is not such a voyage as mediæval mariners were wont to make. The voyage, whatever use the poet may have made of Shelvocke's Voyages, with its story of a black albatross, is in essence created out of "such stuff as dreams are made on." It is the ethereal and subtle fancy of a great poet, "the baseless fabric of a vision." We do not know even if the weird scenes that the Mariner describes were actual occurrences or mere phantasmagoria, the product of his heated and distorted imagination. The poet leaves it splendidly vague, as it should be left. All we do realise is the spell of the story, the horrors of the lonely seafarer, the dreadful effect on the Mariner of the ghostly sights and sounds. The Mariner himself gathers up into his person the elements of romance, mesmeric and haunting in his compelling power, mysterious and awe-inspiring in appearance, with his glittering eye, his skinny hand, his arresting voice, and the spiritual misery that drives him into speech to ease his tortured soul.

The supernaturalism of the poem is no matter of stage-lighting as with "Monk" Lewis; of hysterical declamation as with Mrs Radcliffe; of scenic accessories as with Scott, it is an atmosphere that suffuses the entire tale; the outcome of a hundred delicate touches and subtle hints, made convincing to the reader by the profound psychological insight of the poet.

Note the masterly skill with which we are prepared for the spiritual horror.

"Down dropt the breeze, the sails dropt down,
'Twas sad as sad could be,
And we did speak only to break
The silence of the sea!"

The nerves are overwrought by the dreadful silence, then comes the physical strain of the parched system

"Water, water everywhere,
And all the boards did shrink;
Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink"

The stagnant waters with their myriad putrescent life, the intolerable waiting for the calm to break and then, when mind and body were broken down, the appearance of the phantom ship

As the spectral horrors multiply, the poet reproduces for us with the imaginative fidelity of the great artist, those little pictures of sunrise and sunset, and the quiet beauty of the moonlight night, that give additional power to the strange and fearful sights.

"The sun's run dips; the stars rush out,
At one stroke comes the dark,

"The moving Moon went up the sky,
And nowhere did abide;
Softly she was going up,
And a star or two beside—"

Nowhere in our literature is the benison of sleep to the tired, racked spirit suggested with more moving power than in these lines:

" Oh sleep ! it is a gentle thing,
Beloved from pole to pole !
To Mary Queen the praise be given !
She sent the gentle sleep from Heaven,
That slid into my soul "

During sleep the spell is broken, and the long-hoped-for thing comes to pass .

" And when I awoke it rained."

The phantasmagoria melt away, the elements attune the watcher to the welcome change, while the very boat shares in the peaceful aftermath .

" . . . the sails made on
A pleasant noise till noon,
A noise like of a hidden brook
In the leafy month of June,
That to the sleeping woods all night
Singeth a quiet tune "

Yet wild as the story is, with its mediæval superstitions and irresponsible happenings, it is not only made actual and vital to our imagination by its faithful picture of Nature, and its psychological insight, but by the simple humanity with which it is saturated. Interwoven with the strange and recondite are the primal emotions of love, hate, pain, remorse, and hope.

" He prayeth best who loveth best " is no moral tag at the close of a fine descriptive poem, but the summing up in a few lines of the spirit with which the entire poem is charged, an intimate kinship with all " happy living things "

So far we have dwelt more particularly on the psychical aspects of the poem, it remains to note the technical beauty of the work, with its simple clarity and artless art.

The homely diction of mediæval balladry is reproduced with a skill greater than that even of Scott :

" Day after day, day after day
We stuck . "

" Alone, alone, all, all alone,
Alone on a wide, wide sea "

" The sun came up upon the left,
Out of the sea came he,
And he shone bright and on the right
Went down into the sea "

" I moved and could not feel my limbs,
I was so light—almost
I thought that I had died in sleep
And was a blessed ghost "

All the resources of the old ballad metro are used by the poet, yet never overdone, for instance, the effective medial rhymes and the trick of alliteration .

" The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow followed free—"

The ballad habit of repetition :

" With throats unslaked, with black lips baked,
We could not laugh nor wail," &c
" With throats unslaked, with black lips baked,
Agape they heard me call."

" The seraph band each waved his hand,
It was a heavenly sight," &c

" The seraph band each waved his hand,
No voice did they impart," &c.

A besetting sin with the Romantic poet is the abuse of archaic terms. Chatterton was the great sinner here ; but Keats in his earlier work is nearly as bad. Coleridge, with finer instinct, just gives an occasional archaism to preserve the mediæval atmosphere :

" Eftsoons his hand dropt he "

" And, by the holy rood "

" And now all in my own cuntrye."

" A certain shape, I wist."

Thus all the simple beauty of the old ballad is imparted with none of its extravagances, while with the mediævalism he blends the modern spirit, so as to convey a more moving magic to the reader to-day.

Where, in The Ancient Mariner, Coleridge reproduces for us the old ballad form, in Christabel he goes to the metrical romance, and uses variations of the octosyllabic couplet, variations introduced deliberately to harmonise with the " nature of the imagery or passion " . In sheer artistic power the poem is scarcely inferior to The Ancient Mariner, where it yields precedence is in its more limited appeal and more circumscribed milieu. Whether it be taken as an allegory or merely as another excursion into the dim dream-world of fantasy, its beauty and magic are indisputable.

Once again we are in a mediæval atmosphere ; there is the old moated castle with its feudal accompaniments of heralds and pages, with its massive gate " ironed within and without ", we have the witch woman with the evil spell and the innocent victim, hints of the tourney. This poem is a fantasia on the elemental theme of good and evil, light and darkness, set in the appropriate key of moonlight and nocturnal mystery. The precise character of Geraldine, how far she was evil ; the nature of her spell, the reason for its failure ; such matters are left as vague and indefinite as the flickering shadows cast by the great fireplace in the hall. Nor does it really matter. The essential point is that the poet triumphantly suggests the eeriness and remote horror of the scene without having recourse to any elaborate machinery.

The note is struck in the opening lines :

" 'Tis the middle of night by the castle clock,
And the owls have awakened the crowing cock,
Tu-whit !—Tu-whoo !
And hark, again ! the crowing cock,
How drowsily it crew

Sir Leoline, the Baron rich,
Hath a toothless mastiff bitch,
From her kennel beneath the rock
She maketh answer to the clock,
Four for the quarters, and twelve for the hour ;
Ever and aye, by shine and shower,
Sixteen short howls, not over loud,
Some say, she sees my lady's shroud.

Is the night chilly and dark ?
The night is chilly, but not dark
The thin grey cloud is spread on high,
It covers but not hides the sky
The moon is behind, and at the full ;
And yet she looks both small and dull.
The night is chill, the cloud is gray—
'Tis a month before the month of May,
And the Spring comes slowly up this way."

Just as in The Ancient Mariner, the diction is homely and simple ; you are conscious of no effort to make the flesh creep ; yet every touch tells. You feel the oppressive silence, the ominous loneliness, the Powers of Darkness are abroad; whatever light there is shrinks and dwindles, the firelight in the hall dies down, while in the chamber of Christabel "the silver lamp burns dead and dim."

The first part of the poem is flawless, the second part, for all its passages of beauty and tenderness, is in another key. The earlier mood has been forgotten; time has elapsed since the unfinished poem was put aside. Other interests have crowded upon the poet's mind, and it is obvious that he cannot recapture the elusive charm of the midnight scene. Yet the second part of Christabel abounds in noble lines and lovely images, and one could ill spare it on this account.

The fine passage:

"Alas! they had been friends in youth;
But whispering tongues can poison truth;
And constancy lives in realms above;
And life is thorny, and youth is vain;
And to be wroth with one we love
Doth work like madness in the brain.
And thus it chanced, as I divine,
With Roland and Sir Leoline,
Each spake words of high disdain
And insult to his heart's best brother:
They parted—ne'er to meet again!
But never either found another
To soothe the hollow heart from pining—
They stood aloof, the scars remaining,
Like cliffs which had been rent asunder;
A dreary sea now flows between!"

touches a note of poignant personal emotion rare in the work of Coleridge.

Individual as his Nature poetry is, with a subtlety and delicacy rarely found in Wordsworth, yet undoubtedly he was influenced by his friend, and a comparison of the scenic touches in his earlier work and in his work after he had known Wordsworth, shows an intensity of affection and an accuracy of perception not to be explained away merely in terms of poetic development. Wordsworth's power of idealising the commonplace had impressed him. Wordsworth had shown the wonder of ordinary sights and sounds, it remained for Coleridge to exhibit their mystery.

His supreme strength lay in his marvellous dream faculty; one might add that the dream faculty lay at the root of his greatness as a poet and his weakness as a man. But there is no finer dreamer in English verse, this quality it is that gives distinction to The Ancient Mariner and Christabel, and makes of Kubla Khan so superb a triumph. His plays are not interesting, and despite the flashes of beauty in Remorse and Zapolya, it is quite clear that the medium is uncongenial to his powers.

Several of his briefer poems—Love, and The Dark Ladie, Youth and Age—have grace and tenderness, and touches of personal emotion; but his reputation as a poet will rest on The Ancient Mariner, Christabel, and Kubla Khan: to have written these is to touch the heights of poetry, and to mingle with the great immortals.

YOUTH AND AGE

Verse, a breeze mid blossoms straying,
Where Hope olung feeding, like a bee—
Both were mine! Life went a-maying
With Nature, Hope and Poesy,
When I was young!

When I was young!—Ah, woeful When!
Ah! for the change 'twixt Now and Then!
This breathing house not built with hands,
This body that does me grievous wrong,
O'er very cliffs and glittering sands,
How lightly then it flashed along—
Like those trim skiffs, unknown of yore,
On winding lakes and rivers wide,
That ask no aid of sail or oar,
That fear no spite of wind or tide!
Nought cared this body for wind or weather
When Youth and I lived in't together.

Flowers are lovely, Love is flower-like;
Friendship is a sheltering tree;
O! the joys, that came down shower-like,
Of Friendship, Love, and Liberty,
Ere I was old.

Ere I was old? Ah! woeful Ere,
Which tells me, Youth's no longer here!
O Youth! for years so many and sweet,
'Tis known, that Thou and I were one,
I'll think it but a fond conceit—
It cannot be that Thou art gone!
Thy vesper-bell hath not yet toll'd—
And thou wert aye a masker bold!
What strange disguise hast now put on,
To make believe, that thou art gone?
I see these locks in silvery slips,
This drooping gait, this altered size
But Spring-tide blossoms on thy lips,
And tears take sunshine from thine eyes!
Life is but thought, so think I will
That Youth and I are house-mates still.

Dew-drops are the gems of morning,
But the tears of mournful eve!
Where no hope is, life's a warning
That only serves to make us grieve,
When we are old:

That only serves to make us grieve
With oft and tedious taking leave,
Like some poor nigh-related guest,
That may not rudely be dismissed,
Yet hath outstay'd his welcome while
And tells the jest without the smile.

KUBLA KHAN

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree:
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And there were gardens bright with sinuous rills,
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
And here were forests ancient as the hills,
Emfolding sunny spots of greenery.

But oh! that deep romantic chasm which slanted
Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!
A savage place! as holy and enchanted
As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted
By woman wailing for her demon-lover!
And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,
As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,
A mighty fountain momently was forced:
Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst
Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding hail,
Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail:
And 'mid these dancing rocks at once and ever
It flung up momently the sacred river.
Five miles meandering with a mazy motion
Through wood and dale the sacred river ran,
Then reached the caverns measureless to man,
And sank in tumult to a lifeless ocean,
And 'mid this tumult Kubla heard from far
Ancestral voices prophesying war!

The shadow of the dome of pleasure
 Floated midway on the waves,
 Where was heard the mingled measure
 From the fountain and the caves
 It was a miracle of rare device,
 A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!

A dæmzel with a dulcimer
 In a vision once I saw:
 It was an Abyssinian maid,
 And on her dulcimer she played,
 Singing of Mount Abora
 Could I revive within me
 Her symphony and song,
 To such a deep delight 'twould win me,
 That with music loud and long,
 I would build that dome in air,
 That sunny dome! those caves of ice!
 And all who heard should see them there,
 And all should cry, Beware! Beware!
 His flashing eyes, his floating hair!
 Weave a circle round him thrice,
 And close your eyes with holy dread,
 For he on honey-dew hath fed,
 And drunk the milk of Paradise.

ROBERT SOUTHEY (1774-1843)

Robert Southey, at one time closely associated both in friendship and reputation with Wordsworth and Coleridge, is now practically a spent force in literature. Wordsworth and Coleridge live on as an inspiration, but Southey's writings have no following. Yet he played no small part in the literary history of the Romantic Revival, and a portion of his work at any rate merits the consideration of the literary student.

Born at Bristol of good middle-class stock, Southey was educated at Westminster and Balliol, Oxford. His earliest adventure was to marry without any prospect of a livelihood, and it was fortunate for him that his friend Charles Wynn made him an annuity of £100. A short sojourn in Portugal as a young man gave him a taste for the literature of the South, and he devoted his life to the pursuit of letters.

A thrifty and careful man, he lived for forty years at Greta Hall, near Keswick, and not only managed to live in tolerable comfort but to bring together a fine library, support a large family, and look after the children of his more brilliant and far more orratic brother-in-law, "S T C". In 1814 he had been made Poet Laureate, and he did good, solid work, poorly paid, for the Quarterly Review. For some time before his death, like Scott, his mind had been deranged.

HIS WORK

His best verse was written in early life, and in the last few years of the eighteenth century. True to the fashion of the times, he turned his hand to ballad work, and his contribution here, if less attractive than Scott's, is certainly distinctive and original. The grotesqueries of German romance he could achieve with success; and he had the genuine gift of comic exaggeration that gave rise to a form of writing which probably inspired Barham's Ingoldsby Legends. His irregular metres had freshness and raciness, there is plenty of life, if little beauty, about such pieces as The Old Woman of Berkeley, there is humour and character about such ballads as St. Michael's Chair, while The Devil's Walk (originally published in the Morning Post as The Devil's Thoughts) is a breezy, effective, "ding-dong chime."

He had a turn for comedy of a rough and ready kind, and it is a pity that in his long epic narrative he kept it so severely in check. Of the Epics, Thalaba, the Destroyer (1801), The Curse of Kehama (1810), there is little to say. It is not that they are ill written, but they are lifeless. There is no transforming touch of high imagination about them. Scott, Byron, Shelley, and Keats, one and all have written cruder verse, but their worst verse has some redeeming touch that Southey's lacks: Thalaba is a good journeyman's work, and that is all that one can say about it. No doubt the methodical and too temperate soul of Southey was ill suited to an Eastern subject. No amount of industry can take the place of passion; nor scholarly care the office of the imagination. Yet the poem impressed his contemporaries, and from it Shelley borrowed his irregular blank metre in Queen Mab.

Better than this is The Curse of Kehama, where there is rhyme that falls more graciously on the ear than did the unrhymed Pindarics of Thalaba. But the story, for all its occasional picturesque strength, has little grip. Nor is the reason far to seek, for Southey is but following a literary convention of the time in thus trafficking with Orientalism, and has little temperamental sympathy with it. There was more Orientalism in Beckford's little finger than in Southey's whole body.

Don Roderick is the best of the epics, from the standpoint of the humanities, for Southey had really seized hold of the poetical spirit of the Peninsula, or at any rate an appreciable part of it.

His Protestantism revolted against the theology of the South, with which he had as little sympathy as with the quietism of the East; but the chivalrous romance did touch his imagination. His cycle of Spanish songs, The Chronicle of the Cid, is a spirited piece of work, while in Don Roderick (1814) he told a stirring story not merely with excellent zest, but with a power and sense of actuality too seldom found in his longer poems.

His early travels in Spain had impressed the scenery and Spanish ways of living upon his imagination, so that he had not to rely, as in his other epics, on merely bookish inspiration.

Southey's prose is better than his verse. Indeed the weaknesses of his verse became positive merits in the prose. The clear, even, business-like, unobtrusive style gives value to such subjects as The Life of Wesley, or that of Nelson. In many ways it is like the great prose of the eighteenth century, yet it falls below the level of the work of such prosemen as Addison, Defoe, or Swift, in its individual flavour: there is personality behind these, there is little personality in Southey's prose. He is at his best when purely objective. As soon as he comes forward himself he brings with him literary tricks culled from a score of sources—an affectation of Sterne, a flourish of Rabelais; and we sigh for the clear, straightforward manner in which, as a rule, his biographical studies were written.

Regarding his work as a whole, it may be said that it is like a vast stretch of tame-looking landscape with unexpected tracts here and there of sylvan charm and beauty, that the pamstaking pedestrian will light upon and the casual traveller overlook. The real failure of Southey's staying power, despite his scholarship, industry, good sense, and wholesome feeling, lies in the sterility of his imagination. It can send forth picturesque grafts, but it has no fructifying power, no depth, no reserve. His mind is stiff and unyielding, and if we compare his inveterate conservatism with that of Scott, or Wordsworth, we shall appreciate this lack of plasticity.

Southey's Toryism springs from a preference for jog-trot methods of perception, Wordsworth's from a repugnance of lawlessness. There is always strong, elemental passion at the back of Wordsworth's mind, though sternly kept in check. He is cool and cautious by self-discipline: Southey by temperament. Again, Scott's Toryism is suffused with a warm humanitarianism and a mellow geniality; Southey was not ungenial, but his sympathies are narrow in range and he had little insight into character. Yet, with all his imperfection and limitations, he upheld worthily the dignity of letters, left behind him some good verse and better prose, and proved, as his correspondence shows, an amiable, wise, and agreeable friend to such men as Wordsworth, Lamb, and Landor. To have held their friendship is no slight tribute to any man.

HIS BOOKS

My days among the Dead are past ;
Around me I behold,
Where'er these casual eyes are cast,
The mighty minds of old
My never-failing friends are they,
With whom I converse day by day.
With them I take delight in weal
And seek relief in woe,
And while I understand and feel
How much to them I owe,
My cheeks have often been bedew'd
With tears of thoughtful gratitude
My thoughts are with the Dead, with them
I live in long past years,
Their virtues love, their faults condemn,
Partake their hopes and fears,
And from their lessons seek and find
Instruction with an humble mind
My hopes are with the Dead, anon
My place with them will be,
And I with them will travel on Through all Futurity,
Yet leaving here a name, I trust,
That will not perish in the dust.

AFTER BLENHEIM

It was a summer evening,
Old Kaspar's work was done,
And he before his cottage door
Was sitting in the sun ;
And by him sported on the green
His little grandchild Wilhelmine.
She saw her brother Peterkin
Roll something large and round
Which he beside the rivulet
In playing there had found ;
He came to ask what he had found
That was so large and smooth and round.

Old Kaspar took it from the boy
Who stood expectant by ;
And then the old man shook his head,
And with a natural sigh,
" 'Tis some poor fellow's skull," said he,
" Who fell in the great victory."
" I find them in the garden,
For there's many here about ;
And often when I go to plough
The ploughshare turns them out.
For many thousand men," said he,
" Were slain in that great victory."
" Now tell us what 'twas all about,"
Young Peterkin he cries,
And little Wilhelmine looks up
With wonder-waiting eyes.
" Now tell us all about the war,
And what they fought each other for ?"
" It was the English," Kaspar cried,
" Who put the French to rout.
But what they fought each other for
I could not well make out
But everybody said," quoth he,
" That 'twas a famous victory."
" My father lived at Blenheim then,
Yon little stream hard by :
They burnt his dwelling to the ground.
And he was forced to fly -
So with his wife and child he fled,
Nor had he where to rest his head
" With fire and sword the country round
Was wasted far and wide,
And many a childing mother then
And newborn baby died
But things like that, you know, must be
At every famous victory
" They say it was a shocking sight
After the field was won ;
For many thousand bodies here
Lay rotting in the sun :
But things like that, you know, must be
After a famous victory
" Great praise the Duke of Marlboro' won
And our good Prince Eugene !"
" Why, 'twas a very wicked thing !"
Said little Wilhelmine,
" Nay . . . nay . . . my little girl," quoth he,
" It was a famous victory
" And everybody praised the Duke
Who this great fight did win "
" But what good came of it at last ?"
Quoth little Peterkin :—
" Why, that I cannot tell," said he,
" But 'twas a famous victory "

WESLEY AND OLD AGE

" Lord, let me not live to be useless ! " was the prayer which Wesley uttered after seeing one whom he had long known as an active and useful Magistrate, reduced by age to be " a picture of human nature in disgrace, feeble in body and mind, slow of speech and understanding " He was favoured with a constitution vigorous beyond that of ordinary men, and with an activity of spirit which is even rarer than his singular felicity of health and strength. Ten thousand cares of various kinds, he said, were no more weight or burden to his mind, than ten thousand hairs were to his head. But in truth his only cares were those of superintending the work of his ambition, which continually prospered under his hands. Real cares he had none ; no anxieties, no sorrows, no grief which touched him to the quick. His manner of life was the most favourable that could have been devised for longevity. He rose early, and lay down at night with nothing to keep him waking, or trouble him in sleep. His mind was always in a pleasurable and wholesome state of activity, he was temperate in his diet, and lived in perpetual locomotion; and frequent change of air is perhaps, of all things, that which most conduces to joyous health and long life.

The time which Mr. Wesley spent in travelling was not lost. "History, poetry, and philosophy," said he, "I commonly read on horseback, having other employment at other times." He used to throw the reins on his horse's neck; and in this way he rode, in the course of his life, above a hundred thousand miles, without any accident of sufficient magnitude to make him sensible of the danger which he incurred. His friends, however, saw the danger; and in the sixty-ninth year of his age they prevailed upon him to travel in a carriage, in consequence of a hurt which had produced a hydrocele. The ablest practitioners in Edinburgh were consulted upon his case, and assured him there was but one method of cure. "Perhaps but one natural one," says he, "but I think God has made more than one method of healing either the soul or the body." He read upon the subject a treatise which recommends a soton or a caustic, "but I am not inclined," said he, "to try either of them. I know a physician that has a shorter cure than either one or the other." After two years, however, he submitted to an operation, and obtained a cure. A little before this, he notices in his Journal the first night that he had ever lain awake, "I believe," he adds, "few can say this; in seventy years I never lost one night's sleep."

He lived to preach at Kingwood under the shade of trees which he had planted; and he outlived the lease of the Foundry, the place which had been the cradle of Methodism.¹

SAMUEL ROGERS

Samuel Rogers (1763-1855), like Southey and Tom Moore, occupied an important position among the men of letters of his day, and, like them, his literary influence was a transient one. He is inferior even to them as a creative force, but he had a sharp and caustic wit which made him an acquisition at social gatherings, and sufficient susceptibility to the romanticism of his time to give his verse the cachet of popularity. Original he certainly was not, and in poetry he shapes as a versatile and clever imitator of the various literary fashions which had taken the literary world by storm. He could be Byronic in mild fashion, as his narrative poem, Italy, testifies, just as earlier he could reproduce the tricks of the didactic eighteenth-century poet in his Pleasures of Memory.

A wealthy man and a generous host, he played no small part as patron of literary genius.

THE SLEEPING BEAUTY

Sleep on, and dream of Heaven awhile—
Thou shut so close thy laughing eyes,
Thy rosy lips still wear a smile
And move, and breathe delicious sighs!

Ah, now soft blushes tinge her cheeks
And mantle o'er her neck of snow.
Ah, now she murmurs, now she speaks
What most I wish—and fear to know!

She starts, she trembles, and she weeps!
Her fair hands folded on her breast
—And now, how like a saint she sleeps!
A seraph in the realms of rest!

Sleep on secure! Above controul
Thy thoughts belong to Heaven and thee;
And may the secret of thy soul
Remain within its sanctuary!

A WISH

Mine be a cot beside the hill,
A bee-hive's hum shall soothe my ear;
A willowy brook that turns a mill,
With many a fall shall linger near.

The swallow, oft, beneath my thatch
Shall twitter from her clay built nest;
Oft shall the pilgrim lift the latch,
And share my meal, a welcome guest.

Around my ivied porch shall spring
Each fragrant flower that drinks the dew;
And Lucy, at her wheel, shall sing
In russet gown and apron blue.

The village-church among the trees,
Where first our marriage-vows were given,
With merry peals shall swell the breeze
And point with taper spire to Heaven.

THE PLEASURES OF MEMORY

Down by yon hazel copse, at evening, blazed
The gypsy's fagot—there we stood and gazed;
Gazed on her sunburnt face with silent awe,
Her tattered mantle and her hood of straw;
Her moving lips, her cauldron brimming o'er;
The drowsy brood that on her back she bore,
Imps in the barn with mourning owlets bred,
From rised roost at nightly revel fed—
Whose dark eyes flashed through locks of blackest shade
When in the breeze the distant watch-dog bayed.
And hero's fled the sibyl's muttered call,
Whose elfin prowess scaled the orchard wall
As o'er my palm the silver piece she drew,
And traced the line of life with searching view,
How throbbed my fluttering pulse with hopes and fears,
To learn the colour of my future years.

AN ITALIAN SONG

Dear is my little native vale,
The ring-dove builds and murmurs there;
Close by my cot she tells her tale
To every passing villager.

The squirrel leaps from tree to tree,
And shells his nuts at liberty.

In orange groves and myrtle bowers,
That breathe a gale of fragrance round,
I charm the fairy-footed hours
With my loved lute's romantic sound;
Or crown of living laurel weave
For those that win the race at eve.

The shepherd's horn at break of day,
The ballet danced in twilight glade,
The canzonet and roundelay
Sung in the silent greenwood shade;
These simple joys that never fail,
Shall bind me to my native vale.

Among the crowd of minor and for the most part imitative romanticists are Mrs. H. MANS (1793-1835), picturesque, melodious, and facile, and the two MONTGOMERYS, JAMES (1771-1854), and ROBERT (1807-1855). Robert is perhaps the better known name, thanks to the notoriety he attained through Macaulay's slashing attack; but James was the better poet, with many of Mrs. Hemans' qualities set in a more sober, humanitarian framework.

I. POETRY: (c) SIR WALTER SCOTT AND THE BALLAD MAKERS. Sir Walter Scott—Percy's Reliques—James Hogg ("Ettrick Shepherd")—Leyden—Tannahill—Allan Cunningham—Thomas Campbell—Thomas Moore.

SIR WALTER SCOTT

THE magic of the North, its rough tenderness, its elemental passion, its simple homeliness, its throbbing humanity, rich in laughter no less than in tears; these things had been revealed to Englishmen by the peasant poet, Burns. The intimate, everyday life of the poor Scot is seen through the strong and intense imagination of a great poet. It remained for Scott to exhibit the heroism and daring of the romantic past, thus completing the work of Burns, by tracing the sources and confluence of this pulsing life, and dwelling upon its rich heritage of legendary lore, and the splendour of glen and loch that had nursed its people, feeding the Scot with their own wild beauty.

Born on August 15, 1771, at Edinburgh, Walter Scott had as his birthplace a city alive with associations of Scottish greatness and glory. His father was a Writer to the Signet, his mother the daughter of a well-known physician; while his ancestry was intimately connected with Border warfare. As a child he was delicate and ailing, the result of an illness while still an infant, but his fragile physique at this time lent a more vivid life to his imaginative sensibilities.

At the age of three he was sent to his grandfather's farm in the valley of the Tweed, where he was lapped round with many romantic associations, and, while lying on the grass, he would eagerly absorb any tale told him by the shepherds of the life of the Border, and drink in the songs and legends taught him by his grandmother. Indeed, even at this early age, he is said to have sung so loudly a ballad of Hardicnut as to prevent the village minister from "being heard or hearing himself." On the improvement of his health he went to school at Edinburgh, where he became, he tells us, "an incorrigibly idle imp," good at Latin but excelling chiefly in climbing and fighting. When he was thirteen he became familiar with Percy's Reliques, while the romances of Tasso, and Spenser's Faerie Queene proved more congenial than ordinary book learning. Any old song that came in his way he would seize upon "like a tiger"; and from boyhood upwards he never tired of telling stories to his companions, with an aptitude only equalled by another great popular writer, Charles Dickens. Even when called to the Bar, in 1792, he proved a more promising story-teller than a lawyer, was a delightful, high-spirited companion, by no means averse to a skirmish with the authorities, and the first to begin a row, the last to end it. He was as a young man handsome, tall, and vigorous, and if more interested in literature than in law books, gained an experience in his father-in-law's office that served him in good stead in Redgauntlet.

During his youth, while he travelled from one farmhouse to another, he had gained an intimate knowledge of the by-ways of Scottish life, while his retentive memory seized upon every association, treasuring it up till he could make use of it as a literary artist. In 1802 we have the earliest results of his enthusiastic indulgence in the two volumes of Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border; but before that time he had been attracted to German romantic literature (1788), and had taken to translating German ballads. The influence of "Monk" Lewis must also be noted; while the friendship with that erratic but brilliant, gifted poet, James Hogg, began in 1799, and proved a lively inspiration for many years to come.

The Lay of the Last Minstrel, his first original work, appeared in 1805, and was followed by Marmion in 1808 and The Lady of the Lake (1810). Scott did not take his verse seriously, and upon someone asking his daughter if she had read the Lay, came the unexpected reply: "No, papa says there is nothing so bad for young people as reading bad poetry."

About this time Byron sprang into sudden fame with his Childe Harold, displaying in his poem many of the gifts which had made popular Scott's own verse. With his usual good sense and geniality, Scott recognised the superiority of his rival, and decided to give up verse-making since Byron had beaten him at his own game.

Money difficulties supervening, he harked round for another source of livelihood, and while looking for fishing tackle one day came across the manuscript of a half-finished story, Waverley. Better bait he had never lighted upon for tempting fish. The change of literary expression was by no means so marked as it seemed. He had always been a story-teller in verse rather than a lyric poet, he now became a story-teller in prose, using the same fount of inspiration; and it was quite clear that the new medium suited him better than the old, giving him greater elbow-room, and an opportunity for exhibiting his rich sense of broad imagery, that had found no outlet in verse. Waverley, first published anonymously in 1814, was followed by other stories of Scottish life: Guy Mannering, Rob Roy, The Antiquary, and Old Mortality. Indeed for the next sixteen years he held the stage of fiction, publishing twenty-nine stories in all. No other novelist, save Dickens, appealed to so wide a circle or more entirely captured the fancy of the day. When asked for his opinion of Waverley, Lord Holland said, "We did not one of us go to bed last night—nothing slept but my gout." Meanwhile, in 1812, he had built himself a characteristic dwelling-place, Abbotsford, in imitation of an old baronial castle, on the Tweed, near Melrose.

For the next few years he was successful both in life and letters, and Abbotsford became a Scottish Mecca. Happy in his friendships and his life, famous in his work, his existence seemed ideally satisfying, when, with tragic suddenness, came the collapse of his publisher and of his own fortune. With fine manliness of spirit, and splendid industry, he set to work to repair his fortune, but now he was no longer young, and his health was failing, so, although he managed to satisfy most of his creditors, the effort proved too great for his enfeebled body, and in 1832 he died, with the sound of the beloved Tweed in his ears, the music he loved best in all the world. At no time of his life were his great qualities of heart so manifest as in these last few years of struggle with adverse fate; we realise this in reading his pathetic Journal.

CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS WORK

(a) His Genius for Vitalising the Past—The quality most obvious in Scott's work, whether in prose or verse, is his genius for vitalising the past. His feudal home at Abbotsford was no literary affectation, as was Walpole's gimcrack affair at Strawberry Hill, but a genuine expression of the man's romantic mediæval spirit. He was born a storyteller, and had that delightful knack of improvisation which is the secret of all good story-telling.

Thus his best work has the spontaneity and ease of gossip by the fireside, for he was so saturated with old-time legends and his own associations that he exhaled them as movably as did his heather-clad hills exhale their fragrance.

Never did he see an old tower or a stream without instantly conjuring up its old-world associations. For him every common bush burned with the fire of romance. Dowered with this creative energy of imagination, he made the reader also feel the glamour of places and the actuality of the past. He could effect with an old legend what a great composer could with some folk-song. He could improvise round it a host of fantastic variations. A fluent and ready writer, his work suffered few corrections.

He compels our interest by no literary trick, but by making us feel that men and women of a past age were real live human beings. How does he manage this? By reason of his intuitive perception that the Scot of his own day was the product of the past, and organically connected with that past. Knowing his own peasantry with as intimate a knowledge as Burns, he makes the reader feel that his Dandie Dinmont, his Jeanie Deans, his Bailie, his Covenanters were no creations of other times, but might be found in modern dress in the Scotland of his own day.

Thus he welded together the past and present in a homogeneous whole, and shows us the spiritual continuity of history. Thus he makes manifest how the national type of character is the vital embodiment of centuries, and is evolved from countless customs and traditions. With this power, wherein we see the finer aspects of the conservative attitude of mind, he reconstructed Scottish Society, and looked with jealousy and fearful eye upon anything that threatened to sweep away some relic of the past. Hence his opposition to the French Revolution is readily understood, and is akin to Burke's, though Burke's was philosophically

Both men held that the "starch of tradition," to use one of George Eliot's phrases, was necessary to keep society together, and to ensure its well-being. Neither man saw through the merely destructive side of the Revolutionary movement, a wholesome and cleansing influence, that, despite incidental damage, would in the long run renovate society upon a saner and firmer basis.

If Scott exhibited something of the narrowness of the old Tory spirit, he had none of its exclusiveness and superciliousness. None loved the common people more than he, no man was tenderer to their weaknesses, more charitable in his sympathies.

The great failing of the eighteenth century, in its attitude towards the past, was its self-sufficiency. The chief idea of its great writers, when criticising the past, had been to compare it with the standards of the age, and if it did not conform with them to condemn. Little attempt was made to understand the standard of other times, and a ludicrous example of this spirit may be seen in dramatic performance, where Lady Macbeth appeared in hoops and the Greeks in crinolines. Abstract formulas interested them, not concrete embodiment of life. They were curious about theories of life, singularly incurious as to the drama of life. History for them was largely a peg for rhetorical generalities. What Scott did for history has been admirably expressed by Carlyle.

"These historical novels," testifies he, "have taught all men this truth, which looks like a truism, and yet was as good as unknown to the writers of history and others, till so taught that the bygone ages of the world were actually filled by living men, not by state papers, controversies, and abstractions of men. . . . It is a great service, fertile in consequence, that Scott has done, a great truth laid open by him."

Leaving aside for the most part the mystical aspects of mediævalism that attracted the German romancers and our own Coleridge, he fastened upon its showy and picturesque externals. He is a kind of mediæval reporter, fancifully detailing the spectacular effects of the time, and concerned chiefly with the colour, the variety, the bustling vigour of mediæval times. The inner life of the Middle Ages, as fashioned by the austere mystical soul of Dante, was alien to his vision. The ecclesiastics of Scott are no living symbols of strange, passionate faiths, but picturesque people, jolly or evil natured as the case might be, but with little demonic or saintly about them. It is quite true that he genuinely admired Gothic architecture, and the ritual of Catholicism, but he did so for its external impressiveness. He revelled in their possibilities of local colour, he was touched by the part they played in moulding human lives. But he viewed them always from the outside; they never seized upon his inner life as they did that of the German romancers. So he remained a staunch adherent of the English Church to the end of his life, and stoutly opposed Catholic Emancipation.

(b) His Love of the Earth.—Scott's passionate attachment for the past of his country is blended with his equally passionate attachment to its soil. Critics have spoken of his love of Nature, but the phrase suggests the transcendental affection felt by Wordsworth or Shelley, rather than the hearty concrete attachment of Scott. It was with him Earth worship, not Nature worship; and the Earth in particular of special localities, endeared to him by a hundred associations. This qualification differentiates his Earth worship from that of Meredith, which was general, cosmic, not specific and humanised. He loved his country's soil as a child loves, for its associations, and he told Washington Irving that if he did not see the heather once a year he thought he would die. Yet a beautiful landscape to him meant little without the human touch in it. Sanctify it with some legend or personal association, and he took it to his heart.

"O Caledonia! stern and wild,
Most nurse for a poetic child,
Land of brown heath and shaggy wood,
Land of the mountain and the flood,
Land of my sires! What mortal hand
Can e'er untie the filial band
That knits me to thy rugged strand"

His sense of beauty was sufficient to make him kindle at any fine scene, but when to this beauty was superadded some historical association, then the liking became a passion. "Show me," he said, "an old castle and a field of battle, and I was at home at once"

The names of places had a natural magic for him as they had for Lamb. Hence the definite concrete character of his romances. Most of his legendary stories he connects with particular names and places. That nebulous atmosphere of dateless climes loved by some romancers, Coleridge for instance, in his Christabel, and Keats in his La Belle Dame, was alien to Scott's nature. He was never happy till he could give his fantasies a geographical label. It is here that the individuality of Scott's romances, be they in prose or verse, differentiates him so clearly from other great names in the Revival of Romance. Wordsworth's romantic leanings, for instance, were entirely diffused and spiritual. He had small historical sense, and certainly no faculty for externalising a legend or a story. Given some historical association, Scott will revitalise the entire scene, using his power of scenic description to visualise more clearly the drama he is presenting. Wordsworth, on the other hand, as in his Incident of the Wars of the Roses, moralises and spiritualises the matter, caring little for the actual scene, much for what it symbolised.

To Wordsworth the pageant of the Middle Ages was a dream of ancient strivings that stirred the imagination and touched him as another chord of that "still sad music of humanity," which came to him from a distance, as it were, sitting in philosophic aloofness. He would ruminate gently over "old, unhappy, far-off things and battles long ago," but to Scott the unhappiness concerned him far less than the variety and excitement, and battles for him were never "long ago," but exhilarating actualities near at hand.

(c) His Hearty Humanity—The fictions of Scott are the inevitable expression of his temperament; they are genuinely romantic, not subtly so, not deeply so, but alive with the colour and movement of bygone times. Charles Reade worked up his subject with the patience and enterprise of a conscientious and imaginative journalist. George Eliot reconstructed the past with the laborious zeal of the scholar; the past and the present were as one to Scott; he had no need of research or working up his subject. He breathed the past; it was part of himself, not a masquerade garb but bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh.

Yet Scott does not owe his superiority as an historical romancer to his greater store of knowledge but to his greater enthusiasm. In the long run, no doubt, the assimilation of years of antiquarian study gave him an advantage over novelists to whom an historical novel was wholly a tour de force. But there is no one of Scott's novels that shows a greater mastery over its material than, for instance, Thackeray's Esmond, while in sheer artistry he is, through carelessness, often inferior.

In historical enthusiasm, however, he is supreme among writers of fiction. It is no one particular century, no passing phase of social life that moved him, but the past as a whole. His antiquarian interests are so wide, so minute, that at times they overburden the narrative and make for tedium, but so sure is the man, so sure is his instinct for what is picturesque and dramatic, that we forget the antiquarian in the story-teller; and the lasting impression upon our minds is the impression of vitality.

And what gives his historical pictures their vital significance is the hearty humanity with which he endows them. Scott was no psychologist, in the sense that we apply the term to literary artists like George Eliot, Meredith, or Hardy. He was not given to analysis of any kind and was notoriously careless in giving reality to his heroes and heroines, whom he is quite content to leave as picturesque accessories to the stories. But whenever he has to deal with humble folk, he shows a lively sense of their virtues and foibles, and is as warm in his democratic sympathies as is Burns himself.

The essential kindness and generous sympathies of the man exhaled from his romances. Dealing as he often does with gross and barbarous times, he humanised their fiercer and more repellent elements. His simple direct nature, while impelling him to overlook much that was fascinating and mysterious, acted like a moral antiseptic when dealing with dubious and morbid subjects. That much abused word "wholesome" is peculiarly applicable to Scott's work. It is full of good sense, manly feeling, and a rich if not subtle humour. As a humorist his great divergence from the great humorists of the eighteenth century lies in his distaste for satire.

Satire presupposes the moralist. Scott was not a moralist, he was content to tell a good story in verse or prose, to dash off a situation, to light up an oddity, without ulterior comment. Yet, if no moralist by intent, he was a moralist in effect. After reading one of his romances, the tribute of Byron rises to our memory: "Walter Scott is as nearly a thoroughly good man as a man can be, because I know it by experience to be the case."

SCOTT'S INFLUENCE AND SIGNIFICANCE IN ENGLISH LITERATURE

Coleridge said of Schiller that he was "Master not of the intense drama of passion but the diffused drama of history." The same might be said of Scott; and his greatness lies in the breadth and range of his romantic sympathies. Take his work piecemeal, and his limitations are soon perceived.

In his verse the elements of awe, mystery, and wonder are seldom touched. His muse is robust, facile, theatrical; not subtle, profound, inevitable.

His intimate acquaintance with mediæval romance is, in itself, a positive bar to high distinction of phrase. If he had captured the opulent variety of the old romances, he had carried away no little of their fluent redundancy, while his conservatism led him to retain something of the stilted phraseology of the age in which he had been cradled. His metrical inferiority to such a consummate master as Coleridge is made evident at once by comparing the Lay of the Last Minstrel with Christabel. It was on hearing the recital of Christabel, while that poem was still in manuscript, that inspired the "light horseman stanza," which he favoured so greatly. But the variety, the delicacy, the easy charm of Coleridge as a metrist were beyond his more vigorous, straightforward methods.

In his fiction the same defects are apparent, though less obtrusive, because of the fecundity of concrete life that crowds the pages. It is most distinctly felt in the bluntness of his characterisation, and the careless manipulation of his plots. Beside Dumas his awkwardness as a story-teller is realised again and again, beside the great novelists of the Victorian era, his characterisation is often insipid and superficial.

Let these failings and limitations be frankly acknowledged. It remains for us to say wherein, despite of these, lies his unassailable greatness.

In the first place, he is great because he links up most of the various phases of romanticism that meet us in his predecessors: the elemental charm of the Old English ballad, the diablerie of German romanticism, a love of the picturesque and sublime in nature, enthusiasm for the pomp and ritual of mediæval social life. These had already been heralded in Percy's Reliques, in Burger's Lenore and Goethe's Goetz, in Mrs Radcliffe's novels, the verse of Collins, Gray, and Cowper, and in the fiction of Horace Walpole. Scott brings them together, focussing their power, in both verse and prose. What is morbid and exotic he puts aside, and if he lacked the subtlety and delicacy of some of these exponents, there is no mistaking the big, massive effects of his large and varied canvases. Thus romanticism is no longer the literary inspiration of a few detached artists, it has become a power to move the many.

It has been often pointed out how that Scott's work falls into a threefold division, in the form of the popular ballad, of the metrical romance, of the historical novel; what has been less seldom emphasized is the fact that his greatness lies in all-round excellence, by the vigorous breadth and ease shown in each of those departments, rather than in his supreme technical mastery of any particular one. He succeeds by reason of his versatility and unerring popular appeal.

Critically considered, his ballads, with all their verve and swing and attractive charm, never attain the imaginative heights of such pieces as The Ancient Mariner, nor the exquisite workmanship of Rose Mary and Sister Helen. But, taken as a whole, there is no collection of ballads to equal much less rival, Scott's, for he has not only greater knowledge but, what is more important, a saner taste than Percy. Mention of his ballad work must not pass without reference to his exceptionally fine ballad Proud Mary, where he comes nearer than anywhere else to Coleridge and Keats.

Compared with his splendid work as a ballad writer, his metrical romances seem of less enduring fame. But it is easier to see their defects, perhaps, than appreciate their merits to-day. Despite their limitations and inequalities of workmanship, their narrative power is of the first order; and not only Macaulay and Browning, but more modern tellers of tales in verse, owe much to the vivid and graphic force displayed in Marmion and The Lady of the Lake.

Most important of all is Scott's significance as a novelist. Here he was both an innovator and a conservator.

He brought to converge upon the novel the same scattered influences of romanticism that he did in his poetry, enriching its theme, and founts of inspiration with his wealth of antiquarian lore, his open-air enthusiasm, his delight in the colour and movement of bygone times, and his intimate knowledge of Scottish life.

And while doing this he retained many of those great qualities that had distinguished the masters of eighteenth-century fiction, humour, shrewd common sense, actuality. Hitherto Romance and Realism had been sworn foes. It was the realism of Nash and Green that had given the first blow to mediæval romance, a more effective blow had been struck by the artistry of Defoe, and now, when the literary tide was flowing strongly for romance once more, Scott, instead of placing them in violent opposition as mediævalists like Walpole and Mrs Radcliffe were doing, blended them together.

The union did not prove a permanent one, for the romantic tendency and the realistic tendency urge of necessity in opposite ways, but both realism and romance were the better for this temporary partnership.

Thus the historical novel as created by Scott was an entirely fresh departure in fiction. One has only to compare the Waverley Novels with the historical fiction preceding those to realise the originality of his formula. Strictly considered, every historical novel is a romantic speculation. With the adroit use of material that has come down to us we may be able to reconstruct a picture of twelfth, fifteenth, or sixteenth century life; but, frankly, we have not the data for knowing exactly how the various classes of society spoke and acted in those times. The earlier historical story-teller had tried to surmount the difficulty by disconnecting the past from the present and by enclosing his tale in a strange and alien setting, to create the necessary illusion. Scott saw with his keen common-sense that this was entirely wrong. It is quite true that he possessed exceptional knowledge of the past, but his success did not lie in this.

His knowledge merely helped him. He succeeded because in place of hauling the past into the present and thereby disconnecting past and present, he boldly projected the present into the past, using his knowledge of contemporary life to humanise his old-world characters. Manners may change and fashions alter, but human nature remains constant; and thus we have the apparent paradox that Scott's success as an historical novelist lay in his sturdy realism; that he made the men of Robin Hood's day and Shakespeare's day alive and actual by virtue of his acquaintance with the men that lived around the Tweed of his own day. Wisely, moreover, he does not concentrate the interest around the historical figures of the past, but around his own fictitious characters, for his own characters, after all, were real, they were drawn from personal observation, his historical sketches were clever guesswork. He envelops his characters with the broad strands of real historical events, yet he bids us follow not the intrigues of Louis XI but the varying fortunes of Quentin Durward. Such was his method, and such the method adopted by his numerous followers—James, Answorth, Lytton, Kingsley, Hugo, Dumas.

IVANHOE

The portal, which led from the inner wall of the barbican to the moat, and which corresponded with a sally-port in the main wall of the castle, was now suddenly opened; the temporary bridge was then thrust forward, and soon flashed in the waters, extending its length between the castle and outwork, and forming a slippery and precarious passage for two men abreast to cross the moat. Well aware of the importance of taking the foe by surprise, the Black Knight, closely followed by Cedric, threw himself upon the bridge, and reached the opposite side. Here he began to thunder with his axe upon the gate of the castle, protected in part from the shot and stones cast by the defenders by the ruins of the former drawbridge, which the Templar had demolished in his retreat from the barbican, leaving the counterpoise still attached to the upper part of the portal. The followers of the knight had no such shelter, two were instantly shot with cross-bow bolts, and two more fell into the moat; the others retreated back into the barbican.

The situation of Cedric and the Black Knight was now truly dangerous, and would have been still more so, but for the constancy of the archers in the barbican, who ceased not to shower their arrows upon the battlements, distracting the attention of those by whom they were manned, and thus affording a respite to their two chiefs from the storm of missiles which must otherwise have overwhelmed them. But their situation was eminently perilous, and was becoming more so with every moment.

"Shame on ye all!" cried De Bracy to the soldiers around him; "do ye call yourselves cross-bowmen, and let these two dogs keep their station under the walls of the castle!—Heave over the coping-stones from the battlements, an' better may not be—Get pickaxe and levers, and down with that huge pinnacle!" pointing to a heavy piece of stone carved work that projected from the parapet.

At this moment the besiegers caught sight of the red flag upon the angle of the tower which Ulrica had described to Cedric. The good yeoman Locksley was the first who was aware of it, as he was hastening to the outwork, impatient to see the progress of the assault.

"Saint George!" he said, "Merry Saint George for England!—To the charge, bold yeomen!—why leave ye the good knight and noble Cedric to storm the pass alone?—make in, mad priest, show thou canst fight for thy rosary—make in, brave yeomen!—the castle is ours, we have friends within—See yonder flag, it is the appointed signal—Torquillstone is ours!—Think of honour, think of spoil—One effort, and the place is ours!"

With that he bent his good bow, and sent a shaft right through the breast of one of the men-at-arms, who, under De Bracy's direction, was loosening a fragment from one of the battlements to precipitate on the heads of Cedric and the Black Knight. A second soldier caught from the hands of the dying man the iron crow, with which he heaved at and had loosened the stone pinnacle, when, receiving an arrow through his head-piece, he dropped from the battlements into the moat a dead man. The men-at-arms were daunted, for no armour seemed proof against the shot of this tremendous archer.

"Do you give ground, base knaves!" said De Bracy; "Mout joye Saint Dennis!—Give me the lever."

And, snatching it up, he again assailed the loosened pinnacle, which was of weight enough, if thrown down, not only to have destroyed the remnant of the drawbridge which sheltered the two foremost assailants, but also to have sunk the rude float of planks over which they had crossed. All saw the danger, and the boldest, even the stout Friar himself, avoided setting foot on the raft. Thrice did Locksley bend his shaft against De Bracy, and thrice did his arrow bound back from the knight's armour of proof.

"Curse on thy Spanish steel-coat!" said Locksley, "had English smith forged it, these arrows had gone through, as as if it had been silk or sendal." He then began to call out,—"Comrades! friends! noble Cedric! bear back, and let the run fall!"

His warning voice was unheard, for the din which the knight himself occasioned by his strokes upon the postern would have drowned twenty war-trumpets. The faithful Gurth indeed sprang forward on the planked bridge, to warn Cedric of his impending fate, or to share it with him. But his warning would have come too late, the massive pinnacle already tottered, and De Bracy, who still heaved at his task, would have accomplished it, had not the voice of the Templar sounded close in his ear.

"All is lost, De Bracy, the castle burns!"

"Thou art mad to say so!" replied the knight.

"It is all in a light flame on the western side. I have striven in vain to extinguish it!"

With the stern coolness which formed the basis of his character, Brian de Bois-Guilbert communicated this hideous intelligence, which was not so calmly received by his astonished comrade.

"Saints of Paradise!" said De Bracy; "what is to be done? I vow to St. Nicholas of Limoges a candle-stick of pure gold!"

"Spare thy vow," said the Templar, "and mark me lead thy men down, as if for a sally, throw the postern-gate open. There are but two men who occupy the float, fling them into the moat, and push across to the barbican. I will charge from the main gate, and attack the barbican on the outside, and if we can regain that post, be assured we shall defend ourselves until we are relieved, or at least till they grant us fair quarter."

"It is well thought upon," said De Bracy, "I will play my part—Templar, thou wilt not fail me?"

"Hand and glove, I will not!" said Bois-Guilbert. "But haste thee, in the name of God!"

ROB ROY

As I sauntered on, I found the gardener hard at his evening employment, and saluted him, as I paused to look at his work. "Good even, my friend!"

"Gudo e'en—gudo e'en t'ye," answered the man, without looking up, and in a tone which at once indicated his northern extraction.

"Fine weather for your work, my friend!"

"It's no that mukle to be complemended o'" answered the man, with that limited degree of praise which gardeners and farmers usually bestow on the very best weather. Then raising his head, as if to see who spoke to him, he touched his Scotch bonnet with an air of respect, as he observed, "Eh, gude sae us!—it's a sight for sair een, to see a gold-laced joustiecor in the Ha' garden sae late at e'en."

"A gold-laced what, my good friend?"

"Ou, a joustiecor—that's a jacket like your ain, there. They hae other things to do wi' them up yonder—unbuttoning them to make room for the beef and the bag-puddings, and the claret-wine, nae doubt—that's the ordinary for evening lecture on this side the border."

"There's no such plenty of good cheer in your country, my good friend," I replied, "as to tempt you to sit so late at it."

"Hout, sir, ye ken little about Scotland; it's no for want of gude vivres—the best of fish, flesh, and fowl hae we, by eybos, ingans, turneeps, and other garden fruit. But we hae mense and discretion, and are moderate of our mouths.—but here, frae the kitchen to the ha', it's fill and fetch mair, frae the tae end of the four-and-twenty till the t'other. Even their fast days—they ca' it fasting when they hae the best o' sea-fish frae Hartlepool and Sunderland by land carriage, forbye trout, grisees, salmon, and a' the lave o't, and so they make their very fasting a kind of luxury and abomination; and then the awfu' masses and matins of the puir deceived souls—But I shouldna speak about them, for your honour will be a Roman, I'se warrant, like the lave?"

"Not I, my friend, I was bred an English Presbyterian, or dissenter."

"The right hand o' fellowship to your honour, then," quoth the gardener, with as much alacrity as his hard features were capable of expressing, and, as if to show that his good-will did not rest on words, he plucked forth a huge horn snuff-box, or mull, as he called it, and proffered a pinch with a most fraternal grin.

Having accepted his courtesy, I asked him if he had been long a domestic at Osbaldistone Hall.

"I have been fighting with wild beasts at Ephesus," said he, looking towards the building, "for the best part of those four-and-twenty years, as sure as my name's Andrew Fairservice."

"But, my excellent friend Andrew Fairservice, if your religion and your temperance are so much offended by Roman rituals and southern hospitality, it seems to me that you must have been putting yourself to an unnecessary penance all this while, and that you might have found a service where they eat less, and are more orthodox in their worship. I dare say it cannot be want of skill which prevented your being placed more to your satisfaction."

"It diana become me to speak to the point of my qualifications," said Andrew, looking round him with great complacency, "but nae doubt I should understand my trade of horticulture, seeing I was bred in the parish of Droepdail, where they raise lang-kale under glass, and force the early nettles for their spring kale. And, to speak truth, I hae been flitting every term these four-and-twenty years, but when the time comes, there's aye something to saw that I would like to see sawn,—or something to mow that I would like to see mown, or something t' ripe that I would like to see ripen,—and sae I e'en daiker on wi' the family frae year's end to year's end. And I wad say for certain, that I am gaun to quit at Cannlemas, only I was just as positive on it twenty years syne, and I find myself still turning up the mools here, for a' that. Forbye that, to tell your honour the evendown truth, there's nae better place over offered to Andrew. But if your honour wad wush me to any place where I wad hear pure doctrine, and hae a free cow's grass, and a cot, and a yard, and mair than ten pounds of annual fee, and where there's nae leddy about the town to count the apples, I'se hold myself muckle indebted t'ye."

"Bravo, Andrew! I perceive you'll lose no preference for want of asking patronage."

"I canna see what for I should," replied Andrew; "it's no a generation to wait till ane's worth's discovered, I trow."

"But you are no friend, I observe, to the ladies."

"Na, by my troth, I keep up the first gardener's quarrel to them. They're faehous bargains—aye crying for apricocks, pears, plums, and apples, summer and winter, without distinction o' seasons; but we hae nae slices o' the spare rib here, be praised for't! except auld Martha, and she's weel enough pleased wi' the freedom o' the berry-bushes to her sister's weans, when they come to drink tea in the holiday in the house-keeper's room, and wi' a wheen oodlings now and then for her ain private supper."

PROUD MAIRIE

Proud Mairie is in the wood,
Walking so early;
Sweet robin sits on the bush,
Singing so rarely.
"Tell me, thou bonny bird,
When shall I marry me?"
"When six braw gentlemen Kirkward shall carry ye."
"Who makes the bridal bed, Birdie, say truly?"
"The grey-headed sexton
That delves the grave duly
"The glow-worm o'er grave and stone
Shall light thee steady
The owl from the steeple ang,
Welcome, proud lady!"

THE LADY OF THE LAKE

Their light-arm'd archers far and near Survey'd the tangled ground,
Their centre ranks, with spike and spear,
A twilight forest frown'd,
Their barbed horsemen, in the rear,
The stern battalia crown'd,
No cymbal clash'd, no clarion rang,
Still were the pipe and drum;
Save heavy tread, and armour's clang,
The sullen march was dumb
There breathed no wind their crests to shake
Or wave their flags abroad,
Scarce the frail aspen seem'd to quake,
That shadow'd o'er their road
Their vaward scouts no tidings bring,
Can rouse no lurking foe,
Nor spy a trace of living thing
Save when they stirr'd the roe,
The host moves like a deep-sea wave,
Where rise no rocks its pride to brave,
High-swelling, dark, and slow
The lake is pass'd, and now they gain
A narrow and a broken plain,
Before the Trossach's rugged jaws,
And here the horse and spearman pause,
While, to explore the dangerous glen,
Dive through the pass the archer-mon

At once there rose so wild a yell
Within that dark and narrow dell,
As all the fiends from heaven that fell
Had peal'd the banner-cry of Hell!
Forth from the pass, in tumult driven,
Lake chaff before the wind of heaven,
The archery appear.
For life! for life! their plight they ply,
And shriek, and shout, and hattle-ory,
And plaid and bonnets waving high,
And broadsword flashing to the sky,
Are maddening in the rear
Onward they drive, in dreadful race,
Pursuers and pursued;
Before that tide of flight and chase,
How shall it keep its rooted place,
The spearman's twilight wood?
"Down, down," cried Mar, "your lances down,
Bear back both friend and foe!"
Like reeds before the tempest's frown,

That serried grove of lances brown
 At once lay leuell'd low,
 And, closely shouldering side to side,
 The bristling ranks the onset bide,—
 "We'll quell the savage mountain
 As their Tinchel cows the game!
 They came as fleet as forest deer,
 We'll drive them back as tame."

SCOTT AND THE BALLAD MAKERS

Scott's name and fame are associated closely with his two countrymen, JAMES HOGG, the "Ettrick Shepherd," and JOHN LEYDEN. Of Hogg I have spoken elsewhere; he was a genuine poet of a subtler though less varied imagination than Scott, and as a ballad writer found literature more profitable than "driving sheep to Edinburgh." Leyden was a scholar equally versed in Sanscrit and Border-lore. He had much to do with Scott's earlier studies in balladry, and though his own output was slight, is the author of a few ballads, the Elf-King and The Mermaid for instance, that deserve to rank alongside of the work of Scott and Hogg.

A BOY'S SONG

Where the pools are bright and deep,
 Where the grey trout lies asleep,
 Up the river and over the lee,
 That's the way for Billy and me.

Where the blackbird sings the latest,
 Where the hawthorn blooms the sweetest,
 Where the nestlings chirp and flee,
 That's the way for Billy and me.

Where the mowers mow the cleanest,
 Where the hay lies thick and greenest,
 There to track the homeward bee,
 That's the way for Billy and me.

Where the hazel bank is steepest,
 Where the shadow falls the deepest,
 Where the clustering nuts fall free,
 That's the way for Billy and me.

Why the boys should drive away
 Little sweet maidens from the play,
 Or love to hanker and fight so well,
 That's the thing I never could tell.

But this I know, I love to play
 Through the meadow, among the hay;
 Up the water and over the lee,
 That's the way for Billy and me.¹

KILMENY

She saw a sun on a summer sky,
 And clouds of amber sailing by;
 A lovely land beneath her lay,
 And that land had glens and mountains gray;
 And that land had valleys and hoary piles,
 And marled sons, and a thousand isles.
 Its fields were speckled, its forests green,
 And its lakes were all of the dazzling sheen,
 Like magic mirrors, where slumbering lay
 The sun and the sky and the cloudlet gray,
 Which heaved and trembled, and gently swung,
 On every shore they seem'd to be hung;
 For there they were seen on their homeward plain
 A thousand times and a thousand again,
 In winding lake and placid firth,
 Little peaceful heavens in the bosom of earth.

Kilmeny sigh'd and seem'd to grieve,
 For she found her heart to that land did cleave;
 She saw the corn wave on the vale,
 She saw the deer run down the dale,
 She saw the plaid and the broad claymore,
 And the brows that the badge of freedom bore;
 And she thought she had seen the land before.¹

Another Scottish singer is ROBERT TANNAHILL (1774-1810). He was a weaver of Paisley with an original gift of song, and temperamentally had more in common with Burns than with Scott. His main concern is love—love primal and passionate, and such a lyric as Jeannie, the Flower of Dunblane, is among the most intimate and moving songs that breathe an elemental atmosphere of nature and humanity.

ALLAN CUNNINGHAM (1784-1842) was a stonemason of Dumfriesshire. He attracted the notice and won the friendship of Sir Walter Scott, who admired his gift for vivid, homely ballad-writing. His stirring sea song, A Wet Sheet and a Flowing Sea, is a first-rate ballad of its kind, and there is a direct simplicity about Hame, Hame, Hame, that makes its appeal at once.

Cunningham wrote a useful Life of Burns, and will be remembered also for his services in collecting Scottish songs.

HAME HAME, HAME

Hame, hame, hame, O hame fain wad I be—
 O hame, hame, hame, to my ain countree!

When the flower is ' the bud and the leaf is on the tree,
 The larks shall sing me hame in my ain countree,
 Hame, hame, hame, O hame fain wad I be—
 O hame, hame, hame, to my ain countree!

The green leaf of loyalty's beginning for to fa',
 The bonnie White Rose it is withering an' a'
 But I'll water 't wi' the blude of usurping tyrannie,
 An' green it will grow in my ain countree.

O, there's naucht now frae run my country can save,
 But the keys o' kind heaven, to open the grave,
 That a' the noble martyrs wia died for loyalty
 May rise again an' fight for their ain countree.

The great now are gane, a' wae ventured to save,
 The new grass is springing on the top o' their grave;
 But the sun through the mirk blinks blythe in my e'e,
 "I'll shine on ye yet in your ain countree."

Hame, hame, hame, O hame fain wad I be—
 O hame, hame, hame, to my ain countree!

Along with Cunningham must be mentioned WILLIAM MOTHERWELL (1797-1835), who, like Tannahill, was a native of Paisley, and, like "honest Allan," was an admirer and editor of Burns. He wrote also a Life of Tannahill, and in 1819 and 1827 published a collection of songs. The Harp of Renfrewshire and Minstrelsy Ancient and Modern. His most distinctive claim to remembrance lies less in his Scottish songs, excellent as some of these are, than in his ballads from the Norse. The rich folklore of Scandinavia was yet to find its great modern discoverer, but Gray and Motherwell are certainly among the early pioneers.

The fighting note in Motherwell's muse finds a counterpart in Campbell's ballads. THOMAS CAMP-

BELL (1777-1844) has more affinity with the English Gothic School than with the simpler, more elemental ballad writers with whom we have been concerned. There is something of Mrs. Radcliffe's melodramatic violence in Campbell's effects, and the colours he lays on so freely are not free from the charge of tawdriness. None the less, at his best, he is a spirited and impressive song-writer in the realm of "battle, murder, and sudden death."

Born in Glasgow of a business family, he proceeded to the University in due course, where he experimented freely in his favourite form of rhetorical verse. He was well acquainted with the wild scenery of the Island of Mull, and while watching the storms break there he was eagerly watchful also of the fiercer storms enveloping Revolutionary France.

His earliest work, The Pleasures of Hope, though romantic in feeling, was cast into the familiar mould of Pope—a mould certainly not adapted for exhibiting Campbell's peculiar gifts to the best advantage. His vigorous imagination, however, impressed the readers of his day, and he won the notice of Scott, who soon interested him in ballad minstrelsy.

His early experiments in this direction are not happy; exhibiting the extravagances rather than the merits of the Romantic School, it was not until the time of his journey abroad, when the invading armies of France were carrying all before them, that his ballads caught fire. Revolutionary France warned his blood, and all the horrors and fascinations of the fight took possession of his imagination. There he found the inspiration for Ye Mariners of England, Hohenlinden, and The Battle of the Baltic.

Apart from his songs, Campbell is not an interesting writer. He imitates Scott's romantic narrative with nothing of Scott's rich, concrete power.

YE MARINERS OF ENGLAND

Ye Mariners of England
That guard our native seas!
Whose flag has braved a thousand years,
The battle and the breeze!
Your glorious standard launch again
To match another foe,
And sweep through the deep,
While the stormy winds do blow!
While the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy winds do blow!

The spirit of your fathers
Shall start from every wave—
For the deck it was their field of fame,
And Ocean was their grave.
Where Blake and mighty Nelson fell
Your manly hearts shall glow,
As ye sweep through the deep,
While the stormy winds do blow!
While the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy winds do blow.

Britannia needs no bulwarks,
No towers along the steep;
Her march is o'er the mountain-waves,
Her home is on the deep.
With thunders from her native oak
She quells the floods below,
As they roar on the shore,
When the stormy winds do blow!
When the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy winds do blow.

The meteor flag of England
Shall yet terrific burn;
Till danger's troubled night depart
And the star of peace return.
Then, then, ye ocean-warriors!
Our song and feast shall flow
To the fame of your name,
When the storm has ceased to blow!
When the fiery fight is heard no more,
And the storm has ceased to blow.

If Ireland can boast no such body of singers as can Scotland, she can at any rate claim one of the most popular literary personalities of his own or any other time, that of TOM MOORE (1779-1852). Born in Dublin, May 28, 1779, the son of a grocer, he received a good education, and after leaving Trinity College, Dublin, he went to study law at the Middle Temple. Like many another "literary gent," he speedily turned his attention from legal subtleties to the delights of letters, and in the early years of the century did well with a translation of Anacreon and the Poems of Thomas Little. An appointment in the Bermudas (1803) proved of some financial value, but subsequently, owing to the misconduct of his deputy, he became involved in pecuniary difficulties, through which he gallantly waded. Two volumes of verse in rapid succession, including the Irish Melodies, a duel with Jeffrey, and a brilliant explosion of political squibs entitled The Twopenny Post bag, occupied the next few years. Jeffrey subsequently became a firm friend, and Moore varied his sentimental and satiric moods adroitly. Lalla Rookh, an Oriental fantasy, followed in 1817 and met with great success. The Fudge Family of the following year was in his satirical and jocular vein. If his later verse is not so happy as the earlier, he gave ample evidence of his mental vigour and versatility by an ingenious prose romance, The Epicurean, and an admirable Life of Byron. In 1835 he was pensioned, but his last years were somewhat clouded by mental disease.

The vogue of Moore has long since died out, and we are more likely to undervalue him to-day and to echo Hazlitt's caustic criticism. But he has not a few claims to our remembrance, and was something better than the shallow, facile rhymester he sometimes appears.

Certainly the personality that emerges from his own naïve and exuberant letters and journals is an attractive one. A cheerful, honest soul at heart, with a fund of genuine humour, vain but by no means self-sufficient, kindly and tender, terribly sentimental, though a fine strain of imagination breathes through the facile sentimentality at times. Something of a poseur and a dandy it is true, but in this he was of his time, and he never took his own pranks and posings seriously. If not original, and too often commonplace, he is sincere and almost invariably pleasing, whether in his graceful and tender melodies or his smartly-written and neatly effective sarcasms.

In his own day he was amazingly popular. Shelley admired his verse, Coleridge praised his deftly mingled poetry and music, and "the music, like the honeysuckle round the stem, twining round the meaning and at last overtopping it," and he retained, through varying vicissitudes, the friendship of Byron despite the poet's gibe on a certain occasion when they stood watching a Venetian sunrise: "Damn it, Tom, don't be poetical!" When he entered a Dublin theatre the audience acclaimed him as if he had been royalty, and even on a rough sea voyage, we are told, he was not safe from the admiring embraces of elderly ladies!

Of Moore's poetry, the Irish Airs present him at his happiest. His Orientalism was a veneer, and he had little power to suggest the mysticism and passion of the East. Lalla Rookh, inspired by Southey and Byron, is no more than a fancy dress masquerade, for all its brave show of learning, and the irrepressible Tom, with his fine Whig sympathies and fashionable sentimentalism, can be discerned easily. The Irish Airs stand on another plane. It is true that they have no touch of what we call "Celtic magic," and give no expression to the subtler spiritual ecstasies of the Irish temperament, but they have a sweet cadence, a delicate pathos, and if they do not transport you to "a peak in Darien," they conduct you through very agreeable meadowland.

THE YOUNG MAY MOON

The young May moon is beaming, love,
The glow-worm's lamp is gleaming, love;
How sweet to rove
Through Morna's grove,
When the drowsy world is dreaming, love!
Then awake!—the heavens look bright, my dear,
'Tis never too late for delight, my dear,
And the best of all ways
To lengthen our days
Is to steal a few hours from the flight, my dear!

Now all the world is sleeping, love,
But the Sage, his star-watch keeping, love,
And I, whose star
More glorious far
Is the eye from that casement peeping, love
Then awake!—till rise of sun, my dear,
The Sage's glass we'll shun, my dear,
Or in watching the flight
Of bodies of light
He might happen to take thee for one, my dear!

THE LIGHT OF OTHER DAYS

Oft, in the still night,
Ere slumber's chain has bound me,
Fond Memory brings the light
Of other days around me
The smiles, the tears
Of boyhood's years,
The words of love then spoken;
The eyes that shone,
Now dimm'd and gone,
The cheerful hearts now broken!
Thus, in the still night,
Ere slumber's chain has bound me,
Sad Memory brings the light
Of other days around me

When I remember all
The friends, so link'd together,
I've seen around me fall
Like leaves in wintry weather,
I feel like one
Who treads alone
Some banquet-hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed!
Thus, in the still night,
Ere slumber's chain has bound me,
Sad Memory brings the light
Of other days around me.

SHELLEY AND HIS CIRCLE

WHATEVER intellectual and emotional differences may separate the various circles of Romantic poets, one and all paid whole-hearted allegiance to Nature. Even that restless man of the world, Byron, could enjoy to the full the charms of a solitary landscape, while the song of a bird took captive the rich, concrete imagination of Keats, the transcendental ecstasy of Shelley, the brooding spirit of Wordsworth. This is the bond uniting all the Romantic singers. It was an intimate and potent one, and it is well to bear it in mind when noticing the particular characteristics of each circle, and the idiosyncrasies of individual members of these circles. For while it is convenient to treat of these poets in groups, and while mutual influences were considerable, the artistic originality and intense individuality of the greater souls must always be borne in mind.

In the poetry passed under review, the main thing has been the reiteration of the importance of ordinary folk and commonplace things, and of the simple joys and beauties of Nature. But these, as we have seen, by no means exhaust the Romantics. The intellectual implications of Ro-manicism, only hinted at now and again in Wordsworth and Coleridge, come boldly to the fore in the small choric circle of poets with whom we shall now be dealing.

[Moral and intellectual freedom/ social emancipation, and a rich abandonment to the sensuous delights of life, these are matters that find full expression in the work of poets like Byron, Shelley, Keats

GEORGE GORDON NOEL, 6TH LORD BYRON (1788-1824)

HIS LIFE

One of Byron's early biographers, John Galt, has summarised the poet as "a mystery in a winding-sheet crowned with a halo." His latest biographer, Miss Ethel Colburn Mayne, sees in this self-styled "victim of her sex" one of "the most splendid examples we have of the struggling, winning and losing, enjoying and scorning, aspiring and falling, loving and hating human spirits."¹

Born on January 22, 1788, in London, Byron was singularly unfortunate in both his parents. His father was a handsome blackguard, nominally a soldier, who, having squandered his wife's fortune, deserted her and their child, and died in France in 1791. His mother, Miss Gordon of Gight, a woman of the most passionate extremes, would at one time spoil her son by over-indulgence and immediately after goad him into fury by her cruel taunts at his lameness, although he had bravely suffered the most excruciating torture at the hands of incapable practitioners in the vain hope of a cure.

During an early upbringing in comparative poverty he attended a cheap day-school at Aberdeen, but failed here to learn even his letters, for which his mother "boxed his ears." Private tuition followed, and then—a warm-hearted, lively lad, quicker to give a blow than accept one—pursued his instruction at Aberdeen Grammar School until 1798, when, on the death of his great uncle, he inherited the title and an impoverished estate.

Removing with his mother, first to Nottingham, then to London, the youthful peer was placed with Dr. Glennie at Dulwich, preparatory to his entrance at Harrow, but his mother's injudicious behaviour and self-will so greatly impeded his studies, that the boy was considerably below the standard of other boys of his age when he went up in 1801, shy and sensitive, "more easily led by a silken thread than by a cable." Cricket and boating were always favourite pastimes, and in the noble art of self-defence he "lost but one battle in seven."

With the reputation of an idler he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1805, though he had wished for Christ Church, Oxford, but there was no vacancy. He made no profession of serious study, but was an omnivorous reader, particularly interested in Oriental history, and while "I took my gradations in the vices with great promptitude," he says, "I could not share in the commonplace libertinism of the place and time without disgust." To the alarm and indignation of the college authorities he kept bulldozers in his rooms, and a bear cub that he said was "in training for a fellow-up." In 1808 he left the University with an M.A. degree, "because the old beldam could not avoid it."
